Mr. Speller: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the May day holiday is a total flop in terms of British tourism? Will she consider helping our most successful industry by amalgamating the Spring bank holiday and the May day bank holiday to make one worthwhile west country break?

The Prime Minister: We went out to consultations on just such a scheme in 1982 but opinion was very divided and there was clearly no case at that moment for changing the present arrangements.

Dr. Owen: Does the Prime Minister agree that one of the lessons of last Thursday's elections was that people do not like absolute power exercised—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am trying to help Back Benchers to get to their questions.

Dr. Owen: Does the Prime Minister recognise that one of the lessons of last Thursday was that people do not like absolute power exercised by minorities, that they do not like ideology and dogmatism and that they are becoming increasingly fed up with the the Prime Minister's own hectoring style? Far from—[Interruption.] If we always have to make ourselves heard above a hubbub [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. All Members have to make themselves heard.

Dr. Owen: Does the Prime Minister realise that, having lost 750,000 votes at the last election, she now exercises power with the support of a minority of the population of this country?

The Prime Minister: As for the right hon. Gentleman's comments about a hectoring style, he has become the arch example of that very thing. I can think of no better description of the style that he has adopted. As for seeking power, the right hon. Gentleman is seeking almost absolute power on a smaller minority.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to consider the fact that in the past few days there has been hard evidence that industry and employment in Norwich have been adversely affected by the long drawn-out and futile miners' strike? Does she agree that in those circumstances it is hyprocisy for the Opposition to pose as the protectors of jobs?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Yes, employment was adversely affected, not only in the mining industry but among all the suppliers to the industry and many people are now out of a job as a result of that strike when they would otherwise have been in a job today. My hon. Friend is right. Strikes destroy jobs.

Mr. Freeson: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Foreign Office has been keeping files on Klaus Barbie and Dr. Mengele and has refused to release those files? In this week of VE celebrations, does the right hon. Lady agree that it would be appropriate to instruct the Foreign Office to release those files? What is it hiding?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we release files whenever we can to assist either in trials or in commissions of inquiry. That would be our policy, but there are occasions when for very good reasons we cannot do so.

Q6. Mr. Dover asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dover: Following the events of last Friday, what assurance can my right hon. Friend give the House that the Government will allow enough time for the passage of the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill promoted by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell)?

The Prime Minister: I understand my hon. Friend's concern about that Bill. I know that the Bill arouses strong feelings in the House, and I also feel strongly about it, but it has been the practice that the Government do not give Government time for private Members' Bills. Therefore, I cannot offer my hon. Friend any great comfort. My hon. Friend will doubtless also consult my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal, but I cannot give him any hope that he will get a different answer.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether there would be a place for Tory wets in her version of a classless society?

The Prime Minister: For a good climate one needs drys and wets.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Howarth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be great disappointment that the early negotiations to reduce trade barriers were blocked last week by the French? Will she assure British industry that she will continue to press on our major trading partners the urgent need to deal with this grave problem, which was highlighted by the visit to Japan of our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry?

The Prime Minister: The only one difference of opinion on trade between France and the other countries was not that France was anxious to keep protectionism — she agrees that we must do everything possible to reduce protectionism—but that she was not prepared to put her name to fixing a date for a new round of GATT. The rest of us felt that we should give a lead. France put her name to all other aspects of the communiqué about reducing protectionism.

Economic Summit (Bonn)

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about the economic summit which I attended in Bonn, accompanied by my right hon. and hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Heads of State or Government of the United States, France, West Germany, Italy, Canada and Japan were present, accompanied by their Foreign and Finance or Economic Ministers, together with the President of the European Commission.

I have placed in the Library of the House copies of the economic declaration and of the political declaration to mark the 40th anniversary of the end of the Second World War.

I shall deal first with the political issues. As countries which once fought each other bitterly, we recalled the benefits of reconciliation and of 40 years of co-operation, and pledged ourselves to their continuance. We welcomed the opening of negotiations in Geneva on the reduction of nuclear arms, expressed our appreciation of the positive proposals of the United States, and urged the Soviet Union to act positively and constructively to achieve significant agreements.

Foreign Ministers discussed the middle east, southern Africa and central America. They condemned the continuing, brutal occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet troops, and of Cambodia by Vietnam.

On Britain's initiative we had a discussion of the growing problems posed by drugs, and we agreed to set in hand work on further co-operative measures to combat the vicious trade, which is the cause of so much human suffering. We also reaffirmed our determination to strengthen further the co-operation against terrorism agreed at the London summit last year.

On economic matters, the discussion and the communiqué reflected the similarity between the approaches and policies of all seven Governments. We recognised the further progress since our last meeting in keeping down inflation and strengthening the basis for economic growth. We also welcomed the fact that the recovery has begun to spread to the developing world.

Nevertheless, we recognised that our countries still face important challenges. Among other things we need to strengthen the ability of our economies to respond to new developments; to increase job opportunities; to combat protectionism; and to improve the stability of the world monetary system.

To sustain non-inflationary growth and to create higher employment, we agreed, first, to consolidate and enhance the progress made in bringing down inflation; and, secondly, to follow prudent and, where necessary, strengthened monetary and budgetary policies with a view to stable prices, lower interest rates and more productive investment. Each of our countries will exercise firm control over public spending in order to reduce budget deficits when excessive, and, where necessary, reduce the share of public spending in gross national product.

Thirdly, we agreed to work to remove obstacles to growth and encourage initiative and enterprise so as to release the creative energies of our peoples, while maintaining appropriate social policies for those in need.

Fourthly, we agreed to promote greater adaptability and responsiveness in all markets, particularly for the labour market.

Fifthly, we agree to encourage training to improve occupational skills, particularly for the young.

Building on those common policies, each country indicated its specific priorities. For example, President Reagan emphasised his determination to achieve a substantial reduction in the United States' budget deficit. The Japanese Prime Minister undertook that his Government would make further progress in deregulating financial markets, promoting the international role of the yen, facilitating access to markets, and encouraging growth in imports. The United Kingdom will continue to work to reduce inflation, keep public spending under control, promote the development of small business and advanced technological industries, and encourage initiative and enterprise in the creation of new job opportunities.

On international trade, we agreed that protectionism does not solve problems, it creates them; that further progress in relaxing and dismantling trade restrictions is essential; that a new round of multilateral trade negotiations should begin as soon as possible, with the broadest possible participation; and that the preparations for the new round should begin with a meeting of GATT officials before the end of the summer. With the exception of France, we were agreed that the new GATT round should start in 1986. France was not prepared to commit herself to a date.

The discussions on international monetary questions, which began after the Williamsburg summit, will be completed next month, when the Group of Ten meets in Tokyo. It will put forward proposals for discussion in the interim committee of the IMF at its October meeting. We endorsed the case-by-case approach to the debt problems of the developing countries set out at the London summit.

We expressed our particular concern for the plight of African peoples suffering from famine and drought. While acknowledging the very substantial assistance provided not only by Governments but by private organisations and individual citizens, we instructed experts to report to the Foreign Ministers of the Seven at the end of September with proposals for further measures which might be necessary.

Particular concern was voiced about the practical distribution of food aid which has been so generously given, and the need for long-term polices of good husbandry to avoid creating more desert land. We also called on the Soviet Union and other Communist countries to assume their responsibilities in helping to relieve the suffering caused by famine and drought.

What was impressive in the summit discussions was the conviction of all represented there that lasting job opportunities can be created only if we maintain sound financial policies and open markets and remove disincentives and unhelpful regulations to foster a climate of more vigorous enterprise and initiative.

As the communiqué said,

"By pursuing these policies we will not only address our domestic problems, but at the same time contribute to an enduring growth of the world economy and a more balanced expansion of international trade."

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): First, I warmly commend the collective pledge made by the powers at Bonn actively to continue the reconciliation and co-operation which have benefited all countries in the past 40 years, whether they were former allies or former enemies.

Secondly, I support the Prime Minister in her continuing efforts to encourage international co-operation to combat drug trafficking and terrorism.

Thirdly, I warmly endorse the decision of the Prime Minister and five of her colleagues not to join President Reagan in his vindictive and dangerous policy of imposing a complete economic embargo on Nicaragua.

Fourthly, I must record deep disappointment that on economic issues the Bonn summit turned into yet another sit-tight summit. How many times will the Prime Minister register the need for monetary reform, the reduction of social inequality, the promotion of growth and trade, helping the poorest countries, and much else, and then, having recorded those challenges, dodge away from doing anything effective in any of those areas?

Specifically, does the Prime Minister recall that after the London summit, she told us that the summit seven, including Britain, would "encourage multi-yearly rescheduling" of the debts of poor countries, and that they would "seek to maintain and wherever possible increase the flow of official aid to developing countries, particularly the poorest"?

Against that background, why is it that in the ensuing 12 months the Governments of the summit countries have left rescheduling almost entirely to commercial institutions and have borne hardly any of the responsibilities themselves? Why is it that in that 12 months the British Government, under the right hon. Lady's leadership has, far from maintaining or increasing the flow of aid, cut the flow of official aid to the poorest countries in developing parts of the world?

The Prime Minister has told us that President Reagan emphasised his determination to achieve a substantial reduction in the United States' budget deficit. As the condition of the United States economy has been responsible for half of the growth rate in European economies in the past year, what effect does the right hon. Lady think the rapid reduction of the United States' budget deficit will have on our economy if there is no simultaneous compensating expansion of European economies, especially our own?

We have had another do-nothing summit this year. Will the right hon. Lady give us yet another do-nothing year when it comes to fighting unemployment at home and poverty and starvation abroad?

The Prime Minister: I note the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman on all Heads of State or Government, including those who share his political views and not mine. When they are in power, however, they pursue the same economic policies. The difference between them and the Socialists on the Opposition Benches is that a British Socialist Government promise everything, which takes them to the International Monetary Fund, while other Socialist parties, when in power, pursue much more conservative policies, both with a small c and a capital C. They do so because they are realistic. The right hon. Gentleman is extremely critical of his fellow Socialists who are Heads of State and of Socialist Governments.

I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has welcomed the political statement and the statement on drug trafficking.

We were not asked to join the United States in imposing sanctions on Nicaragua.

The right hon. Gentleman has talked of a sit-tight summit, but I have said that all Heads of State or Government are convinced that the policies that are being followed are the right ones. They will keep down inflation, and unless we try to do that we shall be doing great harm to employment prospects. Over the past year we have introduced the policies that were outlined in the Budget on training and for an increased community programme. These policies have not yet worked through, but they should provide more help to those who would otherwise be unemployed. About 600,000 more jobs have been created in the past six months. Britain is one of the few European countries that is creating more jobs.

There has been one agreement on multi-yearly rescheduling. There have not been more because such agreements require, first, the accord of the IMF. Normally, commercial banks do not lend unless there is agreement with the IMF to change policies, or a good prospect of it. That is the only proven policy to follow when one is lending through the banks other people's money.

We are one of the countries that gives aid priority to the poorest countries, even though these are not always the countries that will give us more jobs at home. Other countries do not always give such high priority in their total aid budgets to the poorer countries.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the reduction in the United States' budget deficit. As a percentage of gross national product, that deficit is not nearly as high as some think. The net deficit is 4¼ per cent., taking into account the surpluses that are produced by the separate states. We must consider the deficit in terms of the savings ratio. It would be far more advantageous to the world if we all brought down interest rates. That would give us far more sustained expansion than the policy that is now being pursued. We hope that that will be the result of the United States reducing its deficit to something more in tune with its lower savings ratio.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield. Hallam): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the sixth parliamentary and scientific conference run by the Council of Europe will take place in Japan at the end of the month? To what extent will Japanese markets be opened up to other countries?

Secondly, what would be the impact of protectionism on our own economy? About 50 per cent. of Britain's GDP lies in imports and exports and a move towards protectionism would not be in our interests nor those of the western world generally.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is much better for countries which rely on exports to try to open up the world's markets than to go for a policy of protectionism. Each and every one of us has some protectionist policies, but most of us felt that it would be far better to take them all to the next round of GATT and to bargain away some of our protectionism for a reduction in other people's protectionism. They would not all go at once, but that would be much better for those of us who depend on world trade. That applies to most developing countries, too.

With regard to the Japanese market, I think that Mr. Nakasone has realised far more than previous Prime Ministers the need to open up Japanese markets. I hope that we shall pursue the point vigorously through the European Economic Community. Some members of the Community have much tougher limits on the import of, for example, Japanese cars than others. It is quite clear that we cannot go on keeping our markets open unless other countries keep theirs equally open.

[The Prime Minister]

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): Why does the Prime Minister, who used to be most sceptical and impatient about the value of summits, now appear to be satisfied with one that has almost certainly produced the most flatulent and platitudinous communiqué of the 11 in the series? Can the Prime Minister tell us of one beneficial and constructive thing which she thinks will happen as a result of the summit and which would not otherwise have taken place?

The Prime Minister: I think that this is the first summit in which each country pledged itself to take specific action. I cannot remember a previous communiqué in which each country set out separately what——

Mr. Jenkins: The 1978 summit.

The Prime Minister: The 1978 summit in Bonn was disastrous because it reflated and led to the higher unemployment and some of the higher inflation which followed. I think that the right hon. Gentleman will find that Germany would never follow that course of action. I note that the right hon. Gentleman said that the summit was platitudinous. Platitudes are platitudes because they are true. Therefore, he believes that the economic policy that we set out is true. I am grateful for his support.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Was further aid for population control in African countries considered at the summit? Was reference made to the unhelpful attitude of the American Administration, and was that Administration encouraged to become less dogmatic and more realistic in that regard?

The Prime Minister: We are considering further what best to do about aid to those countries. Particular concern was voiced about it not always being easy to distribute the amount of aid that is given, whether in food or other items such as medicines. We must look further into that. We were also anxious not only to give emergency food aid but to help those countries to develop their agricultural economies so that they might produce better aid for themselves. We are also anxious to help them to get grains which are suitable for dry zone areas and generally to help them in husbandry.

As for the United States, I remember that, at the recent United Nations summit in Geneva on help to the African countries, the United States was extremely generous in her allocation of aid to Ethiopia and Sudan.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Is the Prime Minister aware that few people expected much from the summit as summits increasingly resemble the futility of the inter-war economic conferences? Will she say more about Japan's trade practices? Is she aware that they increasingly look like economic domination, as they did in 1941, rather than economic co-operation? Should she not have resisted that even more strongly?

The Prime Minister: It was not possible to be stronger than I was on certain aspects of Japanese trade, nor is it possible to be stronger. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that we have to pursue our trading arrangements with the outside world through the Community. I believe that M. Delors, the President of the Commission, will continue to pursue this matter as vigorously as we would wish.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): My right hon. Friend referred to the discussion about drug trafficking and the misuse of drugs. Will she elaborate further on that subject? Will there be room, on a pan-European and worldwide basis, to have joint activity in the same way that the Government have set up joint activity between Ministeries in this country? Does my right hon. Friend come back from the summit with an awareness of the need for even greater spending, particularly on the education of young people about the threat of this horrible drug trafficking menace?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, there is already some co-operation, between countries, but I believe that it can be stepped up. It is particularly urgent now that there appear to be more supplies of cocaine, and sometimes success in one country in discovering cocaine and destroying it can mean that the cocaine is then directed to a different country. Therefore, we in Europe have to be very wary of what is happening, and do all that we can to stop it coming in.

As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has issued a statement on what we are doing about reducing drug trafficking. He has also made it clear that he expects to introduce legislation to confiscate the assets of those who are convicted of drug trafficking so that, having suffered a prison sentence, they shall not nevertheless still be in possession of the enormous sums that are involved. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and the several Departments will co-operate with other countries in doing everything that we can, and if it means more expenditure, we shall have to undertake it.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Is the Prime Minister satisfied that the approach of the summit to economic recovery was sufficiently urgent? Does she recall the recent reminder by Paul Volcker, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, that over the past two years American expansion and the impact of higher imports were responsible for 70 per cent. of growth against only 40 per cent. of OECD output for the same reasons? Does not the right hon. Lady accept that that era is now ended, for there is unmistakable evidence of slowdown in the United States? Does she not agree with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that the most urgent requirement of the summit was to come forward with a set of appropriate and compensating measures?

The Prime Minister: I tried to answer that in part in my reply to a previous question. Certainly last year there was a 9 per cent. increase in world trade. Half of it was attributable to more imports into the United States. As the hon. Gentleman said, that policy could not be sustained. The policy that led to the high dollar and double deficit could not be sustained, which is why, I believe, the President of the United States and Congress will have to take action to reduce the deficit. It would be of more benefit to the world if action were taken to reduce that deficit because of the expected impact on interest rates. It would be more profitable to world expansion to get lower interest rates all round because that is the way to get more construction and more small businesses developing. If that policy were pursued, it would give a boost to growth. Hitherto, during the past year, there was an unsustained boost through the imports into the United States.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): In view of the fact that welcome reconciliation has presumably led to a much greater increase in mutual trust between nations, does my right hon. Friend think that it is time that Japan was made to bear the proper burden for its own defence? Would not that go a long way towards solving the problems that trouble us all?

The Prime Minister: We have to tackle Japan on an open trading basis. I do not think that it is right for one country to expect others to be open, make enormous profits from their openness, use those profits to undercut them in other markets, and still not take steps either to have home markets open or to redress the balance of trade by making major procurement purchases, which a Government can do, in aircraft and other such things from other countries overseas. My hon. Friend raises another matter — the defence of Japan — which would have considerable political implications. I would be slow to jump to the conclusion that he has reached, although I accept that Japan must take more responsibility for the defence of her maritime coast.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): In her statement, the Prime Minister referred to the discussions between Foreign Ministers about the middle east, southern Africa, and central America. Was any progress made in stopping the flow of arms to those regions as well as on human rights?

The Prime Minister: I do not know whether they discussed that subject, but I expect that it came up in relation to one of those countries. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, it is not easy to stop the flow of arms to these regions, and some of the previous efforts have not been successful.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Apart from a ritual condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, did my right hon. Friend persuade her fellow summiteers of the value of a constructive policy to do something about the problem of that tragic country, particularly as she knows that there is a coherent policy available to her fellow Prime Ministers?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the United Nations has been making strenuous efforts to make arrangements that would ultimately result in the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. I am not very optimistic that that prospect will be achieved.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): If the Prime Minister has returned determined to redouble her efforts to make us more efficient, to shake out even more people from the labour market, to cut back on our social services and to try to catch a bigger share of the international market, and all the other leaders have decided to do the same, will we not all be running very fast to stand still in the same place?

The Prime Minister: We have not been quite as successful as some other countries, such as Germany, in securing extra export markets. One of the reasons is that Germany's unit labour costs are below ours and, although it is a high-wage economy, it is also a low-cost economy. In any event, we are not on a zero sum. There is a good prospect for us to improve our own performance, which can only be done through management and the work force. We are not doing it at the expense of other people, except perhaps at the expense of those who have an enormous trade balance, such as Japan. We have to compete with Germany, France and Japan, and if the hon. Gentleman is not willing to compete, there is no hope for him and his party.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I thank my hon. Friend for raising with the Japanese delegation the disgraceful predatory pricing on the second Bosphorus bridge. Can she reassure me that we shall preserve bridge-building technology in the United Kingdom, and the hundreds of jobs in Darlington that depend upon it? Will she also assure me that everything possible will be done before the contract is signed to persuade the Japanese and Turkish Governments that it is in everybody's interest to ensure that at least the bridge section of this contract can be subcontracted to a British firm?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend is as concerned as I am because he, with another of my hon. Friends, came to see me some time ago about the Bosphorus bridge. As he is aware, we were prepared to match the Japanese offer on the bridge, but we could not do it on the roads leading to the bridge. That led to the allocation of the contract to the Japanese. If there is any hope of our having the subcontracted bridge, I am sure that it will be pursued vigorously.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The Prime Minister said that the middle east was discussed. Was there any sign of a new initiative from the United States? Does she agree that there is an urgent need for new initiatives if the situation in the middle east is not to deteriorate further?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, Ambassador Murphy has been in Jordan discussing with King Hussein the possibility of setting up a team of Palestinians to negotiate with King Hussein, directly with Israel. He has made one visit and I believe another is in the offing. There is no initiative beyond that because a great deal will depend on the success of what he is doing there.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the assertion that much of the United States' economic growth has been financed by Government borrowing, so far without any apparent inflation? Does she accept that much of this money was effectively siphoned off from investment funds from the non-United States economies, has raised world interest rates and has resulted in serious potential inflation inside the United States economy? Will she assure the House that she will not resort to any cosmetic, irresponsible and inflationary borrowing here at home?

The Prime Minister: No, and that was one conclusion of the summit: that we must not resort to inflationary borrowing, which would be highly damaging not only to the control of inflation but to the prospects of getting more jobs later. I agree with my hon. Friend's premise that, although much investment in the private sector has been financed from within the United States, that has left very little of a savings ratio to finance the deficit, which has been financed by drawing in capital from the world over.

[The Prime Minister]

That has kept interest rates artificially high. The greatest thing that could happen in the effort to obtain world expansion would be the lowering of interest rates, which I believe will follow if there is a sufficient reduction in the United States deficit.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): In addition to the nonsense that the Prime Minister has been talking about Japan, is she aware that on radio the other day, when she gave her first report of the summit meeting to the nation—I believe the programme is called "The World This Weekend"—she talked more nonsense when she suggested that the British people could solve their problems by creating their own businesses? How will the 4 million unemployed living on social security benefits be able to create their own businesses? Will the people who are now going bankrupt because of her Government's policies create their own businesses? Is it not time that she came into the real world and understood that the only way to deal with unemployment in a serious manner is by state and Government intervention?

The Prime Minister: Unless more small businesses are formed, we will not get more jobs. The alternative—this is what the hon. Gentleman proposes—would be to halve jobs and wages or split them proportionately. All that we could do under his proposal would be to shuffle round the amount we have and try to get more employment with it. He will know from the success of Japan and the United States, and from living in the real world, that new jobs come from the formation of new businesses. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, who answered questions today before I did, said that Britain has 100,000 more new businesses today than it had in 1979. That is good, but it is not sufficient. If the hon. Gentleman is giving up all hope of an increase in new business and small business formation, he is giving up all hope of creating more jobs.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of us were much heartened and warmed by the fact that she had come to an understanding with Mr. Nakasone of Japan? Does she also accept that, five years ago to the month, I was promised that we had come to a gentleman's agreement with Japan on trade, but that since then the deficit with Japan has increased by more than £20,000 million? has not the time come to say clearly that gentleman's agreements must between gentleman, and that unless the Japanese come to a copper-bottomed agreement in the very near future we shall have to protect our industries as they have protected theirs? This country cannot continue selling its industry down the river to the Japanese.

The Prime Minister: Whatever the Japanese have done so far to try to secure more imports, they have not succeeded. They have not purchased abroad, at any rate not from Britain and some other countries, as many goods, such as aeroplanes, as they could, therefore, we were anxious to fix a date for a new round of GATT so that we could deal with such matters together in a much more effective forum than any other. Apart from that, we must pursue a policy through the European Community. Mr. Nakasone now knows how strongly not only Europe but the United States feels about it.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I have listened with interest to the Prime Minister's comments on the views of Mr. Nakasone, and I was interested to hear her reply to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). Will she reflect on her statement on BBC radio this morning, when she deplored the failure of Cleveland Bridge to acquire the contract for the Bosphorus bridge, not on the grounds that the offer was bad and the technology inadequate, but on the grounds of a last-minute injection of investment as a subsidy from the Japanese Government? During her reflection, will she also consider the fact that that nation gives similar subsidies to its shipbuilding, steelmaking, communications and transport industries? If, as she says now, new industries in Britain must do it without state intervention or aid, how does she expect Britain to compete with countries that do it all the time?

The Prime Minister: I deplore the fact that we did not get the Bosphorus bridge contract for two reasons. First, on the bridge itself, our bid was the lowest and, therefore, I believed that we should get it. When it came to matching an offer that anyone else made, we were prepared to do so for the bridge. However the contract was for the roads as well, and we could not match the Japanese offer there. The second reason why I deplored it was that it will cause the loss of jobs in an area where we could have done with jobs.

As to subsidies, may I point out to the hon. Gentleman that we give subsidies to shipbuilding — considerable subsidies. We give subsidies to steel — considerable subsidies. We give subsidies to railways—considerable subsidies. We give subsidies to coal mining — considerable subsidies. The Japanese are not the only people at it.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): In relation to the Bosphorus bridge contract, does my right hon. Friend agree that although she and her colleagues at the summit agreed that they did not wish to embark on a trade war, that is what the Japanese have done by their predatory pricing methods and by the way in which they dumped credit to secure the contract? The fact that they have offered $206 million over five years at 5 per cent. interest means that they are buying into our markets, jobs and industries and driving up our unemployment. Has not the time come, despite Mr. Nakasone's smiling protestations, to say, "This must stop or your car imports to Britain will be reduced by 10 per cent."? Will she ask the Japanese to subcontract the bridge to Cleveland Bridge?

The Prime Minister: I understand why my hon. Friend feels even more strongly than the rest of us, because he also came to see me about the Bosphorus bridge contract, which will affect employment in his constituency. As I said, we did everything asked of us as a Government to help the company to obtain that contract. I know how strongly he feels about the Japanese, and I share his feelings. But I must make one point: we must be as efficient and as good in design as are the Japanese. We certainly were in relation to the bridge. If we were in relation to everything else, we should have had the video trade here which we did not have. We must be as good at design and efficiency as they are, and in addition we must have free and fair trading. Trading cannot be free unless it is fair.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must protect the rest of the business. There are two other statements and a Ten-minute Bill. I shall allow questions to continue until 4.15. I hope that all hon. Members who have been rising will be called to speak before then, provided everyone puts questions briefly.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): The Prime Minister must be aware that the Japanese have been promising to open their markets and increase their imports for many years. However, despite formidable pressure from international forces for long a time, there has been no progress. Why does not the right hon. Lady fight for British industry as effectively as the Japanese fight for theirs? If she had done so, the Bosphorus bridge contract would be ours.

The Prime Minister: We had the lowest tender on the bridge, which was due to the company, and the Government matched the Japanese offer on the bridge. We could not match it on the roads. We had hoped to get the bridge contract. The company did the job, and we did the job. We did not get the contract for the bridge because of the roads aspect.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, despite the strictures not only of Britain but of other countries, we have not yet made inroads into the Japanese market. In some cases, the Japanese have had better-designed and more efficient goods than we have. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we must pursue this matter, either through those who make the voluntary agreements on a industry-to-industry basis, or through the European Community. The Government will pursue it through the Community.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): As my right hon. Friend and the leaders of the principal European nations penned their splendid general denunciation of protectionism in other countries, did my right hon. Friend reflect that it was rather ironic that the farm Ministers did not even agree on a tiny reduction in cereal prices which had been decided upon a year ago?

The Prime Minister: As I said earlier, almost every country practises some aspects of protectionism. The common agricultural policy is certainly protectionist, but so are some aspects of America's trade and farming. These aspects must be discussed at the GATT meeting. We have had six working parties within GATT, one of which has been concerned with trying to free trade in agricultural products. Six of the seven leaders at Bonn wanted to set a date for the GATT conference, believing that that was the way in which we could all discuss protectionism and how to get rid of it and could bargain one aspect against another. Six of us were ready to set our names to a date; one was not. Nevertheless, I believe that there probably will be such a conference during 1986.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Despite the fact that we were not directly involved, did the Prime Minister point out to President Reagan the diplomatic folly, petulance and contradiction within the general tenor of the communiqué imposing a trade embargo against Nicaragua? Is it correct that the right hon. Lady has agreed to celebrate the 40th anniversary of Dr. Goebbels' downfall by telling us that she does not have the faintest idea when unemployment will be reduced?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman's second question was rather grotesque in the circumstances. I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman and some of his right hon. and hon. Friends. There is only one way to increase the numbers employed, and that is to increase the number of customers who are prepared to buy British goods. They will buy British goods when they are the best.

On Nicaragua, President Reagan had his own reasons for taking that action. The hon. Gentleman will recall that, during the Congress debate, there was a message and declaration from Nicaragua that, should help for the Contras stop, Nicaragua would be prepared to follow a genuinely plural political policy and to release documents from censorship. That can only mean that she had not done either until that proposal was made.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): As we in Britain have one of the strongest national interests in maintaining an effective open trading system, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind between now and the next GATT round the vital importance of proceeding on a multilateral basis, since it is precisely because of the stitching up of the various bilateral agreements and understandings that we have arrived at so many of our present trading problems?

The Prime Minister: I totally agree, and that is why there are so many piecemeal aspects of protectionism. That is why six of the seven of us wanted to fix a new date for the GATT meeting. All we have done so far is to agree that there should be a preparatory meeting of officials to sort out the agenda and the modalities. We have agreed that that preparatory meeting should take place before the end of the summer. That is at least a step forward to securing the conference that most of us want.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the Prime Minister believe that the summit will lead to a reduction or to an increase in demands from American Congressmen and Senators for protectionist measures, especially the 20 per cent. import surcharge?

The Prime Minister: If we had all agreed to give a lead on a date in 1986 — we could merely give a lead, because Britain is only one of the GATT countries— that would have been a good defence to the demands that would come from some parts of Congress. If the United States becomes more protectionist, it will not be the United States' problem; it will be our problem, Europe's problem and the problem of the developing countries. That was why we took the line we did. I regret that we were not successful in all seven of us agreeing, but at least six of us gave a firm clear lead because we wanted more open markets.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Was the latest Japanese trade deficit of £38 billion discussed round the table by the Heads of State? If so, what conclusions were drawn? What did the Japanese Prime Minister say about it?

The Prime Minister: As I said in my statement, the Japanese have said that they will do all that they can to open up their markets and get the value of the yen to a level more appropriate to Japan's excellent trading balance. I still think that the best way of achieving this is not only by discussion with the Japanese but by a GATT ministerial meeting.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): A little while ago, spokesmen for the Japanese Government in Strasbourg complained that it was easier for Europe to sell to Japan than for Japan to sell within the Community. That might cause incredulity on both sides of the House, but as far as some member states of the Community are concerned that is true. How does that happen? Is it not clear that, while the Government are in power, Britain's commercial prospects have as much chance as a whale in Tokyo bay?

The Prime Minister: On selling to Europe, different systems apply in Europe — for example, the arrangements in place before the European Economic Community agreement was signed in 1956 have remained in place. That helps Italy especially because it had a small Japanese car quota and, therefore, still has a small quota of, I think, about 2,000. Our car quota with the japanese is arranged between the motor industries. The arrangements in Germany, France and Britain differ because they are voluntary arrangements entered into between the car industries in each of our countries and the car industry in Japan. That is the only basis for them. Apart from that, we have to negotiate through the EEC. The Community states with low quotas are not exactly anxious to negotiate with the rest of us, because it might mean higher imports for them.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): During the economic summit, did my right hon. Friend have a chance to discuss with President Mitterrand what happened when, as the brand new Socialist President of France in 1981, he attempted to do precisely what the Leader of the Opposition suggested earlier and, within two years, saw the French economy brought to its knees? Will my right hon. Friend suggest to President Mitterrand that he give a little teaching to his Socialist cousin just in case the Leader of the Opposition is more interested in economic reality rather than fourth-form abuse wrapped up in a third-form perspective of history?

The Prime Minister: In view of the experiences which my hon. Friend enumerated, I believe that President Mitterrand would be a very good teacher. Unfortunately, I do not think that he would have a very good pupil in the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Bearing in mind what has happened at previous summits, and especially this one, does the Prime Minister wish that she had kept to the strictures that she used to admonish a former Prime Minister when she said that these summits were a waste of time? Is she aware that, every time she has returned empty handed, unemployment has increased? Is it not a sad irony that, in this summit, 40 years after the building of the bridge over the River Kwai, the super Japanese, with an economy that the Prime Minister has idolised, have pinched the Bosphorus bridge project from underneath her nose by giving state aid? What an irony.

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman could have been listening to what I said, because otherwise he would have heard——

Mr. Skinner: I heard the right hon. Lady this morning.

The Prime Minister: I am delighted. It might by this time have penetrated the hon. Gentleman's mind. After all, we were both at grammar school, so we should both have equal understanding. May I therefore explain in words of one syllable, although the hon. Gentleman could cope with words of three or four syllables if only he would admit it, that the amount of aid which would have been given by this Government to the Bosphorus bridge project was equal to the amount given by the Japanese. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that that was a very good thing to do.

4.19 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the future of the British gas industry.

Major progress has been made with the Government's privatisation programme. Management and enterprise have been freed from bureaucratic intervention in industries as diverse as aerospace, the ports and cross-Channel services, the oil industry and British Telecom.

The Government have decided that the time has come for a further major step in the transfer of state industry to the private sector. I propose to introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity to provide for the transfer to a new private sector company of all the assets of the British Gas Corporation, and for appropriate regulation of monopoly aspects of the gas supply business. Following that legislation, the Government intend that the shares in the new company should be sold to those employed in the industry and to the public.

This change, like the earlier ones, will remove state intervention and substitute realistic tests of performance for bureaucratic or political ones. It will create a real ownership by the public and employees in place of the nominal public ownership of the nationalisation statute. It will place new emphasis on efficiency for the benefit of consumers and give employees a new stake in the business.

The legislation will protect the consumer by establishing regulatory arrangements to oversee gas prices to the consumer and terms and conditions of supply. The new company will have an appropriate obligation to supply consumers, as has been the case with the British Gas Corporation. The legislation will protect consumers against discrimination and will contain necessary safety provisions, including the obligation on the new company to maintain the emergency services.

The opportunities for greater competition opened up by the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982 will be maintained and kept under review. In particular, it is the Government's intention that competitors should be able to supply not only large industrial consumers but smaller domestic and commercial consumers in areas not already supplied by BGC, with suitable safeguards for safety.

Outside the areas of gas supply, the new company will be able to develop other areas of its business in a competitive environment, subject like any other company to the general framework of competition legislation.

I intend to provide special opportunities to gas consumers and other small investors to purchase shares, in line with our policy on wider share ownership. All gas consumers will benefit from the emphasis on efficiency which will be built into the regulatory system and from a staightforward system of gas pricing related directly to achieved commercial performance.

As with previous privatisation measures, I propose to make generous provision to enable all who work in the industry to acquire shares and thus to take a new stake in the company's performance and success. There will be new opportunities, as well as new challenges, for management and employees in the new company.

The British gas industry is now nearly two centuries old. It has spent nearly 40 years as a nationalised industry, but was developed for a century and a half in the private sector. It has undergone great change in the past two decades with the transition to natural gas, which has linked it to the great expansion of British industry into the North sea. I believe that today's announcement will mark a new and long period of successful development into which the management and all who work in the industry can bring their present talents and link them with new freedoms in the interests of the nation.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): The Government's proposal to privatise British Gas will create a massive new private monopoly out of publicly developed assets. For what purpose, and to what end? Will there be any greater choice for gas consumers? Will it introduce competition, which is so vaunted by the Government? The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. How many applications and approvals have there been under that Act? What a flop that Act has been. Will the measure bring the consumer any new benefits? Will it produce lower gas prices? There is not a shred of evidence to suggest that customers will be better off.

The Secretary of State has boasted that gas consumers will be offered a special opportunity to buy shares. The majority of gas consumers have enough to do to pay their present gas bills, which are deliberately inflated by Government policy. Does the Secretary of State recall that it was his Government who imposed a gas price increase of 10 per cent. above the rate of inflation for three years on the run—an additional national gas bill of £4 billion—and a £1·5 billion gas levy? The consumer, not the Government, has financed the development of the gas industry.

The Secretary of State boasts about the so-called wider share ownership. The privatisation record shows an ever-increasing concentration of shares in fewer and fewer hands. Is he aware that less than 5 per cent. of British Telecom's shares are now in the hands of its employees? The same story can be told about British Aerospace and Cable and Wireless.

I remind the Secretary of State that the British Gas Corporation has an outstanding safety record. If his proposals should have the misfortune to get through, there will be widespread anxiety that a private monopoly might cut corners on safety.

In his Cambridge speech last week the Secretary of State made a great point about employment and the creation of jobs. What new jobs will these measures create? What effect will they have, not just on the people who work in the industry, but on the tens of thousands who supply the industry?

Is the Secretary of State aware of growing public disquiet about the financial propriety of the privatisation programme, which disquiet was rightly highlighted in today's TUC report? Huge fees are obtained by a limited number of City and financial companies. We want a full public and parliamentary inquiry into those issues before any further privatisation.

There will be equally widespread anxiety about the future ownership of the shares. Does the Secretary of State intend to have safeguards, such as the so-called "special" or "golden" share? What time scale does he envisage for these measures? How much does he expect to receive from the sale of these national assets? The sale will involve billions of pounds, but he has not today put a figure on what the Goverment propose.

[Mr. Stanley Orme]

We all know why the Government are selling this industry—it is to pay for the Chancellor's pre-election handouts. There is no national energy case for the proposals. The British Gas Corporation, as a public corporation, has served the country well. It is one of the success stories of the past 20 years. There is every argument for maintaining a national corporation serving the nation and answerable to the House through the Secretary of State. There is no case for the creation of a monster private monopoly, serving limited interests, apparently to be controlled and regulated by a new Government quango. That is why the Opposition will oppose the proposals and any Bill that follows.

Mr. Walker: In the comments that the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) made about the interests of the consumer he said that the Government had increased gas prices, against the consumers' interests. Does he not remember the year when the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) was Chancellor and the British Gas Corporation announced an increase of 12·3 per cent. in its prices for the following year, and that six months later, at the Chancellor's request, they were increased by a further 9·6 per cent.? Was that looking after the consumer, or was it a politician interfering, as politicians have constantly interfered, in nationalised industries — almost always against the consumers' interests?

It will be in the consumers' interests to have an organisation that is interested in improving efficiency and its competitiveness with other forms of fuel. As to the monopoly position, alas, since 1847 there has been a monopoly in the supply of gas. There was a monopoly when gas was nationalised, because it is unlikely that each house had two or three sources of supply. We recognise that. It is far better to have an organisation that will be judged on its commercial success and efficiency than to have the constant bureucratic control from which every other nationalised industry suffers.

The gas industry's safety record has been good. Plainly, it is in the interests of the new company to maintain the highest safety standards. It will have to follow all the statutory obligations.

I have read the reports of the TUC with a great deal of interest, but I think that its latest report was one of the most superficial and unenlightened that I have seen for a long time.

The "golden" share will have to be considered when we prepare legislation. It is important that the company remains under British control. That has always been the position.

On the question of timing, we hope to get this industry into the private sector as speedily as possible. As to the suggestion that it is an attempt to boost our electoral prospects, the only boost will be if the Opposition are foolish enough to promise that they will nationalise the industry again.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his proposals, but may I ask him to bear in mind three crucial matters: the operation of pipelines — I hope that there will be common carriers—future oil discoveries and the export and import of natural gas?

Mr. Walker: These matters will be considered before any issue of shares. The common carrier proposals in the present legislation will continue to operate.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The right hon. Gentleman mentioned efficiency. Is it not a fact that British Gas has been outstandingly efficient, and would have been even more efficient had it not been for the dogmatic intereference of the right hon. Gentleman; for example, over its oil interests and the gas levy?

What possible justification can there be for converting a public monopoly into what will be virtually a private monopoly, unless it is the Government's obsession with short-term financial gain because of their long-standing obsession with the public sector borrowing requirement?

Mr. Walker: If the management and employees of British Gas pursue matters efficiently and effectively, is it not right that they should be given a personal stake in that success? Is it not good that management and all those employed in the corporation should have some direct benefit and result from their improved efficiency and an incentive to apply it to the full?

The right hon. Gentleman accused the Government of interfering in a way that damaged the corporation's efficiency. I could cite many examples from 1974 to 1979 when the Government of which he was a member had all sorts of interventionist pranks with the BGC. That is the horror of nationalisation.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his proposals, which will provide an opportunity to increase the number of shareholders in British Gas from one to many hundreds of thousands, thus creating a genuine measure of public ownership. Can he confirm that gas consumers in the south-west of England will continue to have access to gas supplies after denationalisation? Will the price in that area continue to be roughly the same as in the remainder of the country?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I can confirm both points, and the legislation will ensure that that remains the position. For the south-west and elsewhere in the country, the current positions for supply and pricing will continue to operate.

I agree with my hon. Friend about the spread of ownership. The reality of the hopes and aspirations of nationalisation in 1945—of there being a genuine sense of ownership for those employed in the industry—has proved a failure, and the ownership has always been in the hands of politicians and civil servants.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Will the Secretary of State tell the House how the commercial success and efficiency of the new company can be judged if there is to be no real market for its goods and no real competition? Who will carry out the regulation of prices and of the monopoly? Will another bureaucratic quango do that? How will the consumer benefit if the monopoly still exists?

Mr. Walker: There are plenty of examples throughout the world of privately owned utilities in which there is a regulatory price system having fine performances in efficiency. Efficiency brings rewards to the managers of a company and also to the consumers. A great deal of competition will remain, as there has been for a long time, between gas and electricity.

If the hon. Gentleman is saying that the alliance is in favour of continuing nationalisation, I shall look at that with considerable interest.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. I am glad that British Gas is finally to be denationalised. Contrary to the view of the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), British Gas has been an inefficient organisation in Scotland. I hope that the legislation will ensure that the smaller towns can enjoy gas — something which they cannot do now. What steps does my right hon. Friend propose to take on the question of the many showrooms in towns and cities that will be affected by privatisation?

Mr. Walker: British Gas has recently reduced the number of showrooms as a result of a commercial decision. The Government took action to ensure that the accounts of the showrooms should be shown separately. I think that the corporation will take decisions to improve effectiveness. For example, in a number of recent cases British Gas has undertaken joint ventures with the private sector in retailing and providing services. I guess that under privatisation that will be an increasing trend.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): What is the criteria against which the right hon. Gentleman judges the efficiency of an organisation, and will he measure them against the performance of British Gas in return on assets, profitability, safety and customer satisfaction? Can any private concern in the United Kingdom measure up to the performance of British Gas since it was created? How does he propose—if he proposes at all—to restrict incursions by oil companies into the ownership of the company that he will create? The Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act restricted the incursions of British Gas into the oil industry. Will he give an assurance that the so-called golden share will operate?

Mr. Walker: On the hon. Gentleman's latter point, I believe that, in common with other privatisations, the golden share will operate. On the issue of the North sea, the privatised BGC will have all the freedoms of any other corporation or company, which will be a further advantage.

On the question of criteria, many other companies could probably show that they have done better on return of capital——

Mr. Douglas: Name one.

Mr. Walker: There are plenty. The BGC, like any other corporation, has had its mistakes and its successes. If the management is as good as the hon. Gentleman suggests, it will at last have a system where that is recognised.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there might have to be some changes in the tax regime if the Government are to retain their economic rent, bearing in mind that the shareholders, whom we welcome, rather than the Treasury, will be collecting the dividend?

Mr. Walker: The taxation proposals that will apply to the industry will have to be made clear by the Government prior to any issue, and I am sure that that will be done.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does the Secretary of State acknowledge that this is a further extension of the Tory party's clause 4? It is an ideological privatisation, not to benefit the industry, but to create current spending out of state-owned capital. Does he not realise that a flotation of this size will distort the stock market, to the disbenefit of the smaller businesses needing venture capital? Does he not recognise that at the end of the day British Gas will still be a monopoly? If it must be regulated, why cannot that regulation and competition be introduced within the public sector?

Mr. Walker: There are substantial resources in the pension funds which represent the interests of those who work in industry. There is a substantial supply of money available to such an enterprise. It will be an attractive and good investment.

There is a general argument that it is rather nice to keep all this in the public sector. By chance, at some time during my political life I happen to have had Cabinet responsibility for virtually every nationalised industry, with the exception of the Post Office — and I am not volunteering for that. All I can say, in no doctrinaire way, is that under all Governments the Treasury and appropriate Departments have crawled over every project and plan and interfered on a considerable scale, which is a great disadvantage to these industries.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement. Did he consider setting up regional bodies rather than a national body, as that would have provided a degree of comparison of operation from different part of the country?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I gave careful consideration to that, but, for a range of reasons, concluded that it was not a positive or practical idea. The reorganisation — which was carried out prior to my time at the Department—to make one network showed savings of probably £1 billion a year. To set up new organisations for each region, to follow that by a period of time within which they all had an opportunity to settle in, and to have considerable price differentials hitting some regions of the country far more than others would, in totality, have created no advantage, particularly when, at the end of it all, one must remember that gas is a product which, whether on a regional or national basis, will not have house-to-house competition.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Does the Secretary of State expect the Gas Corporation to have to pay higher charges for any capital that it raises after privatisation? If not, what assurances can he give about future changes in the tax regime to people who may be considering buying shares? Does he think that the present chairman of the Gas Corporation will be more committed to the gas industry if he has a private holding in it?

Mr. Walker: The present chairman will, of course, decide what he considers to be the advantages or disadvanages, but I should have thought that for any chairman, having all of his employees and members of management being able directly to participate in the firm must be an advantage of outstanding importance. The answer to that part of the hon. Gentleman's question about borrowing is that the cost of borrowing, as he knows, varies depending on the success and quality of the management. The cost of borrowing for highly assessed, quality managements is even cheaper than borrowing from the Government.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement of this further substantial extension of genuine public ownership. Will he pay particular attention to the need to break the effective monopoly which is enjoyed by the Gas Corporation through its control of the pipelines, which, in spite of the common user provisions, prevents the competitive supply of gas direct from producers to consumers? Will he ensure that, within the new arrangements, there is an opportunity for real price competition between suppliers?

Mr. Walker: I must tell my hon. Friend, having studied the worldwide scene, that he should not overestimate the areas in which there will be two suppliers in competition. I have looked at operations throughout the United States, in the whole of North America, in Australia and in other parts of the world, and it is a myth to pretend that by some wave of the legislative wand there will be massive competition. We had a private sector gas industry in Britain for more than 100 years. From 1847 onwards there has been little competition of the nature described by my hon. Friend.

The provisions of the 1982 legislation are important. I have made it clear that for industrial users and those in areas which at present do not have gas supplies, if competition wishes to come in and supply them that opportunity will be available, and I hope that advantage will be taken of that. I have also said that we will keep the 1982 legislation under review. However, it would be wrong to give the impression that anywhere in the Western world was there lots of competition in gas.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): One is bound to wonder what the Government will do for cash after they have flogged off and squandered the nation's assets. Will a gas levy be imposed on the private company, and will that company be able to import Sleipner or other gas from the Norwegian sector should it wish to do so and the Government disagreed?

Mr. Walker: Decisions on import and export policies and the future of taxation will have to be announced by the Government before any prospectus is issued.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is no reason for any diminution of safety standards as a result of this measure? Does he further agree that any concern that arises will principally be the result of a scare campaign by the Labour party?

Mr. Walker: I agree with my hon. Friend, and it would be a grotesque insult to the existing management of the British Gas Corporation to suggest otherwise.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Secretary of State suggested that many other substantial companies had done better than British Gas. Will he name one substantial public company which has equalled the record of British Gas over the last decade? Does he really believe that when these assets have been sold off the profits which will accrue to the shareholders rather than to the Treasury will directly serve the national interest?

Mr. Walker: When the shareholders happen to be the management and employees, and those who administer pension funds, all taking an interest in improving efficiency, and when one removes from British Gas the massive interference of politicians and civil servants that has taken place, there will be advantage to the nation as a whole.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): In view of the massive success of the British Telecom share sale in attracting the participation of a high proportion of employees, against the advice of their trade union, and introducing an unprecedented number of individuals to the experience of share ownership, may I ask my right hon. Friend to assure the House that the same careful attention will be given to marketing the British Gas issue when the time comes?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I assure my hon. Friend of that. One of the most important aspects is that employees and managers will be able to have a substantial share in their corporation. That will be good, and, as my hon. Friend says, it was a great success with British Telecom. I see no proposals in today's TUC statement suggesting that the workers of British Telecom should have those advantages taken from them. I am sure that those employed in the gas industry will welcome this opportunity to participate in their future success.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that prior to the establishment of British Gas many major British towns and cities successfully ran their own gas authorities? Should an authority desire, in the interests of its ratepayers, to make a bid, will he place any obstacle in the way of that being done? In other words, will it be left to the finance houses to take part in this wholesale looting of taxpayers' assets?

Mr. Walker: If the hon. Gentleman feels that way, he should have opposed nationalisation when it first took place.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): May I, as one who made his maiden speech on the subject of gas, add my congratulations to my right hon. Friend for his statement today? Since making that maiden speech, whereas oil has been international, natural gas has been too national, particularly in Europe. Will my right hon. Friend consider the possibility of common carrier obligations extending to a European gas grid, with the possibility of domestic and industrial users consuming gas from Norway, the middle east and perhaps even from Siberia?

Mr. Walker: The future export and import policy will have to be carefully considered before the transfer of ownership is made, and a statement issued. We must recognise the importance of seeing that the development of the North sea continues and that there is security of gas supplies to this country. Decisions will be made in that context.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the chairman of the British Gas Corporation support the transfer of the gas industry from public to private hands? If he does not, will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that he will not attempt to gag the chairman in defending his industry remaining in public hands?

Mr. Walker: I do not know of anybody who has succeeded in gagging Sir Denis Rooke.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his announcement. Will he do everything in his power to allay the fears of employees of both British Gas and East Midlands Gas and assure them that they have nothing to be frightened about, but, rather, that they should be encouraged to buy shares because they will be good value? The one problem that I envisage relates to the tariff structure. What will be done about tariffs to ensure that there can be genuine comparison of efficiency after the change comes about?

Mr. Walker: The regulatory authority will lay down criteria which eventually will be examined by the House, and I believe that that will be clearly seen to encourage efficiency, to the benefit of consumers and shareholders in the business. I welcome my hon. Friend's comments about the employees. I am certain that what is proposed will be beneficial to the employees, though doubtless there will be the usual scares about their pension rights and so on. All of those rights will be protected and they will continue, and the employees will know that the business is freed from the sort of Government interference that has not done the industry much good in the past. In addition, they will be able to share in their own success. Any sensible and rational employee in the gas industry should strongly welcome the statement.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Has the Cabinet taken account of the overall impact of the policy which has just been outlined in relation to British Gas, already carried out in the case of British Telecom, and expected to be carried out in the case of British Aerospace and, possibly, the British Airports Authority? There are to be massive share issues and, apparently, an attempt to attract the small-savers. That must be detrimental to the inflow of funds to organisations such as the building societies. They may have to increase their interest rates to the lenders, and that will have grave implications for those with mortgages. Has the Cabinet taken that into account?

Mr. Walker: If the hon. Gentleman takes that view, he should calculate the effect of large Government borrowings on the same movements and deplore them too.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I do not intend to congratulate the Secretary of State. While the right hon. Gentleman was prancing around in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food a few years ago, like a bull in a china shop, and looking after the interests of the farmers on the Benches behind him, another Minister suggested at the Dispatch Box that a certain sector of the gas industry should be sold off. However, because of the ensuing row in the House of Commons, and the invasion of the House of Commons by thousands of employees from the industry, the Government backed off. If the employees in the industry make it clear to the Secretary of State that they are not interested in privatisation and have already demonstrated against it, will he back off? If not, why not?

Mr. Walker: Provided that the hon. Gentleman, having made the same remarks about British Telecom, will back off now that all the shares have been bought.

Mr. Haynes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We all hear things here that we do not like.

Mr. Orme: May we take it from the Secretary of State's answers that there is to be a golden share and that the industry will be protected from overseas takeover? That should be made quite clear.

Secondly, if a private monopoly is allowed to have oil interests, but a public monopoly, which is successful and is investing, is prevented from having the same interests, is there not a contradiction in the Conservative approach?

Mr. Walker: No, I think that it is a very good Conservative approach, and I fully support it.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order. However, as no doubt the hon. Gentleman was seeking to discomfit the Secretary of State, I hope that he is not being too thin-skinned about the matter.

Mr. Haynes: Perhaps I should not raise the point of order.

Mr. Walker: If the hon. Gentleman made no criticism of British Telecom and did not consider that the workers were against the change, of course I withdraw. How wise the hon. Gentleman was.

I assure the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) that there will be appropriate legislation to ensure that there can be no foreign takeover.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman made an accusation that is not true. If he had said "The Labour party", I would not have protested, but he referred specifically to me. What he said was not true and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Walker: Of course I withdraw it. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on not being associated with the Labour party.

Mr. Haynes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman is answering in the same vein, and that is not being honest at all. That is being crooked.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No, it is not being crooked. The hon. Gentleman must not make that accusation. I think that, on reflection, he will withdraw that word.

Mr. Haynes: I withdraw it. I should have said "deceitful".

Legionnaire's Disease (Stafford)

4.53 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I will, with permission, Mr. Speaker, make a statement about the outbreak of Legionnaire's disease in the Stafford area.

From mid-April onwards the Mid-Staffordshire health authority has had a series of admissions to its hospitals of mainly male and mainly elderly patients with acute respiratory illness. The combination of pneumonic and other symptoms suggested that one of the organisms responsible could be legionnella pneumophila. Investigations also showed cases of influenza B. Legionnaire's disease is difficult to diagnose with certainty at the beginning of an outbreak because blood tests on living patients do not provide confirmatory evidence until two to four weeks after the onset of the illness. It was not until 3 May that the first positive evidence of Legionnaire's disease was obtained and a positive diagnosis of the disease was then made in 12 cases.

On 29 April the health authority contacted the communicable disease surveillance centre at Colindale which is the national centre of expertise in this field. The following day two doctors from Colindale began their investigation in Stafford. They were asked to support the health authority in the efforts that it was already making to diagnose and trace the source of the disease. After 3 May, the team from Colindale was increased and intensified its efforts to identify possible sources of the outbreak in the community. These investigations are still continuing. One probable source that has been identified is the water in the cooling towers of the Stafford district general hospital's own air conditioning system. This and all water supplies at the hospital have therefore been tested and heavily chlorinated. The hospital has now been declared safe by the Colindale team and the Health and Safety Executive.

By 10 am this morning, a total of 30 people showing the symptoms of acute respiratory illness have died since the beginning of the outbreak. Of these, six are confirmed cases of Legionnaire's disease. A total of 130 people have been admitted to hospital with the symptoms. Seventy-four are still in hospital, of whom two are in intensive care. The indications are, however, that the outbreak is now under control. Seven patients have been admitted or transferred to Stafford general hospital during the last 24 hours. Sixteen patients have recovered sufficiently to have been discharged.

I have spoken to the chairman of the Mid-Staffordshire health authority and I am confident that the authority is doing everything necessary. I should like to pay tribute to all the authority's employees, and in particular to the nursing and medical staff, who have worked throughout the period to treat the patients and keep the Stafford hospital open.

The first priority so far has been to deal efficiently with the outbreak and positively to identify the source of the infection. Once we are completely satisfied that this has been done, we will need to inquire into the outbreak in detail, and to consider what lessons can be learnt from it. The exact form, composition and terms of reference of the inquiry can most sensibly be settled when the immediate task is complete. The patients, their families and the public will wish to have the full history of the outbreak. We and health authorities will want to know what further steps might be taken to minimise the risk of any similar occurrence anywhere in the future. I expect, therefore, to make a further detailed announcement about the inquiry as soon as possible.

I am sure that the whole House will join me in expressing sympathy with the families of the victims of this tragic outbreak of disease in Stafford.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I am sure that all hon. Members will wish to join the Minister in expressing sympathy for the victims of the outbreak, and their families, and in paying tribute to the NHS staff who have worked so hard to try to save the lives of those affected.

It is also right that people should concentrate for the moment on combating the outbreak. However, people in the Staffordshire area, and perhaps further afield, will not be really reassured until there has been a thorough-going and independent inquiry into the outbreak. People will not be satisfied with a local internal inquiry conducted by the health authority or an inquiry conducted by the regional health authority.

I should like to ask a number of specific questions. The Minister may not be able to answer all of them today, but the inquiry will need to consider them. What was the cause of the outbreak, and how did it spread? When did the health authority first suspect that the outbreak was not influenza? If the health authority had suspicions before 29 April, when it first contacted the communicable disease surveillance centre, why was there delay in contacting the centre? Have the tests on the cooling tower water provided positive proof of an infection in the water system? Is the health authority's own pathology laboratory sufficiently well equipped and staffed to cope with the outbreak? Did the Stafford general hospital follow the DHSS guidelines for keeping the cooling towers clean? In any case, are those guidelines adequate? Have checks been made at other hospitals of a similar design, of which there are a substantial number? Are checks to be made on other forms of cooling towers and cooling systems, whether commercial or industrial?

Until those questions have been answered, people in Stafford and others interested in the outbreak are not likely to be satisfied.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman accepted that a number of his questions anticipate the outcome of the inquiry, so I shall not go into detail on those matters. I have discussed the issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and we have talked about the form of any inquiry. It turns out that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) agrees with me and my hon. Friend that the inquiry must be independent, which almost certainly means that members will not be drawn from the regional or the district health authority.

The only matters about which I wish to delay are the composition and terms of the reference of the inquiry. Only after the whole thing has been dealt with at Stafford shall we be certain of the sort of expertise that we shall require on the inquiry team. We shall then know to what extent they will be considering health matters or engineering matters and so on, and we shall be able to get the right people together.

Questions about the cause of the outbreak and steps taken to identify and diagnose the disease will have to be addressed by the inquiry. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras will appreciate that the people of Stafford were taking steps from the moment they began to realise that there was an upsurge in numbers, and he will appreciate the difficulties in positively identifying and diagnosing Legionnaire's disease and distinguishing it from other forms of apparent pneumonia. The details mentioned by the hon. Gentleman will be addressed by the inquiry.

We do not yet have the results of the tests on the water in the cooling towers, but no doubt we shall receive the results soon and find out whether they are positive and whether they confirm the identification of the cooling towers as the probable source of the infection. The epidemiological evidence is compelling and makes it almost certain that the cooling towers were the source.

There are departmental guidelines, and they were circulated to all authorities after an outbreak in Kingston upon Thames in 1980. As far as I am aware, the guidelines have been complied with, but, again, the inquiry will look into that. One result of the tragic outbreak may be that we shall have another opportunity to assess the adequacy of the guidelines and to update, strengthen or adapt them, as proves necessary.

Purely as a precaution — and one that the hon. Member seemed to be urging — we intend in the next day or two to write to the managers of every district health authority drawing attention yet again to the guidelines and making sure that the necessary inspections, tests and chlorination are being carried out on cooling towers of the type at Stafford.

Whether it will be necessary to look again at the design of new hospitals, cooling towers and air conditioning systems in a wide range of modern buildings will be discovered only in the fullness of time when there has been the most exhaustive inquiry into the outbreak.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for making a statement and for agreeing to the independent inquiry for which I have called over the past week. I am also grateful for the effective and immediate advice tendered to the district health authority by the Government and their officials. Has my right hon. and learned Friend any idea when the inquiry is likely to take place?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, particularly for his tribute to the assistance given by the people from Colindale in the most valuable scientific and medical support that the Department was able to give to the people struggling with problems in Stafford.

We do not want a great delay before the inquiry is held, because we do not want memories to fade or details to be lost. I expect to be able to make the further announcement to which I referred — about the form and terms of reference of the inquiry — within the next week or two, assuming that we are able to clear up the remaining doubts about the outbreak and its resolution over the next day or two. After that, it will be a matter of logistics to get the inquiry under way as soon as possible.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends with the Minister's expressions of sympathy.

The institution of an inquiry must be sensitively timed, though I accept what the Minister said about the need for some speed. Will he consider making the inquiry's terms of reference sufficiently wide to take into account the possibility that this disease, like others, may have originated in non-industrialised countries? Increased mobility, let alone altruism, perhaps necessitates preventive measures and effective health care being looked at globally rather than in our country alone. Might not some of the new health problems that we are experiencing be coming from abroad and should we not consider carefully whether action needs to be taken beyond our shores?

Mr. Clarke: The disease has been positively identified only in fairly recent times, but it appears to be a particular problem in modern buildings, with modern air conditioning systems and showers. I have no doubt that everything learnt from such outbreaks in this country and in other countries has to be used on a worldwide basis. It is only from such occurrences that we learn how to protect ourselves against them. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security is attending the World Health Assembly in Geneva this week, and no doubt he will take the opportunity at the margins of the meeting to discuss experience of Legionnaire's disease throughout the world.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I associate myself with the expressions of sympathy that my right hon. and learned Friend has properly uttered. Is he aware that for many years my constituents and others in Staffordshire were waiting for the hospital, that many thousands of them are grateful for the extraordinarily fine care that they have received as inpatients and outpatients since it opened, but that they are deeply worried about what appears to be a terrible problem emanating from the most modern of buildings?

I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for saying that the inquiry will be independent, but I urge him to ensure that it is thoroughly independent and that someone such as a High Court judge is asked to preside over it.

Mr. Clarke: There is a tragic irony here. We have a magnificent new hospital and there is a strong probability that one feature of it has proved to be a cause of disease. I reassure my hon. Friend's constituents that the water systems for the tanks have been drained, refilled and heavily chlorinated; the whole water system has been chlorinated; and the temperature in the hot water system was raised to a level that killed off the organisms that cause the disease. The system has been declared safe by everybody, including the national experts from Colindale. There is no continuing risk to health.

I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend said about the independence of the inquiry, and I shall comply with his request.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I associate myself with the Minister's expressions of sympathy.

Is it not ironic that people going into hospital for a cure contract a disease instead? Is the Minister aware that that is happening frequently and that, according to a letter sent to me by the Secretary of State 18 months ago, 10 per cent. of patients in British hospitals acquire infection on entering hospital? Will the Minister take the advantage of this opportunity to deal with the major problem of hospital-induced disease and try to make hospitals safer for patients?

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that there is a problem of infection in hospitals.

[Mr. Clarke]

Everybody in the NHS is aware of that and devotes considerable attention to reducing the infection incurred by patients.

I know that the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to cause needless alarm. He knows, though some members of the public may not, that some of the infection that makes up the near 10 per cent. figure is trivial and minor. Nevertheless, I would not minimise any of it. As Legionnaire's disease is a newly discovered and particularly difficult infection, we must make sure, in the light of the Stafford tragedy, that we reduce the risk to a minimum in future.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): On behalf of my constituents in Stone and Rugeley in particular, many of whom work in the hospital and a number of whom have been bereaved, I should like to associate myself with my right hon. and learned Friend's remarks.

According to national press reports, the problem may have arisen from the air conditioning system, as my right hon. and learned Friend said, but that system was investigated and serviced as recently as January this year. Will the inquiry therefore establish that that investigation was thorough and proper rather than simply cursory and of a general nature? Secondly, will he take account of the fact that within easy reach of the hospital there are two power stations, Rugeley and Meaford, both in my constituency, and therefore that there might still be a possible risk of some atmospheric conditions emanating from the cooling towers there, and will he ensure that this wide-ranging inquiry considers that aspect also?

Mr. Clarke: On the available statistics, there is a strong probability that the cooling towers at the hospital were the source of the infection. Until we have the results of the tests, we cannot be absolutely certain. But, of course, we will not eliminate the continuing search for other possible sources of infection.

There are guidelines about the inspection and chlorination of water systems in hospitals. We will want to make sure, first, that they were complied with, and, secondly, that they are adequate, although, of course, one can never guarantee that an infection will not arise a day after a thorough inspection has been carried out. Any lessons that are drawn from this incident may well have wider application to buildings other than hospitals, because the problems with most air conditioning systems and large accumulations of water, as in cooling towers at power stations, can all give rise to Legionnaire's disease in some circumstances.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Is the Minister able to say over what period of time the cooling ponds and towers may have been defective? Is he able to identify the number of people visiting the hospital who may have been at risk in that period, and so reassure people, certainly in my constituency and in neighbouring health authorities, that the problem will not spread?

Mr. Clarke: I am not able to give absolutely positive answers to those questions, because they are no doubt matters that the inquiry will examine.

The health authority became aware of this upsurge of people with pneumonic symptoms in mid-April. It peaked towards the end of April, and it is now falling away again. None of the staff appears to have contacted any problems of this kind, and many other people who obviously went to the outpatients' department have had no problem.

One of the features of Legionnaire's disease is that only particular sections of the population appear to be at risk. The young and the fit by and large are often quite unaware of the fact that they have had anything other than a mild dose of flu. Therefore, it may well be that no one will ever be able to give completely positive answers to the questions that the hon. Gentleman has asked.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): A number of my constituents in Cannock have been affected by this terrible disease. I have been asked by some of them to express to the staff involved the tremendous appreciation of those who have been bereaved at the efforts made by the hospital staff in difficult circumstances.

I very much welcome what I took to be an indication by my right hon. and learned Friend that there will be an independent inquiry. I am sure that bringing minds to bear on this problem from outside the Health Service could well be advantageous and help to root out the cause of this baffling disease. Will my right hon. and learned Friend look particularly at the air conditioning systems not only in the public sector but in the private sector? Lastly, once the causes have been discovered, could we perhaps have an action programme circulated to every hospital and general practitioner in the country, so that the disease can be identified at an early stage?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that my hon. Friend's praise for the staff of the hospital will be much appreciated.

There is no doubt that we will have an independent inquiry. All that I am reserving today are the names of the members, the exact form of the inquiry and its terms of reference. I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern. As I said a moment ago, anything that we discover as a result of this outbreak almost certainly will have some relevance and application to those responsible for modern hotels or office blocks, and probably other premises.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): In the light of the increased knowledge that we now have of the whole question of pathology and respiratory diseases and the extra work at Colindale that the Minister has mentioned, can we rest assured that, in the cuts being applied to the Medical Research Council, research in this sector will not be cut back? Secondly, in the light of an answer that the Minister gave to one of his hon. Friends, as the family practitioner committee is no longer part of the district health authority and as more people die from respiratory disease not in but outside institutions, can we be reassured that the same kind of coverage and information will be made available to general practitioners as will be made available to hospital doctors?

Mr. Clarke: This is not the occasion on which to enter into arguments about whether cuts are taking place in the budget of the Medical Research Council. Since 1981 research has been commissioned into aspects of this disease. The results of the studies carried out are now being analysed. We hope to have the results of valuable work following that research by the autumn this year.

On the last point, we have obviously had to make sure that no division of responsibility leads to any division of knowledge or access to knowledge. In fact, the Stafford district health authority took steps to notify its general practitioners, warning them to watch out for certain symptoms and to inform the health authority the moment that Legionnaire's disease was positively diagnosed. I quite accept that people in the community will be affected as much as those who have been admitted to hospital.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this outbreak is a tragedy not only for the people who died and for their families but for the dedicated staff of the hospital who must be deeply upset at the thought that the hospital itself could be the culprit? Perhaps all that it shows is that we know precious little yet about the epidemiology of this disease. Does he further agree that one of the lessons that are bound to be drawn is that spending on the maintenance of hospitals, new and old, is not optional but of the utmost importance, and that maintenance budgets at which no one ever looks and about which no one ever boasts are not in conflict with acute care but an essential part of it?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with both parts of my hon. Friend's question. First, I think that the staff would share her views entirely. Secondly, certain elements of maintenance are essential for safety. All authorities should resist the temptation to make cuts in maintenance which are easier to make than changes elsewhere. As far as I am aware, in this case there is no background of cuts in maintenance or anything else in Stafford. Indeed, Stafford is an authority with a brand new hospital, the hospital which we are discussing, and it has £500,000 more revenue spend this year than it had last year.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that a company in my constituency, Housemans Burnham Limited, claims to have a product, Hatacide LP5, which is highly successful in controlling the legionella pneumophila bacteria in industrial cooling sytems? Will he see whether this could be used to prevent outbreaks elsewhere?

Mr. Clarke: I hate to say anything for good or ill about my hon. Friend's constituents, but the fact is that none of these biocides has the approval of my Department, although we have considered a number of them. All the advice that I have is that chlorine is the most effective way of dealing with Legionnaire's disease and the organism that causes it, and chlorine is the only product at present recommended by my Department.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend do everything in his power to speed up the decision and judgment of the inquiry because of the fear felt, perhaps unnaturally in certain other parts of the country, by people who may be deterred from going into a new hospital? We all know that hospitals are there to cure. We need the report of the inquiry as soon as possible.

Mr. Clarke: As I said earlier, as a precaution we will write to the general managers of all districts reminding them of the existence of the circular which sets out the frequency with which water systems should be tested and chlorine added. I am sure that we will find that every district is already following those recommendations. Any that are not will be doing so in double quick time and will not wait for the inquiry.

Mr. Dobson: Assuming, as we must for the time being, that the water system and the water towers are the source of the infection, will the Minister give us a clear commitment that he will get in touch immediately with those authorities which have hospitals of a design similar to that of this hospital to make sure that this does not occur in other places?

Mr. Clarke: I will. All that the letter to which I have referred awaits is the necessary typing and postal distribution. We will, as soon as possible, be writing to all health authorities pointing out that they should be examining their sytems every six months and chlorinating them to the recommended level.

Mr. Speaker's Ruling (Written Answers)

5.18 pm

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) raised a point of order last Friday, when Mr. Deputy Speaker was in the Chair, about the substitution by the Treasury at about 7 o'clock last Thursday of a new text of a written reply after what purported to be the original reply had been lodged at the proper time, that is, at 3.30 pm. I understand that the facts are not in dispute.

Nevertheless, I have to rule that, in the words of "Erskine May" on page 345,

"any alteration"

—to a written answer—

"must be made orally in the House by the Minister".

The Treasury should not have sought to substitute a new answer by sending it to the hon. Member for Sedgefield at 7 o'clock. I note that the Financial Secretary offered his apologies when the matter was first raised last Friday.

Furthermore, the revised answers should not have been accepted and printed by the Official Report. I therefore direct that the original answers should now be printed and should appear in the Bound Volume.

I also understand that the hon. Member for Sedgefield was concerned about the interference with his mail once it had been placed on the Letter Board. No doubt the staff on duty at the Letter Board were seeking to be helpful, but I have to say that they should not have allowed the mail of the hon. Member to be opened in the way in which it apparently was.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I am grateful for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I am content to leave these aspects of the matter at that.

CORRIGENDUM

Official Report, 2 May 1985, Written Answers, columns 245 and 246, delete all under the heading "Johnson Matthey Bankers" and insert instead thereof:

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to the answer of the Economic Secretary on 25 April, Official Report, column 974, he will list the lending of Johnson Matthey which was there described as extremely unwise and imprudent lending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. It would not be proper for me to reveal details of the affairs of JMB's customers.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the inquiries by the Bank of England into Johnson Matthey Bankers have revealed departures from normal prudent banking practice.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what action the Bank of England took prior to the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers in pursuance of its duty to supervise the banking system;

(2) whether the review of the arrangements for banking supervision will comment on the justification of the Bank of England's takeover of Johnson Matthey Bankers; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether the review of banking supervision will deal with the monitoring by the Bank of England's banking supervision department of Johnson Matthey prior to its collapse and the steps it took prior to the collapse to identify and seek to correct Johnson Matthey Banker's difficulties.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985, c. 65]: My right hon. Friend will make a full statement when he has received and considered the report of the review of banking supervision and has nothing further to add at this stage.

Personal Statement

5.20 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief personal statement.

On Friday afternoon, following some heated exchanges, I was in the process of making representations to Mr. Deputy Speaker, during the course of which I accidently dislodged the hinged wing of Mr. Speaker's chair. That was certainly not intentional, but I wish to apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House for any discourtesy which may have been attributed to the incident and to give my undertaking that I shall be more careful with the furniture of the House in future.

VE Day—40th Anniversary

5.21 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that you are not responsible for the business of the House, but I seek your advice because of the shortage of time.

I understand that there is not to be a statement in the House tomorrow to mark the 40th anniversary of the ending of the war. It seems strange to me, and no doubt to other hon. Members, that there will be no opportunity for brief exchanges and that an event of such historical importance is to pass without any kind of statement.

I understand that there is to be a service, but, in view of the shortage of time, I hope that the Leader of the House will be prepared to explain why there is not to be a statement. Indeed, I hope that even at this late stage there will be a change of mind on this very important topic.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has information that has not been given to me. Normally I do not know about these matters until 12 o'clock on the day in question.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I am almost all that stands between the House and the Committee stage of the Finance Bill, so my remarks will not be protracted.

I accept at once that the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is widely felt throughout the House. The hon. Gentleman will see from the record of what happened 40 years ago, however, that on that occasion the House adjourned for a church service. In many ways, therefore, it seems appropriate that we should repeat that.

Nevertheless, as the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter, I shall look at it again.

Abolition of Forth and Tay Road Bridge Tolls

5.22 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish tolls on the Forth and Tay Road Bridges.

The Bill is designed to rectify a long-standing injustice whereby Fife is the only county in Britain in which people have to pay tolls on the south as they enter and also on the north as they leave the bridge. Secondly, it is designed to end one of the early, expensive and unfortunate experiments in privatisation, as a result of which motorists crossing have to pay for the bridge four times over—as taxpayers, as ratepayers, as road tax payers and as toll payers. Thirdly, it is designed to remove one of the many Government-imposed barriers to the creation of jobs in Fife, where unemployment is rising faster than in almost any other part of the country.

The Bill also provides an opportunity for Conservative Members to fulfil at least one of their election promises to the people of Scotland. With broken promises on pensions and on rates high in their minds, Ministers may care to consider that more than 10 years ago, at exactly the same time as they promised to abolish domestic rates, the Conservatives gave a specific manifesto undertaking to abolish tolls on the Forth, Tay and Erskine bridges. Since their return to office in 1979, with tolls, as with rates, the Government's response to their long-standing commitment has been not to abolish the tolls but to double them, and then to attempt to raise them again—ignoring all respectable advice, including that of their own appointed officials, that the present system of charging tolls is unfair, inconsistent, inexplicable and economically unsound.

Tolls are unfair because some bridges, such as the Forth and Tay, are subject to tolls, while others, such as Kessock and Ballachulish in Scotland, and many more in England, are not. Tolls are inexplicable because the Government cannot satisfactorily explain to anyone the criteria whereby tolls are selectively imposed. Tolls are also illogical. Their only public justification is that there are exceptional benefits to users, but Ministers have never been able to define those benefits, because they are not definable.

The charging of tolls on the Forth and Tay bridges in particular is unfair, inconsistent and illogical because the roads involved, which the Government say offer exceptional benefits, are essential elements of our national road system. Eleven million vehicles cross the Forth bridge every year. It is indisputably an indispensable part of the British motorway system and it is listed as part of the European system of major roads. It is also the main northerly route for Britain's North sea oil-related traffic. What possible justification can the Government have for continuing to classify the Forth road bridge merely as a private road and accepting no responsibility for its debt, running and repair costs?

When the bridge was first conceived 40 years ago, the then Labour Government offered to pay £4¾ million, which was 75 per cent. of the projected cost of building the bridge. By the time the bridge was completed, that contribution represented only one quarter of the final cost. If the Government were prepared to pay most of the cost in the 1940s when the economic benefits were perhaps speculative, what explanation can the Government now give for their refusal even to reconsider the finances of a bridge which is clearly an essential element of our road system?

The toll system on the Forth is unsound for yet another reason. Uniquely, users of the Forth bridge contribute tolls not just to pay off the £13 million cost of the bridge but to pay off £6 million of debt accumulated in building 8 miles of motorway approach road—a stipulation which the Secretary of State's most recent investigator found extraordinary, unfair and unreasonable. As a result of all this, the Forth bridge, which cost £19 million to build 21 years ago, now has a larger debt than it had when it was completed. Even after 170 million cars have crossed it, paying £34 million in tolls, the debt continues to rise and there is no sign that this trend can ever be reversed.

The only legal constraint upon the Secretary of State when he seeks to push up tolls on the Tay bridge, as well as on the Forth, is the ritual public inquiry, which has become a circular exercise in self-justification. The Secretary of State recommends an increase, he appoints his own reporter to examine the recommendation, he receives the reporter's report and then accepts his original recommendation and raises the tolls.

These bridge tolls should be abolished because they are a tax not only on cars and on travel but on jobs and industry in Scotland. Last week, a monthly rise of exactly 5,000 was reported in the British unemployment figures and half of that increase was in Scotland. More serious than that, 14 per cent. of the overall increase was attributable to three constituencies close to the Forth bridge, including my own constituency, which make up only 0·5 per cent. of the British population.

For the first time ever, there are officially more than 20,000 unemployed in Fife, and I believe that the real figure is nearly 30,000. In the past six years, 12,500 jobs have been lost and as many jobs again are at risk as a result of the threat to Rosyth dockyard and to the mining industry in Fife. The Government's response to this record and rising level of unemployment has been to take from Fife £20 million in regional development grants over the next five years. The Secretary of State, in proposing toll increases, will be taking an additional £1 million in tax from the county of Fife and from bridge users.

The Government's only response to my plea for emergency help for areas in my constituency with 40 per cent. male unemployment was a letter saying that the unemployment figures did not justify a major initiative by the Government. How much higher must unemployment rise before the Government are moved to take action, whether by removing bridge tolls or through direct funding of job creation projects in Fife?

The Government's record on election promises in Scotland is appalling, as the Secretary of State and his Ministers know. The Secretary of State's reputation in London, as he well knows, is that not of Scotland's Minister in the Cabinet, but of a district commissioner for an economically derelict, electorally dispensable northern outpost. If it is within his power to make a small exception to the Government's disastrous record in Scotland, the Bill offers him that chance.

The Bill will bring an end to the expensive privatisation experiment on the Forth and Tay, which has gone so badly wrong, and provide for the future employment security of those who work on the bridge. The cost of abolishing tolls will be small, but the economic benefit in uninterrupted flow of traffic, cheaper fuel bills, reduced administrative overheads and in the encouragement of industry north of the Forth will be substantial.

Perhaps the journey of Conservative Ministers to meet their diminishing band of supporters at the Scottish conference in Perth will be a little easier if they can tell the conference that they will support the Bill, and that, although they cannot fulfil their most recent election promises to the Scottish people, they will at least honour the long-standing one to abolish tolls.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gordon Brown, Mr. Dick Douglas, Mr. Willie W. Hamilton, Mr. Harry Gourlay, Mr. Alexander Eadie, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. William McKelvey, Mr. John Maxton, Mr. David Marshall, Mr. Robert Hughes and Mr. Ernie Ross.

ABOLITION OF FORTH AND TAY ROAD BRIDGE TOLLS

Mr. Gordon Brown accordingly presented a Bill to abolish tolls on the Forth and Tay Road Bridges: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 10 May and to be printed. [Bill 143.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

(Clauses Nos. 3, 10, 35, 40, 54, 64 and 87 and Schedules 12, 16 and 22)

Considered in Committee

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Ordered,

That the order in which proceedings in Committee of the whole House on the Finance Bill are to be taken shall be Clause 3, Clause 10, Clause 35, Clause 40, Clause 54, Schedule 12, Clause 64, Schedule 16, Clause 87 and Schedule 22.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 3

HYDROCARBON OIL

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

5.32 pm

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I wish to oppose the clause.

In his Budget speech on 19 March, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced an increase of 4p per gallon in the tax on petrol and 3½p in the tax on derv. The clause puts those increases into effect.

At the time of his announcement the Chancellor explained that the increase in the tax on petrol and derv was in line with inflation. On such occasions, the Chancellor usually describes that as "indexing." He always uses that word as if it settled all argument and as if indexation were a mysterious fiscal force with which we interfere at our peril. If his argument is accepted at face value, it means that the relationships between one tax and another, between taxes and price levels, and between a tax and a commodity on which it is levied, are fixed, immutable and impossible to change. My hon. Friends and I do not agree.

We believe that it is important for the House to review such taxes from time to time and to consider whether the tax on a particular commodity or activity has been established at the right level. It is time for the House to take a hard look at the taxes on petrol and derv.

We must consider the taxes against the background of the statement of the Chancellor's predecessor, who said that petrol tax is "a selective expenditure tax".

We must also consider the taxes against what has happened since the Conservative Government took office in 1979. At that time the motorist paid about 88p for a gallon of petrol, and the tax was 40p. During the previous five years, both the price of petrol and the tax on petrol increased, but the tax was increased by less than the net price for a gallon of petrol—the price before tax—both in absolute terms and proportionately so that the tax accounted for 44 per cent. of the price at the pump. That was the position at the end of the Labour Government's term of office.

Since then we have had six years of Conservative Government. The pump price of a gallon of petrol has continued to increase. Indeed, it has more than doubled. It has increased from 88p to more than £2. Conservative Chancellors have increased the tax even more sharply. The tax on a gallon of petrol has risen from 40p to £1·07. Under the Conservative Government, the tax on petrol has risen, again in absolute terms and proportionately, by more than the general rate of inflation. Most of the increase in the price of petrol has occurred as a direct result of those tax increases. Taxes now account for 54 per cent. of the price paid by the motorist compared with 44 per cent. six years ago. That is why we now pay £2 for a gallon of petrol.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does my hon. Friend agree that the wider nature of the deception that has taken place is that, on the one hand, Conservative Ministers talk on television about having reduced income tax while, on the other, they conveniently avoid referring to this draconian increase in tax, which affects the great majority of the population? Is that not a deception?

Mr. Davis: I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's intervention. It is a deception for the Chancellor and Treasury Ministers to appear on television and talk about reductions in taxes when they increase a tax which bears heavily on those with the lowest wages.

As a result of six years of Conservative Government, the price of a gallon of petrol is £2. The movement in prices and taxes on derv has been similar. Together, those taxes, as a proportion of the Government's revenue from all taxes, have risen from about 5·5 per cent. to more than 6 per cent.

The fact is that the Government are prejudiced against the private motorist. They are not interested in people who buy their own cars, drive their own cars and pay for their own petrol. They are interested only in people who have cars provided for them, not as a tool of their trade but as a perk of their position.

The Government's record on petrol tax is wholly indefensible. I am not surprised that Ministers are reluctant to come to the Dispatch Box today to explain why they are again increasing the price of petrol. They have already increased the price by more than they should have done, and there is no way that they can use what has happened in the past six years to justify the increase this year.

Nor can Ministers justify this year's increase by pointing to what has happened since they increased the tax a year ago. In recent months, we have seen a massive increase in the price of petrol at the pump, thanks to price increases by all the major oil companies. When we debated the issue in Committee a year ago, the motorist paid about £1.70 a gallon. Now he pays £2 without the Chancellor's tax increase, and with it he pays £2.04. Even without the Chancellor's help, the price of a gallon of petrol has risen by 18 per cent. during the past year—more than three times the general level of inflation. In those circumstances, it is not unreasonable to expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to forgo any further increase in tax, for this year at least.

Surely we all accept that increases in the prices of petrol and derv are a direct cause of inflation? At a time when inflation is beginning to creep up again, it is common sense for the Chancellor to do everything he can to avoid making it worse. If he is serious about achieving zero inflation, even he must understand that it will never be achieved if he increases taxes for the coming year in line with inflation during the past year.

[Mr. Davis]

The impact of the tax is selective. It was the Chancellor's predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe), who described it as a selective tax,

"deliberately biased against those living in rural areas"

and

"deliberately biased against those who have no option about the method by which they travel to work". —[Official Report, 9 May 1977; Vol. 931, c. 937.]

The Government's record in the past six years shows that they, too, are biased against people who have no option about the method by which they travel to work and against people living in rural areas.

It is not only the people living in rural areas who are affected by the tax on petrol, but it is true that they are affected even more than people living elsewhere. For many people in rural areas there is no alternative to using a car. That is why some of the areas with the lowest average incomes have the highest levels of car ownership. I thought that the Chancellor was claiming in his Budget that he wanted to help people on low wages. What is the point of reducing their national insurance contribution with one hand if with the other hand he insists on increasing the cost of getting to work? Where is the incentive in that? Indeed, why work? But it is not only a matter of getting to work. Children have to be taken to school, people have to get to the shops, to the post office and to the chemist. For people in rural areas, the car is not a luxury; it is an absolute necessity for getting anywhere.

The car is also increasingly becoming a necessity for many people living in urban areas and the suburbs, not least as a result of the Government's attack on bus services through the "Abolition of Public Transport Bill." In short, the Chancellor and the Government do not seem to understand that driving is not in the same category as drinking, smoking and gambling. Taxes on petrol and derv should not be increased automatically—almost casually — by the Chancellor, without thought, without any regard for inflation and without any regard for those people for whom a car is a necessity. That is why we want to delete the clause from the Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I support the extremely perceptive and effective attack on the clause by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). We shall be voting against it for several reasons.

The Government's position on the measure seems to be to pass it off as the normal kind of adjustment for inflation, and nothing to bother about—a simple updating of the figures. They are trying to pass it off as something which need not excite any interest or attention. If the Conservative party were in opposition and a similar increase had been proposed by a Labour Government, the Conservative Benches would have been crammed; instead, they are almost empty, giving the impression that there is nothing abnormal about the clause.

The increase in the duty on petrol comes on top of the massive jump in petrol prices which, as my hon. Friend said, has occurred this year. The oil companies seem to get it both ways. When the dollar goes up, they increase the price of petrol at the pump to allow for the increase in the dollar. When the dollar comes down—and it will almost certainly come down even further — there is no corresponding reduction in the price of petrol. The ratchet works only upwards and in favour of the oil companies.

5.45 pm

The dramatic price increase this year has brought us to the £2 gallon of petrol; indeed, in Grimsby, it is over £2. In Grimsby, petrol prices at the pump are substantially higher than in other parts of the country because of the nature of the distribution system. We have within a few miles of Grimsby a major refinery, and our petrol comes from that refinery, but it is still dearer to buy in Grimsby than in areas that are more remote from that refinery.

A gallon of petrol at the Texaco pump in Grimsby costs 204·6p; at the Total pump it costs 203·7p. That is substantially higher than the price that motorists have to pay in the major conurbations; therefore, a grievance will be exacerbated by the increase. The grievance will be felt even more strongly with the elimination of public transport as a result of the Transport Bill.

Public transport has to be cost-subsidised in an age when more and more people have cars. There will be an increasing need for cars as the major carriers, exposed to the pressures of unreasonable competition as a result of the Transport Bill, are forced to increase their prices. The clause has to be smuggled through, as it were, before the disastrous effects of the Transport Bill are felt.

Had the increase been proposed by a Labour Government, there would have been substantial howls of outrage from Conservative Members. The Labour Government's record in increasing taxation on petrol, although it aroused massive outcries from the Conservative party, then in opposition, was far better than that of the Conservative Government. The Labour Government's approach was far more sensible and far more moderate and did not involve the massive increases in petrol taxation which have been carried through by the present Government.

The previous Chancellor of the Exchequer pleaded that he was simply bringing our petrol prices into line with those in other parts of Europe. Since then, prices in Britain have increased to the point where they are ahead of those in several European countries. In the last quarter of last year, the average petrol price at the then prevailing exchange rate, for 4-star or equivalent petrol, was 42p per litre in the United Kingdom. The price has increased substantially since then. In Grimsby it is now 45p per litre. That compares with 36p per litre in Luxembourg and 39·2p per litre in West Germany.

Thanks to the efforts of the Conservative Government, we now have expensive petrol in Britain, and the Government seem to regard the car as a luxury. In places such as Grimsby and in the surrounding country, the car is an absolute necessity for getting to work and for getting around. It is necessary even to get the children to school, given the running down of rural bus services.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): The hon. Gentleman is making a powerful plea for market forces to be allowed to have their way. He has just praised, by inference, European countries where market forces rule. Does it not enter his mind that where a commodity is accepted as being both essential and strictly finite in the quantity available there might just be a case for introducing some planning and, through the tax system, some measure of Government interference?

Mr. Mitchell: The Liberal party now seems to be arguing for higher duties on petrol, whereas in 1977 it used its participation in the Lib-Lab pact to argue for lower duties. It is an example of the intellectual equivocation in which the Liberal party indulges from time to time. There is a case for adjusting the duties in the light of the heavy increase in petrol prices that has occurred in the past year. The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) described petrol as a finite resource. He should read the article by Professor Odell in the latest Lloyd's Bank Review. Professor Odell tells us that petrol reserves increase year by year. The cry that we should tax a finite resource to discourage use is one which I cannot accept. It runs exactly contrary to my argument.

The increase in total tax on petrol, including VAT, has been 67p in the Government's lifetime. The tax take, including VAT, that they inherited from the previous Labour Government was 39·9p per gallon in May 1979 and it is now 106·7p. That is a ludicrous level of tax, including VAT, when we consider that the £2 gallon is with us.

We must vote against the clause as a protest on behalf of the average motorist. The business user will not be hit by the Government's proposals; he is the friend of the Government and he is heavily subsidised by them. He will not feel the effects of the increase in price. The Opposition speak for the average motorist, many of whom have older cars and live in areas where there is inadequate public transport. For many such motorists their car is a daily necessity of life and they are finding the costs of motoring an increasingly difficult burden to bear, especially in the light of the petrol price increases which have been sanctioned by the Government and which are now to be supplemented and heightened by the proposals in the clause.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The intervention of the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) was fascinating. It revealed current thinking in the Liberal party on what its position should be on items that are scarce. Apparently the hon. Gentleman thinks that taxation of a finite resource is a way of dealing with price and supply. That is exactly the argument that would be deployed for charging higher prices in times of food famine. I find it hard to believe that the Liberal party would wish to subscribe to such a crude use of market forces in the curtailment of demand. However, the hon. Gentleman's intervention is on the record, and unless he seeks to intervene in the debate we must take it that that is his finite position. Indeed, it will so be pressed at the time of the next general election.

The price of diesel has strong regional industrial cost implications. When the Minister replies he should address himself to the argument that I am about to advance, which is advanced also by many in industry, especially in manufacturing industry, who are not within our central conurbations. I understand from the excellent presentation of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) that 47½ per cent. of the price of diesel is tax and that the tax take has risen from 41·9p in 1979 to 93·4p in 1985, which is substantially more than double.

Who is affected by the increased tax take? We know that a small minority of the population has diesel cars. The greatest consumer of diesel or derv is industry. The larger the capacity of a heavy vehicle and the further that that vehicle has to travel to deliver the goods which it carries from the point of manufacture or distribution to the point of receipt — for example, the retailer or central wholesaler — the greater are the costs that fall upon industry. If a bed manufacturer in Slough, for example, sends a container of beds to London, he will pay far less for the distributiion of the beds than a similar manufacturer in Cumbria, the north of Scotland or Wales, because the distance travelled by the lorry will be further when it leaves the manufacturer in Cumbria, the north of Scotland or Wales.

When we impose higher taxes on diesel, we are increasing disproportionately the costs that fall on the industries which exist far from the centres of population and our central markets. Inbuilt in the price of diesel should be a form of regional consideration which takes into account the special problems within manufacturing industry in the regions.

I took the example of a bed manfacturer for a particular reason. The bulkier the goods, the more aggravated becomes the condition. Almost invariably the bulkier the goods, the lower the price of the load. That means that the cost of transporting the load from a major plant in the regions back to the central area is proportionately greater. That must apply when it is transported to our main conurbations and our principal markets. These are considerations which Governments should take into account when formulating policy on the price of diesel.

The inbuilt regional disincentive is aggravated further by the tax increase which has been imposed on heavy vehicles. It is so large that it will lead to an increase in costs for manufacturing industry that will be disproportionate in the outer regions. The calculations which were undertaken by a newspaper — I hope that they are accurate — show that the tax increases imposed on the operators of heavy lorries have been between 9 per cent. and 29 per cent. For a 15 to 17-tonne lorry, the rate of duty will increase from £850 to £1,330, a 21·1 per cent. increase. For a three-axle, 23 to 25-tonne lorry, duty will be increased from £1,250 to £1,610, a 28·8 per cent. increase. For a 29 to 31-tonne vehicle with four axles, duty will be increased from £2,100 to £2,420, a 15·2 per cent. increase.

These figures have a direct bearing on the clause because collectively they operate to the disadvantage of producers in the regions who have to carry higher and higher costs. To go on and on about environmental damage and the need for hauliers to pay for the environmental damage that they inflict is entirely to ignore the impact upon hauliers of the new regime of taxation. It might seem that I am taking a minority position and that hauliers, with their large trucks, might be unpopular environmentally. However, they are extremely popular in areas where their work is essential in servicing the infrastructure of manufacturing industry, which are invariably areas of high unemployment.

When introducing his Budget the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that his proposals for heavy lorries would deal with the environmental damage that they cause. However, I hope that the Minister who replies will take into account the arguments that I have endeavoured to advance, which will be echoed by hauliers throughout the regions of the United Kingdom, and certainly in my constituency.

One of the most remarkable features of the past few years has been the public's complete lack of response to the substantial increases of tax levied on petrol. It has increased from 39·9p to 106·7p a gallon, or 167 per cent. That is substantially greater than the rate of inflation during the same period. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) mentioned the differential of 1p in the price of petrol at garages in his part of the country.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My point chimes in with what my hon. Friend said about derv. The increase in the tax on petrol and derv is an especially heavy burden on parts of the country such as we represent as we depend heavily on transport. In my part of the country, motorists already pay substantially more on average for petrol, even at discount garages, than do motorists in metropolitan areas.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am not convinced that we are paying substantially more. I remember when we were paying substantially more. I can remember differentials of 10p or even 15p a gallon between parts of Scotland, the north-east, Cumbria, the midlands and the south. The differentials still exist, but they are small—only 1p or 2p. Why are there no longer large differentials? Is an unofficial cartel in operation in the market? Have petroleum producers agreed to ensure that competition is not so strong that their margins are interfered with?

I have read reports today that petrol companies are beginning to get back into profitability. Will that have a bearing on prices paid by consumers? If there is an unofficial agreement between petroleum manufacturers and distributors, that may constitute an anticompetitive practice under the terms of the Competition Act 1980. That Act provided that, when it could be established by the Director General of Fair Trading that an anticompetitive practice existed, the Secretary of State could act to stop it.

Will the Minister consider whether there is scope for a reference under the 1980 Act to establish whether an anticompetitive practice is being run? If there is, the public must be informed. It would not be in the public interest to retain it. The only person who can know whether there is such a cartel is the Minister as he has privileged access to information. Britain does not have a monitoring programme to ensure that the public interest is protected. In the present conditions of reducing competition, the Government should seriously consider such a programme to protect the public.

We should consider the effect of increased taxation on rural dwellers. Many of them travel substantially more than the 9,500 miles a year which motoring organisations regard as average. Those who cannot afford to use cars must use buses. They are now required to bear the brunt of a succession of Government initiatives on bus policy.

We had the cut in bus grant in 1981, which damaged the ability of municipal undertakings and bus operators to buy buses, and there has been a cut in transport supplementary grant, which has an effect on revenue support for buses in rural areas. The buses Bill is in Committee and also affects rural areas. We should bear in mind all of those measures when considering the Budget.

This is one year when the Government could have forsaken tax increases such as these to safeguard regional industry and the interests of the travelling public. They have failed to do so, and the public will now have to decide what to do about it.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I should like to speak as a Socialist who represents a deprived part of the country where male unemployment is about 20·6 per cent. and where there is unusually low car usage. I know from my constituents that the Government's imposition of tax on petrol, which has led to a £2 gallon, has hit them hard, especially the less well off and those who live on unemployment benefit.

It now costs £16 or £18 to fill the tank of a small family car. For people earning perhaps £60 a week, that is a substantial proportion of their income. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) said, a car is no longer a luxury. It is a necessity, especially for people who live in rural areas. Bus services have been reduced in many rural areas. Many people, especially the elderly and those on pensions, face difficulties when they have to go to the chemist to collect a prescription. The increase in petrol prices has hit them pretty hard.

People who live on family income supplement simply cannot afford to fill up the petrol tank after having paid the other bills associated with owning a necessary car. The Government have increased taxation far more quickly than did the Labour Administration.

Let me examine Government revenue, using 1975 prices. In 1974-75, Government revenue from taxation on petrol and derv was just over £1·5 billion. When the Labour Government left office in 1978-79, the figure had dropped to about £1·4 billion. Now, in 1985-86, with the increases referred to in the Bill, the revenue has gone up to £2 billion. At constant 1975 prices, that is an increase of about 43 per cent. I believe that people in my constituency are pretty unhappy about that increase.

In west Hull we also have industries. Hull is a pretty entrepreneurial place. It always had a fairly wide base of industries. We all know that these days we have to keep costs down to be able to employ people and make profits. The increases in fuel costs which the Government have created through higher taxation mean that our industries are less able to compete with countries in Europe and with the United States. Those who have been in the United States will realise how low the cost of fuel is there compared with this country.

In the Bill, the Government do not encourage the use of derv. At the moment the Government are not showing discrimination in favour of a fuel which is basically very economical. There is now an increase in the number of private cars using diesel. There is the disadvantage of the diesel knock and lower performance than one gets with a car using petrol, but I should like the Government to take steps to encourage the use of diesel cars. The gap that one saw even as recently as a year ago is being eroded. That is very sad, because there are strong environmental arguments, which I shall not develop now, but which are important, for using diesel fuel.

The point touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is also important. At the moment the regions could be helped, particularly when one takes into account the way in which industry has moved to the south and the way in which the regeneration of industry seems to be taking place in the south rather than in the north.

If one looks at the total tax on petrol and derv, including VAT, one can see that from May 1979 to May 1985, in pence terms, the increase in petrol has been 67p, and the increase in derv 52p. I ask the Minister to consider widening that gap so that there is greater discrimination in favour of diesel vehicles, for the reasons that I have given.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is my hon. Friend aware that another system is used by the Icelanders, and by people in some other countries, too, whereby a substantially greater cost is attributed to the tax disc, and the price at which diesel is made available is the heating oil price? The effect is that high user vehicles are invariably diesel and there is an incentive for manufacturers to ensure that their representatives are provided with diesel vehicles, with the consequent effect on the environment.

Mr. Randall: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. With a diesel vehicle, one has a higher capital cost and supposedly a low running cost. What seems to be happening is that the running costs are becoming closer to those of petrol vehicles, so that it takes longer to write off the higher capital cost. I see that as a disincentive for people to use diesel vehicles. The essence of a diesel vehicle is that it is more economical over longer distances.

The Government have claimed that the increases that we have had have been essentially to match inflation. I understand that the tax increase in petrol and diesel alone amounts to only about £250 million. Bearing in mind the large increases in petrol and oil costs, I would have hoped that this time the Government would help people and industry, and encourage the improvement of the environment, by using the revenues in a way that would not cause people hardship, would not be a disincentive to using diesel, and would not impose high costs on industry.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): It is suitable that we are starting our consideration of the Committee stage of the Finance Bill with clause 3, because in this one clause we see the Government raising taxes, particularly indirect taxes, which will hit hardest the lowest paid and people on low incomes in our communities, hindering rather than helping small business, in spite of what the Prime Minister professed in her statement this weekend, and also hindering and hitting rural areas. Those are all things about which we shall continually hear throughout our deliberations in Committee. Therefore, it is suitable that we start with a clause which exemplifies so many of the things that are wrong with the Finance Bill. After that opening statement, the House will not be surprised to learn that the Opposition will oppose the clause, as we shall oppose the Bill all the way through.

I am sure that it has not escaped your notice, Mr. Crouch, that the Government Benches are not packed with hon. Members who are anxious to speak in favour of the clause. Indeed, we have been debating it for more than an hour, and not a single argument has been voiced in support of increasing oil taxes. I suspect that the Minister will be the only person who can rustle up even half an argument in favour of the Government's proposals in the clause. He will lose the argument on this debate and this part of the Bill, although he may hope to carry his hon. Friends with him in the Lobby afterwards.

It is suitable that we are starting with this clause not only because it exemplifies so much that is wrong but because it is about oil. The whole of the Chancellor's Budget, and, indeed, his whole financial strategy, is totally dependent this year, more than any year, on oil. The extreme windfall of the weakness of the pound has increased the money available to the Chancellor from an estimated £9½ billion to £12½ billion. Credit is not due to the Government for that windfall; it was not created by their economic management. It is a windfall of £2½ billion or £3½ billion depending on the level of the pound against the dollar on any day. But for that, the Government would be revealed in the Finance Bill and the Budget as not having an economic strategy, and their failure would be even more obvious and blatant.

The clause is appropriate also because oil has been, apart from the Government's biggest windfall, their biggest failure. Their inability to harness the benefits of that oil to the advantage of the people and manufacturing industry will be the thing most remembered about them in the years to come. In the past six years — many Conservative Members know this, have recognised it and have spoken about it, particularly outside the House, although occasionally they have had the courage to do so inside — the Government have squandered every penny earned from North sea oil. No matter how much they put up the taxes, it will be to the discredit and detriment of manufacturing industry that the Government have maintained such a policy.

The Government have chosen to use oil as a weapon against inflation and to control the supply of money. They have not chosen to invest in infrastructure, and in the manufacturing infrastructure in particular. Every sane Member, on either side of the House, knows what the Government should have done with the oil wealth. The hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd) does not seem to believe that that is true, but as a Whip he should know more than anybody else what Conservative Back Benchers feel. He must know that they recognise the desperate and tragic waste of oil revenue over which the Government have presided.

The increase in petrol tax levied by the clause brings the increase in petrol tax for the past six years to 167 per cent. Members of the public may be interested to know that when they buy their petrol at around £2 a gallon, £1·06 goes to the Government. As they do that every day and see over 50 per cent. of the cost of their petrol going to the Government, they might ask themselves what the Government are doing with those taxes and to what extent industry is benefiting from the use of those taxes by the Government.

I am anxious to hear what the Minister will say in defence of this provision. In particular, when he comes to defend this sad but mercifully brief clause in a long Bill, will he explain what research his civil servants have done on the transport costs to manufacturing industry? Will he own up to the fact that there will be knock-on effects for small businesses and for businesses located in rural areas? What will be the impact on transport costs, and therefore on unit costs?

In addition, will the Minister speculate on how far he thinks he can go in milking this sector of tax? The Government are searching for tax revenue, but are reluctant to face the issue of direct taxation. Therefore, will we see the £2.25 per gallon in the lifetime of this Government, or will it cost even more?

I say this more in hope than expectation. The Committee should vote against the clause because it shows that the Government are committed to being the party of higher taxation. It puts up tax, and does not help industry or the small businesses which the Prime Minister has said she wishes to help. She must know that, by putting up petrol costs, and therefore transport and distribution costs, for the small businesses which she hypocritically claims she wishes to see get off the ground, she is making it more difficult, not easier, for them to prosper. I hope that we shall see the end of the clause, and I look forward to seeing how the Minister can possibly defend his party—the party of high taxation.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I welcome you, Mr. Crouch, to the Chair during our considerations on the Finance Bill. I trust that you do not have to occupy it for quite as long as some of your predecessors did last year.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) said that it was appropriate to begin our discussions with this clause. I do not dissent from what he said in that regard, although I do not accept many of the exaggerated and rather absurd arguments that he then deployed.

It was interesting to see the hon. Member go through the ritualistic assertions always made by the Opposition—certainly made by my hon. Friends when we were in opposition—that the Government are rather short of supporters in these debates, and the Opposition are providing most of the content of the debate. I have heard this ritualistic charge made before. I hope that I shall continue hearing it made by Labour Members on Opposition Benches to Conservative Members on Government Benches for many years to come.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) acknowledged, the increases imposed by this clause maintain the real value of the yield from oil duties. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget speech, they do no more than keep pace with inflation. I can confirm to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) that the increases are expected to increase revenue in a full year by £250 million, although I would not agree with his comment that it was "only" £250 million. It is a sizeable sum, of which petrol will yield £200 million and derv £50 million.

The immediate effect of the duty increases on the retail price index is about one tenth of 1 per cent. This is solely due to the petrol increase because derv is not represented in the RPI, although there is an indirect effect which is difficult to quantify and depends on the extent to which, and how rapidly, businesses pass on the increased fuel costs to their customers.

The increases on petrol and derv are no more than are required to revalorise the duty, having regard to the RPI movement during the past year. The oil duty is a significant revenue raiser, the total estimated yield being nearly £6·5 billion in 1985-86. It would be difficult to raise an equivalent amount of revenue elsewhere, and successive Governments have always seen oil as a source of considerable revenue.

In view of the comments that have been made, I shall compare what happened here to what happened in Europe. The advice that I have received is that, as a result of the increases in this Budget, the total tax burden—that is duty plus VAT—remains in real terms below the peak reached in 1975, under the last Labour Government. My hon. Friends who have been listening to the debate will be rather surprised, in view of the comments that have been made, to hear that, despite the significant increases that I accept have been made, in real terms we have not returned to the peak achieved at the end of 1974 and early 1975.

I never like to use statistics unfairly. We can all trade statistics, and I wish only to get the matter into perspective. I accept that there was a sharp peak, from which the price came down.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is not true.

Mr. Hayhoe: I would be prepared to produce the figures that I have been given on this by the officials who have worked them out. In real terms, taking the duty at 1985-86 prices, the typical total tax burden per litre is 23·80p at present and was 24·47p at the end of 1974 and the beginning of 1975. In 1970-71, it was a little higher at 25p.

Mr. Terry Davis: When the Minister asks his officials to produce those figures, will he also ask them to reconcile their figures with those contained in the 75th annual report of the Customs and Excise, which show that total net receipts for all hydrocarbon oil duties in 1974, at 1975 prices, were £1,549 million? In 1975, the figure was £1,227 million and in 1985 it will be £1,945 million. I do not expect the Minister to answer my point now, but perhaps he will ask his officials to explain those conflicting figures in the public document.

6.30 pm

Mr. Hayhoe: On consideration, the hon. Gentleman will realise that there is no discrepancy in what we are saying. He is giving total annual figures whereas I was giving a peak figure, which arose when VAT was increased to 25 per cent. at the end of 1974. For a short time, that created an extremely high figure for the total burden. I said that, in comparison, the peak figure attained under the Labour Government was marginally higher than the present figure.

The European comparison, which is also important, was mentioned by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and others. Britain is still fairly low in the European league table. If we consider the retail price of petrol sold at the pump, the price in Britain is below that of Belgium, Denmark, France, Ireland and Italy. If we consider tax as a percentage of the retail selling price, Britain is below the Netherlands, Italy, Ireland, France and Denmark, and just above Belgium.

I have little doubt that, by an ingenious use of the figures, those who would wish to make such a comparison will find that, in some aspects, Britain is higher in the table.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What about the duty on derv?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am talking now about petrol. The figures for derv are different. One is often aware of the points that the hon. Gentleman will raise before he makes them, and I shall say something about derv in a moment.

Mr. Fisher: I am grateful to the Minister for mentioning tax as a percentage of retail price. Although I am sure that his European comparisons are correct, does he accept that a comparison of the percentage when his Government came to power in 1979 and now is not flattering to the Government? I estimate that the present percentage is about 52 or 53 per cent. of the retail price, whereas in 1979 it was about 39 per cent.

Mr. Hayhoe: It was not 39 per cent. but about 49 per cent. of the retail price in 1978-79. In 1979-80, it was 47 per cent., and then it increased, as the hon. Gentleman said, to the present figure of 53 per cent. However, if he puts down a question, I will gladly confirm those figures or make any necessary corrections. They are the figures that I have in front of me today.

The hon. Members for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and for Kingston upon Hull, West mentioned the derv-petrol duty differential. The duty differential in favour of derv has been widened marginally from 14p a gallon to 14·6p a gallon, including VAT, which leaves it unchanged in real terms. Therefore, it has not narrowed, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West alleged. The differential takes account of the continued need to limit the impact of duty increases on business and distribution costs. However, derv must continue to make a considerable contribution, in the Chancellor's judgment, to the overall yield from motoring taxes. Erosion of the revenue must be contained, and industrial as well as private consumers must be encouraged to use oil efficiently.

To take the point that the hon. Member for Workington had in mind, it is true that the duty on derv in the United Kingdom is almost the highest in the Community. However, we must consider such matters in the round. Several EC countries with low derv duties have higher rates of VAT than does the United Kingdom, and they incorporate provisions in their VAT regimes which prevent VAT from being recoverable as input tax. The block on reclaiming VAT paid on derv applies in several European countries. That complicates the comparison, because, as the hon. Gentleman will know, in Britain it is possible for the VAT paid on derv or on petrol that is used for business to be reclaimed.

The total tax burden on derv is about 93·4p a gallon, but the duty only is 68·9p. The difference of about 24p a gallon is the VAT charge, which is reclaimable.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not fair and reasonable that, after those considerations have been taken into account, British manufacturing industry should not have to pay a higher net price for diesel than do our European Community partners? Is it not true that, after one has taken into account the complications to which the Minister referred, British firms still pay a higher price for diesel than do firms in other Community countries?

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall have to check that——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister should know.

Mr. Hayhoe: I do not have the details in front of me, and I wish, as always, to give precise figures to the hon. Gentleman. I can tell him that, in some European countries, the rates for vehicle excise duty—the disc to which the hon. Gentleman referred—on diesel-engined vehicles is higher than those for petrol-engined vehicles. The comparisons are complicated. If the hon. Gentleman tables a question, I should be happy to set this out in tabular form to try to get all the factors together.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the Minister misleading the Committee? As though to excuse the regime in the United Kingdom, he referred to one group of vehicles, but he did not say that those vehicles were motor cars. We are not discussing motor cars; we are discussing commercial vehicles, and in that sector his argument does not hold water.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am not trying to excuse the position in the United Kingdom. If I wanted to make party points, I would say that, in 1977, instead of there being a reverse differential on duty in favour of derv, there was a reverse differential of 5p a gallon, in the money terms of the day —it was a considerable difference—against derv. The hon. Member for Workington should look at all these aspects in the round. If he seeks to be fair—I know that he often does—he will see—[Interruption.] I hope that I do not do the hon. Gentleman a great disservice by saying that, even occasionally, he seeks to be fair. I shall withdraw that expression instantly if the hon. Gentleman is worried. I thought that he had been reselected.

The debate has been extremely useful, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hodge Hill for initiating it. This aspect is an important part of our taxation regime, and it was right to have a short debate on it. I commend clause 3 to hon. Members, and I hope that it will be carried by a substantial majority.

Mr. Terry Davis: I, too, welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Crouch.

As the Minister has said, we have had a short debate on this issue. Let us hope that all our debates will be as short. If other Treasury Ministers conduct themselves with as much good humour and equanimity as the Minister of State, I am sure that the whole debate will be brief.

I disagree fundamentally with the Minister of State. The hon. Gentleman said that the Chancellor was "required" to increase these taxes. The Chancellor is not required to increase them. He is not required to revalorise them. There is nothing inexorable about these increases. It is a political decision. It is a decision about priorities. We are not talking about the abolition of petrol tax, as the Minister seemed to imply, but we oppose this particular increase.

I agree that it is a considerable sum—£250 million for petrol, and £50 million for derv. Those significant sums should not be raised in this way. The Minister said that my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) had a habit of putting points that could always be anticipated. I must admit that I expected the Minister to ask me how we would pay for the abolition of this increase this year, and I will now tell him. We would not ease capital gains tax for those who make a profit of £6,000 or more a year at a cost of £150 million. We would not abolish development land tax for those who make a profit of £75,000 a year from property development at a cost of £50 million. Those sums alone amount to the sum that the Chancellor will obtain from increasing the price of petrol without any regard for those on low wages in rural, urban and suburban areas who have no alternative but to use private cars. This is a political decision. It is a choice of priorities by the Chancellor to increase the tax on petrol, reduce the tax take from capital gains and abolish development land tax.

The Minister made comparisons with Europe. When Conservative Treasury Ministers make comparisions with Europe instead of with their predecessors—the Labour Government—I know that we have won the argument. Therefore, I and my hon. Friends will vote against the clause.

Question put, That the clause stand part of the Bill:—

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 5, line 16, at beginning insert

'Save in so far as Schedule 5 to the Principal Act applies to the classified advertisements concerning births, marriages and deaths.'.

Failure to accept the amendment will mean that old-age pensioners and families who wish to record death will have to pay 15 per cent. in addition to the price of advertisements. Those who wish to announce or record the happy event of a marriage or birth will also have to pay an extra 15 per cent. As usual, the hardest hit will be those who are least able to pay.

The Government's policy has at least the merit of consistency. They are consistently against the interests of the poor and consistently in favour of the interests of the rich. The imposition of VAT on newspapers will raise a measly £50 million. We should contrast that with the thousands of millions of pounds that have been given to the top 5 per cent. of wage earners to see how inequitable the Government's proposal is.

It is as well to set the amendment in the context of the importance of advertising to our national, local and regional newspapers. In 1983, it was estimated that classified advertisements were worth £584 million to national newspapers and some £817 million to local and regional newspapers. That £817 million breaks down into £430 million for the daily local and regional newspapers, £207 million for weekly newspapers and £180 million for free newspapers. In the regions, 80 per cent. of newspaper revenue comes from advertisements. Figures show that in 1984 there was an increase of about 29 per cent. in advertising revenue for regional and local newspapers.

It is estimated that 20 per cent. of advertisements are private classified advertisements.

Although it is not possible to break down births, deaths and marriages as a percentage of private classified advertisements, they must represent a considerable proportion.

An independent report on regional and local newspapers has estimated that there will be a drop of 5 per cent. in advertising from private individuals and a loss of revenue of about £5 million as a result of the imposition of VAT.

Some 25 per cent. of the staff of regional and local newspapers work in the advertising section. The most dramatic effect of the imposition of VAT will be in ordinary individuals, because births, deaths and marriages are, by their nature, personal and individual.

The state death grant has been disgracefully low for some time, which means that the poorer individuals have to meet a great amount of the cost of funerals. This extra 15 per cent. will impose an additional burden on them. They will not be selling anything VAT-able. Not being businesses or corporations, they cannot offset the VAT against sales. The imposition of VAT on newspaper advertisements must be treated as a direct 15 per cent. tax that must be passed on by the newspaper.

We have always had all-party agreement on VAT—which I hope still exists—that we should attempt to exempt or zero-rate items of necessity. That is why there is no VAT on food, despite the mistaken wish of some people. Certainly the Labour party intends to maintain that policy. The same considerations apply to advertisements for births, marriages and deaths. They may not be necessities in the strict sense, but people wish to place such advertisements because of circumstances that plainly make it equitable and fair that special treatment should be given to them.

It is mean and petty to visit this increase upon private individuals. We do not know Government estimates for the revenue from VAT on classified advertisements, but, when discussing the imposition of additional tax, we must balance the revenue with the consequences to the individuals concerned.

I hope that the Minister will deal specifically with the role of the EEC—especially the reasoned opinion of the Commission—in the Government's decision to introduce clause 10. In October 1984, the Commission gave a reasoned opinion that zero rating on certain United Kingdom items should cease. Of course, EEC countries can claim exemption for social reasons or benefit to the consumer. Although the Commission said that newspaper advertisements did not fit within those categories, and should cease to be zero rated, the Government disagreed at that time. If they felt then that they should be zero rated because of social reasons or benefit to the consumer, why have those same considerations not motivated the Government in deciding whether to accept the amendment?

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): If the Government wish to counter any action by the Commission, that is the easiest thing in the world to do. The derogation remains, and we can contest any action as much as we wish. The problem arises because the Government agree with the Commission and are helping it to bring to an end some of the exemptions and zero ratings that is wants abolished.

Mr. Blair: My right hon. Friend is absolutely correct. He will no doubt be aware that the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, in its report, said that zero rating should remain. I agree that the Government are assisting the EEC in its work. Yet when the Commission first gave its reasoned opinion, because of pressure from, among others, their Back Benchers, the Government said that they would not bow to the EEC. That is an about-turn. It shows that the Government will not pay attention to the report of the Select Committee and do not accept that for social reasons and benefit to the consumer zero rating should remain.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Not only are the Government not taking any notice of the Select Committee, they are not taking any notice of their own officials who, in reference to the Commission's reasoned opinion, said:

"We rely on the belief that our zero-rates are for clearly defined social reasons and for the benefit of the final consumer."

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who confirms my point.

When the Commission first gave its reasoned opinion, the Government were keen to allay the fears of their Back Benchers and not to appear to bow to EC pressure. They were keen to say that the Commission had it wrong and that there were social reasons and benefit to the consumer why zero rating should remain. Therefore, what possible justification can there be for the Government to reverse their position? Either they have changed their mind and no longer accept that there are social reasons or benefit to the consumer, or they believe that, even though there are such reasons, they intend that zero rating should cease.

It is difficult to understand why, when these matters were first published in 1977, there was no objection from the Commission. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was concerned with those matters at that time. The Minister must tell the House the extent of EC pressure on the Government. Do they now believe that there are no longer social reasons or benefit to the consumer, or do they believe that there are still those reasons but they will impose the tax anyway?

The Finance Bill in many ways has crimes of omission in terms of what it should be doing for British industry and the British people which are much greater than its crimes of commission. It is a nothing Budget on the broad scale, but at this level it could have a serious effect on private individuals, many of whom are least able to withstand the economic pressures of our time.

Given the small revenue, the serious effect on the newspaper industry and on consumers, the social reasons why newspapers should remain zero rated, the Government's attitude and the attitude of their officials before the Select Committee, I submit that very good justification must be given by the Minister if he asks the House not to accept the amendment. I wait with interest to hear his reasons.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I support the amendment because the imposition of VAT on advertising will hit many organisations. Charitable organisations will be greatly affected because they must advise people of their activities, and advertising in newspapers is frequently the means that they use. When, for example, a charity runs a street collection, it must advertise the result of the event. Imposing VAT on newspaper advertising is bound to place an additional cost on charities.

I received a letter dated 22 April on the subject. It said:

"The Government does, of course, recognise the immensely valuable role which charities play in this country."

If the Government take that view, they should help such organisations, not place further financial burdens on them. The letter went on:

"The relief would cost many tens of millions of pounds, which would have to be made good from elsewhere."

That referred to relieving charities from this imposition of VAT. If the Government are sincere in wishing to help such organisations——

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. David Crouch): Order. The amendment deals with applying VAT to certain categories of advertisements concerning births, marriages and deaths. We shall come later to the question of the application of VAT to charities.

Mr. O'Brien: I appreciate that, Mr. Crouch. I quoted from the letter—which was sent to me by the Minister—to show that VAT on newspaper advertising will hit many people in addition to those who wish to notify their families and friends of births, marriages and deaths. The imposition of VAT on small advertisements will place an additional financial burden on those who live in urban and rural areas. I trust that the Minister will comment on that aspect as well as on the more general points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair).

Mr. Randall: I, too, support the amendment. I will, during my remarks, use the expression "classified advertisements" to represent small advertisements relating to births, marriages and deaths.

If adopted, the amendment would save the newspaper industry millions of pounds. We are discussing what is essentially a tax on the ordinary person. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) pointed out, it was suggested in the pre-Budget briefing by Price Waterhouse and Company that the loss of revenue to newspapers as a result of the imposition of VAT on classified advertisements would be about £5 million a year, and that must have a great effect on local and regional newspapers.

It would greatly harm those who are establishing small businesses. In Hull, which, as I have mentioned previously, is an area of entrepreneurs, we are proud of the number of new businesses that are being established. In many instances, new companies are not initially registered for VAT. In any event, when they are first established, they must advertise considerably.

Although the amendment is concerned with advertisements relating to births, marriages and deaths, it is valid to refer to other small advertisements, especially as the Government claim to wish to encourage small businesses. Those establishing small firms will be badly affected by this VAT change.

What effect will this form of VAT have on the newspaper industry? Many newspapers are today embarking on the introduction of expensive high tech equipment. The reduction in profits that will result from this imposition of VAT is bound to have an adverse effect on that form of investment.

This loss of revenue through VAT being imposed on classified advertisements could result in cuts being made in editorial space and, indeed, in the size of newspapers. My principal worry is the effect that it will have on regional papers, particularly those that run on tight margins.

Before coming to speak to the amendment I telephoned the editor of my local paper, the Hull Daily Mail, which is a good newspaper of which I am proud. I am happy to say that it publishes everything that I provide.

The Hull Daily Mail has a circulation of about 115,000 copies a day. It is a daily evening paper, and part of the Northcliffe group, which I believe includes 13 newspapers and many periodicals. The editor of the paper intends, if the provision becomes law, to pass the increase on to the customer, initially at any rate, although the newspaper is fairly profitable. The editor deals with these forms of advertising from day to day, and he intends to pass on the increase. The ordinary person will have to carry the can. The Government are imposing yet another level of taxation.

The papers most affected by this tax will be the small weeklies and the free papers. The editor of the Hull Daily Mail said that the paid-for papers were being discriminated against because they carried a high proportion of private advertising whereas a number of the free papers tended to deal with commercial advertising. I hope that the Minister will take that into account.

It is important to realise that there has been a phenomenal growth in free papers. I believe that about 700 papers are now produced, employing about 14,000 people full time and about 96,000 part time. The industry is growing rapidly. I hope that the introduction of VAT on advertising will not hamper that growth and destroy the employment opportunities that it provides. I am sure that other hon. Members, like me, find that a new free paper seems to be pushed through their letter boxes every week.

The example that I have quoted suggests that the 15 per cent. VAT is unlikely to be absorbed. Certainly the less profitable papers will not be able to absorb it. They will pass it on.

What about the customers themselves—the people who place the advertisements? There are different categories of classified advertisements, but the area that arouses the strongest feeling is that of births, deaths and marriages. The people who wish to place such advertisements may be on low incomes for whom an extra 15 per cent. will be a serious matter.

A significant number of people live on low incomes. The programme "Breadline Britain" suggested that 7 million or 8 million people are living in poverty. Such people often wish to advertise births, marriages and deaths.

I found out in discussion with the editor of the Hull Daily Mail that there is a tradition in Hull of using classified advertisements when a local personality dies. On the day following the death, there is a queue in the department that deals with classified advertisements to put in column inches about the personality concerned. That is a great tradition in west Hull, and the introduction of VAT on this form of advertising will spoil it.

In Hull, the older people like to commemorate silver and golden weddings, for instance. They like events to be recorded for posterity in the newspaper. This form of tax will end that tradition.

For all those reasons, I support the amendment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: What amendment No. 2 seeks to prevent is a tax on grief and joy, and also a tax on announcements of marriage — an event that arouses emotions somewhere between the two. Effectively it is a tax on feelings, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) pointed out in his moving speech, a tax on the expression of those feelings. It would tax the commemoration of the death of a loved one who has passed on—a husband, wife or member of the family. Some people like to commemorate such events every year, others at five-yearly intervals, in the "In Memoriam" columns. My hon. Friend's emphasis of that point suggested that he might be composing his own epic poem — "Lines on the failure to be reselected to Kingston upon Hull, West". There are some joys, confined to these Benches, that the Government would certainly be willing to tax.

The tax will not raise a large sum of money. It will tax real feelings. It is unreasonable and unnecessary.

We seek, through amendment No. 2, to reduce the scope of the tax, but we must consider the Government's general proposition. It would be reasonable on two grounds to oppose the tax altogether. It is a concession to European pressure that should never have been made, because it invalidates the Government's proclaimed opposition to wider aspects of that pressure. The Government said that they would resist that pressure, but they are now making a concession, in the form of this extension of VAT to advertising, that will be absolutely irreversible and will weaken the defence of zero rating in general.

The tax is harmful to charities—they are the subject of a later amendment — and to consumers. It is especially harmful, too, to an essential element of local democracy and society and of our way of life—the local newspapers. Local newspapers have many faults. In politics and in their general attitudes, they are too conservative. They have been made slothful by monopoly. However, they are an essential part of local life and democracy and they are in a difficult financial situation. They face fierce competition from the multiplicity of media, especially the local free sheets. A tax on their advertising will make their situation worse.

The erosion of our zero-rating system is unnecessary. The system works well and has been tried and tested. It has been supported by Governments of both parties over the years. It was introduced by the Conservative Government who negotiated our entry into the Common Market. They were particularly proud of the zero-rating system and the social purposes that it served. That view was backed by the succeeding Labour Government.

7.30 pm

The European Commission does not like the zero-rating system. It would rather people saw what they were paying for, and paid a tax directly to the EEC. The Commission thinks that VAT should be seen as such a tax. I doubt whether that will enhance the popularity of the Common Market.

The Commission likes harmonisation for harmonisation's sake, and advertisements in newspapers are taxed in every other EEC country except Greece. The tax is 14 per cent. in Germany, 19 per cent. in Belgium, and 22 per cent. in Denmark. The Commission would like to see that tax system extended to this country I do not understand why the Commission takes that view. Taxing advertisements would not enhance the working of the internal market, and classified advertisements of births, marriages and deaths are not an exportable commodity.

It could not be said that our system gives advantage to a competitor—although if birth announcements are not taxed that might be an incentive to have children! I am not sure about the logic of the Commission's position. Does it want a 15 per cent. tax on birth announcements to keep down the British birth rate and make us a less effective competitor? In terms of the internal market and customs union, there is no reason why advertisements should be taxed.

The concession maintained by the amendment is obviously for the benefit of the final consumer, which the Commission says is a legitimate reason for zero rating. Of course, if the final consumer is the subject of a death announcement, the concession benefits his family.

More important, our concession is legal. All Governments have maintained and defended full control of our internal tax regime. After the 1975 renegotiation, the document put to the British people by the Labour Government emphasised that we had maintained full control of our internal tax regime and that there would be no pressure and no need for us to reduce the scope of zero rating. That scope was never questioned in the negotiations that led up to the sixth directive.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) stressed, the Government would not have accepted the sixth directive had questions been raised about the zero rating of any of the items mentioned in the so-called reasoned opinion of the Commission. We accepted the directive on the basis that it sanctified, maintained and sustained our system of zero rating. But the Government are selling that down the river.

The sixth directive allows zero rating for a transitional period for clearly defined social reasons. In this case, the valid social reasons are to keep in existence a healthy, financially viable local press, and the benefit of the final consumer, which, presumably, is covered by births, marriages and deaths advertisements. The transitional period continues until the Commission decides unanimously to end it. So why are we rushing along in this ill-considered fashion?

Illogically, and with only murmured warnings, the Commission came out in October 1984, after a long delay, with a reasoned opinion of our zero rates on live animals, sewerage services and water supply for business, newspaper advertisements and news services, protective boots, clothing for industrial use and other items.

The Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service felt that the opinion was prompted by the Commission's legalistic obsession with harmonisation. The Government opposed the Commission views and were right to do so. Treasury officials told the Select Committee — they were speaking generally, but newspaper advertisements are part of the generality — that the Commission's interest in harmonisation was "greater than the circumstances of the UK really require".

The officials pointed out that the Commission's action was understandable, but they regarded it as "legalistic". They were "surprised" by the objections made to zero rating.

The Select Committee argued:

"VAT is a tax on consumers and . . . any reduction in the amount of VAT payable must be of direct benefit to the consumer . . . Registered traders net off their input VAT before remitting the balance to the exchequer, so that the result of zero rating is always to benefit the consumer, whether directly or indirectly."

It is curious that the Government, having expressed their opposition to the reasoned opinion and defended zero rating, should undercut their arguments, abandon their case and close their options by this clause. Once imposed, the VAT cannot be taken off. That would be contrary to article 28(2) of the sixth directive because abolition and reintroduction do not amount to the maintenance of zero rating, which is sanctioned by the directive.

Why has one aspect of the reasoned opinion been singled out? What is the logic of the Government's position? What is the point of all this? The exemption served a valuable social purpose because it helped to maintain the viability of our press, particularly the local press.

It is worth emphasising that newspapers in other countries have benefits that our newspapers do not enjoy. Zero rating of advertisements was a partial benefit for our newspapers, but was no substitute for the substantial benefits received by newspapers in other EEC countries. Now even that partial benefit is being knocked away by the Government.

In France and Belgium, newspapers enjoy tax concessions. They enjoy subsidies in Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, and most famously—though outside the EEC—in Sweden, where subsidies can be provided to support a competing local press in localities where a monopoly would otherwise result. Newspapers enjoy cheap loans in Denmark and postal concessions in all countries of the EEC. They enjoy telecommunications concessions in Belgium, France and Ireland, and rail concessions in Belgium, France, and Italy. The concession which has been swept away by the Government was a small substitute to help the press to maintain its financial viability.

The tax revenues arising from the change are small, £52 million in a full year, according to the Newspaper Society, and £50 million according to the Treasury. This loss to newspapers comes at a time when local newspapers particularly are in a difficult competitive situation. Competition is particularly intense from the free sheets, and such competition might drive other established local papers in the free sheet direction. Advertising is crucial because 80 per cent. of the revenue of local newspapers comes from advertising and only 20 per cent. from sales.

An estimate is given in the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service of the contribution of the different sections of advertising which have been taxed under the clause. Classified advertising for local and regional newspaper produced £464 million in revenue for those newspapers in 1983, of which recruitment accounted for £88 million, property £108 million, motors £110 million, and other categories £157 million, with which we are concerned in the amendment. Therefore, advertising is crucial to local newspapers, yet under the clause it is being taxed. It is estimated that there will be a drop in volume of advertising of about 5 per cent. as a result.

The category which we seek to defend in the amendment is the most unacceptable one to tax because it is a tax on feelings, and its consequences to newspapers are directly harmful. Therefore, we should support the amendment so that the feelings and emotions of our constituents may be expressed tax free, we should support the local press, which is in a difficult financial situation, and we should oppose the Government's concession to the EEC, which undermines the validity of the Government's opposition when they come to defend the rest of our zero-rating system.

Mr. Fisher: I am grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends for having tabled the amendment, which recognises, in a way that the Government have been unable to recognise, the effect that this short clause will have on individuals.

I suspect that the Government did not really think through what they were doing. They where so keen to extend the range of indirect taxation by extending VAT, and they were so put off and perturbed by the active campaign on behalf of books, publishing and the cover price of newspapers, that they were distracted by political pressures. Even they did not have the nerve, correctly, to put VAT on children's shoes, because they recognised the emotive nature of so doing.

No doubt the Government felt that this extension of VAT was an easy option. Because it affects small advertisements and announcements of births, deaths and marriages, involving small sums, no doubt they told themselves that no one would object, that people had to put in such advertisments anyway, and therefore that they would be able to get away with it. I suspect that Minister's, if they had thought at all along those lines, did not really recognise what the impact on people would be.

I do not know whether the Minister's local paper has a births, deaths and marriages column. I am sure that it does, because these columns appear in every newspaper. I do not know whether the Minister's local paper has an in memoriam column, or whether this is another example of the north-south divide so that it is more common in the midlands and in the north of the country. In Stoke-on-Trent, it is an important element of our local paper.

On Tuesday last, 30 April, which was the last day before the tax come into effect, our local paper in Stoke-on-Trent, the Evening Sentinel, reported eight births, four comings of age, 49 deaths and 66 in memoriams, which is not a particularly large figure. At weekends there are probably more than 100 in memoriam advertisements. The Minister, just for a second, might listen to one of them and recognise who he is taxing and why. It says:

"78 today. Another birthday we cannot share, my birthday gift must be a prayer.
The years we spent together . . . are never really gone, they leave behind special memories for looking back upon.
You suffered much in silence, your spirit did not bend,
you fought for life with courage, until the very end.
Each leaf and flower may wither, each evening the sun may set, but those who are thinking of you today are . . . those who do not forget.
God bless—your loving wife".

Lower down in the same column, the Evening Sentinel published a small advertisement of its own:

"VAT ON ADVERTISING. Government Regulations introduced in the recent Budget mean that VAT at the current rate of 15 per cent. must be added to all advertisements published from May 1st, 1985".

That is the sort of advertisement that the Government are taxing. The Minister cannot be proud of or pleased with that. Did he and the Government, in introducing this provision, intend that a woman like that who wishes to commemorate the passing of her husband and what he meant to her should have to pay 15 per cent. tax on registering her love and her grief at the passing of her husband? I cannot believe that the Government or the Minister intend that. The Minister really ought to accept the amendment.

Mr. Hayhoe: The amendment seeks to continue zero rating for classified advertisements in newspapers and magazines concerning births, marriages and deaths. Before I respond to the detail of the amendment, it may be sensible for me to say a word about the general effect of the clause and, indeed, to respond to the invitation extended to me by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair).

The reason for the change that animated my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was that it removes an anomaly. Advertisements in all other media are already taxed — television, radio, hoardings, billboards, leaflets and promotional material. Only advertisements in newspapers and magazines were not taxed. In fact, advertisements in books were taxed — not that they occur all that frequently.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): What similarity is there between the substance of classified advertising and the kind of advertising that takes place on television and on the radio? I do not know whether the Minister listens to commercial radio, but there is not the kind of classified advertising there to which my hon. Friends have referred.

Mr. Hayhoe: But I have listened to the debate and to what the hon. Member for Sedgefield said when he asked what animated the Government to bring forward the clause. The hon. Gentleman did that as a background to dealing with the amendment which refers to classified advertising. I shall come to that in a moment.

As to the reasons for the tax, first, it removes an anomaly. It is one thing to relieve newspapers and magazines from VAT, which had been forecast before the election, but quite another to extend that same relief to those who advertise in them. Because the Chancellor decided not to extend VAT to the cover price of magazines and newspapers but believed that it was right to make all advertisements taxable, he took this step. As has been acknowledged, it provides some useful revenue, and it is a further step in the direction of a shift in the burden of taxation from earnings to expenditure.

I confirm that the increase in revenue will be £30 million in 1985-86 and £50 million in a full year. Those figures take account of the fact that net revenue will accrue only from those traders and private individuals unable to reclaim the tax. It does not affect the VAT position in relation to the cover price of books and magazines.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Minister not learnt anything from last year's proceedings? The imposition of VAT on building improvements was regarded as a monstrous bungle by his Department and substnatial unemployment was forecast as a result. The imposition of VAT on fish and chips also led to forecasts from HOTAG of massive redundancies, which have indeed taken place. Has the Minister learnt nothing from those mistakes? Does he not think that the case put by people now forecasting unemployment in the newspaper industry should be heard? In the light of his two previous bungles, should he not take those views into account, especially in view of the employment implications?

Mr. Hayhoe: I do not know why the hon. Gentleman intervened to make those observations, which he could have made in the general debate. I was responding to the invitation to explain the reasons for the tax. I appreciate that there are differing views in the Committee. That is partly why we debate these matters. If the Opposition did not disagree with the Government on this, they would presumably not have chosen to debate it.

A great deal has been said about the EEC, first by the hon. Member for Sedgefield, when he opened the debate, and later by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) who referred several times to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service and to the wider European Community considerations. I confirm that the EEC challenged our zero rating of newspaper advertising and news services as being contrary to the sixth directive. Incidentally, the reasoned opinion did not challenge the zero rating of books, newspapers and magazines; it concentrated on advertisements and news services. The British Government rejected the Commission's reasoned opinion and that position is fully maintained in respect of all the items challenged by the Commission.

Paragraph 46 of the Select Committee report sets out the position extremely fairly. It states:

"The argument that the British Government is its own master in matters of taxation also allows that the Chancellor may wish to reduce the extent of VAT zero rating"— in other words, to extend the VAT base—

"in order to pursue his declared aims of widening the tax base and shifting the weight of taxation from direct to indirect taxes. This decision is his prerogative"— and, of course, Parliament's—

"and is a political one which is not central to this report."

The Select Committee continued, endorsed by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby and others, that the change to extend zero rating,

"if it is made, would be solely for domestic reasons. The decision is a political one on which we make no judgment. It has not been part of our inquiry. A British Chancellor can make his own decisions for his own reasons."

Mr. Blair: As I anticipated, the Minister has denied that the EEC had anything to do with the decision. The basis of the Government's rejection of the Commission's reasoned opinion, however, was that there were social reasons and that benefits to the consumer were involved. Do the Government still take that view? If so, what possible explanation is there for the imposition of the tax?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have just given the explanation. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor thought it desirable. But the decision in no way undercuts our position in relation to the EEC, and the Opposition do a disservice to our national interest by suggesting otherwise. The explanation given by the Select Committee is accurate, because the Select Committee understood that these are matters for the British Government, the British Chancellor and the British Parliament to decide. If Parliament and the Government so decide, it is not a matter for the Community. The decision can be made quite separately without in any way undercutting or weakening our position with regard to the Community.

Mr. Fisher: My reading of the Select Committee report is rather different. The report rightly emphasises that if the Government go ahead with this, it will be the Chancellor's own political choice. The Minister has confirmed that both in his reference to the report and in his gestures of assent. He is saying that the Chancellor's political choice is to tax classified advertising in the same way as all other forms of advertising and, of his own free will and volition, to impose this tax on the grieving and the recently bereaved. The amendment deals specifically with that form of advertising. Is it really the Chancellor's personal political wish to tax those people? Will the Minister also tell us how much will be raised from the tax on classified advertising? In other words, what price has the Chancellor put on taxing these people?

Mr. Hayhoe: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will contain himself. He knows me well enough to know that I shall deal with the amendment and respond to what has been said. He is wasting the Committee's time by intervening in that way. I was responding to the invitation from the Opposition Front Bench to explain the background to the measure and the European Community aspect, to which the hon. Member for Great Grimsby devoted a large part of his contribution, but the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) chose to jump up in a fury while I was doing so. I shall come to his points in due course, although what I have to say may not convince or appeal to him. I know from last year's debates what a Herculean task that would be. Nevertheless, I shall explain the Government's view.

I wish to emphasise an important point that the hon. Member for Sedgefield picked up once again. I assure the Committee that the change has been made for reasons of domestic taxation policy.

Mr. Fisher: Shame!

Mr. Hayhoe: This is a perfectly proper subject for debate and disagreement, but I hope that no suggestion will be made which will weaken the British Government's position in relation to other challenges from the European Commission. On other zero-rated items we may be challenged in the European Court. We shall fight our corner on behalf of the British interest as we see it, and I hope that nothing that is said today will seek to undercut our position in that respect.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Does the hon. Gentleman foresee any difficulty from the Commission if a future Government wished to reverse the present decision?

Mr. Hayhoe: My next note is to confirm what the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said—that departing from zero rating was a one-way journey and irreversible. I acknowledge that. That is known widely, and the Select Committee refers to it in its report. If the Committee endorses the Chancellor's decision, the decision cannot be reversed at a future stage within the rules of the Community as they now exist.

I shall speak fairly generally about the different classes of advertisers who will be affected. Registered traders who deal in taxable goods and services will be able to reclaim the tax under the normal mechanism. Traders in the exempt sector, such as finance, insurance, education and health, will either be unable to reclaim any tax or have the tax recovery restricted to the extent to which they make taxable supplies.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) referred to small traders. Small traders who are not registered for VAT—their annual turnover would have to be below £19,500—would not be able to reclaim the VAT and, therefore, VAT would stick on them. It would also stick on private individuals who would also be unable to reclaim the tax.

The hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) mentioned charities, but I shall not deal with that point now because there is an amendment specifically about that, which we shall discuss later.

Obviously, the impact on the newspaper and magazine industry will vary for each publication, depending on the balance of its income between cover price and advertising, and on the extent of the advertising that it receives from the exempt sector—mainly financial—small unregistered traders, and private individuals unable to reclaim the tax. I acknowledge immediately that the burden will be greatest on the regional and local press, which depend most heavily on advertising revenue, and perhaps on that proportion of advertising revenue where the charge is not reclaimable and where it will stick. That applies particularly to free newspapers which depend entirely on advertising revenue, although the rates that they charge are generally lower than those of their competitors, where there is a cover price.

The quality national newspapers will be harder hit than the tabloids because of their greater dependence on advertising revenue and because they carry more classified and financial advertisements. Other publications which depend on a high volume of classified advertisements and those with a high number of financial advertisements may suffer a higher proportional loss of revenue.

No detailed study has been made of the effects of the tax on advertising alone. The study completed by the trade associations considered the combined effect of a tax on both advertisements and cover price. The best estimate by Price Waterhouse was a 3 per cent. volume reduction for regional newspapers. That was, however, an average figure, and obviously there will be a considerable range. The effect will depend on the extent to which advertisement rates fully reflect the tax and the extent to which advertisers who are unable to reclaim the tax are prepared to increase their expenditure. Although the effect may be significant for some specialist publications, the reduction is expected to be small overall because VAT is likely to stick on less than about one fifth of total press advertising.

I shall now turn to the particular points of the amendment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister said that in some cases the figure would be more than 3 per cent. Will he confirm that that could lead to job losses?

Mr. Hayhoe: From the information available at present, the chances of a loss of jobs are small.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is what was said about the impact of VAT on fish and chip shops.

Mr. Hayhoe: Many of the representations that we have received have argued that the change will reduce employment because publications will close or expansion will be curtailed. I think that that is the sort of point that the hon. Gentleman has in mind. It is difficult to isolate the effect of this tax change from the many other factors that influence employment prospects. Our best estimate of the net effect of the measure on employment is that it should be marginal across the whole range of the press and magazines.

I shall now deal with our debate about classified advertisements for births, marriages and deaths. It is hard to quantify the costs. The best estimate of the loss of revenue is between £5 million and £10 million in a full year, if the amendment is agreed to. Obviously, that is especially relevant to private advertisers, as they place most classified advertisements. That means that little of the tax will be recoverable from such advertisements. The simple consequence is a tax on final consumer expenditure. The same is true of the other private classified advertisements — for example, the sale of household goods, motor vehicles, houses and so on. Hon. Gentlemen have already given the figures for the breakdown of overall classified expenditure.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central pointed out that announcements of births, marriages and deaths are of special social significance and should be singled out for continued relief. I am not persuaded by his arguments. The arguments are most forceful for death announcements. Obviously, grieving relatives wish to let others know of a death as quickly and efficiently as possible. Announcements about births and marriages are a form of discretionary spending, and there is insufficient justification for continuing VAT relief on them, as VAT is to be imposed on press advertisements generally. If VAT relief were continued on them, there would soon be pressure to extend that relief to other commemorative or congratulatory messages, such as engagements and wedding anniversaries. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West mentioned the importance of classified advertisements for golden weddings. Pressure may even be extended to the Valentine classified advertisements, which have become a growth industry in recent years. It is difficult to see where relief would end if we took that avenue.

Although I accept the case is strong for death announcements, it would be extremely difficult to devise and administer a relief for that category of advertising alone. It would place an extra administrative burden on newspapers, because they would have to make special accounting arrangements to identify and deal with the one or two types of advertisements which would continue to be zero rated.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield spoke about the impact on pensioners. I recognise his anxiety, that poorer old-age pensioners will have particular difficulty in meeting the additional cost of VAT on death notices. Happily, such an event occurs fairly infrequently in most families. The additional VAT charge on such advertisements in regional or local newspapers throughout the country will probably be about 50p or £1 for the whole advertisement. It is to be hoped that such an advertisement would be only rarely inserted by a particular family.

It would be very difficult to allow a concession such as that requested in the amendment. If such a concession were to be made, pressures would immediately build up to extend the relief to other worthy causes. I have little doubt that the inventive minds of hon. Members in all parts of the Committee would quickly bring forward suitable candidates for further concessions.

VAT is a broadly based tax on consumer expenditure. Once it has been extended to cover a formerly zero-rated area, I think it would be wrong to grant special relief other than in the most exceptional circumstances, and I do not regard the amendment as covering such wholly exceptional circumstances. Therefore, I hope that the Committee will not accept it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Blair: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in clause 10, page 5, line 16, at beginning insert

'Save where advertisements concern employment.'.

It is fitting that we are debating the amendment on a day which has included employment questions. In answer to a question which I had tabled, the Secretary of State for Employment told the House that there were 3,273,000 unemployed claimants in April 1985. That is a staggering figure, but it is a gross understatement of the true level of unemployment. The real total is much closer to 4 million.

We argue about the policies that are best to reduce unemployment and about those that produce the present level of unemployment. However, it should be common ground that no obstacle should be placed in the way of further employment prospects. It is surprising and disappointing that the Government are not prepared to concede without hesitation an amendment that would exempt from VAT newspaper advertisements for employment. If a company advertises job prospects in a newspaper, whether it is a national, regional or local journal, it will pay VAT at 15 per cent. That is a true tax on jobs.

The position is even worse for smaller companies or firms which have only recently been formed and which are paying VAT because their annual turnover is less than £19,500. They will advertise jobs, pay VAT on the advertisements and will be unable to set that off against any VAT that they charge on sales. The VAT that they pay in addition to the price of the advertisement will go straight on to the costs of the firm and will reduce the money that is available for employment. The VAT that is charged on advertisements is a tax upon employment and will hinder greatly the prospects of those seeking jobs. It will discourage employers from advertising jobs widely.

Many people find jobs through their local newspapers. Those who are seeking work will go to the job centre and they will read their local newspapers. In any reasonable local newspaper there is usually a column of job advertisements. It is obvious that they are important so that those seeking work may learn where employment prospects lie. We should oppose any tax that prevents or hinders the individual's ability to seek work.

I hope that the Government will think again and will acknowledge that job advertisements should not be taxed. If the amendment is accepted, there is a much better chance that employers will be encouraged to advertise jobs and consequently a much better chance of individuals finding work through their local newspapers and other sources of job advertisements.

Mr. Hayhoe: The purpose of the amendment is to continue the zero rating of employment advertisements in newspapers and magazines. In effect, all recruitment advertisements would continue to be zero rated. The cost of the amendment would be less than £5 million. It would be low because the vast bulk of recruitment advertising is placed by commercial concerns rather than private individuals. Most advertisers will be able to recover the VAT charged under the normal mechanism of the tax, as it can be claimed back as input tax.

Those affected adversely will be small traders—the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) referred to them specifically—who are not registered for VAT. Included in this category will be those with a turnover of less than £19,500 and traders who deal in exempt or non-business supplies. The latter category is much more substantial than the others and includes, for example, Government Departments. However, there is a certain circularity about extra tax charges that are paid with one hand and collected with the other. I should make it clear that local authorities would not be affected because they do not come within clause 20. Some parts of the finance, insurance, health and education sectors will be affected as well as some charities. We shall be dealing with advertisements by charities when we reach amendments Nos. 4 and 5.

As the cost of recruitment advertisements will not increase for the majority of employers, there will be no reason for them to reduce their recruitment advertising on account of VAT. In areas where not all the VAT will be recoverable, it is possible that there will be some reduction in the amount of recruitment advertising which is placed. A few representations to that effect have been received by the Treasury from the financial sector. I expect the effect of such reductions to be pretty small. To the extent that a reduction occurs, it is likely to be in the frequency or size of advertisements. It is improbable that an employer wishing to recruit staff will not advertise because of the VAT charge. I strongly doubt whether the extension of VAT will have a noticeable effect on the level of employment.

The amendment suggests that there should be special relief for recruitment advertisements. The revenue cost of allowing the relief would be relatively small—under £5 million—but the case for it has not been made out fully. The effect on employment would be minimal and the effect on advertising would be small. That is probably common ground because the vast majority of recruitment advertisements will be placed by people with whom the VAT charge will not stick.

If relief were allowed, it would be difficult to refuse other worthy causes. Indeed, it would make something of a nonsense of the Division on amendment No. 2. Reliefs such as this would significantly complicate the administration of the tax and put an additional administrative burden on newspapers and magazines, as they would have to deal with some zero rated advertisements and some taxed ones. VAT is intended as a broad-based tax on consumer expenditure. Once it has been extended, it is wrong in principle to select items for continued special relief. I hope that the amendment will be withdrawn or, if not, that the Committee will reject it.

Amendment negatived.

8.30 pm

Mr. Blair: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 5, line 16, at beginning insert

'Save in so far as Schedule 5 of the Principal Act concerns value-added-tax on advertisements by charities.'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 5, in page 5, line 16, at beginning insert

[The Temporary Chairman]

'Save in so far as Schedule 5 of the Principal Act concerns value-added-tax on advertisements by registered charities'.

Mr. Blair: Amendment No. 4 has drawn support from a broad range of people. Perhaps the most strongly argued debate on the Bill will be about VAT on advertisements by charities. The amendment exempts charities from VAT on advertisements. I expect the Government will argue that to accept the amendment would be to accept an anomaly. They have argued that it is wrong to distinguish between different types of advertisement. There will be no anomaly if the amendment is accepted. Indeed, an anomaly will arise if it is not accepted.

The basis of charities' operations is that their income is not taxed. They raise their income primarily from donations. Therefore, clause 10 means that, although charities' income is not taxed, the primary means by which they raise that income — advertising — will be taxed. Their ability to raise money will be hampered and their costs will be increased. Moreover, charities have no VAT in respect of sales to set off against the tax that they pay on advertisements. I cannot believe that the Government want to hinder charities and to subject them to a tax that will greatly hamper their fund-raising activities. The change comes especially ill from a Government who maintain—the Prime Minister has said this often—that the more charities do, the better. They believe that more should be done privately to lessen the burden on the Exchequer.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When the Prime Minister suggests that charities should not be zero rated, perhaps she regards them as revenue raisers on her behalf.

Mr. Blair: I take my hon. Friend's point. The Government regard charities as a substitute for state action. The whole House agrees that charities perform a useful function which should be encouraged. If, therefore, charitable income is so socially desirable that it is exempted from tax, so should be the conduit by which the money is raised.

Charities need advertising for donations, to exchange information about their services and for staff recruitment. There is a strong move afoot to exempt charities from VAT, and the Charities VAT Reform Group has been established for that purpose. The argument to exempt charities' advertisements from VAT can be made logically and without having to accept the case for general exemption. The reform group did a survey of the top 200 charities and received 110 replies which showed that they would have to pay an extra £1·2 million a year in VAT for advertising space. That sum will come directly from funds which would otherwise be used to do charitable work. Only the Exchequer will benefit. The Treasury estimates that there are between 70,000 and 100,000 charities in Britain, so the total burden will be considerably higher. It is therefore surprising that the Government have estimated that the cost will be only £1 million.

I hope that the Minister will deal with this matter. That figure of £1 million is hotly disputed by the charities. I shall be grateful if the Minister will say whether my information is right or wrong. It is that the Government's figure of £1 million is based on the Advertising Association's estimate of agency-placed advertising. In other words, that £1 million represents the amount of agency-placed advertising by charities. However, much charitable advertising is not done through agency placing. Therefore, perhaps the Government's figures are based on that misunderstanding.

The charities feel particularly strongly about this matter, partly because of the way in which the Budget has been sold for charities. It has been said by Ministers and by the Chancellor himself that, overall, the Budget is helpful to charities. That view is not shared by charitable organisations to which I have spoken.

The Government say that they have helped charities in two ways. It is worth outlining them so that we can set in context what we are talking about in the amendment. First, the Government say that they have raised the limit on relief from higher rate tax from £5,000 to £10,000. They say that that will be of assistance to charities when they receive greater donations. The Exchequer estimates that the cost of that to the Exchequer will be £1 million. I hope, again, that the Minister will specifically say whether my information is right. It is that few covenants reach £5,000, never mind £10,000. Therefore, the notion that the £5,000 limit to relief from higher rate tax is a barrier to higher covenants is not borne out when one examines the amounts of covenants.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not also noticeable that there is a certain profile which one can identify in relation to those contributions, which is that certain charities attract higher contributions, while others attract none? Therefore, the help to which my hon. Friend has referred is specific in so far as it will go only to a few, and a great number of charities will not benefit in any way, but will just lose.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is absolutely right.

I have looked into these covenants. For example, not a single covenant of £5,000 is received by the Muscular Dystrophy Group of Great Britain. The steering committee of the Charities VAT Reform Group receives about £543,000 in total covenanted income. That includes some major charities such as Dr. Barnardo's, Help the Aged, International Christian Relief, MENCAP, and so on. Therefore, the total covenanted income of many of the large charities is not that large. I should like to know whether the Minister accepts that few covenants reach £5,000 and where on earth he gets his £1 million from. The charities dispute it strongly.

The second piece of mitigation put forward by the Government as to why VAT on newspaper advertisements will not affect charities too adversely when compared with the other things that the Government are doing in the Budget is that they have extended relief from VAT to computers purchased for medical research. The Government pray that in aid for what they are doing for charities. Again the Treasury comes out with some fairly extraordinary figures as to what charities will be saved through that extension of VAT relief. It says that about £5 million will be saved. That is an extraordinary figure. If it is grossed up, it comes to about £33 million. I cannot conceive the scale on which charities will have to purchase computers so that there is a £5 million saving as a result of VAT relief.

8.45 pm

I have made inquiries of two charities which one would expect to be at the forefront of computers for medical research—the Cancer Research Campaign and the Marie Curie Memorial Foundation. Neither believes that that relief from VAT on computers purchased for medical research will make any difference to its expenditure problems. I should be grateful if the Minister would give us chapter and verse on those figures.

When we are talking about anomalies, there is also another matter to consider. I understand that the Government have said in certain quarters that it is impossible to distinguish between socially useful charities and charities with a less socially useful function. With respect, that distinction is present in the reliefs which charities are already given. There is no reason to think that that distinction is any greater in relation to VAT relief for newspaper advertisements than in relation to any other type of tax relief.

The charities' concern is real about this matter. As amendment No. 5 shows, there is cross-party concern at the effects of VAT on advertisements by charities. Because of the way in which charities operate, they have a particular need to advertise their services and to advertise for donations. They have a particular need which is way above that of ordinary corporations, businesses or other individuals. Given that charities perform a service in our society which we all wish to see both encouraged and heightened, I cannot believe that the Government, having listened to the argument, and taking account of the proper concern of charities, will persist in rejecting the amendment.

The amendment is crucial because it is about the type of society that we wish to see. The type of society which the Opposition wish to see, and which I hope many others in the Conservative party wish to see, is one where those who go about the difficult business of raising money for charity have no hindrances put in their way, but are helped and encouraged. One certain way for the Government to make credible their promise to assist charities is to support the amendment.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I speak in strong support of amendments Nos. 4 and 5 which relieve charities of the further crushing VAT burden that is imposed in the Bill. For several years I have been involved in the parliamentary campaign to try to secure VAT relief for charities. It is sad for me to acknowledge that, despite all our efforts in recent years, the Government are now substantially increasing the charities' VAT burden.

It is hard to believe that it was a VAT working party set up by the present Foreign Secretary, when he was Opposition Treasury spokesman in 1976, which came out strongly in favour of relieving charities from the VAT burden. He said that it should be a priority. That was when VAT was about half what it is today. Since then, despite massive opposition from hon. Members on both sides of the Committee and from all organisations outside, that VAT imposition has been increased substantially. That, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has pointed out, runs counter to the Government's declared policy of support for voluntary bodies, and for the very ones to which we look to provide social services and the health care and welfare advice that is needed.

It is a sad story. In 1979 VAT was nearly doubled. Last year, VAT was imposed on building alterations, and leading charities providing residential services faced substantially increased VAT bills. The Imperial Cancer Research Fund, since last year's imposition of VAT on building alterations and extensions, has faced an increased bill of £330,000, the National Children's Home an increase of £200,000, the Spastics Society £120,000, Help the Aged £150,000 and the Royal National Institute for the Blind £95,000. Those are just a few examples of the burdens that such charities are having to face.

Subsequently, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced small concessions on building alterations for disabled people and these figures have been slightly reduced, but the potential burdens still remain. The total non-recoverable VAT for members of the Charities VAT Reform Group, which has been doing all the spadework in obtaining the necessary details, and which includes the majority of the top 200 charities, is about £10 million a year.

Many of these charities are trying to meet the increasing demands on their services resulting from the squeeze on local authority spending. Local authorities are able to recover their VAT on the same services as those provided by the charities, yet the charities are not able to recover their VAT. The result of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's action on building alterations is that many community care projects are being cut. This cannot be a sensible policy, especially in view of the cost effectiveness of the charities' operations.

There is now the added VAT cost on advertising which, for the 18 charities on the steering committee of the Charities VAT Reform Group, will add £387,000 to their advertising budget of £2·5 million. A few weeks ago, the director of the Multiple Sclerosis Society came to the House of Commons to talk to the all-party disablement group. The main point in what he had to say was the importance of advertising as his charity's major fund raiser for research into multiple sclerosis. That society now faces an increased cost of £50,000 a year. That sum could fund three years of vital research into multiple sclerosis in a small unit. The Spastics Society put its extra cost at £30,000, and its overall bill for the year is now up to £530,000.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said that he expects to raise about £50 million a year from this measure, and he estimates that, of that, the charities will bring in less than £1 million. That is a substantially lower figure than the one produced by the Charities VAT Reform Group, whose figures are based on factual information. As the hon. Member for Sedgefield pointed out, 110 of the top 200 charities will spend £1·2 million extra this year for VAT on advertising, so the Treasury figure, like so many of the forecasts that we have to view these days, is a tailored guesstimate. The Budget concessions on convenants, which raise the limit on higher tax relief from £5,000 to £10,000, will not counterbalance the extra VAT cost. Few charities receive covenants of this size—mainly charities such as the National Trust. The 18 steering committee charities received a total of only £1·3 million last year. They will be paying almost half that amount back in extra VAT this year.

The other concession in the Budget is the relief from VAT for computers purchased for medical research. That, again, is regarded as a negligible concession by the charities group. Even the medical research charities, such as the Cancer Research Campaign and the Marie Curie Memorial Foundation, do not believe that it will be of particular assistance. Again, we have a Treasury guesstimate that this concession will cost £5 million a year. If that is true, it would involve an expenditure by charities of £33 million a year on computers for medical research. We can rightly ask how this Treasury assessment has been arrived at. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us.

I hope that the Committee will recognise the contradictions inherent in the charities taking on the increased burden of providing extra services that the Government are asking them to carry out, while clobbering the same voluntary organisations with huge added VAT costs. I know the old Treasury argument that is trotted out every time that we trudge along to the "no" room in the Treasury. It is that, while giving VAT relief to charities may be desirable, it has to think of all the administrative difficulties that will result from across-the-board VAT relief or repayment.

We point out that covenants are done on that basis, but the answer is that these are covenants to charities that must have a certain amount of voluntary support before they get donations. That is a weak argument, and experts from the charities have frequently offered to help the Customs and Excise to overcome any administrative problems. Overdue reform of charity law should not be used by the Treasury as an argument against granting a particular concession.

I know that the Government make large sums of money available in the form of grants to worthy bodies, and I commend them for the support that they are giving. However, many organisations, such as the Multiple Sclerosis Society, do not depend on any state aid whatever; they rely entirely for their income on the success of promotional and fund raising activities.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor could give relief that would be of most benefit in two particular sectors. First, any service undertaken by a charity, such as providing residential care facilities of a similar nature to those provided by a local authority or central Government, or any other service purchased from a charity by a local authority, should be relieved of VAT under section 20 of the 1983 Act. Secondly, there should be immediate relief from VAT on building work, including extensions, alterations, repair and maintenance, undertaken by a charity, on properties on which they receive mandatory rate relief, plus relief from professional fees on such work.

The amendments should be supported. In Treasury terms, they do not involve a large sum of money, but in terms of their effect on our valuable voluntary organisations, including bodies such as Oxfam, War on Want and others engaged in relief operations, they would be invaluable. Their acceptance by the Government would help restore morale among all those working in our charities and reassure me that the Government recognise the impact of the VAT charges on the handicapped and disabled. I support the amendments and am prepared to support them in the Lobby.

Mr. Wainwright: It is pleasant, at long last this evening, to have an amendment from the Labour segment of the Opposition which the alliance can support, out of the bizarre menu that Labour Members have presented to the Committee for today's and tomorrow's debates. I am glad that, on this occasion, we can be united. I am especially glad that the spokesman for the Labour party, the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), made it clear that he is not using this amendment as a Trojan horse in an attempt to exempt charities from VAT generally. Until we have seen a scheme for that wholesale exemption which can actually work, the alliance will be unable to support such a proposal.

I am sure that the alliance is not alone in the Committee in saying that any VAT exemption for registered charities must be an exemption for all registered charities. It would be intolerable, although it is sometimes suggested, to say that to economise in administration a general exemption from VAT should be given to some types of charity only or some sizes of charity only. It is a matter for rejoicing that Britain has a pluralist doctrine of charities. People of religions that may seem to some to be a little out of the way are fully entitled to register as charities, and people dispensing education in institutions of which some of us may not approve are equally entitled to the benefit of our charity laws, which date back to good Queen Elizabeth I. Therefore, any attempt to discriminate between one registered charity and another in tax privileges would be resisted by the alliance.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I wish to clarify, if possible, the Liberal party's view on this matter. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Liberal party would support a general relief for charities? If he is saying that he could not support that because of a technical difficulty, why could not charities be included in the same section of the Act as local authorities, which enables them to recover their VAT?

Mr. Wainwright: I do not say either of those things. I hoped that I had made it clear that as soon as someone —it does not matter who—produces a workable scheme that will grant the exemption to every registered charity, regardless of its size, location, aims or administration, the Liberal party, no doubt with other parties, will be glad to consider it. But no such scheme has been produced, and anything that I have seen has been discriminatory and limited to the sorts of charity that are alleged to have the organisation to cope with the VAT problems.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a scheme whereby a charity could produce its VAT payments quarterly, together with its certificate of incorporation as a charity, and thus obtain recompense, would be perfectly simple to administer and operate?

Mr. Wainwright: If that were the case, we should have heard of it before now. But that is not what is suggested. It is clear that an exemption which enabled the official of a religious body or a school to draw up at the petrol pump or to visit the paint shop, buy either petrol or paint and say, "This is for a charity, so give me a special chit," would be a recipe for chaos. It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to police and for the trader to operate. I return to the point that the charities should face: such a scheme could apply only to some sorts of charity. If it is to be discriminatory, we want no part of it.

This debate is pleasing to us because, fortunately, in this matter there need be no discrimination, and the administration and reasonable policing should be relatively straightforward. After all, what is more public than an advertisement? If one buys an advertisement, one declares to the world the transaction in which one is engaged. One cannot buy an advertisement for one's private enjoyment or benefit and pretend that it is a charitable advertisement, because it is there in the newspaper for everyone to see. In addition, newspaper administration is usually much more sophisticated than administration at a small store selling other articles which some people wish to be exempted from VAT for charitable purposes.

The argument about local authorities does not stand up for a moment. I do not wish to usurp the role of the Government spokesman, but I am sure that he will say that, whereas there are only several hundred local authorities — all public bodies whose minutes are published and where nearly everything is available for inspection — the number of charities runs into six figures. Included in that number are some unusual bodies whose administration does not conform to a general pattern. There is a world of difference — indeed, a Pacific ocean of difference — between local authorities and the great mass of British charities. There is no analogy between them.

Since this exemption would be tolerably easy to administer, could be administered fairly, and would come to the relief of many local charities, such as churches, chapels and other assemblies, because local funds could be used to relieve local needs — the high cost of press advertising bears heavily on bodies with small resources — and because the amendment would relieve all charities without discrimination, we shall be happy to support it.

Mr. Yeo: I speak in strong support of the amendment. I have a long-standing interest in VAT in relation to charities. I was, in fact, the founder chairman of the Charities VAT Reform Group. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for giving that group such favourable publicity.

The main objective of the Charities VAT Reform Group is to secure complete relief for charities from VAT. The group represents most of the major national charities and many of the smaller ones. I must correct a point made by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright). At no stage has the group done other than campaign for complete relief from VAT. We do not suggest that there should be discrimination between charities. If the Government felt that some charities were less deserving than others and chose to make that distinction, that would be a matter for the Government and we would examine their suggestion. The group's objective has always been to secure complete relief. I am sorry that the Liberal party seems to be confused about that point.

To say that VAT relief should be denied to an organisation such as the Spastics Society because VAT relief cannot, apparently, be extended to the Moonies is an extraordinary and convoluted argument. To say that one organisation which is probably universally regarded as deserving will not receive this benefit, because it cannot be given to an organisation which is not universally regarded as deserving is extraordinarily illogical even by Liberal standards.

Mr. Wainwright: Which of the two quite contradictory arguments is the hon. Gentleman putting before the Committee? A few minutes ago, he was saying, "Far be it from the Charities VAT Reform Group to exclude any charity from the scope of its intentions," and that the group had no desire to be discriminatory. Within seconds, he went on to say that it was absurd to put the Spastics Society on the same level as the Moonies. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He should tell hon. Members whether he wants an exemption for all registered charities, whatever the defects in our charity laws, or whether he wants the exemption to be limited to certain types of charity.

Mr. Yeo: I do not want to detain the Committee unnecessarily. That is exactly what I did say. I believe that universal relief should be granted, but if the Government choose to be selective about it I should be happy to look at their selection.

I believe that this relief is justified because of the valuable work done by charities. It is recognised by hon. Members and the public that charities do valuable work. This relief is justified also because of the accepted principle that tax concessions for charities are justified. In fact, charities are exempt from income tax and capital gains, corporation and capital transfer taxes — almost any type of tax one can think of, except VAT.

It is important to be clear about the fact that what we are seeking for charities in terms of VAT is not a concession; it is merely equality of treatment with local authorities, which already recover VAT. When I was running the Spastics Society and it ran a handicapped school for spastic children, that operation looked remarkably similar to those operations run by local authorities. The only difference between the two was that, when I repaired the roof of one of the Spastics Society schools, I paid 15 per cent. more than the local authority. There is great similarity between the two operations. For that reason, it is all the more unacceptable that the position of charities in relation to VAT should remain significantly worse than the position of local authorities or commercial companies. I do not believe that any hon. Member or anyone outside the Chamber wants that to persist.

The Government's arguments are well known. They say that, if they were to grant relief, it would be indiscriminate. That is a most extraordinary argument. That has never deterred the Government from making other concessions, of which in some cases they are justifiably proud,, for example, on legacies and covenants. In those cases no distinction has been drawn between the charities that can benefit from them.

When we ask for VAT relief we are suddenly told that charities are not be entitled to the special relief although they benefit from the other concesions because in the Government's eyes some charities are not deserving. The argument cannot logically be repeated. I hope that my hon. Friend will not repeat it tonight.

It is also argued—I have seen letters from Treasury Ministers about this—that VAT relief cannot be granted because it is only of value to those who pay VAT. That is an extraordinary argument. Of course it is valuable to them only because they suffer from the heavy VAT burden. It is of no benefit to someone who does not pay VAT.

The Royal National Institute for the Blind pays £300,000 a year and the Royal British Legion pays £250,000 a year in VAT. Such sums are paid by many similar organisations. That money could be far better used on behalf of blind people, ex-service men and others.

The argument of lost revenue is put forward, but the benefit to the community of allowing greater resources to remain in the hands of the charities, and the multiplier effect that that would have, is considerable. That argument does not stand up especially from a Government who are interested in obtaining value for money.

The administrative objections are greatly exaggerated, as my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) has said. I am disappointed to find that within the past few weeks letters have been sent from the Treasury saying that the relief would have to be granted to as many as 100,000 organisations. I hoped that we had passed that point in the argument. I had hoped that the detailed submissions made over the years by the Charities VAT Reform Group had reduced that figure to a maximum of 20,000 organisations. If, because of its anxiety over administrative costs, the Treasury wished to reduce the numbers still further, it could place a financial limit below which it would not consider individual cases. The numbers could then be reduced to a few hundred.

If my hon. Friend needs further confirmation of the fact that only a few charities have a turnover of more than a few thousand pounds he has only to study the report made last year by a Select Committee in another place in connection with a private Member's Bill which dealt with the reform of local charities.

I have no doubt that if the Government are interested in boosting the voluntary sector the best thing that they could do would be to grant charities a general relief from VAT. I regret that the hon. Member for Sedgefield did not feel able to give the Labour party's unequivocal support for a general relief.

I was deeply disappointed by the Budget this year which contained so little for charities after the submission from the Charities VAT Reform Group to the Treasury. It includes a shopping list of possible reliefs. Limited reliefs could be confined to specific areas—for example, the extra VAT cost of altering buildings as required by fire officers. Such relief could have met with the Treasury's favour. It was a source of great regret to charities that it did not do so.

Newspaper advertisements are a highly sensitive matter for charities. Charities use newspaper advertisements to a great extent for fund raising. Charities are debarred from advertising on television. They can advertise only in newspapers, and that is now to bear this additional cost. The figures have already been quoted. The 110 charities that have been surveyed spent £1·2 million on newspaper advertising. That is not a guess; it is an analysis of the amount of advertising last year which would have borne the extra cost of VAT. If all charities had been included, the figure would have been much higher.

The advertising bill must inevitably result in some curtailment of the charitable work carried out by those organisations. The latest extension of VAT will affect many organisations which have not previously been burdened with it. Oxfam, whose work is done mainly outside this country, has not had the problem before, but it will be brought into the net. Any hon. Member who is worried about the adequacy of our overseas aid programme should support the amendment, because the resources that organisations such as Oxfam have available for helping the Third world will be reduced.

If the Government accept the amendment, they can be confident that they will not be bestowing huge benefits on what they may regard as dubious charities because they are not large users of advertising space. The proposal will effect such organisations as Actionaid, Dr. Barnardo's and Help the Aged. They will be penalised.

9.15 pm

The Opposition have also tabled an amendment which contrasts with a slightly equivocal alliance position. At the time of the Band Aid record before Christmas, when there was a tremendous outcry in the country about the famine, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) — in characteristic headline-grabbing form — jumped on the bandwagon and said how much he opposed the collecting of VAT on the Band Aid record. I look in vain for any alliance representative tonight. The right hon. Gentleman is not here, nor is any alliance Member. I shall look carefully at the Division lists to see whether any alliance Member has supported the amendment. If not, we must ensure that we publicise that fact. When there is a bandwagon, we all know who will be the first to jump on it—the right hon. Member for Devonport. But when there is an opportunity to right a wrong, he is not here. I deplore the fact that there is no alliance Member here to support the amendment, and I urge hon. Members to vote for it.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Mine will be a brief intervention in what is a most important debate. I shall speak briefly out of respect for the many other hon. Members who wish to participate. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) has played a distinguished part in the long campaign against the onerous new burden imposed on charities by the doubling of VAT. I honour the hon. Gentleman and the all-party disablement group, of which he is an officer, for both the strength and the excellence of their advocacy over the years.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the Multiple Sclerosis Society is severely disadvantaged by VAT. It has to pay a large amount of money which could be used for much better purposes. Other victims are the Spastics Society, the Royal National Institute for the Blind and the Royal National Institute for the Deaf. Many others are also badly hit.

I wish to quote from a letter that I received today from Sir John Cox, the director of the Spastics Society. He said:

"The Spastics Society was not only disappointed that VAT relief was not given in the budget but we were dealt a double blow when the Chancellor extended VAT to newspaper advertising. The Society will now have to find £30,000 to cover this new VAT bill in addition to the estimated £700,000 it will already have to pay in unrecoverable VAT in 1985-86 alone."

Why mug the good Samaritan in that way? Not only will VAT on advertising restrict the Spastics Society's ability to raise money; it will affect educational advertising that is designed to promote greater understanding of disability and of the problems and needs of disabled people.

Brian Rix, speaking on behalf of Mencap, has said to me:

"For running a charity, we are being clobbered."

Is the Minister happy with that comment on the Government's approach? I hope he will think again, as he should, on the basis of the compelling evidence that has been put to him in this debate. Other Governments have found a way around this problem. The Irish Government have a list of charities to which repayment of VAT is made. What stops this Government from returning VAT to the charities whose work is, by common consent, for the public good? If other Governments can do so, why do the Government here argue that it would be administratively impossible to exclude particular charities? I strongly urge the Minister to listen to Sir John Cox, Brian Rix and all those in the voluntary sector who fervently want him tonight to agree that enough is enough and that this totally unacceptable burden on charities must now cease.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I join the voices that have come from all parts of the Committee in support of this series of amendments. I appeal to hon. Members of the Liberal party and others who may feel that we should be arguing about the finer print to concentrate on the main argument. That argument has been put year after year by those who work hard in the sphere which we are discussing.

On the Government Benches I see the hon. Members for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) and for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), who have worked hard for a number of years on behalf of the cause that we are discussing. They must be feeling extremely frustrated that the Goverment have failed so far to respond to the pleas that have been made and are rapidly painting themselves in the public mind as an Administration who are anti-charity.

I find this diffucult to understand, because the Government have on numerous occasions emphasised the important role of the voluntary sector. Time and again we have heard — in connection, for example, with disablement—that the voluntary sector should be doing more and should be filling some of the gaps which inevitably have arisen because of cuts in Government expenditure. Yet the very means of raising money for the voluntary sector—advertisements for charities—is being penalised by the Budget. I feel a sense of despair about the way in which the Government have yet again savaged charities.

As we have heard, there are answers to the technical problems that arise. In any event, those problems must be overcome, because there is a real danger that we shall find ourselves on a downward spiral. Many charities advertise to raise money, and part of that money is recycled to raise more money, and so on. If we go into the cycle the other way round, taking out of the equation money which would be used to raise more money for worthwhile work, less will be available to promote and project charities, and less will come in.

Hon. Members in all parts of the Committee have responded individually when charities have needed urgently to project an issue. We have been asked to chip in £10 or £20, taking perhaps a half-page advertisement in a publication, for a worthy cause. VAT will add 15 per cent. to the cost of that—an imposition that could be avoided.

We have seen how some charities have been able to respond quickly, as with the famine crisis in recent months. Following dramatic pictures being shown on television, advertisements in the press on behalf of some charities hit home at a critical time. VAT on advertising will penalise people doing that excellent work.

I shall not repeat figures which have already been presented to the Committee by other hon. Members. Excellent work has been done by the all-party Charities VAT Reform Group. It is high time that the Government took notice and stopped using the perennial "No" to the pleas that are made on behalf of charities.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I support the amendments, though not unreservedly, because charities must tidy up their own shop. While I support most charities, and contribute to some, there are two types about which I am not happy.

Reference has been made to dubious charities, and there are many of them. The total number of charities runs into six figures. There must be hundreds, perhaps thousands, of charities of a dubious or questionable nature, and if VAT relief were granted on their advertising, that would be taxpayers' money going astray. I support the amendments, but it is clear that a review of charity law, how charities register, and what type of charities may register, is long overdue.

There is another type of charity about which some of my hon. Friends worry. I refer to the public schools. The average person is not aware that they are charities. Those who send their children to public schools are, by and large, wealthy enough to be able to opt out of the public sector. Everyone pays rates and taxes that contribute towards public sector schooling, but some people can opt out of that schooling and have their offspring educated at their own cost. I do not really object to that. I object to the privilege that is enjoyed by those who have been to public schools, but I do not mind that the public schools enjoy charitable status and do not have to pay VAT. Such charities, in any case, rarely advertise in the press. The dubious charities may advertise in the local and national press. The local press will be hit quite hard, certainly over classfied advertising.

Overall, I support the amendments. There may be administrative complications, but I do not really think that the Minister can rely on that answer. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) has suggested a possible solution. Charities could be given relief by means of a cut-off point or some other method. The will should be there. Mencap and Oxfam, for instance, are bona fide, worthwhile charities, and it is immoral to tax such bodies.

I have some reservations. Charity law needs to be tidied up. However, I hope that the Minister will be able to suggest something on Report which will embody the spirit of the amendments in the Finance Bill.

Mr. O'Brien: Among the amendments to the provision about VAT on newspaper advertising, amendment No. 4 has created the greatest concern among all parties in the Committee. I hope that the Minister will take note of the concern expressed in all sections of the Committee on this important and emotive subject.

The charities have been hard done by in the past. When VAT was doubled, they were hit hard. The imposition of VAT on improvements to accommodation and new building hit charities in many areas, particularly those engaged in the relief of poverty. I hope that the Minister will consider the points made tonight about the relief of VAT on advertising by charities.

A letter that I have received from the Minister of State says:

> "The Government does of course recognise the immensely valuable role which charities play in this country, not least in taking the pressure off health and local authorities."

That is a truism, and I hope that the Minister will accept it this evening. However, I am sure that when he replies to the debate he will use the following passage from the same letter:

[Mr. O'Brien]

"VAT reliefs for charities on specialised goods needed for their work have been significantly extended since 1979 to include ambulances . . . welfare vehicles" and other aids for the handicapped.

I accept that, but a number of hon. Members have mentioned the number of charities that will have to pay VAT on advertising. A prime example is the Royal British Legion, which has to advertise—sometimes even with full-page advertisements—to get help. The legion will be hit hard. It pays £250,000 in VAT each year and that burden will rise. The legion does sterling work to relieve poverty and does not receive covenants of £10,000 and so on, so it will not benefit much from other changes in the Budget.

I hope that the Minister of State will accept the points made by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee. I urge Conservative Members to mobilise their forces, because no Opposition Member will oppose the amendment. However, it would be preferable if the Minister agreed to accept it.

9.30 pm

Mr. Bermingham: I am always puzzled when people say that tasks are administratively difficult. Where there is a will, there is a way.

Every charity has a registered number. A group cannot become a charity without being registered. Therefore, every charity has a number. Even the Treasury should be able to understand that.

All that we need to do is to persuade the Treasury to agree that every charity that advertises should receive from the company to which it pays the money a receipt showing the number and name of the charity and a sum of money plus VAT. Like all registered traders, the charity could take its receipts to the Customs and Excise every quarter and claim tax back.

Numerous traders make such claims every quarter and the number of charities that will advertise is tiny. The Treasury does not seem to understand that the vast bulk of the 100,000 charities are organisations such as the South Malden Registered Tree Preservation Society—I have made up that example—with assets of £150, virtually no income each year and no activity. It would be eminently easy for charities to get the money back.

Compassion is supposed to rule in our world. The Government keep telling us that these are stringent times and there must be self-help and private sector involvement in helping the elderly, the young, the sick, the disabled and everybody else. But only an uncompassionate Government could say to those whom they are asking to help ohers, "Terribly sorry. In order to raise funds, we shall take a little more from you."

The Government say that the change will cost about £1 million. I do not care about the sum involved, because a greater principle is involved, which is whether we have a compassionate, caring society that recognises the value of work done by charities.

Charities need to advertise to raise funds. Our national budget is over £120 billion and £1 million is a relatively infinitesimal sum. Any administrative difficulties could be overcome by the simple method that I have recommended. I know from experience that the Treasury does not like anything that is simple or straightforward or that seeks to exempt. Charities nowadays, it would seem, are as much for squeezing as anybody else.

I saw the Prime Minister on the 6 o'clock television news tonight attending a party in the House today for handicapped children. When asked whether she would rather be at Prime Minister's Question Time or at the party, she rightly said at the party, and how much she admired the character of the children. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would take a little time this evening to extend that flicker of human kindness and pass it on to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. She might suggest that, if the Government are to have a compassionate face, they could start by telling Treasury officials not to worry about the complexity, and that the hon. Member for St. Helens, South had offered a simple solution to how charities could get back the money, so Ministers could be instructed to withdraw the VAT on advertisements placed in newspapers by charities.

It would be not a bad start to the second quarter of 1985 if the Government would show just a little compassion and let the charities keep all the money that they raise through advertising. After all, the charities need it far more than the Government do.

Mr. Hayhoe: The debate has ranged much wider than the amendment. I make no complaint about that, because I know that the subject excites a great deal of genuine and sincerely held interest and deep passion throughout the House.

First, I pay tribute to the all-party Charities VAT Reform Group, which was started by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo). Although I have had disagreements with representatives of the group when I have met them, I fully support the work of the group. It helps Parliament and the country better to understand the problems. As discussions proceed, I hope that an even deeper understanding of many of the problems involved will develop between us.

I deal first with the cost of the amendment. Although I am advised that the cost will be approximately £1 million, I acknowledge, as has been said by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and other hon. Members, that the Charities VAT Reform Group, in a survey of a limited number of charities, has already estimated that the cost would be £1·2 million. Indeed, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South two or three weeks ago, I should like to put my officials in touch with those responsible for the survey. We ought to be able to agree on the factual realities of the matters under discussion. We may differ about how we treat them, but at least we should attempt to achieve a better understanding. I am concerned at these apparently substantial differences between the estimate that the hon. Member for Sedgefield gave, supported by some of my hon. Friends, and the estimate that I have been given. That offer remains open. I hope that discussion will take place and that we can clarify the position.

Mr. Blair: I support the Minister in his statement. He said that he would like to verify the figure of £1·2 million. If the figure is verified, will that make a difference to his position on the amendment?

Mr. Hayhoe: No, it will not, as the hon. Gentleman will discover. However, I think that as far as possible on this and many other issues we should try to achieve at least a common acceptance of the facts because that is a prelude to reaching decisions which are better informed, and that surely is desirable.

I am advised that the £5 million estimate is based on present expenditure on medical computers by bodies which will be eligible for the relief, including charities providing care and treatment for the handicapped and research institutions, many of which are charitable bodies. For example, universities and health authorities will qualify for the relief. The estimate is not precise and the value of the relief is expected to increase as the use of computers increases. Nevertheless, it is the best estimate available and it goes much wider than the charities that have been canvassed because under the old regime universities and research institutions had to pay VAT, whereas they will now benefit from the relief announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Mr. Blair: If the £5 million estimate is based not primarily on charities but on other bodies which will secure relief on computers for medical research, does the Minister accept the charities' view that the relief will have a neglible effect on their costings?

Mr. Hayhoe: I do not wish to dispute the specific replies given to the hon. Gentleman by specific charities. I am simply saying that the relief must be seen in a wider context, in which, I am advised, a benefit of some £5 million will flow from my right hon. Friend's proposal.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield said that he intended to support amendment No. 5 which deals with registered charities, but he may not fully appreciate the effect of that qualification. Not all charities are required by law to register with the Charity Commission and that qualification would exclude the churches as well as charities in Scotland and Northern Ireland. It is estimated that about 40 per cent. of the charities in the United Kingdom are not among the 150,000 or so registered with the Charity Commission.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) also referred to registration, but this is a very complicated area. My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South, with whose group we have discussed these matters, will recognise that complexity, as did the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright)

Mr. Bermingham: I think that the Minister has misunderstood my point. The only charities known to the law are the registered charities, each of which has a number, so all that one needs to do is to have that number put on the invoice to the charity.

Mr. Hayhoe: If the hon. Gentleman reads my explanation in Hansard, he will realise that that would exclude about 40 per cent. of the bodies which are seen as charities and benefit as charities within the United Kingdom. That illustrates the complexity of the matter.

I have naturally considered carefully the possibility of special relief for charities in this context, as I did when VAT was extended to building alterations last year. Such relief, however, would be indiscriminate in that it would not be restricted to those providing vital welfare services and enjoying wide public support but would extend to thousands of far more controversial and restrictive organisations—religious sects, historical and antiquarian societies, musical and brass band societies, theatres and art galleries, and so on. An immensely broad group of organisations qualify for charity status in that sense.

I well understand those who have called with feeling for a review of charity law. However, that is wider than the scope of the amendment and my responsibilities within the Treasury. For many years I have considered the matter, and I echo the sentiment that there is considerable merit in seeking a rationalisation of the law on charities. However, tonight I must deal with the amendment and what has been said in the context of the present position.

9.45 pm

The way in which we now operate would lead to a lack of discrimination between charities about relief. I am speaking about more than just relief on advertisements. At least half of the interventions were about general charity relief. Most of both speeches of my hon. Friends related to the need for general relief, and the majority of hon. Members who participated in the debate wanted general VAT relief for charities. Their speeches went wider than the amendment, but every hon. Member who spoke supported the narrower relief for press advertising.

Mr. Alfred Morris: I have been following the Minister carefully. He was rightly worried about the veracity of figures. I can assure him of the accuracy of the figures given to me by Sir John Cox, the director of the Spastics Society. How can the Minister justify the imposition of £730,000 in unrecoverable VAT on the Spastics Society in the present tax year? Is the Minister saying that that is justified?

Mr. Hayhoe: That is the result of the law as it exists. When the right hon. Gentleman was in government, his Government did not opt for general VAT relief for charities. I acknowledge that the increase in the general rate of VAT from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent., the extension of VAT to alterations, and this year's extensions increase that burden. Many of the interventions dealt with the principle involved, but the Labour Government did not believe that they could justify giving general VAT relief. I could quote what the then Chancellor of the Exchequer said, but I shall not weary the Committee with that.

Reference has been made to the additional cost imposed by press and magazine advertisements being VAT-able for charities. The extra reliefs that have been given apply within the entire charitable area, although not to the same people, and exceed the new imposition. Most of the debate has been about the argument for general relief. If this modest relief—modest in terms of money because only a million or two are involved—were conceded, it would inevitably lead to the more expensive claims for general VAT relief. A significant number of hon. Members who have spoken have made that clear. Because of the difficulties that we rehearsed last year in a similar debate about VAT on alterations, in which larger sums were involved, I regret that I cannot advise the Committee to support the amendment. It must be seen in the general context. The Government have given direct tax concessions worth about £400 million a year, which have been substantially extended since 1979. Tribute was rightly paid to the substantial increase in grants from the Government to charitable bodies.

Looking at the question in the round, while recognising the deep feelings of those who believe that charities should be excluded from the extension of VAT to their advertising, for the wider considerations that I have described, I must recommend the rejection of the amendment.

Mr. Blair: The fault of the Minister is not that he has made a bad speech but that he has a bad case. The tragedy of a debate such as this is that it has been won conclusively by speakers from each side of the House, yet one fears for the conclusion of the vote.

The Minister says that there is an anomaly in giving VAT relief to charities on their newspaper advertisements. Charities have a series of reliefs from tax. There is no greater anomaly in adding the proposed relief than in allowing charities relief from capital transfer tax, corporation tax, or any of the other taxes.

If it is said that the administrative difficulties in giving VAT relief on newspaper advertisements are too great, my reply is that we should never accept an argument from a Minister about the simple cost of administration until it is given great scrutiny. One such line from a Minister in a debate of this sort is a wholly insufficient basis for rejecting the amendment.

The Minister's argument was even worse when he dealt with the costings. The Minister had no proper reply to any of the points concerning costings. I asked the Minister whether, should he discover that the charities were right about the additional costs, that would change his mind. He said that it would not, yet he says that the facts are necessary in order to make a proper decision. It seems that the Minister makes a decision first and inquires into the facts afterwards. That is a cackhanded method of administration.

It is not right to say that one must accept the general case for VAT relief for charities in order to support the amendment. I purposely said that at the beginning because I wanted to maximise support, and I do want to get drawn into that broader argument. The case for VAT relief on newspaper advertisements is a particular one, because the way that charities raise money is through advertising. That puts them in a totally separate category. The Minister's attempts to resist the amendment do not reflect credit on him. It is time that the Government's reality matched their rhetoric. It is time that they supported amendments which do precisely what they want to do and encourage charities in our society.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): We all know what agitation there has been during the past year at the Government's intention to do the unspeakable and the unthinkable — to tax publications, books and newspapers. The campaign was vigorous, accurate and eventually successful. However, there is no doubt that the possibility was large, and the likelihood was that it would have happened had the campaign not been mounted.

I recall that the last time such a proposition was mooted was in 1940, at the very time when we were fighting with our backs to the wall and being exhorted by Churchill to fight on the beaches. The Battle of Britain was being fought overhead, yet the Parliament of 1940 decided, against the will of the Chancellor, Kingsley-Wood, that there should be no such tax. A. P. Herbert said that if there were a tax on the Bible, it would be the first time that the word of God had been taxed. The thing was blown out of the water in a burst of laughter. This year's campaign has prevented a similar contemptuous end, because I believe that there are enough Conservative Members who have voted against such a proposition if it had been put forward.

We are therefore left with this mean-minded fag end of a proposition to bring in the same sort of taxation on newspapers and publications, with the tax on advertisements. I am no friend of such a tax. By definition, a value added tax is always unjust and can cease to be unjust only when it is highly selective, and when it is highly selective it can make all sorts of errors in application. We all know that. VAT is an unfair and unjust tax, so I am no friend of it. I am also no friend of the institution that brought it into being—the Common Market.

However, there is a case for looking at the expenditure of big business on advertising. As the arguments over the past two or three hours have shown, certain issue have at least been recognised by some Conservative Members; for example, in relation to job advertisements. There has been cross-party sympathy, although not necessarily expressed by a high vote.

We are left with the principle of the issue and also with other areas that are affected adversely. I shall refer to only one where I thought that the Government would show some consideration. It is the arts, first, because the arts already pay VAT. It is nonsensical that the theatre, music and cinema are subsidised by the state on the one hand, and on the other pay VAT, which immediately reduces the level of what is a mean and insufficient subsidy. The arts are in peril because of what they have to pay in VAT. It is nonsense.

Secondly, the arts sell their wares in a particular way —by newspaper advertising. The problem is that they have to advertise not once or twice, but continuously. Unless they advertise, day in, day out and night in, night out, they cannot sell their wares. A large-scale single advertisment does not do, because people need to know what is happening on a particular night. For instance, at the end of the week there will be a swapping over of "Henry V" and "Richard III" by the Royal Shakespeare Company. People need to know the dates on which the plays will be on. Therefore, there has to be continuous and expensive advertising.

In the Standard, three or four pages are taken up night in, night out by necessary large-scale advertising. It is costly to the major companies. It is costly to music establishments which have a run of concerts throughout the week. The programmes have to be made known. It is expensive for the theatres, and above all for the small theatres — the small visiting theatre or local theatre which must have continual advertising. I assure the Minister that the level of taxation on such small theatres will be heavy and continuous.

That would not be too bad if the Government were continuing their support for the arts, but over the past few years they have, and in the forthcoming two or three years they will, savagely cut support for the arts. Next year, support for the arts will be cut in real terms by 8 per cent. When we add to that rate-capping on local authorities, it will be seen that many of the arts will be in extreme danger. Even that monetarist Rees-Mogg, the chairman of the Arts Council, has referred to the number of clients that will be put in jeopardy because of the Government's subsidy policies, which will result in a cut this year and every future year. On top of that comes a thing which may topple many of them, the imposition of VAT on the very sector in which they should be expanding to draw in more box office returns to replace the lost subsidy — advertising.

The Committee must oppose the clause. I hope that we can build up a campaign to get some sense into the Government and some understanding that if they are to impose this tax, although I hope that they will not and will concede the case at a later stage, they must at least make it understood to the Minister for the Arts and the Chancellor that the forecast level of subsidy must be increased. Some measures must be taken to stop the parlous crisis facing the arts and provide proper support to them.

Mr. O'Neill: Much of what I was to say has already been covered and I have already alluded to this subject, in a debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill some weeks ago. I am sponsored by the National Graphical Association. It has to be made clear that the impact of this imposition on employment in the newspaper and print industry generally will be severe. It is not just the 35,000 jobs in the national newspapers, the 68,000 jobs in the regional newspapers or the 19,000 jobs in magazines that will be affected, but the 14,000 jobs in distribution. In all, some 136,000 people are engaged in the production of newsprint and magazines. We shall have to wait to see how true is the Minister's claim in an earlier debate that the impact on employment will be only marginal.

John Le Page of the Newspaper Publishers Association has said that he has fears about the future of two titles. The Newspaper Society has said that this may have a serious impact on the provincial press. It would be dangerous to quote figures about the impact but it will be more than marginal. I say that for several reasons. The provincial press is now of such a flexible character that we are talking not just about the publication of one or two weekly titles. Often, there are big print centres involving several newspapers that, because of the technology, have to be [Interruption.] Is it necessary for me to speak above a chorus of gabble from Conservative Benches?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order.

Mr. O'Neill: Thank you, Mr. Armstrong.

The local newspapers on which many of our constituents depend for information are printed on presses that produce a variety of other products and that bring about the viability of the printing firms that produce the papers. They do not exist only to produce local newspapers, but if the crutch of the local newspaper is removed, the fragile financial basis of those firms will be put in considerable danger.

We are not talking about jobs exclusively in the newspaper industry. The impact of the imposition of VAT on advertising could be such that some local titles will be endangered. It will certainly be a considerable burden on free sheets, which are often produced in the periods during which local machinery is lying idle. It would be a drain on the business if those machines were not employed.

10.15 pm

It is also fair to say that much of the new machinery which is being used in the provinces, unfortunately to a much greater extent than in other areas of the print industry, is expensive equipment whose use depends upon agreements being reached between the unions and management as to its maximum utilisation. For that to be achieved requires delicate and often painful negotiations by both sides, and in some aspects of the newspaper industry in the provinces, that painful stage has been reached, and discussion is continuing about the final stage in the implementation of the new technology. There is no point in print houses anticipating the maximum utilisation of their machinery if they discover that some of their titles or magazines will be withdrawn from production because they are no longer viable after the imposition of VAT.

The Minister suggested that the imposition of VAT will tidy up media advertising so that the press is treated similarly to radio and television. We heard earlier this evening about classified advertising. In terms of the technology and the numbers of people who can be contacted through the press—the viability of the print industry in general is not healthy, despite the many millions of pounds that have been poured into new equipment and techniques—too much of the attractive and expensive business that should go to British printers is going abroad. We are not talking about areas that have big problems with trade unions, but about the production of the brochures used by Thomson Holidays and some mail order firm catalogues, much of whose work is being done in print shops in Italy and West Germany. We are talking about sustaining a British industry that is fighting manfully to embrace new technology and take advantage of the improvements available to it. But it is being denied the encouragement and support that it deserves from the Government.

For the Government to say that simply because VAT is imposed on independent radio and television it must be imposed on the press, too, is nonsense. The same sort of tidy mindedness is clear when one reflects that, in last year's Budget, VAT was inposed on fish and chips, while this year it will be imposed on the newspapers in which they are wrapped.

This is a sad day for Britain, but it is not as sad as it could have been. We know that VAT could have been imposed on books and newspapers, and we are thankful that it has not been. But, since they have gone this far, we do not know how much further the Government will be encouraged to go. I recognise that we must allow this clause to go through. The two earlier amendments related to two special areas of the debate and did not take account of the industry which produces the product that is being taxed, although I believe that we should have taken account of that. I should have thought that the Minister could have found a better target from which to raise that much-needed £50 million.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The extension of the positive rate of VAT to newspaper advertising is unnecessary, fiddling, provocative and prejudiced—in other words, it is fairly typical of the Government's policies and strategies. First, it is part of that strategy on which the Government have embarked of taxing everything on which they can lay their hands—not only fish and chips but hamburgers, matches and lighters. It is the "we need the money" syndrome of spreading the tax burden to create the pretence that they are reducing the burden of direct taxation when all they are really doing is shifting the burden on to any item that will bear it. This is part of the typical strategy of tax duplicity on which the Government have embarked.

Secondly, we object to this measure because it will adversely affect newspapers. My particular concern is with the provincial press. The sins of Fleet street are visited on the provincial press, even to the seventh edition. All too often the provincial press is in financial difficulties. It is facing increasing competition from Fleet street newspapers which seem, in many cases, to have fallen off the back of the advertising industry. Those Fleet street journals often bear as much resemblance to newspapers as this Government's policies bear to conservatism. They are driving the provincial press into difficulties.

It is vital to our democratic way of life to preserve the provincial press. Unfortunately, all too often, the maintenance of good objective standards and good journalism depend not on the stimulus of real competition but on a monopoly's good will and conscience. Many of the evening newspapers are part of a monopoly. Some papers—the Grimsby Evening Telegraph is one, as I am sure the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will agree—maintain the honourable standards of journalism, albeit in the face of increasing difficulties. The financial constraints imposed upon them will be heightened by this measure which will affect newspaper revenue. About 80 per cent. of provincial press revenue comes not from the cover price but from advertising.

Thirdly, this is a retrograde measure because it is truckling to the EEC Commission. My impression is that if one gives such a commission an inch, it will take a kilometre. This attempt to end our zero-rated system of VAT is illegal, irresponsible and unnecessary. It is certainly not justified by the circumstances. Clearly the Government feel a need, for some strange reason, to bow in the EEC's direction. The Government are not able to tackle certain other aspects. They certainly would not wish to extend VAT to safety clothing for industrial purposes, but they have hit the newspapers.

I hope that the newspapers will retaliate by treating this Government and the Conservative party with the same impartiality, courtesy, objectivity and factual accuracy with which they have treated the Labour party over the years. The newspapers must accept that this measure is a direct consequence of the type of policies supported by them — increasing the tax burden by increasing unemployment and deferring to the EEC which, all too often, the newspapers support and back.

Fourthly, this is a retrograde measure because it hits especially severely at those who cannot pass on the VAT burden, including small business and small advertisers. It hits the small classified advertisements of ordinary people announcing events of joy or sorrow—births, marriages and deaths. Such advertisements commemorate the passing of loved ones in terms that may appear fusty and homespun to the sophisticated minds on the Government side but they are deeply sincere. These advertisements should certainly not be the objective of a tax.

Newspapers are working in an increasingly competitive advertising market. There is intense competition. I want to ask the Minister of State a question that affects the other participants involved in this competition. Is the competition on an equal footing? I am interested in the competition from pirate radio. Pirate radio is illegal. There has been an enormous increase in the number of pirate radio stations. In an answer earlier this year, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

"my Department has monitored 74 unlicensed broadcasters on radio" —[Official Report, 8 February 1985; Vol. 72, c. 747.]

A list is included which unfortunately does not contain Radio Arthur which was broadcasting for the NUM during the pit stoppage. The Department took action on 124 occasions in 1984 and so far this year it has taken action against about 15. That does not have the effect of closing them because generally the radio stations continue to broadcast.

Those radio stations broadcast on the basis of advertising revenue which is taken from the pool of advertising revenue which clause 10 proposes to tax. I understood that it was an offence to advertise on pirate radio. It turns out that in their wisdom the Labour Government made it an offence under the Marine, &c., Broadcasting (Offences) Act 1967 to advertise on stations transmitting from outside territorial waters. The stations, like the Government, have to be at sea before they commit an offence relating to advertising. The two stations which broadcast at sea deny that they take advertising revenue from this country. We do not have to believe them, but they deny it.

It is not possible to stop advertising. Although the Department of Trade and Industry has written and made threatening noises to 300 companies which have been advertising on pirate radio, it is not possible to deal with them unless they are charged with aiding and abetting. That means that the principal offender—the pirate radio —must be found guilty.

The rates for advertising on pirate radio vary enormously. A 30-second slot on Capital Radio costs £705 whereas on Radio Jackie, in south-west London, it costs £5. That may not be enormous amount, but it is taken from the pool of advertising revenue. I have to confess to an illegality by listening to Skyline Radio on the way home at night. It is quoted in The Guardian that advertising on Skyline Radio costs between £50 and £225. Payment is strictly in advance. Advertising brings that station about £600 a week. It exceeds the basic running costs of £400. It is, therefore, possible to make money out of pirate radio stations. Are those pirate radio stations registered for VAT? One of them boasts of being registered for VAT. Are the 74 registered for VAT? If they are illegal, how can they be registered?

I have heard car hire firms, hotels, discos, garages and a whole series of businesses advertising on pirate radio. Is the VAT payable on those advertisements allowable against tax? Is the advertising of those firms tax deductible? The matter plainly raises a moral issue and it is perhaps a little unfair to spring it on the Minister.

If the VAT on advertising or the advertising on pirate radio are tax allowable, why are not the hiring of call girls, prostitution or any other form of illegal activity allowable? That opens fascinating vistas that I hope the Minister will deal with. Those questions must be answered in the light of the competition that these stations now provide for legitimate advertising on commercial radio, which already pays VAT, and for newspapers, which will pay VAT under these proposals.

10.30 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I wish briefly to support my hon. Friends who oppose the clause. The proposal to impose VAT on newspaper advertising is a retrograde step. Although the Government may not have actually spread the rumour prior to the Budget that VAT might be imposed on both books and newspapers, they welcomed the publicity, because it made the proposal in the Budget appear small fry compared with what people feared.

The Government are moving in the wrong direction, and having taken this first step I fear that they will be encouraged to move further down that road. Although VAT has not been imposed on books in this Budget, they may move in that direction in future. Therefore, we must oppose the clause. I hope that the Government have second thoughts because we are talking about a small and insignificant part of the overall Budget.

I am concerned about the implications for the provincial press. During recent years a large number of local and regional newspapers have closed. They have been under threat from the free newspapers and other sources going for the limited budgets of advertisers. The local and provincial press are dependent on advertising from people who cannot claim back the VAT—those advertising births, marriages, personal classified advertisements and so on. That is a substantial part of their advertising.

If the Government continue in this direction, many more local papers will be under threat. While I often differ with what they print, I believe that they have a right to print it. It would be a bad day if more of them closed. I accept that the free press has a part to play, but it is no substitute for a weekly or daily regional newspaper. I do not dispute its right to exist, but the amount of editorial material, when compared with a traditional paper, is small. Many free newspapers have few reporters and depend almost entirely on advertising revenue. The local press also depend on that advertising revenue to survive. Any pressure put on them will cause more of them to close, which would be a bad day for local news.

I hope that this is not the foot in the door to putting VAT on to newspaper cover costs and books. As I have been serving on the Transport Bill Committee, I have not heard the earlier debates, so I do not know if the Minister has already answered my point. I hope that the Government will assure us that they will not move in that direction and that, even at this late stage, they will have second thoughts about imposing VAT on newspaper advertising.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I apologise for not being present for all the clause stand part debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) said that the free press was no substitute for a professional provincial press. In some areas free newspapers have become a valuable addition to journalism in Britain, but they are threatened in a dangerous way by the clause.

As my hon. Friend said, the quality of the free press is variable. Some rely almost entirely on advertisements and make no attempt at journalism. What little copy they carry is syndicated. But some, such as the North Staffordshire News and Advertiser, make a distinct effort at journalism. Indeed, because of their limited journalistic resources, they have found a mode of journalism that matches those resources. They cannot cover the whole range of local activities, so adopt a more campaigning role, and they have added a positive and distinct element to journalism.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said, there are now 700 of them and they are a force to be reckoned with. By threatening them, the clause is threatening an embryo movement in journalism which may become insignificant and unimportant, but which could, as I hope will, develop into an interesting part of the media, particularly in the local and provincial sphere.

The clause affects them in a number of ways, some of which the Minister may not totally have taken into account. He may not have appreciated that the whole revenue of free newspapers now bears VAT, a move that is more radical than that which we were discussing in previous amendments in connection with VAT on charities.

This will add considerably to the costs of these newspapers. For example, a local newspaper in north Staffordshire, I was informed last week, has had to employ an extra member of staff simply to deal with the more complex type of invoicing. For a small business run with few staff, that has been a considerable extra cost.

About a third of that newspaper's advertising is placed by clients who will not be able to reclaim VAT. The paper carries 12 pages of advertising, four of which, it is estimated, are from small traders such as people in insurance and finance and from charities. The revenue of such newspapers is affected in an even more radical way than I suspect the Chancellor realised when he introduced the measure.

As I pointed out, it is to be hoped that the free press becomes a significant and valuable addition to journalism. Ironically, this VAT proposal will not only squeeze them as small businesses—and the Government claim that they see small firms as providing the main source of employment in the coming years—but will squeeze their editoral quality. If their revenue is squeezed, their attempts to become serious, albeit limited, journalistic vehicles will be equally restricted.

The Government will force them back into a laager of advertising and syndication, with no attempt being made at even the present embryonic movement into local campaigning journalism which could make them valuable. Instead, the Government will condemn them to being rather limited advertising rags. That cannot be what the Government intend. It would not be to the benefit of local communities, and in strangling these small areas of innovative journalism, the Government will also be strangling some of the small businesses that they claim to want to help.

Mr. Blair: We have already debated the effect on consumers of the imposition of VAT on newspaper advertisements, and it is right that we should also consider the effect on the newspaper industry.

Most of the relevant points have been extremely well made by my hon. Friends the Members for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). The House is, therefore, in the fortunate position that it will not have to listen to me for long. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] I am always open to persuasion.

The Minister of State accepted the estimate of a 3 per cent. drop in revenue resulting from the imposition of VAT on newspaper advertisements. That is a high figure, considering the margins on which some papers operate.

I concur with what my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said about free newspapers. It is often not realised how many people are employed by those papers. It is estimated that there could be as many as 13,800 full-time employees and almost 96,000 part-time employees. All the revenue comes from advertising. The growth in the number of free newspapers has been enormous and it is clear that it will continue if it is allowed to do so. The employment effects are as important as anything else.

We have said throughout our debates that the Minister should be particular in his estimate of the employment effects of introducing VAT on newspaper advertisements. The Government's record in predicting the employment effects of VAT is extremely poor. Last year, VAT was imposed on takeaway foods and we were assured by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that the employment effects of that would be minimal. However, the Hot Takeaway Action Group, which has carried out a large survey, estimates the effects to have been devastating and it is suggested that 20,000 people have been made redundant as a result of that imposition of VAT.

I hope that the Minister of State will give us specific predictions of the employment effects of the imposition of VAT on newspaper advertisements. We fear that it will drive many newspapers at the margin to make a considerable number of people redundant and that it may even put some papers out of business.

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Members for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike) referred to press speculation that the Government might put VAT on newspapers and books. I assure both hon. Members that that was speculation and that the Government had no hand in it.

The hon. Member for Burnley asked whether the imposition of VAT on press and magazine advertising is an hors d'oeuvre to VAT being imposed more widely on the printed word. I refer him to what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget speech. He announced that while the Government accepted that this was an area in which European Community law had to be reckoned with, and where we were bound by treaty obligations, he did not intend to make any further extensions of the VAT base during the lifetime of this Parliament. That is an absolute assurance along the lines for which the hon. Gentleman asked.

10.45 pm

The hon. Member for Paisley, South referred to advertising for the arts—concerts, theatre and the like—and was concerned that the imposition of VAT on advertising would be an additional burden upon the arts which would have adverse effects. In fact, theatres, concert organisations and the like are registered for VAT. If they have a turnover in the year of over £19,500, they are registered and charged VAT on their ticket sales and, therefore, can reclaim the VAT that they pay on their press advertising as they now reclaim other VAT charges that they have to meet. In those circumstances, I think the generality must be that the worries of the hon. Gentleman will not be reflected in practice. Indeed, I know of no representations from the arts world on this issue, because these organisations are well aware that they can reclaim any additional input tax that they have to pay on their advertisements.

The hon. Gentleman made some general comments about Government support for the arts. This is not the occasion to reply to them, and I do not intend to do so. However, for the record, I do not accept his critical comments.

The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) referred to the effect of VAT on advertisements in the press and magazines and was concerned about whether this might result in some job losses. As he knows, and, indeed, referred to, we had been talking along these lines on earlier amendments. I do not intend to repeat what I said then. The estimates that I have indicate that the job effect will be very small.

What I can be certain of, however, is that if job losses occur in the press and magazines, the VAT charge on advertisements will be blamed for everything. Last year, when VAT was imposed on hot takeaway food and that coincided with a record rise in the price of potatoes, fish and vegetable oil, it was never suggested that the difficulties which the industry encountered had anything to do with the price of raw materials—it was all blamed on VAT. Anybody who is involved in tax affairs of any kind knows that one attracts that kind of comment.

I met representatives of the Hot Takeaway Action Group recently and asked them whether, on the basis of group's latest surveys, they could differentiate between the various effects. The surveys were not scientifically carried out, as the representatives acknowledged. The surveys were limited, and it was perhaps a somewhat partial sample that was taken. Therefore, even the representatives of the group do not contend that the surveys give a proper view over the whole of the hot takeaway food area, and they had to acknowledge—and did so quite freely and openly—that they could not differentiate between the various effects.

As to Government forecasts — and reference was made to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary—the first time that we shall have evidence is later this year when we receive the family expenditure survey data for 1984, which will give us a pretty clear indication of spending on hot takeaway food. We shall have to wait until later this year to have some scientifically produced estimates in the expenditure survey, after which we will be better placed to make a judgment.

To return to the question of jobs in the printing industry generally, if management in the printing industry were offered a choice between a much more realistic and co-operative attitude by the trade unions that operate in that industry and the imposition of VAT on its press advertising, I am sure which it would choose.

[Mr. Hayhoe]

I share the concern that has been expressed about the loss of printing in the country and the fact that so much printing has moved abroad over a long period of years. I am delighted that some of it is coming back to the country. That is because management is now being allowed better to manage and use the new technology. I welcome the helpful and constructive comments that have been made on this matter. If those attitudes are reflected more widely I hope that British printing, which had a fine reputation in the past, will be able to recover much of the ground that has been lost.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) referred to the VAT position of pirate radio. As he recognised, that is going a little wide of the clause. It may be out of the same pool, but so are a great many other things. The hon. Gentleman thought that he would be lucky to get an answer from me today, and he was right. Nevertheless, I shall look into the matter and write to him about it.

I commend the clause to the Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 35

PERSONAL RELIEFS

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 34, line 2, leave out '£4,255' and insert '£4,475'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 8, in page 34, line 3, leave out '£2,690' and insert '£2,830'.

Dr. McDonald: The purpose of the amendment becomes clear when one considers the careful way in which the Chancellor presented his statement about age allowances. He said in his Budget statement:

"I propose to increase the age allowances this year by the same cash amount as the corresponding basic allowances. Thus the single age allowance will rise by £200 and the married age allowance will go up by £300."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 801.]

On the face of it, that seemed perfectly fair. In fact, however, it was a continuation of what the Government did last year when they widened the gap between the age allowances and the ordinary personal allowances. Until then the gap had never been more than 1 per cent. but it suddenly widened to 7 per cent., working against the over-65s. This was because last year the Government more than indexed the ordinary allowances but merely indexed the age allowances. As a result, 2·4 million pensioners over the age of 65 had to pay an extra £130 million in income tax, although the Government looked after the better off pensioners—those with investment income—through the abolition of the investment income surcharge.

Having read carefully virtually every word of the Minister's response to a similar Opposition amendment last year, I find that the Government produced no good reason whatever for their treatment of pensioners. There is absolutely no justification for making a distinction between increases in personal allowances to pensioners over the age of 65 and increases in ordinary personal allowances — unless there is an implicit justification which the Government would prefer not to state out loud. As the Government choose to believe that unemployment is due at least partly to the unemployment trap, they may regard it as more important to raise the allowances of people in work to ensure that they continue to work and do not chicken out and take unemployment benefit or social security benefit instead. The consequence of following that argument through is that pensioners' tax allowances do not matter much and that it is sufficient to index them. If one failed to do that, pensions would be cut, in so far as they are subject to tax.

This year the Chancellor of the Exchequer tried to cover the Government's tracks by announcing the same cash amount, yet on examination that is not as fair as it seems. This year's Budget increases the single age allowance by 8 per cent., and the married age allowance by 7·6 per cent. Both are higher than the present rate of inflation, but who knows what will happen to inflation by the end of the financial year?

The real point of comparison is between the single person's allowance or the married woman's allowance, which increases by 10 per cent., and the married man's allowance which increases by 9·5 per cent. The Government have raised the age allowances by a little more than the present rate of inflation but not as much as the ordinary allowances. The reason for that is not clear, unless it is, as I suggested earlier, that pensioners do not matter much because they do not affect the unemployment figures. Perhaps the Chief Secretary can suggest a reason for distinguishing between the age allowances in that way — a distinction which was introduced last year and which continues this year, although not to the same extent.

We are suggesting higher amounts than the Government have done in order to go some way towards rectifying the damage done to pensioners in last year's Finance Act. Our amendment seeks to raise the single person's allowance to £2,830 and the married age allowance to £4,475. I am sure that the Chief Secretary will have done his sums carefully, but, before he produces them, I can tell the House that the cost of our proposal is £57 for a married age allowance and £45 for a single age allowance. Those figures are based on the tax ready reckoner statement in the autumn statement 1984. Those are modest costs. In the clause that we shall debate tomorrow, the costs for a full year will be £155 million, which will go to the better off. Today we have made a modest proposal which costs about £1 million, and which will do a little to help pensioners and to make up for last year's bad treatment.

We have a substantial number of pensioners in mind. In the last tax year, 1·25 million single pensioners over the age of 65 and 1·30 million married couples, of whom one of the partners was over 65, paid tax. Forty per cent. of pensioners are affected by taxation and, therefore, our changes would affect a large number of them. We want the Government to be more generous to them than they are disposed to be.

Last year the Government introduced the gap between the two amounts of allowance, and this year they have widened the gap between the age allowances and the ordinary tax allowances. Having introduced this sort of discrimination last year, the Government—although it does not appear so until one begins to examine the implications of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement—have widened the gap between pensioners and the rest, and one wonders why. No explanation has been given and we are dying to hear the Chief Secretary's justification for it. Perhaps it is all part of a general attitude which the Government seem to have been developing towards pensioners ever since they came into office.

I have mentioned changes, not directly related to taxation, which show what the Government's attitude to pensioners seems to be. For example, the Government changed the basis on which the state pension was assessed, so that it was no longer related to earnings. If that earnings rule had not been changed, a married couple would be getting £62 a week instead of the current £57 a week. A single pensioner would be getting £38·90 a week instead of the current £35·80. So the Government have already attacked pensioners once by changing the basis on which the state pension increases should be assessed each year.

Then there is the threat of the abolition of the state earnings-related pension scheme. We know that the Cabinet has yet to come to a decision about that, and I can understand why there is much in-fighting going on in the Cabinet. After all, on the 1983 figures, at least a million pensioners will be affected. If the Government decided to abolish the SERP scheme straight away, so that nobody benefited from the scheme any more, a million pensioners would be affected and they would lose on average about £2.30 a week.

Therefore, from the Government's past behaviour—the tax changes what were made last year, which are continued in this year's Budget, and all the talk about the abolition of the SERP scheme—we can see that the group about whom the Government care least are the pensioners. The Government would do well to remember that they are large in number, and that many can ill afford the kind of damage that the Government seem to be determined to do to their income.

When we looked at the kinds of thing that the Government might do, on the basis of the estimates of the development of the economy, the level of PSBR and so on that the Government provided, we could see that with better planning and with better intentions the Government could afford to raise the single person's pension by £5 a week and the married person's pension by £8 a week. We have yet to hear what proposals the Government have for pensions this year.

From the Budget statement and the Finance Bill, we can see that the Government plainly do not care about the lot of the pensioners and are determined to enlarge the distinctions between the tax treatment of pensioners and the tax treatment of the rest of the Community. The Finance Bill is designed to continue the damage that the Government started to do to the incomes of pensioners last year. That is why we are seeking to amend the Bill in this way.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) in the points that she so tellingly made. Her speech placed its main emphasis—as it should, coming from the Opposition—on proper provision for the aged. The amendment proposes to increase the age allowance to compensate for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's vicious treatment of pensioners last year. While, as my hon. Friend said, the married man's allowance has increased from 1979 up to this year by 125 per cent., and the single person's allowance has increased by 124 per cent., the single person's age allowance has increased by only 107 per cent. and the married person's by only 105 per cent. That is not good enough. Special problems and responsibilities fall upon the aged and it has always been considered right that the tax system should provide special help through tax allowances for them. That is provision which we back strongly. We are concerned about the Government's niggardly cheese-paring attitude, which hits those most vulnerable by failing to increase the allowances in the way that is proposed in the amendment.

The Government's attitude prompts the question, "What do the Government have against the aged?" They have ended the dual link that the Labour Government established between pensions, prices and wages, whichever increased the more, and now we have a bubbling, seething morass of rumours about the treatment of the earnings-related element in the pension. However, the Government never have the courage to implement their prejudices and they will draw back ultimately. It should be recognised that the rumours are causing much uncertainty among the elderly and those who are approaching retirement age. We remember the rumours which the Chancellor of the Exchequer eventually had to scotch in the Budget statement about the Government's treatment of the pension funds. Against this background, it is only to be expected that we should ask ourselves what the Government have against the pensioners.

The explanation that enters my head is that the deliberate campaign against pensioners is one way of distracting attention from the fact that on 15 October the Prime Minister will become a pensioner. We shall have then the spectacle of a grey-haired couple in the evening of their lives—a little out of touch with reality but only by 100 years—who have become gentler, all their passion spent. They have nothing else to do apart from wrecking the national economy and plaguing those less well off than themselves. That will be characteristic of their policy up the retirement, which is designed to distract attention from the historic event of pension day for the Prime Minister. That is why the Government have embarked on a deliberate campaign against pensioners.

The Labour party sees it as its responsibility when in office to reverse the Government's policies. The Labour party is the party which provides for pensioners. It has always done so and it will continue to do so. When it takes office it will reverse what the Government have been doing by cheese-paring benefits and tax allowances to which pensioners are entitled as of right in according with social justice and human decency, which are concepts foreign to the Government but sacred to the Opposition.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): We have had a brief but interesting debate, which is to a degree a continuation of our debates last year on this subject. I make no complaint about that. It is right that we should return to these important issues. Perhaps the hon. Members for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) drew the wrong conclusions from the facts. They may feel on reflection that some of their remarks were rather highly charged, especially when we go back a little in time.

The hon. Member for Thurrock explained clearly the basis of the amendment. It seeks to index on the basis of the amendment which was introduced on 1 May last year by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). Last year the Government proposed full price protection for the age allowance for the elderly. This year we propose full price protection and more. We are saying that there should be some cash in addition, which is £300 for the married age allowance and £200 for the single age allowance. In cash terms, that will keep them level this year with the ordinary basic allowance but, I concede, not quite in percentage terms.

The hon. Member for Thurrock asked about the theme of the Budget and quoted, not a little selectively, from the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, who said that the emphasis of the Budget was on jobs and people of working age. That does not mean that we intend to discriminate against other groups. That point was made last year, when my hon. Friend the Minister of State said that positive discrimination in favour of people of working age did not imply discrimination against any other groups.

Lest such a conclusion be drawn, we should examine the facts. Since 1978-79 there has been a £2,180 increase in the married age allowance, compared with a £1,920 increase in the basic married man's allowance. The single age allowance has increased by £1,390, compared with a

£1,220 increase in the basic one. I hope that the Committee will not think that that shows discrimination against the elderly. The married age allowance is at its highest point since the war and the single age allowance is at its highest since 1974. That does not show sustained discrimination by the Government against the elderly.

Clause 35 should take 60 per cent. of the over-65s out of charge for tax. I know that the hon. Member for Birmingham Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) deprecates my giving the figures of people taken out of charge for tax. I know too, that he is a keen student of these matters, but I shall not take up what he said on Second Reading. Clause 35 should ensure that 260,000 of our elderly compatriots are taken out of charge for tax. I do not think that that indicates discrimination or that we have no care for that group.

Mr. Terry Davis: The right hon. and learned Gentleman and I share an interest in these matters. How many of those 260,000 people were taken out of tax last year by the increase in age allowance and are therefore being double counted?

Mr. Rees: I cannot give a precise figure. If it can be ascertained during the debate, I shall give the hon. Gentleman the answer. If not, I shall write to him. I am sure that he will add it to his store of knowledge on this important, if slightly arcane, subject.

There is no obvious reason why the elderly should retain a constant percentage premium over the younger taxpayer. Perhaps I might draw the attention of the hon. Member for Thurrock to the fact that there was no constant figure under Labour. I could take her through successive years to show that the proportion that the age allowance bore to the basic allowance was reduced steadily under Labour. Having winced under the hon. Lady's harsh criticisms about clause 35, I was reassured to find that, in 1976, the basic and age allowances were increased by the same cash sum. All of the strictures which the hon. Lady has advanced against us might, if well founded, be advanced against the Labour Government. I am sure that that point must have escaped her attention, otherwise she would not have developed that theme.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Surely the gap was never widened to this extent. The ratio was always more closely maintained under that Government. Even if there was a slight widening, it was never a widening of this degree. The difference between an increase of 107 per cent. in the single person's age allowance and 125 per cent. in the married man's allowance since 1979 is quite considerable.

Mr. Rees: I know that the hon. Gentleman has great enthusiasm for these matters, but let us look at the problem in its true context. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) moved a similar amendment to that moved by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on that occasion. It is curious that those themes run through our debates. He said that there was no clear water between the basic old-age pension and the age allowance. There is considerable clear water on this occasion—about £23 a week for the married man's age allowance and £15 a week for the single man's age allowance. Further, on that occasion, when the Labour Government were in power, the basic rate was 35 per cent., and now it is 30 per cent. Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman reflects closely, he will see that we have a slightly better record than the previous Administration. However, I do not want to enter into a competitive battle on that point. I only want what we have proposed to be viewed in its true context.

I hope that when Committee members reflect on the extent to which we are proposing that the married and single age allowance should be put up, on the number who will be taken out of charge for tax altogether, and on the fact that this is the highest level for an elderly married man since the war, and for an elderly single person since 1973-74, they will see that all the strictures that have been advanced by the hon. Members for Thurrock and for Great Grimsby are not well founded. I know that the hon. Lady is fair-minded. I hope that now she has had a chance to reflect on my remarks, she will not feel disposed to push her amendment to a Division.

Dr. McDonald: As I listened to what the Chief Secretary had to say, and as he referred back to the Minister of State's speech last year, I found that there was still no answer. To give different percentage increases for the age allowance as opposed to the ordinary allowance is unequal treatment. Such inequality has to be justified. No justification whatsoever has emerged from what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said.

The differences between the age and ordinary allowances have been moving on apace under the Government, particularly since their re-election in 1983. For example, in 1983-84, the figure for the single age allowance as a percentage of the single person's allowance was 132 per cent. As proposed in the 1985 Budget, the figure is 122 per cent. That is a 10 per cent. drop in two years, which is pretty much of a change, and at a pretty fast rate. The married person's allowance is slightly bigger than that. If we take the married age allowance as a percentage of the married person's allowance, in 1983-84, it was 134 per cent. In this Budget, it will be 123 per cent. That enormous change is being made in the value of the age allowance, although it has been raised a little bit above the rate of inflation in the current financial year.

That is unequal treatment. It is a steady and fast rate of change. The Chief Secretary has still not provided any justification for that whatsoever, although the Government declare that they are particularly committed to reducing the burden of taxation, a matter that we can discuss further on clause stand part. Frankly, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not justified what has been done in this year's Budget. It is still unequal treatment, and will leave many pensioners worse off than they might have been if the Government had chosen to treat ordinary taxpayers and pensioner taxpayers in the same way.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Dr. McDonald: In clause 35, the Government appear to be generous in the way in which they have raised the married persons' and single allowances above the rate of inflation—10 per cent. and 9·5 per cent. respectively. The Chief Secretary has said that these allowances now stand at the highest point since world war 2. At first sight it seems as though the Government are being very generous and fair in the tax treatment that they have meted out. However, once again, everything is not as it appears.

For example, up to the Budget, and even in the course of the Budget speech, Ministers made great play of the point that raising the allowances would deal with the poverty and unemployment traps, and that this is the best and most efficient way of treating this problem, and a way designed to help those on average and below average earnings. The Government continue to put up that case, in spite of the fact that it has come under fire and justified criticism.

I shall focus not on the unemployment trap but on the poverty trap, because I want to examine the burden of taxation and how it is distributed. Last December, the latest figures available gave the figure of 270,000 families caught in the poverty trap. That is a five-fold increase since 1979. The various efforts that the Government claim to have made to relieve the poverty trap have made it worse.

Some of the families caught in the poverty trap pay marginal tax rates of between 75 and 100 per cent., and some—a small proportion—pay marginal tax rates of over 100 per cent. Recently, when the Daily Mail, with its usual factual basis, claimed that the Labour party might bring in tax changes that would impose marginal tax rates of 98 per cent. on certain people, there was a great outcry from the Conservative Benches. However, I hardly ever hear any Tory Member complaining about the number of families caught in the poverty trap and few voices complaining about the numbers paying marginal tax rates of 75 per cent. and above. They seem only to begin complaining when those who might face high marginal tax rates because of changes are the very rich. The complaints do not come when we deal with the 270,000 families who, in the nature of the case, because they are able to claim family income supplement, are extremely poor. About such cases there is hardly a peep from the Tory Benches about the poverty trap. Nor is there a serious attempt to get people out of the poverty trap.

Indeed, with the national insurance contribution changes introduced in the Budget, the Government have casually introduced another three poverty traps, although admittedly they do not give rise to marginal tax rates such as the ones that I have just mentioned. However, they mean that many people will pay more tax, or they encourage employers to hold down wages so that their employees are not caught in the poverty trap through increases in taxation because their wages are increased from, say, £55 to £58 a week. The Government have done nothing in this Budget, as in previous Budgets, to reduce the number of families caught in such traps, nor have they seriously considered the problem.

The Government claim that they have assisted people on average and below average earnings, and that they have reduced the amount of tax and national insurance contributions that they must pay. Yet if we take that as a proportion of earnings in 1985-86 as compared with 1978-79, we discover that those on half average earnings, two thirds of average earnings or just on average earnings —I am talking about married couples with part-time working spouses, or married couples with two children and part-time working spouses—for all the Government's alleged efforts, are paying roughly the same tax as a proportion of their earnings as they paid in 1978-79. For all the steam, noise and effort that the Government have allegedly engaged in, the tax changes will make little difference to their tax burden.

In contrast, high-paid households—those on five times average earnings—have enjoyed an average reduction in their tax bills of 14 per cent., while those on 10 time average earnings have enjoyed an increase of 22 per cent. compared with 1978-79.

I listened with great interest to the speech of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury on Monday 29 April, and I came to the conclusion that he either had little grasp of the statistics—I am sure that that is completely unfair —or that he was trying to pull a fast one. He said that the Government were more concerned with the genuine quality of life than were the Opposition, and then went on to say that what really mattered was the increase in real take-home pay, or real wealth, under this Government compared with under the Labour Government. Of course, he is correct to say that take-home pay has been increased for some groups, because gross earnings have been increasing at a much faster rate under this Government —I understand to their dismay—than they did under the Labour Government.

I say that the hon. Gentleman was trying to pull a fast one because he suggested that we should focus only on the real take-home pay of those groups, instead of on the Budget and the Finance Bill, which are designed to deal with the distribution of the tax burden of those income groups. To suggest that all that matters is that people's real take-home pay is increasing—the Opposition certainly do not object to that—is not the point. The distribution of the tax burden is the point. To say that real take-home pay has increased for this, that or the other group is neither here nor there. The Financial Secretary gave the game away by comparing the increasess in real take-home pay for those on twice or five times male average earnings under the Conservative Government, with the increases under the Labour Government. According to a survey of personal earnings in 1982-83, we are talking about 44,000 people earning five times average earnings and 1·5 million people earning twice average earnings.

The Financial Secretary referred to enormous increases —14 per cent. in the last five or six years for those on twice male average earnings and 28 per cent. under the Conservatives for those on five times male average earnings — for a tiny proportion of the 22 million incomes.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): Knowing that the hon. Lady is as fair as she is statistically accurate, I am sure that she will remind the Committee that I gave the precise comparisons for average earnings, and half average earnings as well as for twice and five times average earnings. In all those cases, including half average earnings, those people have done better.

Dr. McDonald: Exactly. I made that point. I said that the Financial Secretary was leading us up the garden path a little by trying to make us focus on the notion that what mattered was the increase in real take-home pay. Certainly there have been increases for all the income groups to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I do not dispute the figures, but they are not the point. The point is that the increases have been unequally distributed under this Government far more than under the last Labour Government.

A Finance Bill is concerned with the distribution of the tax burden, not simply with recording the increases in real take-home pay for various groups. It is insufficient to say of the increase in real take-home pay for families on low incomes, "They are fine; they are definitely better off." The real take-home pay to which the Financial Secretary referred excluded VAT and other charges which hit such families harder than families on average and above average incomes. Even the net tax cuts of £1·73 for a married couple and £1·15 for a single person will mean that those in receipt of below average earnings will receive less in their wage packets or salary cheques. In fact, the benefits have already started to disappear because prescription and water charges have increased and excise duties and VAT on various items have been imposed or increased. That hits low-income families much harder than families on twice or five times average earnings.

One could say that the Financial Secretary—I am sure that it was unintentional—was also trying to pull the wool over our eyes by merely referring to the increase in real take-home pay. The hon. Gentleman knows that that excludes VAT and the other duties to which I have referred. The Government have hit the living standards of the low paid far harder than they have hit those of other people.

National insurance contributions are not part of the Finance Bill, but they are part of the Budget and therefore I shall deal with them. We are now all coming to the view that tax and national insurance contributions must be taken together.

The much vaunted reductions in national insurance contributions do not help much. A wages council worker earning £69·85 a week—the rate for bar staff—and receiving the full benefit of the reduced 7 per cent. rate will pay 18·8 per cent. of his earnings in tax and national insurance as a single person after October 1985 compared with 17·4 per cent. of the equivalent wage in 1978-79. Some people do not benefit from any of the changes. I am indebted to the Low Pay Unit for that example. It illustrates once again that the changes do little to help the low paid, that the rich continue to benefit from this kind of Budget, and that there has been no change in the Government's policy.

Taxes have risen in real terms by £26 billion, at 1984-85 prices, between 1978-79 and 1985-86. The only people to have benefited by about £3 billion a year are those with well above average earnings. When we first consider the clause, from the point of view of the Opposition and the public, it seems that the Government are being generous. Allowances are being raised well above the rate of inflation, and they are accompanied by changes in the national insurance contributions. It seems that those with below average earnings will benefit. A closer examination shows that once again nothing has been done to relieve the poverty trap. Those on below average earnings are still paying about the same amount of tax and national insurance contributions as they paid in the last year of the Labour Government, and yet the Government continue to condemn the Labour Government for grossly increasing the tax burden.

Before the Government took office, they said that they would cut taxes and everyone would benefit. That is partly why people voted for them in 1979. Since then, people have begun to understand that when the Government talk about tax cuts that means tax cuts not for everyone, but only if one belongs to that small minority whose wages are double or more than double average male earnings. That is the focus of the Government's attention. They might choose to justify it by saying that if they give incentives to that group of people it will revitalise the economy because they are the innovators who will create jobs. The Government have been up to that kind of trick for the past six years. We are still waiting for those rich innovators to invest, innovate and create more jobs. That justification has gone straight out of the window.

The Government have increased the tax burden. Whatever the Financial Secretary chose to say last week, the tax burden has been even more unfairly distributed than it was before. The only beneficiaries are the better off. The low paid are as badly off as ever, despite the apparent initial glories of the clause. When we look at it, it fades away like fairies' gold. It is nothing in the hands of the low paid.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) made a telling and powerful argument against the Government on social priorities. As she said, the whole of the Government's strategy was based on the trickle-down theory of economics—if more money is given to the wealthy it trickles down to the poor. As Galbraith put it, if we feed more hay to the horse it trickles down to the road to be eaten by the birds, so the more hay we feed to the horse the better the birds are fed. All that has trickled down from this Government is excuses, distorted statistics and sermons from the Prime Minister. The benefits that have been showered on the wealthy—to the tune of £3,000 million every year to the top 5 per cent. of income earners — have not stimulated economic activity or trickled down to the poor. They have not provided the dynamism that was originally envisaged.

It is interesting that tonight we are debating certain clauses because of a conflict of pressures. We want to debate those clauses to which we take the greatest exception; the Government want to debate clauses on which they wish to congratulate themselves. This clause is one of those on which the Government wish to pat themselves on the back. It is a difficult anatomical feat, but not as difficult as some of the other anatomical feats performed by Government, especially under this Prime Minister. Yet that is hardly reasonable given the social priorities embodied in the proposal on personal allowances. There is an argument whether this is the best use of the limited amount of money that the Government felt able to give away in the Budget. I do not regard an increase in personal allowances as the best use, but it is a personal choice. This Government have placed the burdens of the depression that they have created on the shoulders of those least able to bear them—the poor, the aged and the unemployed. It is about time that they were recompensed for what the Government have done to them, as victims of Thatcherism, by some increase through the tax system so that money is channelled directly to them.

I believe that that is best done through child benefit, which has not been increased to the same degree as allowances. It is likely to increase only in line with inflation. I believe that child benefit is the most effective way of channelling money to those who most need it—the poor and those with large families. That should be the priority. If there was a massive increase in that benefit, it could be combined with a tax of the benefit. There should be a massive increase to allow that money to be used where it is most effective. It would deal more effectively with poverty and the real social problems that the Government have created than the increases in personal allowances. Invevitably such increases give less to the low paid and the less well off. That is implicit in the system. But the Government have been giving more to the better off all along.

Under the Budget a Cabinet Minister earning £827 a week—one wonders why they are paid so much given the extent of the devastation that they have caused in the economy—will receive a weekly reduction in tax and national insurance of £8·87. Congratulations to Cabinet Ministers. The mass of the people, and certainly the less well off, have peanuts and penury.

The very myth that taxes are being reduced is punctured by the telling figures provided in answer to parliamentary questions by the Low Pay Unit. Anyone on a half or two thirds of average earnings, or even on average earnings, is still paying a higher proportion of his income in direct tax and national insurance than he paid in 1978-79. I want to quote the figures to puncture the myth once and for all. After five years of saying that they are reducing the tax burden, the person on average earnings is still paying a higher proportion of his income in direct taxes than he paid in 1978-79.

In 1978-79, a single person on average earnings paid 31·7 per cent. of income in direct taxes. In 1985-86 the percentage is 32·5. A married couple on half average earnings in 1978-79 paid 16·4 per cent. of income in direct taxes. In 1985-86, they are paying 18·7 per cent., an increase of 14 per cent. The social priorities of the Government involve taking from the poor to give to the rich, sanctifying it with cant and rhetoric about stimulating an economy which visibly they have depressed and ruined. A married couple with two children on two thirds of average earnings in 1978-79 paid 12 per cent. of their income in direct taxes, whereas in 1985-86 they are paying 13·2 per cent. in direct taxes.

Those social priorities, which are absolutely wrong, which the clause does nothing to alleviate and which characterise the Government, have brought the economy to the present pass of a country stale in decline, larded with the vainglorious platitudes of a Prime Minister of a Government who are viciously placing the sacrifices of that decline on the poor and those least able to carry the burden. Those are the priorities represented by the Government.

Mr. Peter Rees: We have had two wide-ranging contributions from the hon. Members for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). They were long on rhetoric and short on facts. Indeed, at times I wondered whether we had been taking part in the same debates and had been looking at the same tax system. However, as the evenings go by in Committee Room 10 upstairs, our views may come together and we may realise that we are focused on the same problems.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby, with his usual panache——

Mr. Terry Davis: Now answer the debate.

Mr. Rees: That was intended as a compliment. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) should not be so sensitive. He knows that I am prone to distribute my compliments even-handedly between both sides of the Committee. I said that Labour Members had made engaging contributions, but I wondered whether the facts justified their remarks and whether they really had been considering what had happened to the tax system during the period between 1974 and 1979 and between 1979 and the present day.

This clause was chosen for debate. Indeed, it would have been odd had we not chosen to debate on the Floor one of the principal income tax provisions. We should have been subject to criticism by the main mass of hon. Members who will not be privileged to sit upstairs in Committee Room 10 and maybe by the world outside——

Mr. Terry Davis: There are not many sitting here.

Mr. Rees: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would prefer not to open up that point. I was not proposing to do so, but if he would like a record kept hour by hour, day by day, of those who attend our debates, I am sure that the Clerks would oblige.

I was pointing out that it was right that during our debates on the Floor, when any hon. Member is free to contribute, at least one of the income tax provisions should have been singled out for debate.

I hoped that we might find common ground. I hoped that the hon. Member for Thurrock, with her sharp and informed view, and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby would recognise that the Government have been concentrating considerable resources on raising the basic personal allowances. The advantages of that are plain.

I am sure that the hon. Lady will be reassured to hear that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be devoting £1·5 billion of resources to raising thresholds in 1985-86. In a full year, the cost will be £1·87 billion—a fairly considerable diversion of resources to what I thought were the common objectives of taking as many as possible of our fellow countrymen out of tax and concentrating particularly on the less well-off sectors.

The Opposition say that child benefits have advantages, but they have disadvantages, too. First, they do nothing for the elderly. Very few elderly couples are likely to be able to claim child benefit. We had an interesting debate about concentrating more resources on the elderly, but the Opposition now advance a contrary case and say that we should have concentrated resources on child benefit and not on basic allowances. Child benefits do nothing for single people or for the childless.

We could have an interesting debate on how to tackle these various problems, but I hope that the Committee will recognise the Government's sincerity and determination to concentrate resources where it is felt that the need is greatest.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: On the better off.

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman makes that spurious point and I concede that the rates of tax that we inherited —98 per cent. on investment income and 83 per cent. on earned income—have been considerably alleviated. If one has a steeply progressive system, to the point of lunacy and near confiscation, and one dismantles the structure, considerable advantages will go to those who have been paying confiscatory rates.

However, if one looks fairly and dispassionately at what has happened, one sees that considerable advantages have been concentrated at the other end. I should like the Committee to concentrate on take-home real pay. The Opposition make the extraordinary proposition that that is not what counts. In my excursions round the country I have found that that is precisely what agitates most of our fellow countrymen.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby singled out a husband on half national earnings, with a wife and two children. The hon. Member looks alarmed, as well he might, but perhaps he will agree that he was carried away by his own rhetoric and ignored what has really happened. Under the Labour Government, the take-home income of that family increased by 4·3 per cent. Let us consider that same family in the period since the 1979 election until this year. Its net income has increased by 12 per cent. By any test that I can formulate, that family has been better off under a Conservative Government than it has been under the Government that the hon. Gentleman supported.

Let us take the same family of a married couple with two children on average earnings and consider how its net income improved under the last Labour Government. It improved by 1 per cent. I do not scorn that; it shows an improvement. Let us consider how that family has done under this Government. Its net income has increased by 13 per cent. I know that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby is a fair person, and I now look forward to his informed comment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The statistics that the Opposition were giving are the important ones. The Government who stated that they would reduce the burden of taxation have increased the burden of direct taxation on those with average earnings. That is the only point that we make. It is surely hypocritical to bring in other factors to try to compensate for the real increase in the burden of taxation that has taken place.

Secondly, what the Chief Secretary is saying is directly opposite to what the Chancellor has said. The Chancellor said that earnings are going up too much and that it is our responsibility to pay ourselves less, to be less grasping about take-home pay and to price ourselves back into jobs. Is the Chief Secretary therefore telling the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is wrong about this?

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman is tempting me to go into a wider field than I think is justified by the clause. I would be delighted to talk about the workings of the labour market, but I suspect that, were I to do so, I would be in some difficulties in staying within the rules of order.

The hon. Gentleman explains what has been happening. Of course real earnings have been going up. Let us take the more general point that he and his hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock made, that the burden of taxation has gone up. But, of course, they have not looked at the composition. They have not realised that two fifths of the increase is due to North sea oil, two fifths to indirect taxes and one fifth perhaps to a degree to national insurance contribution and to rates. We are endeavouring to cap rates, and I therefore hope we shall command the support of the hon. Gentleman in our endeavours. Neither the hon. Gentleman nor his hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock has recommended or even recognised what we have endeavoured to do at the lower end of the national insurance contributions for the employee, again something that I should have thought would command their wholehearted support.

Wherever one turns, therefore, one sees that the Government have been devoting considerable resources to ameliorating the direct tax burden of the less well off members of the community.

The hon. Member for Thurrock went on to say that that ignores VAT. I would only cite, as I often do, but perhaps the Committee will forgive me if I recite it, what a distinguished Minister in this field used to say. I refer, of course, to Lord Barnett. He said—and I commend this again to the Committee—that VAT is nothing like as regressive as we thought. The hon. Member for Hodge Hill, who I know does his homework thoroughly, will recall it, so he would not inflict that point on us because he knows that it is not soundly based. He knows that the range of exemptions and the range of zero rating that were built into the system by Lord Barnett when he introduced VAT in 1972-73 were designed to ensure that there would not be undue burdens on the less well off members of society.

Test it as one will, I assert with utter confidence that the Government's record in relation to the less well off members of the community in respect of direct taxation bears the closest possible scrutiny and, by any test, comes out much better, I am afraid to say, than that of the previous Labour Administration. It may be that in Committee or, indeed, outside Parliament, we shall be told in some detail what a Labour Administration would propose in this regard so that we can compare the kinds of measure that we have introduced and what a Labour Administration would introduce and, to be fair, how they would support them. I do not suggest that the Opposition do that tonight. We shall then be able to take the debate further. Today, however, I am simply concerned to commend clause 35 to the Committee and I am genuinely sorry that there is not more common ground in this area.

I conclude by summarising the reasons why I suggest that the clause should find favour with the whole Committee. First, it crowns what the Government have done since 1979. If the clause commends itself to the Committee today and to the House on Third Reading the basic allowances will have been increased by 20 per cent. in real terms in that period. Set against some difficult economic years, that is a remarkable achievement. Again, as I pointed out in relation to the age allowance, it means that we shall have the highest married man's allowance since the war and the highest single person's allowance since 1973-74. Moreover, I should point out to the hon. Member for Hodge Hill that the increases since 1978-79 will have taken 1¼ million of our fellow countrymen out of charge to tax.

The hon. Member for Thurrock said that there had not been a peep out of the Government about the poverty trap and problems of that kind, but surely taking all those people out of tax altogether is a most significant contribution. The hon. Lady may have other suggestions as to how we can make further advances, but to underpin any further advances we shall expect massive support from the hon. Lady and her right hon. and hon. Friends for our efforts to restrain public expenditure because only then shall we be able to make the kind of advances in this area that will command the hon. Lady's support.

We have concentrated massive resources on increasing the allowances because this takes people out of charge to tax, because it concentrates the greatest proportionate benefit on the lowest sector of taxpayers and, finally, because it takes people out of the poverty trap, although perhaps not so fast as the hon. Member for Thurrock would like.

For all those reasons, whatever other reservations and differences we may have tonight and possibly even on succeeding nights, I hope that we shall find common ground in supporting clause 35 and on that basis I commend it to the Committee.

Dr. McDonald: I do not think that the Chief Secretary has managed to say anything that would encourage us to regard clause 35 as the solution to the problems that I have outlined today and which the Labour party has outlined on many occasions. In some ways, I hardly know where to begin with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech. I do not wish to be unkind, but to me it seemed more like a dialogue of the deaf than anything else.

I will begin with the poverty trap. At best, the changes in the Budget will take between 5,000 and 10,000 families out of the poverty trap. Between 1979 and December 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of families in the poverty trap increased fivefold to 250,000, so the effect of the Government's changes in tax allowances and their failure to keep their promises on child benefit has been to increase enormously the number of families in the poverty trap compared with the number caught in the trap under the Labour Government.

The mere fact that only 5,000 to 10,000 families will be taken out of the poverty trap even with clause 35 shows clearly that raising the basic personal allowances is not the way to deal with the problem. If the Chancellor had kept the promises made by his predecessor to raise child benefit in line with increases in personal allowances, far fewer families might now be caught in the poverty trap. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary of State for Social Services announced an enormous increase in child benefit, the number of families caught in the poverty trap would begin to decline sharply. I could say a great deal more on that point in answer to the Chief Secretary's arguments.

I shall instead turn to a further point made by the Chief Secretary. He said that our amendment and comments about clause 35 were contradictory, but they are not. He said that on the one hand we argue for an increase in the age allowance so that pensioners are treated in the same way as those in receipt of ordinary allowances, and on the other we want an increase in child benefit. Obviously, an increase in child benefit would benefit few pensioners, but it would help a small proportion of married couples—there are only 6 million families with dependent children out of 20 million married couples. Therefore, the figure is less than 50 per cent.

We have focused so much attention on child benefit because poverty has affected families with children far more seriously, especially since 1978-79, than families without children or pensioners. That is not to say that there are no poor people to be found in those two groups. However, families with dependent children face the most severe problems of poverty.

If the Government are to concentrate on dealing with poverty, child benefit should be an important part of their programme. During the run-up to the budget and since then we have said that the attack on poverty should take three forms. The Government should increase pensions, increase child benefit, and put the long-term unemployed on the proper rate of supplementary benefit. The latter would cost a small sum—about the size of the sum that we shall debate tomorrow. There are more than 1 million long-term unemployed, that is, those who have been unemployed for more than 12 months. Our attack would, therefore, be three pronged. We refer to child benefit frequently because we know that families with dependent children face the most severe problems of poverty.

Yet, Conservative Members worry about those who, according to the Daily Mail, may face a marginal tax rate of 98 per cent. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby said that whoever pays that amount of taxation is a high income earner. Such people are few and far between and, probably, pay such a high marginal rate of taxation because they manage their tax affairs incompetently. Whoever pays 98p has an extremely high income.

When we talk about families caught in the poverty trap we are referring to families on extremely low incomes, for whom a further 50p or £1 a week is a matter of importance, and makes the difference between a tin of baked beans and a loaf of bread to feed the kids or nothing. We are not talking about extremely high wage earners who might suddenly find that they are losing 98p on the nth pound. That is why we are shocked and upset when we hear shouts from the Conservative Benches about such a possibility and we do not hear the same horror and disgust being expressed at the notion of families on such low incomes being faced with marginal tax rates of 75 per cent. or more. The number of families faced with those burdens has increased throughout the six years of the Government's period of office. Clause 35 will not do much to alter that position. Increasing child benefit substantially would certainly help to rescue many families from the poverty trap, and that is why we so constantly insist on the importance of that point.

The Chief Secretary, understandably, made some play with my references to VAT and so on. The Chief Secretary —as the Financial Secretary had done the week before —compared the increases in real take-home pay under the present Goverment with those under the last Labour Government, and I did not contradict the statistics which were given in the Financial Secretary's speech last week. What I said was that simply to refer to real take-home pay is not the whole point. It is, of course, entirely to the point if one is talking about the increase in the basic tax allowances. But simply to talk about the increase in the real take-home pay for lower income families is misleading, because it leaves out the other costs which low income families face and which bear more heavily on them. We are, of course, referring to 15 per cent. VAT and not to 8 per cent. Inevitably, the almost doubling of VAT bore heavily on low income families.

I described as a misleading statistical exercise the other charges and alterations in the social security system, such as housing benefit, which make a comparison of real take-home pay in an effort to describe the changes in the living standards of those with below-average earnings under the present Government and those with below-average earnings under the Labour Government. I can understand the Chief Secretary playing little games and referring, in the course of so doing, to Lord Barnett. Nevertheless, the Chief Secretary must face the fact that the bare comparison of the increases in real take-home pay under the two Governments is entirely misleading if one wants to use it to describe the changes in living standards. That is why I referred to that point, although I understand that it does not, of course, fall within clause 35.

None of us wants to oppose the increase in personal tax allowances, but the point that we have to make again and again is that it benefits the better off more than the low paid. It is part of the continuing distortions in the tax system which have occurred since 1979, and which have led to a lightening of the burden of taxation for the better off and little improvement in the burden of taxation on those who are worse off.

We have discussed many statistical examples and I do not want to delay the House, but let us consider the married couple, where there is a part-time working spouse and no dependent children. In 1978-79 their combined tax and national insurance contributions were 15·9 per cent. of their earnings. In 1985-86, following the application of clause 36, they will be 16 per cent.

With 10 times average earnings for the same couple, 65 per cent. of their income would have been taken in 1978-79, and 50·9 per cent. of their income would be taken in tax and national insurance contributions after 1985-86.

That is the inequality and the discrepancy which concerns the Opposition, along with the poverty to which I have referred. We consider the Government's measures entirely insufficient to deal with the unfairness and with the poverty which exists in Britain.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 35 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 40

RELIEF FOR CLASS 4 CONTRIBUTIONS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

12.15 am

Mr. Terry Davis: I shall be grateful if the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will take this opportunity to reply to the point which I put to him on Second Reading and which he overlooked when he replied to that debate.

Mr. Moore: I shall address myself to the clause and endeavour to deal with the specific matter which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) raised on Second Reading. As most Ministers deal with many issues when replying to a debate, I cannot remember the specific one that he raised. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will seek to intervene again in the debate to remind me what it was. If he does so, I shall endeavour to reply. If I cannot do so adequately tonight, I shall seek later to convey the information to him.

I realise that we must be considering the Finance Bill and that it must be May, because we are still at it, as it were, at 15 minutes past midnight. I have no doubt that we are all quite comfortable in Committee terms.

Clause 40 seeks to provide tax relief for the self-employed on one half of their class 4 national insurance contributions. The relief will be given as a deduction in computing total income. This means that it will be allowed after the profits on which class 4 contributions are based are worked out, and so will not in turn affect the amount of the contribution. The Committee will be interested to know that about 1·1 million self-employed will benefit from the relief. It will be given at the taxpayer's marginal rate so that, where he is liable at higher rates, relief will be given at his highest rate. For someone liable for the maximum class 4 contribution for 1985-86 of £607, and paying tax at 60 per cent., the benefit will be £182. I have details of particular examples which the hon. Member for Hodge Hill used on a previous occasion, but he may prefer me not to go into them in detail as they prove his points and mine as well. However, I should be only too happy to go into details if he wished me to do so.

The change will provide a substantial boost to the self-employed and underlines the importance which the Government attach to this part of the economy. The majority of our smallest businesses are in the self-employed sector and it is from here that we see an increasing proportion of lasting jobs. The number of self-employed has increased by nearly one third since 1979.

This is but one of many measures which the Government have taken to help small businesses. Apart from the changes in national insurance contributions in the Budget, the income tax thresholds have been increased and capital gains tax retirement relief is being extended. We shall probably be discussing later the extension of that relief. Most recently, the report entitled "Burdens on Businesses" identified the priority areas for reducing the burden of regulation. The report is being followed up urgently.

Previously, the self-employed have not been entitled to set any part of their national insurance contributions against tax. In law these contributions count as a personal, not a business, expense. This contrasts with the position on class 1 contributions, where the employer's share of the contributions payable in respect of his employees has always been tax deductible as a business expense. The self-employed have long argued to both sides of the House of Commons that part of their contributions should be similarly allowable. The Government are persuaded of the rightness of their case and the clause remedies what many of us see as a long-held grievance. I trust that both sides of the Committee will support the clause.

Mr. Terry Davis: I had hoped that we might make rapid progress and, therefore, I made only a brief opening contribution. It is clear that the Minister has missed the point that I made on Second Reading. I shall repeat it, because I am sure that he will try to reply to it this evening rather than engage in correspondence, if only to save us debating the clause again on Report.

As the Minister has noted, the benefit of the arrangement is much more for someone on very high earnings. For someone who receives more than £45,000 a year, the benefit of tax relief on class 4 contributions amounts to £182 a year. However, the benefit for someone at the top end of the band earning £13,780 is only £91 a year. The Financial Secretary has used those figures.

On Second Reading, I asked the Government why they had chosen to reduce the classable contributions paid by the self-employed as they have done. There are two ways in which they can be reduced. The Government have chosen to allow tax relief on half of the contributions. On Second Reading, I told the Financial Secretary that the same effect could be achieved for most self-employed people by reducing the amount of the contribution from 6·3 to 5·3 per cent. That would provide exactly the same amount of money to a self-employed person earning between £4,150 and £13,780 a year and mean that someone who earned £45,000 a year would still benefit to the tune of only £91 a year from the reduction in class 4 contributions.

We see no justification for giving tax relief on class 4 national insurance contributions, thus providing twice as much money for the person who earns £45,000 a year as for the person who earns £14,000 a year. that is not soley a matter of equity; cost is also involved. the Government's choice involves more paperwork for the self-employed person, because that person must claim tax relief in the tax return. It also involves more work for the Inland Revenue. The Financial Secretary is nodding, so I must be right.

The Treasury has admitted in a press release that the Government's preferred method will involve a significant increase in the number of people employed by the Inland Revenue. I thought that the Government wanted to reduce the number of civil servants, but they have chosen a method that is inequitable and involves the employment of more people at tax offices—they will employ more people to be unfair.

I have heard somewhere that what the Government describe as a significant increase in staff in the Inland Revenue will come to about 50. They are to be employed, not to collect extra revenue, but to distribute this largesse to the self-employed. That is strange behaviour for the Government, especially when we are told that they have had to shelve plans to mount an assault on the so-called black economy by employing people to counter tax evasion, which would involve the creation of 42 new posts. The Government say that they cannot afford 42 people to deal with some of the most serious aspects of tax evasion, and yet they can employ more than 50 people to ensure that people who receive more than £45,000 a year get an extra £182 as compared with £91 for those who earn just less than £14,000. I had hoped that the Financial Secretary would be able to justify the cost of that inequity. I hope that he will do so now.

Mr. Moore: When he wound up the debate on Second Reading the hon. Member for Hodge Hill made many points, and I was not sure to which matter he was referring. As I did not want to delay us I did not want to go into detail, but I am delighted to do so now. So that I can be complete in my coverage, I shall try to cover all the points that he made.

I refer, first, to the principle. I see the hon. Gentleman's point. However, with respect, in this instance there is a confusion in the arguments that he is advancing because we are seeking to give the self-employed a similar tax relief to that which the employer has in relation to a part of his contribution. Simply reducing the rate of class 4 instead of giving tax relief would not bring the tax treatment on to a fairer basis. A cut in the class 4 rate would be at odds with the contributory principle under which the self-employed must broadly pay their way for the benefits they receive.

We are not in dispute about the facts. The hon. Gentleman is right about the extent to which those on a higher income will benefit more than those on a lower income, but there is a ceiling. The maximum benefit is about £182, against the £607 potential maximum total contribution, compared with a benefit of only £90 in the case that he illustrated.

On Second Reading the hon. Gentleman went into considerable detail about a person with profits of only £100 a week. I would not challenge any of the facts. He rightly suggested that that person would save only 19p per week. It is important to view that in relation to the saving against the amount of his class 4 contribution as well, because it is the combined package that someone in that category will see is he is considering his position of self-employment. As the hon. Gentleman knows, class 4 is calculated on an annual basis. On profits of £5,200—£100 a week—the figure comes out at £1·27 per week, and 19p represents a 15 per cent. reduction. If the contribution is small, the tax savings must also be small, by definition. The saving is much more significant if the reduction in class 2 of £1·25 is included. On the combined class 2 — class 4, the person might now pay £6·02 per week. Under the proposals in the clause and the class 2 national insurance changes, he would pay £4·58 per week, a reduction of £1·44, or approximately 24 per cent. I accept that it is not a massive reduction in money terms, but it is significant in proportionate terms.

On Second Reading the hon. Gentleman went into detail on the potential additional paperwork, and referred to cash flow implications. I shall refer to that too, for completeness. There will be next to no extra work for small business men. As the hon. Gentleman was right to say, it is the inspector who calculates the class 4 contributions by reference to the business profits. It is he who will calculate and allow the class 4 tax relief. There will not be a cash flow effect. Class 4 is charged on the income tax assessment on the profits of the business, and is payable in two bites, in January and July, along with the tax on those profits. In the vast majority of cases the class 4 relief will be given in that tax assessment. Thus, by the time the business man pays his tax and class 4, his tax bill will have been reduced to reflect the class 4 relief. The reduction in class 4 itself would not come through earlier.

The hon. Gentleman was right to say that there would be additional staff. One should put it in proportion, but he is right, and it is an important point. The additional Inland Revenue manpower cost of administering the relief is estimated at 60 to 70 units.

I apologise if I did not cover all the points initially. I trust that I have done so now.

Mr. Terry Davis: I readily accept the Financial Secretary's most courteous correction of my point about cash flow. Since our debate on Second Reading I have done some more homework and realised that I exaggerated the argument.

With regard to the benefit to a self-employed person paying class 4 contributions, I stand by what I said.

The Financial Secretary referred to the point that I made on Second Reading about 19p a week, but that was a separate issue. I was commenting on the progressive nature of these contributions—a point covered by the Chief Secretary in that and other debates. He said that it was inevitable in any increase in allowances. We disagree with the Government about increases in tax allowance being a way to deal with the poverty trap, because it benefits people on the highest marginal rates of tax.

I shall concentrate on the inequity of giving £182 to the self-employed person who receives £45,000 a year, but only £91 to the person who receives £14,000 a year. To do that, the Inland Revenue proposes to employ between 60 and 70 extra staff. I am delighted to receive the Financial Secretary's assurance that there will not be any extra paperwork for the taxpayer, but it is bad news for the taxpayer that he will have to pay more for the extra staff to calculate this tax relief, when it could be done without any extra staff, if only the Financial Secretary would agree to reduce the rate of contribution from 6·3 to 5·3 per cent., and concede the Labour party's point about equity at the same time, because that would be the inevitable consequence of doing it in the way that we have suggested.

The Financial Secretary was himself mistaken at one point, when he said that it is important to maintain the contribution at 6·4 per cent. for class 4 contributions because of the benefits to which the self-employed person is entitled. I was not present when class 4 contributions were introduced by the Labour Government, but I know that they brought no increased entitlement to the self-employed. They were a method of ensuring that the self-employed person paid a fair proportion of the cost of social security. His rights and entitlements were not extended. Those entitlements all depend on class 2 contributions, so the Financial Secretary needs to do a little more homework on this subject.

The Opposition stand by what we said. The Government cannot afford to employ 30 people to counter the most serious aspects of tax evasion, but they can employ more than 60 people to ensure that people of very high incomes receive larger amounts than they would from the reduction in class 4 contributions.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 40 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 54

ELECTION FOR CERTAIN MACHINERY OR PLANT TO BE TREATED AS SHORT-LIFE ASSETS

Mr. Wainwright: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 51, line 19, leave out 'fourth' and insert 'fifth'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 10, in page 51, line 23, leave out 'fourth' and insert 'fifth' and amendment No. 11, page 51, line 34, leave out 'fourth' and insert 'fifth'.

Mr. Wainwright: At this exhilarating hour of the morning, I offer the House a respite from the feeble ritual of the cracked Tory pot calling the leaky Labour kettle black, a dreary procedure that reminds me every year of the occasion when a far eastern ambassador judged the beauty finals at Skegness. After surveying the two girls, each of whose charms had great supporters in the town, he announced to a breathless crowd, "Both are worse." That describes what the Liberal party and the SDP have to contemplate every time that the Finance Bill is debated.

This amendment relates to what the Treasury chooses to think are short-life assets. In addition to the three amendments, we shall also have to amend similarly lines 8 and 12 in page 52. This matter began last year in reaction to the rather sweeping and ill-considered reform of the capital allowances for business taxation introduced in the Finance Act 1984.

In Committee on that Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) tabled an amendment to improve greatly and make much more realistic the capital allowances. That is what we seek to do in these amendments. We returned to the matter on Report, by which stage we had the welcome support of the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), the well-known chairman of the Tory finance committee. He explained to me that he was unable to attend our debates today or tomorrow, but he did not explain why so few members of that committee would be attending the debates, although perhaps that was not altogether within his power.

Last year, our amendments had the united support of the various branches of the accountancy profession, although some of the best-known business organisations were rather slow to appreciate the threat which the Chancellor had implemented in the Bill and came round to our point of view only in the late summer or early autumn, by which time it was too late for last year's Bill.

The nub of our case, last year and this, is that the Government still have not taken on board the proposition which, in the view of the alliance, should be fundamental to all taxes on the profits of going concerns. It is that taxes on business profits should fall only on the true profits, no less and no more, which means profits computed on accepted accounting conventions, not on rackety ideas of depreciation used for special purposes by the Inland Revenue. The accountancy profession today does not accept the medieval reducing balance method of calculating depreciation. It disappeared with the Ark, and the statutes up to the early 1950s gave the taxpayer the option to use straight line depreciation, which people used in their own accounts. Therefore, we have gone backwards in recent years.

Where the basic proposition that taxes on profits should fall only on the true profits is flouted, gross unfairness is inflicted between one business and another, some trades are crippled, and some are even extinguished. On this matter of taxing true profits, not spurious ones, the Government start, as previous Governments have started, with two great minuses. First, they fail to distinguish between incorporated and non-incorporated businesses. Last year, the story that such injustices over capital allowances were as dust in the balance compared with the promised reduction in corporation tax took no account of the fact that many traders—the very traders whom the Prime Minister so frequently purports to support, including new and small businesses — do not pay corporation tax. They are assessed under schedule D, and they do not receive a penny benefit from the proposed reduction in corporation tax.

The second minus is the glaringly obvious one that the Government, like all their unfortunate predecessors, make no allowances for the ravages of inflation. However, almost a generation ago—20 years ago—our neighbours across the channel in France and Belgium started to allow their tax-paying businesses to index their assets for depreciation purposes. They caught on to that obvious intellectual approach to the problems of continuing inflation, while we still pretend for revenue purposes that inflation does not exist, let alone, as at present, increasing.

It is important that the tax statutes should provide honest and realistic allowances. That was done at one time, when the Committee was rather wiser than it seems to be now. Until the late 1940s, there were separate schedules of depreciation allowance for different sorts of machinery. In those golden days, the Inland Revenue thoroughly and conscientiously met the various trade associations for different industries, discussed the type of machinery that those industries were using and negotiated a rate of depreciation for it. The schedules were long, but they were meticulously drafted. They ensured that some type of justice impregnated the tax statutes. The Inland Revenue not only tailor-made the allowances but gave the company the option of choosing the straight-line method. All that was lost on the Chancellor when last year he hit upon this crude idea of imposing the 25 per cent. reducing balance on all traders.

Before this year's Budget, the London Chamber of Commerce expressed its concern about this injustice, saying that the new allowances

"have already hit machinery-intensive firms very hard . . . in the light of the pace of technological change, capital expenditure should be written off for tax purposes by straight-line allowances over four years."

The CBI virtually echoed the warnings of the London Chamber of Commerce. Since the Budget, and in the light of the Finance Bill, the Association of Independent Businesses, one of the leading organisations of new and independent business, has offered its support. It has said:

"This Association would support your amendment to alter clause 54 of the Finance Bill to read 'fifth anniversary'."

The association went on to give its reasons.

An interested body, the British Precast Concrete Federation Ltd., whose members employ 23,000 people, also supports this change. It estimates that, taking favourable and unfavourable factors into account, under the system of depreciation introduced last year,

"the industry will be worse off by about £6·3 million a year."

That is a large deprivation. It is a ravage caused by the tax system to an important part of the hard-hit building industry.

A distinguished accountant who is the head of taxation for one of the clearing banks and a member of the "One hundred" group of chartered accountants, so-called because they are the finance directors or the taxation managers of the 100 largest companies in the kingdom, wrote to me saying:

"I would . . . wish to generally support the thrust of your proposed revision which appears to give a more realistic interpretation of short-life assets used in industry and commerce . . . it must be right to tailor the relief given as closely as possible to circumstances in economic life."

That is just what our amendments intend.

In brief, the amendments have a different definition of short-life assets from that of the Government. We believe that short-life assets are much better described and treated as those assets that are expected to have a life of up to six years. The Government choose to take a more restricted view. For the most part, the clause as drafted would apply only to computers and allied equipment and to some highly experimental high technology equipment. That is all very well and splendid. Our amendment would include not only equipment that has a high risk of obsolescence but a good deal of equipment that is the victim of wear and tear through being knocked about and heavy work in the earth shifting sector. Many of the tools used in the building trade and tractors which are used in rough country are quickly bashed to pieces. In other words, the clause should include a much more earthy range of plant and equipment than the somewhat esoteric and sophisticated equipment which will probably obtain relief under the clause as drafted.

I come to the human side of the matter. The people who we believe need the more realistic definition are those who run new and small businesses. They are dependent upon ploughed-back profits to keep going, let alone to expand. With today's news that lower interest rates will be deferred owing to the money supply getting out of control, the message from small businesses, whether they are incorporated or unincorporated, is that unless they are allowed to keep a reasonable proportion of their profits we can say goodbye to much growth in that sector, because the Government's regime has made borrowing intolerably expensive for small and new businesses.

There are several other serious defects in the clause, and it would not surprise us if the Government were to table some fairly substantial amendments at a later stage. I do not believe that they have considered the enormous administrative burden that their system of requiring irrevocable elections, item by item, will mean. When they have second thoughts, they may come a little closer to our view.

I warn the Committee, if "warn" is the right term, that we do not intend to let this matter go. Unless the Government see sense, we envisage returning to the subject in a big way on Report. In the meantime, we hope that the Government will realise the importance of giving a signal of hope to manufacturers by taking on board our amendments and adopting a much more realistic definition of a short life asset.

Mr. Moore: I am not sure to what extent I should cover all the ground that the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) covered. I am fascinated by his description of some aspects of our accountancy scheme as medieval reducing balances. I do not profess to be an accountant. I am not blessed with that expertise. During my 20 months in the Treasury I have heard that large chunks of British industry have benefited in the past from the pooling system which plainly requires the benefits of reducing balances. At some stage we can have a longer debate. I see the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) nodding. He is a former auditor and professional accountant.

I understand the point that the hon. Member for Colne Valley is making. The second part of his speech was more an expression of his frustration at the nature of parts of last year's corporation tax changes, and the extent to which the clause and the amendments relating to it go from that base. I understand the points that he is making, but I do not accept them.

I hoped that the hon. Gentleman could have started with a general welcome for the way in which we recognised the point which he and hon. Members on both sides of the House, although they did not like the system honourably made about what they saw as one of the flaws in it.

Mr. Wainwright: The Financial Secretary may recall that I presented that bouquet on Second Reading. I am anxious not to bore the Committee with repetition.

Mr. Moore: I assure the hon. Gentleman that flattery and compliments can never bore Treasury Ministers. I am only too happy to receive such plaudits again and again. The hon. Gentleman is correct. He mentioned the point on Second Reading.

It might be helpful if I spoke a little wider than the amendments, as the hon. Gentleman legitimately did. The amendments relate to a refinement of the capital allowances code which has been welcomed by both sides of the House — the hon. Gentleman confirmed that welcome—and industry since my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced it on Budget day.

Hon. Members will recall that one feature of the fundamental changes to the system of business taxation launched by my right hon. Friend in his 1984 Budget was the reduction in the rates of corporation tax. I can discuss unincorporated busninesses, but it would not be the moment as we have just had a debate which covered them. I hope that at some stage I shall be able to put on the record the other benefits that the Government believe they have added to unincorporated sector. He was right to say that the small company rate was reduced to 30 per cent.— obviously of benefit to the unincorporated — and the main rate is being reduced by a third over three years.

Another benefit is the gradual phasing out of the 100 per cent. first year allowances on business machinery and plant. The effect will be to encourage business investment, which is expected to be commercially worth while and profitable and to discourage investment which is made only because of the tax incentive. When first year allowances are phased out on 31 March 1986, machinery and plant will generally attract an annual writing-down allowance of 25 per cent. calculated on a pooling basis. I have explained why that has some advantages. The cost of plant goes into the pool, the proceeds from sales are deducted from it and the annual allowance is given on the balance.

The pooling of expenditure and disposal proceeds in this way means that balancing adjustments are not made when individual assets are sold or scrapped. Separate records and tax computations for each and every asset are not therefore needed. These are many of the advantages that exist under the WDA system. That saves work for the business, its accountants and for the Inland Revenue.

A 25 per cent. writing-down allowance on a reducing balance basis enables 90 per cent. of the cost of a business asset to be written-off for tax over eight years. This is, on average, more than adequate for the machinery and plant of many businesses, but we recognise that for some assets — especially, but by no means exclusively, those commonly referred to as high tech — it does not adequately reflect the rapid depreciation which they experience whether through technical absolescence or exceptionally heavy use. The definition goes way beyond high tech into many other items—for example, for some items in the heavy contracting industry there is usually a two to three year life rather than the eight year average life.

It might be useful if I write to the hon. Gentleman and circulate the letter to illustrate the categories of assets that we could identify, which might be helpful. The new scheme represented by clause 54 together with schedule 12 will enable the tax allowances for assets of this type to be brought into line with actual depreciation when they are sold or scrapped.

The new scheme will inevitably complicate the system introduced last year. That is an unavoidable price to be paid. It has been designed with simplicity very much in mind in order to keep to a minimum the additional compliance burden on businesses.

I ask hon. Members to understand that the kind of administrative detail required is required anyway within a business organisation. I do not think that it will much extend that work, but it will complicate matters. It is a relief to help businesses, and to that extent it must add complications to an otherwise simple pooling system.

Traders will be able to elect to have the capital allowances on business assets of their choosing—that is a critical phrase—calculated separately from the main business pool for a period of up to five years—that is, depooled. It is this period which the movers of the amendment seek to extend by a further year.

If the asset is sold or scrapped in this time, a balancing adjustment will be made so that the tax allowances over the business lifetime of the asset are equal to its commercial depreciation. That means that if an asset is scrapped altogether, a balancing allowance will ensure that the cost is fully written-off for tax. On the other hand, if the asset is sold in the five-year period for more than its tax written-down value, a balancing charge will be made to recover the excess allowances given.

If the asset is not sold or scrapped within the five year period, its tax written-down value at the end of that time will be transferred to the main machinery and plant pool. Thereafter, it will be dealt with for capital allowance purposes as if it had never been depooled.

Traders will have two years—a substantial amount of time—from the end of the year in which they bought the asset to make a depooling election. That time limit means that about a half of the five-year depooled period will have passed before an irrevocable choice has to be made. Traders will therefore be able to elect——

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): While accepting that two years is a long period, does my hon. Friend agree that in many cases the logical time to make an election will be when a business, whether incorporated or unincorporated, is submitting its tax computations to the Inland Revenue, in conjunction with, but often frequently later than, its accounts? There may be cases when accounts have been submitted on time but the detailed computations cannot be sorted out within the two-year period. That has been found in applications for stock relief, which are also within the two-year period. In that case, will my hon. Friend consider whether a rigid time limit on such an election is necessary or whether, given that this is a relieving provision for tax purposes, it would be more appropriate to leave it at the discretion of the Inland Revenue?

Mr. Moore: We considered the issue with care and took on board the point that my hon. Friend makes. One of the most important features was to try not to increase the Inland Revenue activity; we do not want, as the hon. Member for Hodge Hill earlier pointed out, to add to the already heavy burdens that the Inland Revenue bears. Although we looked with care at the timing, I will look at the point that my hon. Friend raises, but I cannot say that I am attracted to it at first blush.

I was saying before my hon. Friend intervened that if the asset is not sold or scrapped within the five-year period, its tax written down value at the end of that time will be transferred to the main machinery and plant pool. Thereafter, it will be dealt with for capital purposes as if it had never been de-pooled. As I pointed out, traders have two years from the end of the year in which they bought the asset to make a de-pooling election.

This time limit means that half of the five-year de-pooled period will have passed before an irrevocable choice has to be made. Traders will, therefore, be able to elect selectively knowing which of their assets have already been sold or scrapped and which are likely to be during the rest of the de-pooled period.

[Mr. Moore]

The new arrangement in clause 54 and schedule 12 has the twin advantages of enabling assets the working life of which, based on the knowledge and experience of the trader, is much shorter than the average, to be fully written off, while at the same time maintaining the advantages of pooling for the generality of business machinery and plant.

The scheme as proposed in the Bill requires the transfer of unrelieved expenditure on an asset to the main business pool at the end of the fourth year following the year of acquisition, if the asset has not been sold in this time. These four years, together with the year of acquisition, make up the five-year period of separate treatment.

The amendment seeks to extend this period to six years by requiring the transfer to the main pool to be made at the end of the fifth year, following the year of acquisition, if the asset has not been sold. It is a matter of judgment and analysis. We believe that that would be going too far for a scheme deliberately aimed at short-life assets; and, in any case, we do not believe that it is necessary.

On any test, a five-year de-pooled period embraces the genuine short-life asset. It is not, therefore, immediately obvious that other and deserving categories of machinery and plant would be brought into the new scheme by a one-year extension, or, alternatively, are being kept out by the period proposed in the Bill.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Colne Valley has done the calculation, but it is relevant to note that after six years, more than 80 per cent. of the cost, under the WDA system, of the plant dealt with in the main pool has been written off for tax. To accept the amendment would add to the compliance costs of business and to the administraive costs of the Revenue, both of which we want to minimise. The amendment would not, therefore, improve the proposals as drafted but could introduce some additional and unnecessary costs, and on that basis we could not commend it to the Committee.

Mr. Wainwright: I regret the fact that the Financial Secretary did not give some indication of the different classes of asset which he claims will be helped substantially by the Bill as drafted. Until I have seen his list and had an opportunity of testing it with industrial organisations, I remain profoundly sceptical.

There are limits to what an individual hon. Member can do under the present arrangements in Parliament, but I did some investigation into what short-life assets really consist of, and that satisfied me that the period in the Bill is narrow and will leave out a good deal of plant which is heavily knocked about in the course of construction and other operations and for which about six years is a reasonable life.

I am sorry to differ from the Financial Secretary on a matter of the simplest third form arithmetic, but it is misleading to suggest that, on the reducing balance system, the asset is virtually written off by the eighth year. Even at this hour of the morning, we must not get our arithmetic so wrong.

I have been provided with an example from the files of a firm of distinguished city accountants. It involves a small, hard-working businessman who set up as a small haulage contractor. His capital equipment cost him £12,800 and consisted of a tractor and two trailers—a fairly classic example of someone trying to get a living in the harsh economic climate that has been thrust upon us.

Suppose that man elected for depooling, on the honest basis that he thought that the tractor would shake to bits in about five years, but he found in the fifth year that not only was the tractor miraculously just surviving, but he had no money to renew it and could not afford a bank loan for the purpose. The accountants have worked out that by the end of year five, out of the initial expenditure of £12,800, he would still have £3,037 not written off.

It is wrong that small traders, struggling to establish themselves, should be taxed on profits that do not exist and are merely imaginary. The claim that the asset is virtually written off by the eighth year is not true.

I shall spare the Committee a long dissertation on pooling, but the Financial Secretary is trying to have it three ways at once. He extols the virtues of pooling, but also extols the virtues of the clause, which is a depooling measure and will mean that all the individual items that he professes to regard as so burdensome to business and the Inland Revenue will all appear. A vast number of businesses will make the election, just to be on the safe side.

What is the objection to the proper, diligent method of recording each asset? Any self-respecting company keeps a plant register. It does not have an amorphous mass called "machinery"; it has a register of assets, who made them, their cost and their estimated life on installation. As most businesses use the straight line method of depreciation, they keep detailed individual depreciation records. It is bad management to have a vast, unspecified collection of assets with no identification.

If the Financial Secretary believes that the Inland Revenue will object to the record keeping, let him say so. It is inaccurate for him to claim that business does not want to keep the records. It keeps them, anyway. I am not convinced by the hon. Gentleman's reply, but at this hour it would not be wise to press the amendment to a Division. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: As has become apparent from the speeches on the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), in many ways clause 54 is a belated attempt to recover from some of the disasters of the 1984 Budget changes in capital allowances. The distorting effects of those changes can be seen in the capital investment figures for 1984 and the projections for 1985. There was a considerable rise in the amount of capital investment in 1984, dropping away in 1985. This bulge seems largely to be a result of companies bringing forward their purchases before the capital allowances changes fully take effect.

It is worth mentioning as a matter of background that the CBI survey, which is fairly heavily relied upon by the Government, says that many companies expect capital investment to fall quite sharply. Secondly, capital consumption as a whole in the United Kingdom has exceeded investment by some £1·6 billion since the end of 1981. Without going in detail into what occurred before 1984, that system of capital allowances seems to me to have had three major commercial advantages. First, it allowed a first year allowance of 100 per cent. on the purchase of plant and machinery. That obviously gave a tremendous advantage to companies that were purchasing plant and machinery at the time because they could set off the entirety of the purchase price. Secondly, the pre-1984 system looked at the matter in terms of the purchase of assets, not the sale of assets. I am uncertain whether the clause, based as it is upon the sale of assets rather than the purchase of assets, will create as many problems as it seeks to solve.

Thirdly, under the pre-1984 system, there was no distinction between short and long life assets and thus none of the problems of what we will call depooling were brought into operation by the pre-1984 system. All the assets being in the same pool meant that, for example, in year one, if a company decided not to take the full 100 per cent. of its first year allowance, in year two it could set off any outstanding balance against the proceeds of sale in the same pool of assets.

The purpose of clause 54 is that the company could elect to treat an asset as a short life asset and, provided it is disposed of within the four years after acquisition, the balance of the loss could be set off against taxable profits.

It is right to acknowledge the problem of short life assets, particularly in relation to difficulties arising from obsolete technology. Under the 1984 Budget, prior to the clause 54 change coming into effect, the 25 per cent. could be claimed only in the first year of acquisition, and then 25 per cent. of the writing down allowance was claimed in the recurring years. If, for example, an asset was brought and disposed of in year two and sold at a loss, although that loss arose in year two, 25 per cent. of the writing down allowance has recurred over the years and therefore the loss can be spread only over a period of years.

I wish to put four specific points to the Minister in relation to the way in which the clause operates. It is quite difficult to judge what the precise effects of the clause will be. It is a matter of concern to me that the clause may have hidden problems that have been given inadequate consideration by the Government in introducing it in its present form.

First, I appreciate that any sensible company will have a register of its plant and machinery. In simply identifying a piece of plant and machinery, therefore, the clause is not placing any greater burdens on it in an administrative way. However, the election that will be made under the clause is an election on an individual basis for each item of machinery. Those items of machinery will then have to be shown separately as those that are depooled and treated as short life assets and those that are not. Has any consideration been given to the administrative and accounting problems involved in keeping a proper check to ensure that the assets sold as short life assets are the same assets that were purchased?

Secondly, will the Minister confirm that, if an asset treated as a short life asset is not disposed of within the five-year period, it simply goes back into the ordinary pool of assets? If an asset is not appreciating or certainly if it is depreciating by at least 25 per cent. per year, it would surely be in the interests of any sensible company to treat virtually any asset as a short life asset; because if the company decides not to sell it within the five-year period the asset will simply be treated in the usual way, but if it is sold the company will obtain the benefit of the short life asset provision.

Thirdly, the ability to set the balance against taxable profits arises on the sale of the machinery, not on the purchase as it did under the pre-1984 system. Has any consideration been given to the difficulties of companies in predicting when they are likely to sell? If allowances are given at the time of purchase, capital expenditure decisions are much easier to calculate. The time of sale is more difficult to judge, especially with new technology which may become obsolete at a time which is virtually unpredictable.

Finally, although I am a lawyer by training, I am not used to reading Finance Bills in great detail, and I am uncertain as to the mechanism which triggers the ability to set off the balance against taxable profits within the four-year period after the year of acquisition. What brings into being the ability to claim the benefit of clause 54 on short life assets? Is it the disposal as such, or is it what the clause describes as the discontinuance of the notional trade?

As I understand the clause, once the election is made the asset is treated as part of the notional trade separate from the actual trade and continues to be treated in that way until such time as "the notional trade is permanently discontinued" which is

"when the short life asset begins to be used wholly or partly for purposes other than those of the actual trade", at which point discontinuance arises and the ability to claim under clause 54 ceases. If that is so, could not discontinuance of the notional trade be artificially brought about by the company starting to use the asset wholly or partly for purposes other than those of the actual trade, at which point discontinuance would arise and the triggering mechanism of clause 54 would come into operation? I put that point to the Minister because it is important for the practicality of the clause.

We do not propose to vote against clause. However, detailed consideration of it may show that it creates as many problems as it solves.

Mr. Moore: I commend the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for saying that he was not an accountant. As a lawyer he has a far better grasp of the details than I have as a non-lawyer, let alone as an accountant. The hon. Gentleman raised some legitimate detailed points, but he started with some general points. I shall start with the general issues because it is sometimes difficult to find time to discuss them. It will also ensure that my officials advise me accurately about the hon. Gentleman's detailed questions.

1.15 am

The hon. Gentleman was a little unfair to go over the old ground of last year. It would be hard for me to go into great detail about the basic rationale behind the Government's corporation tax changes. The Government considered the investment achievement in the United Kingdom. Most people recognise that in the 100 per cent. first year allowances we probably had the most generous allowances in the Western world. I assume that the presumption would have been that they served one of two purposes—either they produced a greater quantum of investment and or at least as good, if not better, quality of investment. Otherwise why should valuable tax reliefs be given to encourage investment? There were many debates in Committee and on the Floor of the House last year including one about the long-term nature of jobs and investments. The basic assumption from the OECD data, as opposed to the Government data, was—I have no figures to confirm the points that I made last year, buy my membory is reasonably good on this—that the overall quantum record was no better, and probably a little worse than the OECD average. Our supposed generosity, therefore, of first year full 100 per cent. allowances did not seem advantageous in that sense.

The second feature of the OECD figures suggested that, when one examined in detail the quality of investment, in all cases our rate of return on investment was below the unit return on capital employed. The country did not seem to benefit from the supposedly generous 100 per cent. first year allowances according to those two basic criteria. I shall explain why in a moment.

Mr. Wainwright: The Minister said that the OECD figures suggested that the British quantum of investment was no better than the other OECD countries, despite our admittedly generous allowances. Could the explanation not be quite different? Could it not be that to overcome the enormous political handicap of the continuous stop-go rhythm in the United Kingdom since the end of the war, British industry had to be given super-incentives to invest, otherwise there would have been no investment?

Mr. Moore: We could debate the matter for a long time. I accept that many other factors are involved. An analyst who looked at the nature of our 100 per cent. first year allowances would have been surprised to find that the two theoretical main advantages that might have flowed from them had not. The analysis that many people drew was that most people were consciously concerned with the post-tax, not the pre-tax, rate of return, that that had changed people's attitude prior to investment, and that to that extent we did not have the quality investment that might have flowed from a commercial analysis of investment potential as opposed to a fiscal or tax analysis. That was the basic pattern behind the very substantive changes. Having said that, we acknowledged, in the debates upstairs, that those were substantive changes in the whole of our system.

I accept that change does not necessarily run in line with the basic concept of pooling, but to the extent to which we saw a specific problem relating to short life assets—the fundamental problem that we think we are tackling in the clause—we have sought to retain the basic advantages in the major system, together with the additional advantages that we offer for de-pooling.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield asked four specific questions, and I am happy to answer them specifically.

First, the companies will keep records and the inspectors will monitor claims.

The hon. Member asked about the blanket election proposals. He is right in the point that he made. The legislation will not prevent traders from making blanket elections, since the choice of which plant is to be treated as a short life asset is deliberately left to them. It is unlikely that they will do so, however, since they would then be at risk of balancing charges which would not arise were the plant to be kept in the main machinery and plant pool. A blanket approach would also require businesses—a point that the hon. Member also recognised—to keep separate records and make separate capital allowance computations for five years for each and every item of their business plant. It is much more likely that businesses will elect selectively so that the new arrangements will apply only to assets which they believe to have shorter than average working lives.

In thinking about how we could best help the business community in this area, our purpose was to try to allow the business community to seek to make their selective decisions themselves. Of course, we shall have to watch the particular point that the hon. Member rightly raised.

There is a clear two-year period for election which I think gives reasonable time, although my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) has already intervened to question that point. I said that I would consider it with considerable care.

Finally, the disposal will normally trigger the balancing adjustment. There are some protections within the clause. I will look again at the last point that the hon. Member for Sedgefield made, and if I feel that there is any need to deal with it I shall do so before Report.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 54 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 12 agreed to.

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Mr. Moore.]

Committee report progress; to sit again today.

PETITION

1.24 am

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): It gives me great pleasure to present a petition to this House from Durham county council asking for the rejection of the Transport Bill and any legislation seeking to implement the proposals contained in the White Paper on buses. It gives me great pleasure to associate myself with this petition against a particularly misguided but not untypical piece of legislation from this Government.

To lie upon the Table.

South Manchester Health District

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

1.24 am

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The Minister has an advantage tonight because he is accustomed now to late-night Adjournment debates, operating as he does as the Government's rear gunner on such occasions.

It is stated in the Order Paper that I propose to raise the subject of the "financial position of South Manchester Health District".

There has been a change from what I wrote originally, but I make no complaint about that. I described the debate as one on "The crisis in the South Manchester Health District". Perhaps the Clerks have news that the Minister is about to make a major announcement. The Minister shakes his head, which causes me to revert to my original cynicism. The Government face all crises by refusing to recognise their existence.

There is a real problem of finance in south Manchester. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) and I went with a delegation to meet the Minister for Health, the Minister responded in writing some time afterwards and claimed that there was no evidence of suffering within the south Manchester area. My right hon. Friend has given me a letter from one of his constituents, who was an experienced senior nurse at the Wythenshawe hospital. She was admitted recently to one of that hospital's wards for treatment. She had heard that the Minister for Health had claimed that there was no undue hardship caused by staff shortages in the Wythenshawe chest wards. She wrote:

> "I beg to differ. I saw in one evening shift one sister and two auxilliaries with 29 acute patients in cubicles, not an open ward. Four-hourly treatment had to be done by SRN only."

She referred to a number of examples of things going wrong with patient care. As I have said, she was an experienced nurse. The letter is revealing about the state of play within south Manchester and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for allowing me access to this piece of information.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for quoting my constituent's letter, which I allowed him to see for the purposes of the debate. As my hon. Friend has said, Mrs. Staniforth is a former senior nurse at the Wythenshawe hospital. She was the nursing sister who was in charge of the first cardiac clinic at the hospital. She wrote:

> "I see in the not too distant future a tragedy happening, as staff are human beings and are asked to do the impossible."

That is a voice of long experience to which the Minister must respond tonight.

Mr. Lloyd: In quoting his constituent, my right hon. Friend is entirely accurate about the real position that is facing south Manchester. That position is recognised by the many consultants I have spoken to recently as well as by those involved in the nursing side and in other sectors throughout the health authority. The Minister for Health claimed that south Manchester is better funded than ever before. That might be so in terms of pound notes, and the chairman of the health authority accepts that more money is going into the authority, but the chairman has observed that in real terms south Manchester has seen a 9 per cent. increase in the number of patients treated and, in effect, a static amount of money going into the services that existed two years ago. There has been growth money for cardiac surgery, for dialysis and for adult leukaemia, but it is not adequate to say that services are getting better when clearly they are not. What the chairman of the North Western regional health authority described as an overspend in south Manchester is more accurately described by the chairman of the South Manchester health authority as a shortfall that has been caused by underfunding.

It was claimed that south Manchester was heading towards a £2·8 million overspend. The region has been required to achieve efficiency savings of well over £500,000. There was no overspend. Salary increments for the staff within south Manchester amount to nearly £1 million. We are saying, in effect, that there is an overspend when the staff in a particular area under a particular authority become more experienced and more skilled and when they remain in post for more years. The salary structure of the NHS requires the staff to be given larger salaries to reflect its experience, skill and service, and that causes overspending. Every authority with a stable work force will therefore overspend eventually. That is nonsense. Of the £2·8 million, less than £500,000 can accurately be described as overspend. To some extent, south Manchester is penalised for its own success. The shortfall has had dramatic results, as the health authority has had to make some extremely unpalatable decisions which some people have described as butchery. Ony the regional chairman has been kind enough to call it a serious cut.

The authority has failed to maintain its property and it has decided, yet again, to cut capital spending and maintenance. That is an insane decision. For how many years can we fail to maintain hospitals? More serious is the decision to cut out 100 skilled and trained nurses, not as a result of rational planning of the nursing load but because they cannot be afforded under the mechanistic rubric put forward by the Government to the region. Another 200 jobs are to go in the service. The authority chairman has said:

"The loss of 100 nursing posts cannot be sustained if the present number of wards remains open. We have, therefore, decided that a number of wards must be combined or closed in order to allow the nurse reduction to take place."

The lunacy is that ward closures are being dictated not by health need but by the need to reduce the number of employees on financial grounds. There is no health logic but a crisis management approach which bears no relation to the needs of people in the area.

I recently discussed this matter with consultants at the chest wards at Wythenshawe hospital. They are extremely angry because they are witnessing the dismantling of what has taken many years to build and because no logic underlies the decisions. They see no lack of demand for their services. Indeed, surrounding districts will not be able to cope with the increased demand once the 30 beds at Wythenshawe have gone.

When the cuts were announced, a spokesman for the authority said that patients from outside the area would no longer be able to come to south Manchester for treatment. The stupidity of it all is that that is not true. My constituency forms part of two other health authorities, and it is clear that doctors in Trafford or central Manchester will continue to refer to south Manchester because there is no mechanism in the NHS by which south Manchester can refuse. That being so, there will be increased waiting lists, and patients from south Manchester will be refused treatment in their own hospital. Indeed, they will be told to refer themselves to other authorities.

With geriatric beds, we are told that the closure is temporary as the beds will eventually be called upon to serve south Trafford. In a recent Adjournment debate, the Minister was at pains to tell the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) that no decision had been made about south Trafford hospital. One thing is certain—until a decision is made, it would be the height of foolishness to take beds out of operation.

The authority says that the policy is to support patients in the community, for example through the community geriatric nursing team, yet anyone who talks to those who operate in the community—such as the district nurses and community psychiatric nurses—knows very well that although south Manchester has tried to increase those community services, it has not increased them anything like adequately enough to cope with the increase that will come from the closure of those geriatric beds at Withington, and the general demand for community services. The reality is that community services have been under more strain. That is not my view, but the view of virtually every district nurse——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten) indicated dissent.

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister shakes his head, but I invite him to come to south Manchester. He need not listen to me or Members of Parliament representing the area. He should go there instead. He need not listen to the regional chairman or the authority chairman. Let him talk to the consultants, the midwives, the nurses and the district nurses, and ask them whether they think that there has been an increase in community care and in the quality of services within the wards. They will tell him that there has been a deterioration and that they are working under greater pressure in that area, particularly in the community services on which we are now supposed to rely.

We are also told about the temporary closure of 21 surgical beds, and that they may be needed in future to help out in south Trafford. We are told that there will be an increase in the waiting lists because of such decisions and that general practitioners will be sent details saying where patients can be referred, in areas where waiting times are shortest. What a nonsense that GPs will operate on that basis. That concept is totally unknown in the NHS.

In his letter, the chairman of the regional health authority told me that there will be no great impact on patient care, which is a saving grace. Apart from those in the Government, the chairman is the only person who does not think that there will be a serious impact on patient care. He goes on to say:

"Closures and changes of use are of course subject to public consultation."

That is not true. For example, the proposed transfer of the paediatric plastic surgery unit from Withington hospital to the Duchess of York hospital is not open to consultation because it is a transfer and not a closure, yet it is opposed by every plastic surgeon in that unit. It is no use offering consultation on the closure of the geriatric unit simply because that unit is now closed already, in effect locking the stable door once the horse has gone. The other wards will not close until the end of June, but once again it is meaningless to offer consultation there because there is not sufficient time for adequate consultation. Such a consultation would be bogus and have no impact.

Morale is now very poor in south Manchester. It was poor already at the recent round of talks. Many people have expressed the real fear to me that the amount of cuts being asked for this time round will not be enough to save the £2·8 million. Around October, the authority might have to look for further cuts. The fact that those rumours and fears are abroad means that morale continues to shrink. We are seeing the dissipation of the one thing that makes our Health Service tower above that of many other countries—the great dedication of those working in it. It is desperately important that that is recognised, and that the Minister recognises that I am not simply making a political point; it would be made by all those people.

Therefore, I appeal to the Minister, if he does not believe what I say, to come to south Manchester and talk to those most involved because we have gone beyond the point of the matter being a simple political shuttlecock. We have reached the point where I need to appeal, on behalf of my constituents, to the Minister and the Government to take seriously the impact of the present round of cuts upon that authority.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I am glad that the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) has raised this important question. He has been supported by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). He characterised my role at the end of the parliamentary day as that of a tail gunner, who was the most lonely member of an aircrew during the second world war. Happily, my loneliness is assuaged by the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester), who has come to listen to the debate.

Health authority finance is a legitimate and important matter for public debate. The Government are responsible for the way in which the considerable and rising sums of money being spent in the NHS are distributed to different parts of the country. We have difficult decisions to make about the apportionment of funds between the different health authorities. We are ultimately responsible, and I do not dispute the fact that we should be discussing the important points that the hon. Gentleman has made. However, in any organisation as large as the NHS, spending so much money—a record £14·5 billion this year, which is more than 20 per cent. ahead of the rise in prices since 1979 — regional and local determination must play some role. We cannot second guess from the Elephant and Castle every spending decision taken by a regional or district health authority.

However, regional and district health authorities should live within their means and their cash limits. Cash limits are not some new, draconian and Conservative introduction into the running of the NHS. They were rightly part of the last Labour Administration's way of running things. Health authorities must manage within the sums of money that they have, but there is always room for legitimate debate about whether the sums of money are large enough, given the health care needs of the district.

Resources are not limitless, but demands are. The hon. Member for Stretford and I probably agree that the demands on the NHS are almost infinite and that they could grow way beyond the capacity of this or any other country to fund. One of the main reasons for this is the very success of modern medicine, together with the much wider range and scope of treatment that modern medicine can offer.

In south Manchester, about which the hon. Gentleman painted an unnecessarily gloomy picture—although he pointed briefly to one or two sectors where he thought that things were going well—the district health authority is treating many patients who, only a few short years ago, had no hope. That is putting additional pressure on the system, to which the Government have responded by massive investment in the district. While I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's strength of feeling, and his care and concern for his constituents, there is no way in which south Manchester could be described as an area of deprivation and need compared with the rest of the north. It is one of the best funded districts in the whole of northern England.

In the NHS, the process of redistribution of resources to where the patients are is continuing. There is broadly a bipartisan agreement across the Floor of the House on this. We might disagree about the rate and the pace of redistribution, and say that it is going too fast relative to the sums of money in the NHS—those are matters for debate—but most of us realise that it makes common sense to put the money where the patients are. Money should follow patients, beds should be where patients are, and we need to redistribute money between the relatively well off and the poor areas.

That process was started by the Labour Government, and we are aware that the historically deprived—I do not blame any previous Administration for this—north-western region needs our special attention. It is with that in mind that the total additional revenue allocation for the region this year alone is £43 million, which is a 5·5 per cent. increase in the cash available for 1984-85. That is a formidable real increase in revenue.

The north-west's capital allocation is, for the second year running, the second highest in England. The capital moneys are intended to make up the historic deprivation of the north-west, in terms of capital stock. The pressing need to rebuild older hospitals and units has been recognised by this increased capital allocation. The region is moving quickly, under the Government's policies, towards its revenue target, and this financial year it will be only 1·8 per cent. below that target. That compares with a figure of about 11 per cent. below target just six years ago.

Whatever else has happened in the region, vis-à-vis the rest of the country it has been brought pretty close to its revenue target quickly during the past six years.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: I do not have much time, and I must reply to the hon. Member for Stretford. I intend no discourtesy to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Morris: My constituency is involved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. If the Minister does not give way, the right hon. Gentleman knows that he cannot intervene.

Mr. Patten: The right hon. Gentleman knows that I intend no discourtesy. It would be a greater discourtesy if I were unable, because of the lack of time available to me, to reply in full to the points of the hon. Member for Stretford. I shall certainly write to the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe in reply to any points that he wishes to raise.

How has south Manchester benefited from all this? First, it has benefited through the district's development of teaching, which has continued apace. Secondly, during the past two years, nearly £5 million worth of capital spending has occurred in the district, which is a substantial sum. Thirdly, there is a new day unit for the elderly mentally infirm. Fourthly, £1·25 million has been spent on cardiac services and on kidney dialysis and associated renal services, which the hon. Member for Stretford was good enough to mention as improvements in his district. Fifthly, it is an incontrovertible fact that the district is one of the best funded in the region; it is the highest funded per head of population of the north-west's three teaching districts. That is reflected in the fact that, in relation to where it should be according to the calculations of the regional allocation working party, the district is expected to be about 12 per cent. above target this year. That is as far above target as, for example, a deprived district such as Bolton is below target.

I recently visited Bolton, at the invitation of two of my hon. Friends and one Labour Member, to see the problems there. I was with them for some time that day, and I saw the problems of a district such as Bolton, which is so much below target. I shall certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's invitation to pay a similar visit to his constituency.

One of the best yardsticks by which levels of service can be judged is the access to hospital inpatient facilities for bread-and-butter health services. In south Manchester at present, it is considerably easier to obtain hospital treatment quickly than it is in other districts, such as Bolton.

What are south Manchester's problems? We have had a mixture of fact and anecdote from the hon. Member for Stretford. I do not think that anyone can seriously argue that the district is under-funded. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. South Manchester's financial problems stem from overspending in previous years and from accumulated overspending. The hon. Member for Stretford referred to my shaking my head in disagreement; I see that he is now shaking his head in disagreement with me. We shall have to disagree. The district is facing accumulated overspending of £2·8 million. It would be surprising if a component of that overspending were not attributable to the cost of staff. The cost of staff in the NHS accounts for more than 70 per cent. of total revenue expenditure. Of course, staff costs will always be part of that overspending.

The district is facing this accumulated deficit. We cannot simply wipe the slate clean. How would we explain that to patients in Wigan, Bolton and other deprived districts in the north-west? I have to speak for them as well. All Governments, including Labour, have required health authorities to live within their budgets. This Government's intention is to continue to ask them to do so.

The health authority, under its excellent chairman, Sir John Page, is working the district trying to find ways of reducing the accumulated overspend while continuing to provide the current excellent service. Until that is achieved, it will put in jeopardy all the progress that south Manchester has made, undermining the foundations of the district's development in the future as a centre of life-saving surgery.

South Manchester is certainly a responsible health authority. It has set a budget for 1985-86 which it thinks can be contained within its cash limits. It is considering making a number of service changes to make all that possible. The regional health authority has agreed to some of those changes and has asked for others to be re-examined. All this consultation is a critical part of the process. The hon. Member for Stretford is not being fair to the way in which the consultation process is carried out. If he really feels that consultation is not being carried out according to the rules, it is important that he should write to me or to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health to point out exactly where and how the procedures are not being followed.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Once a ward is closed—as with the geriatric ward at Withington hospital — what meaningful purpose can consultation have, even if it is carried out with the best will in the world? We all know that it will not reopen the ward.

Mr. Patten: It is not always the case that wards closed under the emergency procedures are thereafter closed permanently. There are a number of examples where wards have been closed temporarily by health authorities pending the consultation process. After consultation, because of the view of the health authority or of the Minister to whom the matter has gone on appeal, the decision has gone the other way and the wards have been reopened. The consultation process is extremely important, and I hope that people will take part in it wholeheartedly, where there have been short-term or temporary closures.

A number of changes in the district will be beneficial to patient care. Some of the suggested changes will mean, if approved by the region and followed by the district health authority, that people will receive treatment much closer to home. If people receive closer to their homes the care that they need, this is a change for the better. Neither my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health nor myself approves the wholesale shipping of patients over substantial distances when they can be treated closer to their homes.

There are a number of beneficial effects in the proposals. The district treats a high proportion of elderly patients in hospital — much higher than the national average. I do not think that that accords necessarily with good, modern practice. It is sensible that the district wants to shift resources to treat those who do not genuinely need to be in hospital. I do not think that community care is a cheap option or that the transfer from hospital to community care is an easy transfer to make. We are living in a period of change, and community services are adopting and adapting practices. Of course, there will be problems in south Manchester, as in other areas of the country—

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Programme Project

1. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are Her Majesty's Government's intentions in respect of funds which will be made available for urban programme projects.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): Details of planned expenditure and priorities for the urban programme are given in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428-II pages 118-121). This year £338 million has been allocated to help foster enterprise, improve the environment and tackle social problems. These resources are used in accordance with ministerial guidelines, a restatement of which, together with details of my Department's initiative to strengthen the management of the urban programme, has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cohen: The Minister is aware that many valuable urban programme projects and children's holiday and play schemes in my constituency, Leyton, have been rejected by his Department. Are not many self-help community groups suffering because the Government are not providing sufficient funds for the urban programme? In view of the effect upon voluntary organisations of the proposed abolition of the Greater London council, should not the Minister be entering into a positive commitment to a major expansion of the urban programme?

Sir George Young: The urban programme is a popular programme which is always over-subscribed. Before the hon. Gentleman takes this Government to task for their attitude towards Waltham Forest, he may care to reflect that in 1984-85 we shall be making roughly £183,500 available under the traditional urban programme, compared with about £76,000 in 1979. There has, therefore, been a real increase in the resources that this Government have made available to Waltham Forest under the urban programme. As for abolition, the Government have made it quite clear that there is no reason why worthwhile projects should suffer after the abolition of the GLC.

Mr. Ashby: Does my hon. Friend not agree that perhaps the most valuable urban aid that is provided is for the clean-up programmes in areas of decline? Does he not agree that the programme that has been financed by the Government in my constituency, Leicestershire, North-West, is valuable and should be extended for another two years?

Sir George Young: We are always pleased to learn that money spent under the urban programme has been gratefully received by the local hon. Member. Environmental improvement is one of the objectives of the urban programme and we hope to maintain the initiative that has recently been launched in Leicester.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Is the Minister aware that many local authorities would not have had impossible targets to meet or would not have had to be rate capped if they had not had to incorporate under their own expenditure headings time-expired schemes which were originally funded by the urban programme? Was that not the case last year with Liverpool, and is it not the case this year with many rate-capped authorities? Will the Minister refund many of these programmes?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman may unwittingly have led people to believe that Liverpool city council is rate-capped. It is not. It has always been a feature of the urban programme that it pump primes worthwhile projects on the basis that local authorities will take them over at the end of four or five yars. That has always been the basis upon which the urban programme has been planned.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: My hon. Friend will agree that the previous Labour Government and this Government have reduced the rate support grant, but is it not also true that specific grants in the urban programme have given many cities more rather than less money than used to be the case under the old purely rate support grant system?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the worthwhile increase in the value of the urban programme. In 1978-79 the urban programme spent £93 million and in the current year, £338 million. That is a worthwhile increase in resources to our inner cities.

Mr. Simon Hughes: What is the skeleton in the Government's cupboard that leads them to command an internal report on the future of the urban programme and then not publish it? What does that report say? Does it say that there will be a further cut in the urban programme, or does it say, as it should, that there should be a substantial extension and improvement? Can it be made public? That is really the question.

Sir George Young: That was an internal review of the urban programme. It has been reviewed more often than almost any other item of Government expenditure, and it has always emerged from such reviews with credit. We plan to spend in cash terms this year roughly the same as the cash outturn for last year. The fact that we have managed to safeguard the urban programme over the past six years at a time when, for good reasons, reductions have been made in public expenditure, is a reflection of the priority that we attach to dealing with the problems of the inner cities.

Mr. Barnett: In allocating funds to specific projects, to what degree has the Minister followed the order of priorities set by the local authority which put those projects before him?

Sir George Young: Ministers usually honour the priorities that are set by local authorities. We recognise that they are in touch with the position to an extent that Ministers cannot be. Having said that, we have made our overall priorities for the urban programme clear in terms of the balance between economic, social and environmental projects, and in order to secure that national balance we occasionally have to re-order the priorities of individual local authorities.

Mr. Holt: When will my hon. Friend review the urban programme to embrace those void areas which are currently covered by the urban programme, not by the rural programme? Towns such as Lofthouse and Skelton in my constituency are in grave need of some urban or rural renewal, or renewal of whatever type my hon. Friend would like to give them, in order to improve the environment, yet they are excluded. When will the Government take action on that?

Sir George Young: I understand my hon. Friend's concern that his constituency should have access to as much money as possible. In due course we shall be reviewing the designation of districts under the urban programme, and I have noted my hon. Friend's bid.

Mr. John Fraser: Will the Minister recognise the contradiction that out of nine partnership authorities last year, six were penalised, and in two authorities, for about every £2 paid in inner city partnership grants £3 was taken away in penalties? Will the Minister accede to the request of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and disregard for penalty purposes the contribution that local authorities make towards inner city partnership programmes?

Sir George Young: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government have to consider any application for disregard that is made by local authorities. If such an application is made, it will be considered, but there is no reason to exempt local authorities in the inner city areas from the search for economy and efficiency which the Government expect all local authorities to try to make.

High Technology Site, Bickenhill

2. Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to reject any planning appeals, involving the proposed high technology site in Bickenhill, until the Marston Green and Bickenhill district plan is determined.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nell Macfarlane): No, Sir. The draft status of a local plan is not in itself a reason for the rejection of planning appeals. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consider any such appeals on their merits.

Mr. Mills: Does my hon. Friend realise that his answer will give rise to great concern among my constituents, who consider the pace of applications for that small 140-acre site of green belt, if not illegal, certainly immoral? Is he aware of the legitimate interest of the national exhibition centre in considering development in the area—a most important asset for Birmingham? Will he consider waiting for the determination of the structure plan and the Marston Green and Bickenhill district plan before allowing those applications to proceed?

Mr. Macfarlane: I note my hon. Friend's comments, and I am well aware of the strength of local feeling in his and neighbouring constituencies which are concerned about development. He has led delegations and has made his views well known on his constituents' behalf. There is a presumption against development in the green belts. Such development will be permitted only in exceptional circumstances. We have to take many steps over the next few weeks. I made it clear earlier this year that the proposal, with careful and sensitive planning, will be economically beneficial to the region as a whole, without being prejudicial to the objectives of green belt policy.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Is my hon. Friend aware of the wider anxiety in Solihull about the pace of change and scale of development? Is he aware of the suspicion that the inner urban areas might have a greater need for the resources involved?

Mr. Macfarlane: I am well aware of that. All such issues are taken into account before my right hon. Friend reaches a decision.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister aware that many of us cannot afford to turn down high technology parks? If the Minister has any trouble allocating such parks, why does he not just send them north, because we shall welcome them at any time? Is the Minister aware that my constituency has the space for a high technology park?

Mr. Macfarlane: I note what the hon. Gentleman says.

Rating

3. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received advocating the abolition of the present rating system.

7. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received on the reform of the rating system.

8. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has recently received on the reform of the rating system.

19. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received on the reform of local government finance since 10 October 1984.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): We continue to receive many representations advocating abolition or reform of the rating system.

Mr. Evans: Will the Secretary of State confirm that he has received representations from some highly placed persons in the Conservative party making the absurd suggestion that the present rating system should be replaced by a poll tax? Will he make it clear to those highly placed persons that, apart from the astronomical cost of collecting and policing a poll tax, the British people will decimate any political party that seeks to impose a tax on the right to vote?

Mr. Jenkin: I have read a number of imaginative press pieces about the studies that I announced last October. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that in our studies of the local government finance system we are examining alternative methods of raising revenue locally and that all options are open.

Mr. Knox: In view of the difficulty of finding a satisfactory alternative to the present rating system, is not the most sensible step to transfer the cost of teachers' salaries from the rates to central Government?

Mr. Jenkin: Many of the complaints which Ministers face at the Dispatch Box are about the increasing centralisation of control to Whitehall. It would be a major act of centralisation if the Department of Education and Science took over the payment of teachers' salaries or, indeed, any other part of the education budget which is currently borne by local authorities.

Mr. Heddle: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government, unlike the Liberal party, do not intend to impose the rates burden upon agricultural land, but that they intend to relieve the commercial and industrial ratepayer of the pernicious burden of vindictive and profligate Labour-controlled local authorities, by fixing the commercial rate centrally? Does my right hon. Friend agree that an element of a poll tax, without safeguards, is regressive in some respects and involves the practical difficulty of updating the electoral register twice a year?

Mr. Jenkin: I note carefully what my hon. Friend has said. Agriculture has been exempt from rating since the 1920s and we have no plans to bring it back into the rating system.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the Secretary of State accept that the injustices of the rating system are made worse because in Engand and Wales it is based on valuations that are 12 years out of date? Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that he made commitments to take urgent action on revaluation as long ago as August 1983? In view of the Government's unhappy experience in Scotland, do they still intend to continue with revaluation, or will they be looking for a much fairer system, such as local income tax?

Mr. Jenkin: I am aware of what the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The Government now take the view that there cannot be a revaluation in England and Wales without a reform of the system.

Mr. Fatchett: Are not the present problems with the rating system directly attributable to the massive cuts in rate support grant? Will we not find it impossible to come up with a fair system until the Government carry their responsibility and restore to local authorities the money that they have cut during the past six years and restore the level of support given by the last Labour Government in 1978-79?

Mr. Jenkin: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman chose that date, because he knows perfectly well that the last Labour Government reduced the proportion of expenditure by central Government from the level that it reached in 1976.

There is no preordained right for local authorities to have certain parts of their expenditure met by central Government. At the heart of the studies being undertaken by my hon. Friends is the restoration of full accountability by local authorities to those who pay for them and elect them. We are currently engaged in doing that.

Mr. Boyes: Does the Secretary of State recall that in 1982 the Select Committee on the Environment said that a poll tax should not be introduced under 'any circumstances? Therefore the right hon. Gentleman's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) was disappointing. Is it not clear that a poll tax is undemocratic because the flat rate could be set at a level which the poor and the unemployed could not afford, and that they therefore would not bother registering to vote? The people who support the right hon. Gentleman's party—the wealthy—could afford it and thus use their votes against the Labour party.

Mr. Jenkin: At every election which the Conservative party has won, it has had considerably more votes from those on the lower end of the scale than from those on the higher end——

Mr. Straw: There are more of them.

Mr. Jenkin: That is quite right.

On the question of raising revenue to finance local authority expenditure, the hon. Gentleman should recognise that it is an unsatisfactory system because in many parts of the country very few people pay towards the cost of local services, while so many enjoy them. It is that imbalance which seems wrong to us, and which any reform must right.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Is not the real problem with rates the fact that they are too high? Is that not at least partly because we are trying to finance too much public expenditure from rates? If that is so, rather than looking for alternative methods of raising local finance, would not the right answer be that suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox)—to consider transferring education expenditure, or at least expenditure on teachers' salaries, from local government to central Government?

Mr. Jenkin: I understand my right hon. and learned Friend's case, but what is wrong is that a tax that is property-based should now bear so much expenditure that is not property-related. There needs to be a wider tax base if local authorities are to be accountable to their local ratepayers. I do not believe that the answer to the problem is simply to centralise more spending in the Exchequer.

Dr. Cunningham: Are we to believe that local government finance is to suffer yet another fundamental change, decided in secret without proper public evidence and debate? Does the Secretary of State recall the recently published words of the Controller and Auditor General, who said that rates

"increases can therefore be attributed more to the reduction in the proportion of Government grant than to increases in local authority spending; and unless and until the level of central Government support is stabilised again it will be difficult for local electors to distinguish how far changes in rates should be attributed to the actions of the local authorities themselves."

Are we now to accept that the Government, having taxed water, energy and health, are about to tax votes also? Is that the prospect that the right hon. Gentleman is offering to the House? Does he not realise that the electors could fill a warehouse with broken Tory promises on rates?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman posed one serious query at the beginning of that supplementary question when he asked whether there was to be another fundamental review of local government finance.

Dr. Cunningham: In secret.

Mr. Jenkin: I shall come to that. There is widespread recognition of the need for a reform of local government finance. I hope the hon. Gentleman welcomes the fact that the studies that will lead to that are well under way. We shall publish our proposals in the form of a consultative paper and there will be ample opportunity for all those interested to put forward their views before there is any question of legislation being introduced.

4. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to be in a position to announce the outcome of the Government's review of the rating system.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I hope to be able to do so later this year.

Mr. Winnick: Considering the present defects in the rating system, is it not clear that the imposition of a poll tax would make the system far worse and would, in particular, penalise those on average and small incomes? Is it really proposed to have a poll tax in addition to the rating system? We appreciate that the Secretary of State is under great pressure from the Prime Minister. Will he inform her that the last occasion when a poll tax was introduced in this country led to the uprising of 1381? Is that not a good enough warning?

Mr. Jenkin: I was not about then. The concern in the country is very widespread because in recent years, often for the best of motives, a considerable gap has opened up between those who pay, those who receive and those who vote. That gap lies at the heart of the lack of accountability of local authorities to those who pay the bills and is greatly colouring the studies that we have undertaken. I ask the hon. Gentleman to await the outcome of those studies before jumping to conclusions.

Mr. Maude: Before my right hon. Friend announces the outcome of the review, will he bear in mind the crucial importance of ensuring that the cost of providing local services falls on all local people and that there should be no exemptions from and rebates of what I hope will be a residents charge introduced to replace rates?

Mr. Jenkin: I take note of my hon. Friend's views.

Mr. Freeson: Instead of undertaking another secretive review, why will the Government not just republish the Layfield report and make some conclusions based on that? Is it not a fact that a poll tax would need so many qualifications and exemptions that it would end up, as the Select Committee said in 1982, as a crude kind of local income tax, and that it would be far better to go fully down that road and introduce a properly worked out local income tax system?

Mr. Jenkin: The right hon. Gentleman's points are considerations which the Government are taking into account in the studies which we are undertaking. However, it must be recognised that there is widespread concern that many of those who benefit from local authority services contribute little or nothing towards them. That has undermined the principle of accountability in many areas, and we must address our minds to that.

Mr. Tracey: In conducting the review, will my right hon. Friend give proper weight to the views of business and industry in Britain, because that is where much of the rating burden falls? Will he take on board the views of the Institute of Directors, as a recent sample by the institute revealed wide support for a poll tax?

Mr. Jenkin: Nationally, over 60 per cent. of the revenue raised by local authorities comes from non-domestic ratepayers, two thirds of it from industry and commerce. In some areas the figure is significantly higher. That is another point which leads to a weakness in the accountability of local authorities to their ratepayers. Part of the studies that we are undertaking will consider ways of dealing with that problem.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Given the controversial nature of any report that results from this review, can the Secretary of State say whether the Government intend to put the proposals of himself and his colleagues to the country in the next election manifesto or whether they intend to legislate before then on a reform of the rating system?

Mr. Jenkin: We leave both options open.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Although all options are still open, will my right hon. Friend be cautious about further raising public expectations about a poll tax, which is less attractive the closer it is studied? Although the system needs to be radically reformed, does my right hon. Friend agree that this would not be best done by inventing further forms of taxation?

Mr. Jenkin: If reform were easy and painless, it would have been done years ago. Because of the widespread feeling that doing nothing is no longer an option, we need to examine all the possibilities to maintain and improve the system of local government finance in order to strengthen the health of local government as a whole.

Mr. Hardy: Has the Secretary of State studied the recommendations and conclusions of the Layfield report? Does he accept that the major change that has taken place since the Layfield report was published is that the share of local expenditure met by the Government has fallen dramatically? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that this is the major cause of the widespread concern to which he referred?

Mr. Jenkin: I do not necessarily accept that, because many authorities have been able to cope with a reduction in the percentage of grant by imposing modest rate increases because they have been able to find economies and make savings. The Layfield inquiry was conducted eight years ago, and events have moved on substantially since then. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not think it wrong for the Government to take a fresh look at the problem. The Layfield analysis is part of the evidence on which my hon. Friends are basing their studies.

Mr. Squire: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on achieving two out of three marks for discussions on public reports to date. Will he note that many of us support the transfer of non-domestic rate to the centre but recognise, as the Government appear to do, the need to create funding in addition to the present rating system? May I echo the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). The single central failing of a poll tax is that it cannot command the broad support which a fundamental reform of the rating system must have if it is to be introduced.

Mr. Jenkin: I note my hon. Friend's view. During our studies, all the options are being studied carefully. We shall come forward with our proposals in due course.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is not the Secretary of State getting rather fed up with being dropped in it from a great height by the Prime Minister over rating and the abolition of the GLC? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would like to tell us something about what happened in the other place yesterday. If the right hon. Gentleman is considering levying a poll tax, is he also considering making registration compulsory?

Mr. Jenkin: What happened yesterday in another place is not a matter that arises from this question. Obviously, if there is to be a reform of taxation, there must inevitably be laws to ensure that those liable to pay taxation do so. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman would expect it to be otherwise.

Mr. Colvin: May we take it that the Government are firmly committed to replacing not only domestic but commercial rates? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that an overriding principle of any alternative system would be the ability of those to be taxed to pay?

Mr. Jenkin: Our studies embrace the entire system of local government finance, not only revenue raising, but the relationships between central and local government. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that it would be wrong at this stage of these studies to rule out any of the options.

Dr. Cunningham: If the right hon. Gentleman wants to reform local finance, why does he not begin by abandoning the iniquitous system of targets and penalties which he and his predecessors have so unfairly enforced? Can the right hon. Gentleman name one country with a plural democratic society which actually uses a poll tax to raise local government finance? Does the right hon. Gentleman not recognise that the whole idea of taxing registrations to vote is abhorrent in a democratic society? May I tell the right hon. Gentleman and the House unequivocally that, if any such system were introduced, it would be abolished by the next Labour Government.

Mr. Jenkin: It is, I fear, typical of the Labour party that it promises to abolish things before it knows what they are. When one thinks of all the other things that it has promised—abolishing tax relief on mortgage payments, and putting capital gains tax on those who sell council houses—I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman is becoming confused.

Leicester (Rate Capping)

5. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has so far received from citizens of Leicester concerning the rate capping of Leicester city council.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): My right hon. Friend has received about 75 representations about the rate capping of Leicester city council from Leicester citizens.

Mr. Janner: Has the Minister also received this morning 26,000 further representations in a petition presented to his Department on behalf of the citizens of Leicester, most of whom helped to ensure that last week all Labour candidates in the city increased their majorities and votes? Does he not recognise that central Government interference in the affairs of the city is a direct denial of local democracy and is disliked by citizens, however they would normally vote?

Mr. Baker: It is highly unlikely that the citizens of Leicester dislike rate capping, because Leicester's rate has been cut by one third as a direct result. Last year Leicester received some £9·7 million of block grant. As a direct result of rate capping it will receive £12 million this year. In addition, its urban programme allocation, which I have approved, is £5·4 million this year.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my right hon. Friend take not the slightest notice of the petitions, which were phoney and deliberately whipped up by the scaremongering tactics and campaign of the Leicester Labour party, which spent £61,000 last year on an anti-rate capping campaign and which to date has allowed £150,000 for an anti-rate capping campaign? Does he accept that in Leicester people want to be rate capped and that the Conservative vote, in fact, held up?

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for his support. I am sure that the citizens of Leicester object to the use of ratepayers' money for political propaganda because of the way that it has been manipulated. On rate capping in general, I was glad to see that last night Sheffield city council at last faced reality and, against the advice of its leader, set a rate within the limit set by the House—[HON. MEMBERS: "Order."] — and rejected a deficit budget. I only hope that the remaining——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question was about Leicester.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Watts Committee (Water Metering)

6. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he received the report of the Watts committee on domestic water metering; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): I hope to receive the report before the end of next month. Thereafter I will make a statement. I have read my hon. Friend's pamphlet "A fair deal for water" which is an excellent contribution to the debate.

Mr. Freeman: Is my hon. Friend aware that the cause of metering will be greatly served by the privatisation of water authorities, and that there is widespread support for that move on the Conservative Benches? In the meantime, will he encourage water authorities to introduce more extensive metering trials?

Mr. Gow: On the second part of my hon. Friend's question, he will be aware that at present all water authorities offer the option of metering to all their customers. With regard to the first part of his question, he will be aware that the Government are examining the possibility of the privatisation of the water authorities and, under the lead of the Watts committee, the possibility of wider water metering.

Mr. O'Brien: Before the Minister makes any statement on the wholesale metering of water throughout the country, will he have regard to the fact that there are few democratically elected members on water authorities? Will he ensure that the water authorities are more democratic before he makes such a statement?

Mr. Gow: We have more streamlined and efficient water authorities today than ever before. On the issue of metering, I commend to the hon. Member the pamphlet of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), which, priced at £1·25, is extremely good value and a great deal better than the pamphlet written by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), who advocated that the gain someone makes on his house should be subject to tax.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my hon. Friend accept, since in the way that the system operates at present there is no advantage in going for metering if one is on an average sort of rate, that there is a great deal of resentment, especially among single householders and the elderly, who get no concession or recognition for the fact that they use the service very little and are charged precisely the same as those who use it a great deal? Will he ensure that that vice is taken out of the system?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend is right. There is a widespread view that the present system of charging on the basis of rateable value is not fair. This has been considered in the past, but we are looking at it again. We shall certainly bear in mind the point that my hon. Friend rightly makes.

Mr. Rooker: The Minister applauds the pamphlet of his hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman). Does he agree with his hon. Friend when he rules out a poll tax on water? Does he further agree with his hon. Friend's assertion in the pamphlet that the price mechanism ought to be the overriding factor in consumer demand? Is this what the Prime Minister really means by a classless society, when there is a differential on the use of water according to ability to pay?

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman is creating a certain amount of advance and synthetic indignation about this. I was commending to the House, and, indeed, Mr. Speaker, I commend to you, the excellent pamphlet written by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman). [HON. MEMBERS: "Has the hon. Gentleman read it?"] Of course I have read it. Courtesy among colleagues is something not widely understood by Opposition Members. My hon. Friend was kind enough to send me an advance copy, as he will confirm, and I am grateful to him. I hope that today's exchanges will mean that the pamphlet is read even more widely. I hope that the Conservative Political Centre, which published it, will receive some more funds for its needs in the future.

Olympic Games

9. Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any recent application from United Kingdom cities wishing to host future Olympic Games.

Mr. Macfarlane: No, Sir. It is for the British Olympic Association to consider applications from United Kingdom cities wishing to host the games.

Mr. Pendry: While recognising that this is principally a matter for the British Olympic Association, but recognising equally that three cities are bidding for the 1992 Olympic Games, may I ask the hon. Gentleman to say that if the British Olympic Association considers one of those applicants worthy he will today commit not only moral but financial support to that city so that it can meet the high Olympic standards?

Mr. Macfarlane: It is premature to anticipate any such argument. The British Olympic Association has many issues to consider over the next few months. Technically, it has until August to decide whether to sponsor a host city when it goes to the IOC later this summer.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not a fact that when the Olympic Games were last held in the United Kingdom, at Wembley, they created many jobs, with the rebuilding of Wembley Park station, the railway bridge, Olympia Way to Wembley, and so on? Is it not right that, when we have a city such as Manchester, which has much open land and space left by declining industries such as the textile industry, we should replace those jobs by petitioning the British Olympic Association to place the Olympic Games in the United Kingdom in Manchester?

Mr. Macfarlane: I am sure that the chairman of the British Olympic Association, by this time tomorrow, will be fully aware of the force of my hon. Friend's argument.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware of the great success of the national railway museum at York and the national museum of photography at Bradford? Is it not a peculiar form of arrogance to believe that any national facility must be based in London? Will he support the application to stage the Olympic Games in the north of England rather than automatically assuming that a national facility be sited in London?

Mr. Macfarlane: While I would be the first to applaud some of those centres, I certainly do not consider that the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's argument is an assumption which anybody else would follow.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend give an undertaking that, while the Government will do everything to encourage the Olympic Games to come to the United Kingdom, there will be no need for taxpayers' money to be used for this purpose, following the excellent example of the United States Los Angeles Games, which actually made a profit?

Mr. Macfarlane: While applauding the latter part of my hon. Friend's philosophy, I must point out that it is up to the British Olympic Association to decide whether to put this forward to the next IOC.

Mr. Ewing: Will the Minister not be so dismissive of the idea of attracting the 1992 Olympics to the United Kingdom? As taxpayers' money was required to attract the 1966 World Cup, does he accept that we shall certainly require some taxpayers' money to attract the 1992 Olympics? To avoid this inter-city competition, will the Minister learn from the experience of the Los Angeles Olympics, where some of the events were held 500 and 600 miles from the main centre, and choose a collection of cities, two of which should be in Scotland — Edinburgh and Glasgow — in which to stage the Olympics?

Mr. Macfarlane: I must point out that I do not accept the opening part of the hon. Gentleman's philosophy. There are many ways in which funds can be raised. I do not accept that the Olympic Games should be held at the taxpayers' expense. In Los Angeles, the matches were staged not 500 or 600 miles apart, but no more than 200 miles from the centre of the city.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister agree that if an application made by London for the 1992 Olympic Games were accepted, and if Government plans were carried out, London would be the only city contending for the Olympics which had no unitary local authority to respond to such a decision and to ensure that the games were properly administered and run?

Mr. Macfarlane: The last time the games were held in this country they were held in London, and they were bid for by the Lord Mayor of London.

Mr. Maclean: Will my hon. Friend suggest to the Olympic committee that it inaugurates a new competition and prize for hon. Members wanting the most taxpayers' money to take the games to their constituencies?

Mr. Macfarlane: I take note of what my hon. Friend says. I am certain that the British Olympic Association will take note of all the points made today.

Mr. Denis Howell: Does the Minister appreciate that the bid for the Olympics will be taken seriously only if it is proved to to be financially feasible? Therefore, when the choice is being made by the British Olympic Association, will the Minister please make an assessment of the cost involved—both the private cost for running the games and the public cost for the infrastructure? Does he understand that unless that is done, the entire matter will be regarded as a charade?

Mr. Macfarlane: Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, I have every confidence in the BOC. It is perfectly capable of making feasibility studies in conjunction with the cities.

Textile Closure Areas (Aid)

10. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much European regional development fund non-quota aid for textile closure areas available for infrastructure investment has been spent so far; and how much he anticipates will be spent in 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The proposals for £60 million worth of aid during the next five years were approved by the Commission in January. My Department is responsible for £21 million of that, and we are still examining the applications made by various qualifying authorities.

Mr. Galley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be a shocking waste if that £21 million were lost to the textile closure areas? Will he undertake to monitor the position in conjunction with the local authorities involved to ensure that that money is spent sensibly and fully within the four-year period?

Mr. Baker: I fully support what my hon. Friend has said, and I am sure that it meets with agreement on both sides of the House. It would be helpful for some textile areas where the textile industry is rundown to apply for this aid, which is primarily used for the conversion of old textile mills into smaller units for enterprise workshops and so on.

Mr. Wainwright: Is the Minister aware that almost a year of the time allotted by the European Community for spending this money has past fruitlessly? Where local authority schemes are produced in textile closure areas, will he undertake that the use of the EC money will not be frustrated by his rate capping or other limitations on local authority spending?

Mr. Baker: In reply to the hon. Gentleman's first point, the Commission approved the money only in January 1985, and we saw the applications in February, March and April. I assure him that we are processing them as quickly as we can.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend accept that some excellent schemes have been put forward in the north-west, not least by my city of Lancaster? Does he appreciate that it is extremely important to get the money on the ground as early as possible? We want to beat unemployment now.

Mr. Baker: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I cannot comment on individual schemes, as we are still assessing them in the Department. I accept the pressures from both sides of the House to get on with the matter and approve the schemes.

Mr. Straw: Is the Minister aware that the Silberston report has predicted that even if the multi-fibre arrangement is approved, a further 156,000 jobs could be lost in the textile areas during the next five years? Does he accept that, against that background, the expenditure of only £60 million to meet the social and economic consequences of closures is peanuts? What efforts is the Minister making to increase the resources available to those hard-pressed areas?

Mr. Baker: I cannot comment on the outcome of the MFA discussions and the possible continuation of the scheme, because that is the responsibility of another Department. However, I accept entirely what the hon. Gentleman said. There has been a rundown in the industry. This contribution will help. Other schemes in the urban programme help his constituency and others across the country, and, of course, the Department of Trade and Industry has some programmes.

Nature Conservancy Council

11. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to extend the funding of the Nature Conservancy Council.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): The NCC's grant-in-aid has been increased from £18·1 million in 1984-85 to £22·7 million in 1985-86. Requirements for future years will be considered in the light of the NCC's corporate plan.

Mr. Kirkwood: Those increases are welcome so far as they go, but if it becomes clear that the NCC is unable to complete the renotification of sites of special scientific interest by the end of calendar year 1986, will the Minister consider providing extra funds for that? Does he accept that the new responsibilities visited on the council after 1 April this year, in terms of the farms structure and regulations that encourage farmers to leave intensive farming, have put an additional burden on the NCC? If that proves to be a problem, will he produce extra finance to enable that programme to proceed smoothly?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support. We increased the Nature Conservancy Council's funding by 36 per cent. between 1983-84 and 1984-85, and by 25 per cent. in the next year. I am happy to be able to tell him that the NCC recently confirmed that it could bring forward the substantial completion of the SSSI programme from 1987 to the end of 1986, which is a satisfactory outcome in response to the additional money that it has received.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend accept that the Government deserve credit for increasing the funds of the NCC so substantially? However, does he also accept that the NCC now has the capacity to deal with the vexed problem of marine nature reserves? Does he agree that we must set up the first marine nature reserve without delay, and that, if we wish the voluntary principle to survive, we have no excuse for failing to do so?

Mr. Waldegrave: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's remarks. During our debates on the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), I made it clear that if there is no measurable progress on marine nature reserves within the next 12 to 18 months the Government will wish to reconsider the matter.

Mr. Dalyell: What does the Minister mean by "measurable progress"?

Mr. Waldegrave: If we have not achieved an agreement to have a marine nature reserve during the next 12 to 18 months, I would regard that as sufficient evidence to cause us to reconsider the law.

Mr. Soames: Will my hon. Friend do more to persuade the NCC to explain the excellent work that it does to a wider public? Is it not important that it has the support of the broader constituency?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is right, and the support that the NCC is increasingly obtaining from the farming community is important in enabling it to achieve that end.

Mr. Weetch: Would it not be a sound idea to establish strong funding so that emergency action could be taken if an area recommended as an SSSI were threatened by unnecessary and ill-thought-out commercial expansion? Does the Minister realise that such an area in the Orwell estuary is already threatened? Has the NCC made any recommendations to his Department, and, if so, what is his response?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about the Orwell estuary. With all-party support, the House moved to block the three-month loophole, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State showed himself ready to move quickly to make conservation orders where necessary.

Mr. Key: Although we are all grateful for the increase in NCC funds, does my hon. Friend accept that there is an increasingly fine line between the establishment of SSSIs and other sites of special interest, which may be more archaeological than agricultural? Does he agree that additional funding may be necessary from other sources, for instance, to save some of the finest water meadows in Britain — an example of which is at Britford near Salisbury—some of which have already been ploughed up?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right to say that we must not make the mistake of concentrating only on SSSIs. However, it is open to local authorities to make management agreements for sites of the sort to which my hon. Friend refers.

Dr. David Clark: In order to publicise the work of the NCC, will the Minister consider making its papers available to hon. Members? In view of the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) about the draining of wetlands, is the hon. Gentleman aware that a soil survey has shown that pH has fallen to as low as 2·5? Will he therefore be prepared to increase the funding of the NCC and ask it to undertake a full comprehensive soil survey of the East Anglia area in particular?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's latter suggestion. A great deal of other work is going on into the sources of changing acidification in water. I shall certainly consider that suggestion as well as the other one that he made.

Water Supplies (Nitrates)

12. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has yet made a decision on the applications from water authorities to seek exemption from the regulations limiting the content of nitrates in public water supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be announcing decisions soon.

Mr. Taylor: In considering those applications, will the Minister make it clear that the Government are not giving up the battle to curb nitrate levels, which are regarded by many other Governments as a serious health hazard? Will his Department be willing to initiate action to curb the horrendous use of nitrates in intensive farming, which serves simply to produce more cereals which cannot be disposed of, and pollutes public water supplies throughout the country?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to what is potentially a serious problem. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has recently published a code of practice about the application of nitrogenous fertilisers. We hope that it will have the desired effect.

Viscount Cranborne: Is my hon. Friend aware of the valuable research into the effects of nitrates on the water supply conducted in particular by the Freshwater Biological Association in my constituency? Is he further aware that the cut in grant that that association now faces is likely to affect dramatically the salutary results that are being obtained from that study?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is a matter for the Department of Education and Science and the research councils, but the general principle, that the National Environmental Research Council is trying to move more of its research into the universities, is one which most people support.

Housing Stock

13. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of pre-war council houses awaiting modernisation included in those designated difficult to let in local authorities' housing investment programme submissions for 1985-86.

Sir George Young: The information is not available.

Mr. Pike: Is it not time that the Minister found out just how many thousands of houses in this country are urgently awaiting modernisation, and are difficult to let, including many in my constituency? The problem is that the Government give insufficient HIP allocation and have reduced the amount of capital receipts that councils can spend. Because the burden of improving council houses is forced on to rents or rates, or a combination of the two, does the Minister accept that all those facts show that the Government's housing financial policies are a disaster and that they should be prepared to make a change?

Sir George Young: I would not accept that for one moment. The Department depends on the local authorities for the information that it gets on the housing stock. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, there is a problem with the stock that was built between the wars, not least because when restraints on public expenditure were less strict Burnley failed to take effective action to safeguard the condition of its stock. However, in the forthcoming allocation we shall take into account the problems facing housing in Burnley.

Mr. Malone: Does my hon. Friend agree that housing improvement, whether in the public or the private sector, is an activity that creates substantial employment opportunities at a relatively low net cost to the Treasury? Does my hon. Friend therefore agree that it would be extraordinary for us to reduce the funds available to support that activity to achieve gross savings regardless of the net effect on Government expenditure?

Sir George Young: I am sure that my hon. Friend will be pleased to know that the amount of public money spent on improvement grants has gone up by some £90 million since we came into office, to about £700 million for the year that has just passed. Tomorrow we hope to publish a Green Paper on our proposals for improvement policy.

Mr. Tom Clarke: When the informatin becomes available, will the Minister assure the House that he sees a relationship between the lack of response to the scheme for the modernisation of pre-war houses and the large number of bankruptcies among small firms perfectly capable of doing that work? Is it not the case that the inadequacies of Government finance have added workers to the dole queues?

Sir George Young: The hon. Member must try to keep this in perspective. For every £1 of public money that goes into the improvement and conversion of houses, £20 comes from the private sector. Therefore, it is important to pursue policies to ensure that the £20 is available rather than concentrating on the £1.

Audit Commission (Report)

14. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Audit Commission's report on captial spending.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I welcome the report. The commission has drawn attention to flaws in the present system which the Government had already identified and which led us to review the system in consultation with local government. The report will make a useful contribution to this work.

Mr. Wainwright: Does the report not substantiate and amplify in the most authoritative and independent way the criticisms by the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service in each of the last four years, of the Government's persistent mismanagement of public capital expenditure? Does the Secretary of State not realise the urgency of this matter, when skilled people are idle, plant is underused and people are suffering from the inadequacies of the built environment?

Mr. Jenkin: I recognise the urgency to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I have had a series of meetings with local authority associations and officials and I hope to write shortly to the associations or to have a meeting at member level to discuss the options that the investigations have shown up. We shall then have to reach decisions as soon as possible.

Mr. Latham: Is it not clear that the present system does not work? As my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction announced that this would be reviewed when he introduced the capital receipts reduction orders in the House, will my right hon. Friend assure us that a new system will be in place by the next financial year?

Mr. Jenkin: Nobody knows better than my hon. Friend the great complexity of trying to reconcile the two objectives that have been shared by all Governments: first, the Treasury's reasonable measure of control over total public expenditure, including local authority capital expenditure and secondly, giving local authorities time horizons and certainty and flexibility so that they can plan their programmes sensibly. These are complex matters, but I hope that we shall reach decisions soon.

Bates Colliery (Closure)

3.31 pm

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration namely,

"the peremptory announcement of the closure of Bates colliery in Blyth yesterday by the National Coal Board."

The area director of the north-eastern area of the NCB yesterday informed officials of the NUM, in breach of all previous undertakings made by him, that Bates colliery in Blyth, which employs over 1,700 men, was to close immediately. This pit has a good record on productivity and industrial relations and high quality coal. By closing it, the Government are cold-bloodedly murdering the surrounding town of Blyth, whose economy depends entirely on the pit.

The area director of the NCB acted on the instructions of Mr. MacGregor, the chairman, and the Secretary of State for Energy, who poses in the Cabinet as a Left-wing fop, but who is instructing the NCB to carry out a murderous programme of pit closures. He has been guilty of the most serious negligence and misconduct, because only last year £2 million was invested in the pit, but it is now proposed to close it immediately, notwithstanding that recent substantial investment.

The Secretary of State was asked to reconsider the matter and yesterday the area director of the NCB said that the existing review procedure had been bypassed and that no attention had been paid to the existing review procedure. The matter is not negotiable. No consultations will take place, and the men at Bates pit can take it or leave it.

I am conscious, Mr. Speaker, that I have to satisfy you on the correct criteria for succeeding in such applications and to persuade you that the matter is so urgent that it should have priority over today's business. I submit strongly that, it should, in view of the widespread repercussions of the closure of this coal mine, a closure which delberately ignores the existing review procedure. There are 29 million tonnes on unworked but workable coal in the pit of high quality and the matter is of such grave importance that it should be debated today.

In my respectful submission, the Secretary of State for Energy has been guilty of fraud and negligence and various other forms of reprehensible misconduct involving moral turpitude, and I respectfully submit that the matter is so urgent that it should have priority over all the other business today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the closure of Bates colliery in Blyth, Northumberland, as announced by the NCB yesterday."

As the hon. Gentleman has said, I have to decide whether to give the matter precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. I have listened with care to what he has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

District Auditor (Islington)

3.35 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the threat to Islington council's jobs and services by the presence of the district auditor in the town hall this morning."

I make this application because in the borough of Islington, as in the rest of the country, we have a democratically elected council and a local authority which is attempting to keep faith with the people who elected it and to maintain jobs and services. Islington council, like various other councils, has been subjected to a process of selective vindictiveness by the Government since 1979 and more than £40 million of rate support grant has been taken from the borough. Earlier this year, the Secretary of State for the Environment announced that Islington council, in common with the other poorest parts of the country, was to be rate-capped and to lose grant and that the Secretary of State would control its spending levels. Since then, in common with others and as part of its campaign to get central Government funds back, Islington borough council has not set a rate.

The matter is urgent because the district auditor—not the Secretary of State for the Environment, who is the real villain and the person who wishes to destroy the jobs and services, but a Government agent—arrived at the town hall this morning to threaten local councillors with court proceedings if they did not set a rate in the near future.

The matter is important because the council has the support of the population of Islington. More than 2,000 people turned up at the town hall this morning to express their views, and the work force feels likewise. It is also urgent because there is a danger that the Government's policies will seek to criminalise councillors in Islington and elsewhere merely for keeping faith with the manifestos on which they were elected.

It is urgent that the matter be debated in the House so that the Secretary of State can explain why he takes that attitude towards Islington and the other poorest parts of the country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the threat to Islington council's jobs and services by the presence of the district auditor in the town hall this morning."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Members' Interests

3.38 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order relates to applications to move Second Readings of Private Members' Bills, objections to those Bills, the right of Members to know of commercial manipulation of House affairs and the implications for Members' interests. It does not relate to any particular case of an individual's registration, as that would be a matter for the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

As the House knows, when a Member who is sponsored by a trade union or who acts as an adviser, consultant or director and is remunerated for that speaks in the House, he will make a declaration of interest in the Register and, traditionally, on the Floor of the House. The rules are clearly set out in paragraph 292(3) of the "Manual of Procedure", which states:

"A declaration should be made where appropriate at the beginning of most oral interventions in proceedings. This covers participation in debate in the House or in standing committee and at meetings of select committees".

This matter was raised with you last year several times, particularly when you ruled on my point of order about whether a declaration should be made before asking a supplementary question. You ruled:

"Looking again at the point you raised in the House after my ruling given on Monday 30 January 1984—namely, whether from the standpoint of declaring an interest, the answer to a question should be distinguished from the question itself—I have concluded that this matter would be best considered in the first instance by the Select Committee on Members' Interests and that you ought properly to raise it with them." — [Official Report, 9 February 1984; Vol. 53, c. 1039.]

I mention that because I am trying to establish whether there is a precedent for ruling in relation to these matters.

The position is now quite clear. The briefest of interventions constitutes an oral intervention for the purposes of paragraph 292(3). On 9 December last year, in column 645, the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) brought forward her Road Traffic (Driving Instruction) Bill. It was objected to. It was again brought forward on 16 December, reported in column 1360 and on 20 January in column 607. On each occasion it was objected to, and on all occasions by members of the alliance.

Both Government and Opposition had agreed to allow the measure to go through on the nod, as it was about raising driving instruction standards. Despite obstruction from alliance Members, the Bill only cleared the House on the fourth attempt, on 27 January, when alliance Members arrived too late to object——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should make a point of order to me, and should not go over old history which we know.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This is absolutely crucial to my point of order, Mr. Speaker, as you will see as I develop it.

Having cleared the House of Commons, the Bill went to the other place. On 2 April, at the request of Lord Tordoff, the Liberal Chief Whip in the House of Lords, the House went into Committee to deal with one amendment, which would have curtailed the activities—[Interruption.] I am being barracked by Liberal Members. The amendment would have curtailed the activities of some driving instructors.

Lord Tordoff said:

"there is here a problem which is widely felt among the driving schools, particularly the larger ones". — [Official Report, House of Lords, 2 April 1984; Vol. 450, c. 486.]

He then referred to the British School of Motoring, which would have been a financial beneficiary had the amendment been accepted. It was by now clear that with alliance support in the House of Commons in the form of the use of the word "Object", and Lord Tordoff's speech in the other place—an oral intervention, by the way—a successful attempt had been made to extract concessions from the Government effectively to protect the position of the British School of Motoring.

We all know that Members speak up for outside interests in our debates. That is not unprecedented. Trade unions lobby Members of Parliament to raise issues, as do commercial undertakings. But on this occasion there is a distinct difference. When COHSE, the Confederation of Health Service Employees, sponsors me, from which I receive no personal remuneration but a contribution to my constituency party funds, and which at election time is worth approximately £1,300 a year towards my election expenses——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a speech rather than a point of order. I think that I have got the drift of what he is trying to say.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have nearly finished, Mr. Speaker. In my case, that is registered in the Register of Members' Interests. Likewise, if a Conservative Member acts as a consultant director or adviser to a commercial undertaking, he similarly declares an interest. But when Liberal Members of Parliament receive on behalf of their party part of £188,000—a contribution from the British School of Motoring—and in return obstruct a Bill in the House of Commons and try to move amendments to it in the other place, not one of them has the decency to declare that to the House.

What is the difference? My sponsorship goes to my party. The Liberals' £188,000 goes to their party. A proportion of the £188,000 is spent upon promoting alliance candidates at general elections. They are, therefore, effectively sponsored. That is in addition to the use of aeroplanes by the Liberal party leader from the same source. Furthermore, Mr. Anthony Jacobs, the chairman of the British School of Motoring, when asked to comment said:

"There is nothing I wish to influence. There is nothing really to influence. You can't influence the Liberal party."

The truth is that Mr. Jacobs has effectively bought the alliance.

My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that in the same way as in column 1039 on 9 February 1984 you were willing to conclude "that this matter would best be considered in the first instance by the Select Committee on Members Interests" — [Official Report, 9 February 1984; Vol. 53, c. 1039.]

I ask you to do the same on this occasion.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I rule on the matter, I must hear the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

Mr. Beith: Is it not an abuse of the points of order procedure to attack the personal integrity of hon. Members by way of a point of order rather than by way of a substantive motion?

Secondly, is it not a curious omission from the long account of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that he did not mention that the amendment pursued by the alliance received fulsome support from the Front Bench of the Labour party when it was pursued in the House of Lords and that it was designed to make the Bill more effective?

Finally, had any hon. Member risen in his place on any of the occasions when the Bill was brought before the House with the promoter's intention that it should proceed without any discussion and sought to declare any personal interest, if he had one, in the matter, would not that have constituted debate arising on the matter and would it not by itself—[Interruption.]

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to allow a debate on this matter. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised a point of order at considerable length. I thought it only fair to allow the Liberal Chief Whip to respond.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Workington kindly sent me a note when I had mumps saying that he would not raise a point of order with me until he felt that I was fit enough to deal with it. Therefore, I am all the more sorry that the point he has raised is not a matter for me. The rules of the House with which I am concerned apply to the declaration of pecuniary interests by individual Members, not by political parties. The hon. Member must seek other ways to pursue his complaint. The hon. Member mentioned my last piece of advice to him when he raised a point of order of a similar kind. Since he is a Member of the Select Committee on Members' Interests, that is the place where he should raise it.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Your ruling means that those hon. Members who are sponsored by a trade union, as I am sponsored by the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers but who receive no personal remuneration from that sponsorship need not declare it.

Mr. Speaker: I did not say that. I repeat to the hon. Member what I said: that I am concerned with the declaration of pecuniary interests by individual Members, not by political parties.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I share with the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) membership of the Select Committee on Members' Interests, although I did not know that he intended to raise this matter. There is a specific point here which, as you rightly say, might be raised in our Committee, but may I suggest that the simplest way to deal with it would be for the leader of the Liberal party—his party's hypocrisy on these matters is well known in the House if not always outside—to come to the House and make a statement saying that no letters had passed or conversations had taken place between Mr. Jacobs and his representatives on the Bill?

Mr. Speaker: That is a legitimate matter for debate; it is not a point of order for me.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I will take one further point of order from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. Skinner: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is somewhat different, yet it is associated with the initial point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). Since I raised the matter last week, I have received an important letter and I need some advice from you on the appropriate place to raise the matter. The letter is from a driving school, and says:

"I am writing to thank you for bringing to light the scandal involving BSM and the Liberal party. It has long been common knowledge within this profession that BSM have extremely low standards of tuition, poorly paid and under-qualified"——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am responsible for lots of things, but not for that.

Mr. Skinner: I shall just finish the sentence.

"Unfortunately,"—

this is the point—

"their use of 'British' in their trading title has enabled them to continue in business over the years, but their performance does not live up to the promise of the name."

I have another letter from Yorkshire making the same point.

If that is the case, there was every reason to tighten up driving school standards, and from what I can gather, the Liberals were doing their level best to stop it.

Would the matter be better dealt with by the Select Committee suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington or by the Select Committee on Transport, so that we can unearth the scandal and find out the exact link between the sponsored Liberal Members of Parliament and the British School of Motoring and how much money they really have made over the years?

Mr. Speaker: Order. None of that is a matter for me. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should study the proceedings of the Bill which I understand passed all its stages in both Houses.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it another point of order?

Mr. Fatchett: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Another point of order.

Mr. Fatchett: I want to raise with you, Sir, the status of the Register of Members' Interests, because it appears to me that those of us who now disclose the fact that our constituency parties are sponsored by trade unions are placed at a public disadvantage. For instance, a Liberal Member of Parliament from an adjoining constituency need not declare that he is sponsored, but I have to declare my interests for the Register of Members' Interests. I have to declare that interest when I take part in debates in the House, but somebody from an adjoining constituency does not have to declare such an interest. The only remedy left to me as a Member who has declared his interests is to withdraw my name from the Register of Members' Interests because those of us who are sponsored by trade unions will now have to declare that while other Members do not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has raised exactly the same point of order as his hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). It has always been the case that Members declare their personal interests; it has never previously been the case that parties declare any funds that may come from outside the House, from whatever source. If the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about that, he should consult the Registrar of Members' Interests. He will tell him.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall only take a different point of order.

Mr. Corbyn: I want to ask you something, Mr. Speaker, about your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Corbyn: I listened carefully to what you said about the Liberal party receiving funds, but what is not clear from your ruling is whether, if the Liberal party receives money from the British School of Motoring—money which is passed to individual Liberal Members of Parliament—they then fall within the category of those who receive outside sponsorship. If that is the case, what they raised during the debate should fall within the purview of your questioning.

Mr. Speaker: That is a purely hypothetical matter.

Licensing Acts (Amendment)

3.55 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the licensing Acts for England and Wales to permit longer and flexible opening hours.

I shall try to keep my speech shorter than that by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on his point of order.

Today the country celebrates the 40th anniversary of the ending of the war in Europe. A great deal has changed since 8 May 1945, but some things remain much the same. After listening to the formal announcement of victory on the Home service at 3 o'clock in the afternoon 40 years ago, a man might have been moved to go out and celebrate that great event. If at the conclusion of that broadcast he had visited his local public house he would have been told, "I am sorry Sir, we are closed." The man would have been worldly wise and used to the vagaries of our licensing laws and he would not even have bothered to make the journey.

Today, 40 years on, the situation is much the same. The fundamental difference in England and Wales is that that same old soldier, moved by nostalgia, can now cross the road from his public house to the off-licence advertising "Ice cold beer sold here" and buy his cans of beer. He can then sit on the steps of his public house and provided that he does not obstruct the pedestrian highway, cause a nuisance or loiter, he can drink his beer with impunity.

The law that drives that man to that ludicrous, undignified necessity is the relic of an earlier war. It is the result of a pledge, dishonoured by this House, which instead of repealing the Defence of the Realm Act which was passed to prevent munitions workers from getting drunk in 1915, took DORA—as that Act is less than affectionately known—and distilled her, first as the Licensing Act 1921 and subsequently as the Licensing Acts of 1961 and 1964.

I seek to introduce a Bill to amend those antiquated wartime measures which are in force in England and Wales. I propose that, with the consent of the licensing justices, the licensee of a public house shall be permitted to open, by prior determination, for any 12 of the 14 hours between 10 am and midnight. I propose that the opening hours be published outside the public house for the information of the general public and, of course, of the police. I propose that a minimum number of hours a year be laid down during which a public house shall be open to the public. Such a minimum number will permit the publican, as of right, to close for such hours of the day, days of the week, weeks of the month or even months of the year when in his commercial judgment there is insufficient trade to justify his opening. Those closing times shall also be published and made available.

The Bill will be supported by many hon. Members who have taken a keen interest in the growth of our tourist industry. Perhaps rightly, that industry is regarded as the greatest industrial success story of our time. Tourism is a growing industry which is worth millions of dollars and many thousands of jobs to the British Isles. Those who seek to promote that industry—the tourist boards of England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, Government Departments and the trade itself—bear much of the responsibility and must therefore take much of the credit for its continuing and growing success.

[Mr. Roger Gale]

This season it is expected that for financial and other reasons more foreign tourists will visit these shores than ever before and that more domestic holidaymakers will stay at home. There is, therefore, a tremendous opportunity to consolidate a market. We should not lightly throw away that opportunity.

More work must still be done. We must improve the standards of our hotels, restaurants and guest houses and introduce a voluntary registration scheme which allows a visitor quickly to recognise the standards. We must guarantee real value for money and promote facilities, attractions and our heritage. All these matters are for the industry to tackle, with Government backing.

This House can also help. Today I ask hon. Members for leave to introduce one small measure to help us to put out the welcome mat in time for this summer season, so that the hitherto perplexed foreign visitor and domestic holidaymaker can buy an alcoholic drink in the cool of an English pub in the heat of a summer afternoon in Britain, as they can almost anywhere else in the civilised world.

This House has much pressing and important business before it this afternoon, and I do not want to rehearse any of the arguments that more properly belong to a Second Reading debate. However, it would be wrong of me to promote this measure without indicating my awareness of and respect for the concern shown by those in the House who have consistently opposed the introduction of longer and more flexible licensing hours.

Before my election to this House, I studied for the preparation of a television programme on alcoholism and problem drinking, especially among the young — [Interruption.] I said that much in the House had not changed in 40 years and our licensing laws are undoubtedly part of that. I suspect that in 40 years the same Opposition Members will be heckling from the same Opposition Benches.

As part of my research I was privileged to undergo a 12-week training course with the ACCEPT organisation on what it called sensible drinking skills. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may find cause for levity in that, but the purpose of that organisation's presence in this country is to try to prevent people, especially young people and those with severe alcohol problems, from drinking too much.

I repeat that I am therefore aware of the problems and concerns expressed previously by many hon. Members. I have no wish to exacerbate those difficulties — nor, I suspect, does any hon. Member, and certainly not those who seek with me to introduce this Bill.

Much has been made, and will no doubt continue to be made, of the results of the Scottish experiment. The House awaits the report of the population survey carried out by the Scottish Office. There are those who feel that I should have waited until its publication before seeking to introduce this measure.

I wish briefly to make a prediction based upon discussions with a representative of the alcohol research unit at the university department of psychiatry at the Royal Edinburgh hospital. The report will produce a neutral set of results. It will, of course, demonstrate — as the statistics show — that the incidence of conviction for alcohol-related offences in Scotland has, since the implementation of a small part of the Clayson report, fallen. It will also show that, since 1976, consumption of alcohol has fallen in Scotland — but so, it will be argued, has it fallen elsewhere.

What is certain is that a change in the law has led to what Professor Christopher Clayson described as a more civilised style of drinking in a more relaxed and socially controlled environment. That relaxation has not yet embraced the dramatic change in drinking style — a major shift towards the consumption of alcohol in a family environment — that Professor Clayson envisaged, but it is certainly a step in the right direction.

I am convinced, both from my own observations and from the research of those more experienced and more qualified than I, that the solution to the affliction of alcoholism and problem drinking will come not from the enforcement of quaint licensing regulations that are both inconsistent and abused, but through education and the acquisition of the sensible drinking skills taught through the ACCEPT programme. Those skills are more likely to be acquired in the controlled atmosphere of a public house that is open at reasonable hours than through bout drinking sessions created through truncated opening hours topped up with alcohol acquired either from an off-licence or from a supermarket at virtually any time and consumed without supervision.

I am grateful for your patience, Mr. Speaker. I seek to introduce a measure that has the rare distinction of carrying with it the potential creation of employment, popular appeal and, as I hope I have demonstrated, social desirability. A Bill under the ten-minute rule is, as we all know, fragile. But if the House this afternoon gives me leave to introduce my Bill, those who differ from its aims should recognise the value of deploying their arguments in Committee and should not prevent this measure from having a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Roger Gale, Miss Janet Fookes, Mr. Richard Alexander, Mr. David Gilroy Bevan, Mr. John Butterfill, Mr. Conal Gregory, Mr. Rob Hayward, Mr. Greg Knight, Mr. Barry Porter, Mr. Albert McQuarrie, and Mr. Colin Shepherd.

LICENSING ACTS (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Roger Gale accordingly presented a Bill to amend the licensing Acts for England and Wales to permit longer and flexible opening hours; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 10 May and to be printed. [Bill 144.]

Clause 64

MODIFICATION OF INDEXATION ALLOWANCE

4.6 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 59, line 26, leave out 'indexation allowance' and insert 'chargeable gain'.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) is unable to be here today, and in the absence of any more alluring invitations I have agreed to become his PPS for this debate. As we see eye to eye on these matters, I thought that I should say what he would have said had he been here.

Last year my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to reform capital taxation, especially capital gains tax, in the 1985 Finance Bill. The indexation provisions that we are debating today appear to represent the full extent of that reform, and, of course, the reliefs given are most welcome.

One widely recognised anomaly — which I believe Treasury Ministers also recognise—is that the system of capital gains tax as it now applies has ceased to be a capital gains tax in the general sense and has become a 17-year inflation tax covering the years 1965 to 1982. That results from the indexation provision introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe) when he was Chancellor.

Confusion surrounds the tax, and that makes it an inefficient and ineffective tax. It is also an unjust tax, especially for the long-term investors who acquired their assets during the 17-year period or who held assets when the tax was introduced. It was introduced as a short-term tax, but, in effect, we have removed that element of the tax and made it bite hardest against those who have held assets for a significant period. That will become worse as the years go by and as the number of those investors diminishes.

There will also be considerable administrative difficulties. The new rules, especially those allowing indexation losses — which I welcome — are complex. Schedule 16 adds an additional eight pages to the statute book, which I regret because that means more work for accountants and lawyers. I do not complain so much about that as about the additional work for business men, especially those involved in small and family businesses.

Those who remember the administrative difficulties surrounding valuation when the tax was introduced in 1965, hardly relish the problems and the administrative and accountancy costs of now determining the March 1982 values, especially for land and unquoted family companies.

A simple solution to those difficulties is contained in the amendment. Far from seeking to extend the indexation provisions, which would be cumbersome and complex, the amendment seeks the simple solution of treating property as having been acquired in 1982.

This change would incur a cost, I do not deny, but in terms of its rationality, there is much to be said for it. For example, the complicated 1965 transitional provisions would cease to be important and it would no longer be necessary to delve into history to calculate, for example, allowable expenditure. Valuations, in particular, would relate to a period much more within the practical experience of practitioners and valuers.

Furthermore, fewer valuations would be required. At present, it is possible that before computing the chargeable gain, the land or other asset concerned must be valued both for a 1965 and a 1982 value. The amendment seeks a simplification in that the 1965 or other valuation would no longer have to take place.

The amendment would be particularly helpful to those family businesses that have been carried on through long-established companies where the double charge to capital gains tax on liquidation inhibits the sensible reorganisation of the business. Those are valuable reforms that we might make in this complicated tax as it now stands, a tax which will bring in a diminishing revenue year on year as real gains only are taxed and not the inflationary gains that we have had since the tax was introduced.

If my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary is not minded to accept the amendment, he might care to consider another way in which this part of the Bill could be simplified. It comes in the form of a simple suggestion that has been put forward by the Institute of Directors. The institute proposes that after an asset has been held for seven years, it should drop out of the charge to tax and should not be available for a loss to be acquired for the purposes of computing one's capital gains tax liability. That alternative also merits consideration.

Consider, for example, an asset which has maintained its real value throughut the period up to 1982. We find an extraordinary situation. By April 1982, the asset would have accumulated an inflationary taxable gain—which will still be taxable after the Bill has become an Act unless an amendment is accepted—of 85 per cent. of its real value if it were originally acquired in April 1965; of 75 per cent. if acquired in April 1975; and of 42 per cent. if acquired in April 1978. That is not acceptable.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that at a time when Ministers repeatedly ask the British public to take in the waste and cut out excess, to accept cuts in social services and education spending and to accept increases in bus fares, it sticks in the throat to have him move an amendment which would effectively reduce the amount raised by way of capital gains tax, a tax that is paid by few people in society and invariably by those with great wealth? Is he aware that he is not serving the national interest by moving this amendment, particularly when in Manchester, which is close to his constituency, hundreds of thousands of people are living in poverty and deprived circumstances? Why does he favour the few at the cost of the many?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not accept the premise on which the hon. Gentleman makes that intervention. The simplification which this tax change would bring about would mean that many people who are now engaged in activities which can hardly be regarded as productive would turn their energies elsewhere, which in turn would produce more real jobs in the economy and thus contribute towards the creation of that enterprise culture which we have done so much to achieve in the past six years. Priorities in expenditure are, of course, for the Government to determine, and I have not denied that a cost would be incurred in making this change. I am pleading for a more rational tax system, which I hope Opposition Members will support.

There is an injustice involved in this tax, which is a clog on free markets because there is—to the extent that it taxes inflationary and not real gains—a considerable disincentive to disposing of assets to reinvest the money, at least in certain types of company. To that extent it prevents individuals from making investments which are likely to be most productive.

There are many reasons to support the amendment and other forms of reform that are proposed in the area about which I am speaking. I will not go further into the detail of the argument. I seek only to invite the Government to take two steps. The first is to admit that there is no justification for not giving relief in some appropriate form, not necessarily by means of indexation, for pre-1982 inflation, except in terms of the cost to the Exchequer, which will diminish year by year. Secondly, I want my right hon. and learned Friend to promise action in future, so long as Exchequer costs can be justified, to remedy the injustice.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I support the amendment, which was tabled in the first instance by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). I must at the outset declare a distinct personal interest, having just agreed to sell an asset in my ownership; and if the Committee agreed to the amendment, I should not be liable to a substantial payment by way of capital gains tax to which I shall otherwise be liable.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman is at least honest.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Having spoken for myself, I know that I am speaking for thousands of my constituents and hundreds of thousands of other citizens who are obliged to pay what I consider to be an unfair form of capital gains tax.

I do not disagree with the idea of a capital gains tax being levied in cases where people make a regular income —and I am not saying that it is wrong that they should do so—by achieving small capital gains in the course of their work, such as those who work in the commodity markets. It is right that where they are using capital gains as a form of income, something equivalent to income tax should be levied.

It seems absolutely wrong, however, for us to retain this survival from the great inflation of the 1970s. It is the wrong way to raise a capital gains tax. It is, in fact, a capital levy rather than a respectable tax and it should not be continued in the Bill.

The Government are obviously ashamed of this form of taxation because they have started nibbling away at it again. Their right course, however, would have been to have got rid of the tax altogether in so far as it refers simply to inflationary gains. There are many reasons for that. For example, it is a random levy. It is not raised on everyone who owns capital but on those who manage their assets competently and who decide to change their portfolios so as to invest in the future rather than to hold on to the investments of the past. It does not touch people who are content to hold on to yesterday's investments.

It is wrong also on the Treasury's part in that it is continuing to use this tax as something which, as the Minister said on Second Reading, is regarded as a source of revenue. If the Government were to use the proceeds from this capital levy as capital, that might be more respectable, although it would still be wrong. As he admitted, the Treasury simply raises this money as a capital levy and then applies it as revenue. This is yet another insight into the muddled thinking of the Treasury which does not distinguish properly between the capital account and the revenue account. This tax also distorts the capital market.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The hon. Gentleman has made a point about regarding a capital gain as revenue. How does the hon. Gentleman think the Treasury regards the sale of British Gas? Does it regard the sale as revenue or not?

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: The hon. Lady has put her finger on an extremely serious point. The Government need capital and revenue. They should differentiate between the sources of the money that they take from society, and have a properly stated capital account and revenue account. Until we have that, we shall never be able to penetrate into what the Government are doing with regard to the economy.

This tax distorts the capital market because it prevents the adjustment of share prices which would benefit rising companies seeking new funds. It helps to sustain the price of shares in companies which are suspected by investors but because of the tax they do not sell, because they are not prepared to suffer the loss involved in changing their holding. This is a drag on the stock market's efficiency.

The tax also has the effect of diminishing the private sector of the stock market. In past years it has been decided that unit and investment trusts and the like are not required to pay this tax when they change their portfolios, but private sector investors must continue to do so. The diminishing private sector faces a particular penalty because of the way in which the Government continue to raise this capital gains tax.

The stock market in London is being weakened because there is a diminishing number of people to make up their minds on a particular issue. The herd of institutional investors tend to move in the same way at the same time. The London market is becoming dangerously unstable. It is wrong that we should diminish the number of people who are willing from time to time, because of their personal knowledge, judgment and ability, to draw on other sources of advice, to take a contrary view to that of the market.

The Government are acting against their own best principles in continuing this tax. It is the opposite of the ideal of private thrift and self-provision. Lately we have heard my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—I think that all Conservative Members agree — say that she wants to initiate an era in which everyone can be a capitalist. Yet the Treasury is continuing with this unfair form of capital gains tax. It is particularly inapposite at a time when we want to place more emphasis on the need for people to provide for their own retirement through personal pension schemes. People who obtain a pension through one of the established institutions will be able to rely on a body that is exempt from taxation, including capital gains tax. People who try to provide for their old age through their own earnings will remain in the category of those who are hit by this tax.

The Government have done a great deal with regard to indexation and have taken away much of the stigma of this tax for people making their first investment choices; but it is still wrong to impose a retrospective tax on inflation. If we want capitalism to succeed, we must take off the brakes. I understand the sincerity of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours)—he is not in the Chamber now—who is concerned about the burden of taxation and the way in which the Government plan their expenditure within a limited budget; but it is wrong to raise money from the capital market by confiscation. If the Government want to raise money from the capital market, they should pay for it on market terms, and not by relying on obsolete legislation, which imposes a partial and unfair capital levy. It is the role of the House to watch what the Executive is doing when levying taxation on our people. Unfortunately, all too often, hon. Members fall down on that role because the major Opposition party regards itself as the party of high taxation and welcomes increases in taxes. It is not prepared to stand up for the people who are unfairly taxed.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): The Government want to increase taxes.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I have heard hon. Members, from the same party as the hon. Gentleman, who revel in the idea of increasing taxation, making the rich squeak, and so on. I do not say that there should not be taxation, but it must be proved to be necessary and shown to be fair. This tax is neither, and that is why the Committee should accept the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton).

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): Although we are sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has not been here to move his interesting amendment, I am sure that we are all glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) resisted more alluring invitations. How could there be a more alluring invitation than one to participate in a debate in Standing Committee on capital taxation, especially in relation to the Finance Bill? I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton on his discrimination and the sensitivity with which he moved the amendment. I am sure that hon. Members welcome also the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) who has thought long and deeply about this and other matters relating to the operation of our capital markets.

The amendment is not restricted to the elimination of the inflationary element of gains accrued before 1982. In fact, it moves the whole base line forward, taking the matter a good deal further. There may be a case, although it was not developed in full, for moving the base line forward—my hon. Friends the Members for Tatton and for Kensington touched on the matter of simplicity—but that is a slightly broader case than that based on inflation between 1965 and 1982.

A short-term gains tax was introduced in case VII of schedule D which was set up in the Finance Act 1962. It was limited to the disposal of most assets within a year, but disposal of real property within three years. Such was the appetite of the Labour party, for a period from 1965 the short-term gains tax was run in double harness with the longer-term capital gains tax with which we are still saddled. We abolished that short-term gains tax. We are left purely with what might be called a long-term gains tax.

I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton about the ravages of inflation. No doubt we shall have a chance to consider the general principles underlying this aspect when we consider the motion that the clause stand part of the Bill. I have no doubt that that occasion will be admirably utilised by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald).

We can consider how equitable it is to have something which is described as a capital gains tax but which, to a degree, impinges on inflationary and not real gains. I point out one practical reason for suggesting to the Committee that it should resist the blandishments of my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton. The cost will be £550 million. My hon. Friend would say that that demonstrates the extent of the damage. The amendment, however, goes wider than inflationary gains—it brings the base line forward. The cost would be considerable.

The amendment would be slightly capricious in its effects. For example, between 1965 and 1982 agricultural land increased in value, on average, by about 750 per cent. while voting shares increased by 250 per cent. In both cases, there were dramatic increases. Moving the base line forward for all assets, regardless of their quality, would have a capricious impact.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton rested his case on the ground of rationality, which I think, on closer investigation, meant simplification. I would be the first to commend any amendment that was designed to simplify this extraordinarily arcane and complex field of law. I suspect that many of the complex provisions with which capital gains tax is presently encrusted would survive. I doubt whether real simplification would be achieved. The logic of my hon. Friend's case is that the tax should be abolished. That raises an interesting area of debate, but it is not one that my hon. Friend has chosen to employ on this occasion.

When an original base line was introduced at the time the first capital gains tax was levied in 1965, the taxpayer was given the option of adopting a time apportionment method to arrive at his capital gain or of taking the 1965 base line. I notice that, perhaps in the interests of simplicity, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South chose not to introduce that concept in the amendment. Not all taxpayers will feel that the suggested solution was as equitable as my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has suggested. My hon. Friend widened the debate. He reflected on the impact of such capital taxation on the operation of capital markets. I take his point. May I be bold enough to advance the general proposition that few forms of direct taxation do not distort the operation of the markets to a degree? Regrettably, few civilised states have been able to dispense with direct taxation.

[Mr. Peter Rees]

We could have an interesting debate on the relative merits of direct and indirect taxation and how they impinge upon the markets, but I suspect that I should be travelling a little wide and that even your indulgence, Sir Paul, might be strained to the limit. I merely leave my hon. Friend and the Committee with that thought.

4.30 pm

The hon. Member for Thurrock mentioned the composition of Government accounts and asked whether the yield of capital taxation should be allocated solely to capital expenditure. I should be the last to claim perfection for the public expenditure White Paper although, in a constitutional and perhaps in a personal sense, I have to accept responsibility for it. I was happy to do so in our debates before Easter.

The Committee will, however, recall that one of the innovations and improvements introduced was table 112 which sets out capital expenditure. If my hon. Friends study that table, they will see that the Government's capital expenditure is running at £22 billion per annum —considerably more than the yield of capital taxes and privatisation. I hope that the Government meet the point acceptably made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. I am not claiming perfection for Government accounts and if we can set out that point with greater clarity, we shall endeavour to do so.

We have had an interesting debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton has conceded that the amendment goes a little wider than he wished. The general principles have been well deployed. I hope that my hon. Friends will feel that they have had a sufficient airing. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton will recognise that for many reasons, in particular the practical ground of cost, I cannot commend the amendment to the House. I hope that I shall not tax the patience of the House too much if I ask it to accept that capital gains tax is now on an acceptable and sustainable basis.

Mr. Hamilton: I accept what my right hon. and learned Friend says about the case made for the amendment. I said at the end of my remarks that I was looking for an indication from him that it was only cost that was preventing the Government from accepting a measure of indexation for the period 1965-82, that the Government would keep the matter under review and that when we could afford to introduce such a reform, the Government intended to do so.

Mr. Rees: I should like to be able to succumb to my hon. Friend's blandishments, which are so moderate and charming. It is natural that cost oppresses the Chief Secretary. One must be interested in the brutal facts of public finance. However, I ventured to deploy one or two other points which oppressed me. I should hate to say that my mind or those of my right hon. and hon. Friends were ever closed to the possibility of improving our tax system, for many parts of which I could not claim perfection.

The considerable reforms will be tested in the clause stand part debate. There may be criticisms from the Opposition. There may be unanimity on that aspect of our fiscal affairs, but somehow I doubt it.

I hope that my hon. Friends will support me in feeling that if clause 64 and the schedule attached to it commend themselves to the Committee, the tax will, at any rate for all present purposes, be regarded as acceptable and sustainable. I hope on that basis that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton will not feel disposed to press the amendment to a Division.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I was going to say that my arguments had been overcome by the suavity, knowledge and skill of my right hon. and learned Friend which make him such an asset to the Treasury team; but I find it necessary to contradict one point — his suggestion that capital gains tax is now on an acceptable and sustainable basis. I cannot agree with that. I hope that this is a matter that the Treasury will bear in mind when planning the taxation changes to which we look forward during the Government's term of office, if not during the course of the Bill.

My right hon. and learned Friend said that the amendment goes wider than the inflationary issue. It therefore goes wider than the intention for which I was arguing, and I shall not seek to divide the Committee on the issue, although that had been my intention when I first rose.

I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to realise that many people in this country sincerely believe that this form of taxation is wrong. The Government should not indulge in practices which are unfair and damaging to the capital market and which are contrary to the Prime Minister's principles.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Dr. McDonald: The Opposition felt that the debate on amendment No. 12 was a matter for the Conservative Benches, but I must commend the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) for the refreshing honesty with which he put his arguments. He referred to the fact that he had a strong and immediate personal interest in the outcome of the matter. That is refreshing and, as we have heard this afternoon, it was a better performance than that of some other hon. Members.

The theme of the hon. Member's argument on the amendment is relevant to clause 64. Clause 64 and the amendment aim to inflation-proof capital gains. We should pause on that issue for a moment because the underlying principles will require justification by the Chief Secretary.

Clause 64 represents the Government's determination to protect a section of the community against the ravages of inflation. We can perhaps understand that, but we cannot understand the fact that the Government set a stony face against the request of others in the community—teachers, nurses, civil servants and others—to have their income inflation-proofed. Last night, the Chief Secretary was asked to justify the unequal treatment given to one section of the community compared with another, and he manifestly failed to do so. An important issue is at stake here which affects many poor people, and he should explain why the Government are prepared at some cost to inflation-proof the gains made by a tiny proportion of society and to do nothing for teachers, nurses, civil servants and many other public servants. Not only does the clause require a general justification of that kind, but it needs rather a special justification these days. After all, it could better be argued in the past that the main source of capital gains was inflation but now, and perhaps only recently, returns on investment might be regarded as real returns rather than inflationary gains. Therefore, one could say that the Government, in introducing a clause such as this which has as part of its purpose to protect capital against inflation, are doing it at just the wrong time. They are doing it when people are making real returns rather than merely inflationary gains.

The Government cannot have it both ways, of course. They cannot say on the one hand that they have conquered inflation and on the other that they need to protect capital gains from the ravages of inflation. They have to go for one line or the other. They cannot have both at the same time.

The Government might well argue that they are out to promote wider share ownership and therefore they must protect such shareholders from an overbearing tax burden. They want direct investment in equities by individual shareholders in their own right and as a substitute for investment through financial institutions. The Government might argue that reductions in capital gains would stimulate growth in the number of small shareholders which, of course, the Government have stated as their purpose. However, since no tax is payable on gains in any one year of up to £5,900 after the Budget, and exemptions are available for unit and investment trusts, the prospects of any small shareholder being liable for capital gains tax directly or indirectly are very remote. Therefore, small shareholders will not gain particularly from the clause because they are unlikely to be liable for capital gains tax anyway.

The hon. Member for Kensington, in an honest and open speech, made the important point that the Government are nibbling away at capital gains tax. I think that some members of the Government would very much like to abolish capital gains tax at one fell stroke, but instead the Government, perhaps because that would be too obviously a favour to the better off in society, have decided gradually to reduce the impact with the various changes that they have made, including clause 64. Indeed, there are — although the Chief Secretary, I am not surprised to notice, did not outline them — good arguments for having capital gains taxation, and it is worth while mentioning one or two of them. It is important to keep the general principles in mind before we get lost in the details of a complicated clause such as this.

Many would say that there is nothing wrong with stock market speculation and that it provides a valuable financial function in a free market. They might go on to say that, although it has that kind of function, there is no need to give speculators what amounts to a substantial tax incentive to play their chosen role. One might continue the argument by saying that if investors are allowed to make capital gains tax some kind of optional tax and to accumulate a tax credit by establishing short-term losses —which, indeed, is the sort of thing that can be done under the indexation rules in clause 64—then the whole of capital gains tax would become a farce, yielding no revenue. If that were the end product, it might be cheaper and more sensible to have no tax.

A capital gains tax does not discourage investment. The right way to encourage investment is not to be soft on capital gains but instead to have a sensible and effective regime of capital gains tax. Such arguments will be put forward for having a capital gains tax. Indeed, they were put forward by the Chancellor in The Sunday Telegraph in 1962. I wish that he had stuck to the principles that he there set out clearly and rather well instead of abandoning them and taking up some of the options which he so clearly decried in that article, especially the one about establishing short-term losses, thus making the whole tax a farce. It is a pity that he did not stick to his earlier principles because then we would have a fairer tax regime than we shall have after the passage of the Bill.

The changes in capital gains tax are designed to benefit the better off. Some of them already find a capital gains tax useful — and I am aware, of course, that the Government have eliminated one of those with the bond-washing measures that have been introduced—because it is convenient to take returns in the form of capital gains taxed at 30 per cent. with a threshold of £5,900 a year and indexation rather than taking returns as income taxed in full at up to 60 per cent. Therefore, the structure of capital gains tax already gives a clear incentive to seek capital gain rather than income, and to choose equity investments rather than deposits or gilts. But incentive already existed before the changes in the Budget and, apart from the bond-washing proposals, the Budget has done little to alter that.

The kind of people who benefit from the changes proposed in the clause are not the small shareholders or the people on average or below average incomes; they are portfolio investors, wealthy individuals with a share portfolio. The changes will also benefit corporations with liquid resources which would themselves take out portfolios as investments. The indexation will reduce chargeable gains generally and will reduce the tax base for such companies. Those who will benefit from the changes in the clause are therefore a fairly small minority of the population and certainly to be numbered among the better off. To them the Government propose to give more money, and to do so at great expense.

Although I do not agree with the amendment, I think that the hon. Member for Kensington rightly made the point that the measures are complicated, and they will certainly be complicated to administer. Not only will they lead to a growth in the activities of accountants and others, but they will also increase the activities of the Inland Revenue staff. Extra staff will probably be required to be taken on by the Inland Revenue as a result of the clause. I suggest the following figures, and it will be interesting to know whether the Chief Secretary agrees with them. The increases in staff will probably begin not before April 1987. They will lead to an increase of 190 in that year, 360 in the following year and 455 in the year following that. Thereafter, the figures of extra staff required will probably begin to decline somewhat.

It is difficult to estimate the costs of the extra staff, but undoubtedly they would have to be staff at a fairly high level—tax officers or inspectors. It would not be cheap. At the current salaries, they would probably cost the Revenue about £10,000 in salary plus the additional expenses of employment. The tax change is expensive to administer. The Opposition would not necessarily object to the employment of more staff, and we would certainly not object to the employment of higher grade staff, but we object to the fact that the Government are introducing a measure which will cause more staff to be employed by the Inland Revenue to give money to those who do not need it—the better off.

The changes follow the watering down of capital gains tax, which took place under the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1980, there was a big increase in the gains exemption, from £1,000 to £3,000. The benefit was extended by no longer withdrawing the exemption from those whose gains were obtained at above that level. The allowance was bumped up again in 1982 to £5,000, and increased each year thereafter in line with the retail price index. In 1982, the previous Chancellor began indexing the CGT base, but the changes that he proposed and that were passed pleased nobody. They were complicated and difficult to administer. All the changes have, at least in the long term, reduced the amount of revenue which can be expected from CGT to a quarter or less of what it would otherwise have been. Therefore, this nibbling away at CGT has reduced the amount of revenue that the Government can expect from it.

[Dr. McDonald]

The Chancellor in his 1985 Budget continued that process with the indexation provision and with the introduction of the pooling of assets provisions. There is no need for me to go into detail because those provisions are spelt out in the clause and schedule.

The Chief Secretary said that the Chancellor had now reached an acceptable form of CGT, and that it would be unlikely that any further changes in the form of capital gains tax would take place. He may be right. Few further changes are needed if the Financial Times was correct in saying:

"Very few private investors will ever again have to pay capital gains tax, as a result of the changes announced on Tuesday."

The Investors Chronicle, which was more anxious in welcoming the changes, said of them:

"Most significantly they mean that CGT for all investments made after March 1982 is now a tax on real net gains, an important step forward."

I can understand the qualified welcome that the Investors Chronicle gave to the changes. Its comments show the extent of the Government's changes.

The pooling provisions mean that, as more shares are bought, the latest pool increases in size and value, and eventually investors will have only one pool—the post-1982 pool. Given that the overall upward trend in share prices—that has been true for the past two years—is averaged out, the CGT payable on the disposal of shares is less than it would have been if the pooling arrangements had not been introduced. In other words, both the indexation of changes and the reintroduction of pooling contained in clause 64 mean that the amount of revenue that the Government can obtain in future from CGT will be far less than it might otherwise have been. For that reason, it is easy to see why the Chancellor says that the tax is now on a broadly acceptable and sustainable basis, and why the Government have delighted all but their greediest critics.

Amendment No. 12 was designed not to iron out anomalies, as its proponents said, but to allow the March 1982 costs to be used in place of the historical cost so that the entire gain accruing before March 1982 would become tax free. It is easy to see the benefits that would follow from such a change, and why the Chief Secretary suggested that the cost of that would be immense. Obviously, the benefits from such a change would have particularly favoured property companies, for example. The Government have certainly pleased many of the better off, but it is plain that they can never give enough to keep some of them happy.

One or two features of the changes that the Government have made in clause 64 may mean that they will be more generous than they had intended. Perhaps the Chief Secretary would comment on that. Compound indexation is now possible under the rules.

Let us suppose that one has a holding in securities in a company called Blacks, and one bed and breakfasts one's shares each year. Every time one sells, one receives the benefit of that year's indexation because one buys back at a higher price—inflation plus any growth in the value of Blacks' shares. The following year's indexation allowance is based on a percentage of the new acquisition costs, not the real costs to the owner of the shares. No real extra costs are incurred in the buying and selling that takes place. At present, nothing in the clause or schedule prevents a benefit from compound indexation of that type.

I ask the Chief Secretary to consider a further case. Let us suppose that a portfolio now worth £50,000 was bought in 1984 when the Financial Times all-share index, which I am using, was 102 points below its present level. The indexation allowance based on the March retail price index figures gives a real gain in one year of 70 points. The portfolio is now worth £50,000 and was valued in May 1984 at £41,892. That is a difference of just over £8,000. The indexation allowance amounts to £2,549 and the exemption level is £5,559. The capital gains tax indexation allowance in clause 64 and the annual allowance will allow a £50,000 portfolio to be bed and breakfasted every year without CGT liability.

I am not sure whether the Government intended the changes to produce such an effect. If they did, the changes will benefit the better off alone in the community. Not many of my constituents have portfolios of £50,000 that could be treated in such a way. If they intend the change to have that effect, they are being wrongly over-generous in these apparently straitened times by allowing the better off to pay no tax. If they did not intend such generosity, they should introduce amendments to tidy up the provisions of clause 64 and schedule 16, because at present they contain nothing to prevent that from happening.

The Chief Secretary will be aware that as soon as the Government introduce such a measure, and the other anti-tax avoidance measures contained in the schedule, the tax-planning industry goes to work to find other loopholes. I draw his attention to "Gremlin Corner"—it is aptly named—in the 4 May 1985 edition of Taxation, which states on page 87:

"Another tax planning point is that it will be possible to create . . . an artificial allowable loss by purchasing a high-coupon gilt and selling it within the year (but after 27 February 1986). Even if the purchase and sale prices are the same, indexation allowance will create a capital gains tax loss. This stratagem is likely to appeal to institutional investors and individuals paying income tax at 40 per cent. or less."

They are not the most well off in society, but they are among the better off. What action will the Government take to prevent that tax avoidance? We wish to hear the Chief Secretary's views on that point.

By introducing the changes in capital gains tax, the Government are helping exactly the same people as they helped last year when they abolished investment income surcharge. That benefited people with investments of £75,000 or more—again, not many of my constituents have £70,000 tucked away in investments. We were told that the full-year cost of that would be £360 million. Immediately after that Budget, The Times described the abolition of investment incomes surcharge as

"A tremendous bonus for the rich, and especially the idle rich."

The cost of that change, together with the £155 million that it will cost to introduce the changes in clause 64, would be just enough to cover the payment of long-term supplementary benefit this year to those who have been unemployed for more than a year. That would cost the Government £500 million, but I bet that if we asked the Chief Secretary now whether the Government would be willing to benefit the long-term unemployed in that way, he would say, "We do not have the money to do that. We cannot possibly make such a change, because we do not have £500 million in the kitty." Yet the abolition of the investment income surcharge and the changes in capital gains tax could easily cover the payment of much-needed benefits to people who are not among the idle rich, but who have been forced by the Government to be idle. For that reason, we oppose the presence of the clause in the Bill.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Unlike the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), I welcome the presence of clause 64 as a necessary relieving provision. I shall address my remarks to subsection (5).

I especially welcome subsection (5) because, without it, the clause would have provided for the creation of a new Doomsday Book at March 1982. It would have been necessary, on any future capital gain, to agree with the Inland Revenue a value at March 1982. I welcome the inclusion of the provision that the taxpayer must make a claim before the new provisions can operate. Such a provision will ensure that many taxpayers will not have to bear the expense of establishing a value at 1982 to claim what may, especially as a result of the Government's partial success in reducing inflation, be fairly limited relief.

The fact that the new provisions will operate only following a claim by a taxpayer will ensure that the compliance costs inherent in the clause will be limited. At the same time, the benefit of the relieving provision will go where it is most needed.

May I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to clarify the status of a claim under subsection (5)? Is it irrevocable, or can it be withdrawn at any time? I have a special reason for asking that question, because I must contrast the relieving provision in clause 64 with what was admitted to be a relieving provision in the 1965 legislation that introduced capital gains tax. The then Labour Government saw clearly that the operation of capital gains tax would be grossly unfair—it was grossly unfair anyway, given the inflation that they later created—to those who had old assets that fluctuated markedly in value. Therefore, they introduced a provision for valuation at April 1965, but it was introduced only on the basis of an irrevocable election by the taxpayer.

The result was that a taxpayer who owned an asset such as jewellery, a painting or land, which was a chargeable asset that he had sold and which fluctuated in value over the years, was given, not a relieving provision but a ticket in a lottery. The result of the lottery was that he entered, and could end up paying substantially more tax as a result of entry, or he did not enter and wondered what would have happened had he entered.

If the claim under subsection (5) is irrevocable, in some circumstances exactly the same effect could occur. The taxpayer could elect for the indexation provisions to apply and could then discover that, as a result of the opinion of the district valuer, which could be upheld by the courts, the value of his asset at March 1982 was considerably lower than it originally cost.

I take it that the intention of clause 64 is not to penalise the taxpayer, but to compensate him for inflation. Therefore, it would seem rather unfair if, as a result of the provision, the taxpayer ended up paying more tax, particularly when such additional tax liability would be based solely on the opinion of one or more valuers.

The evil that I have outlined could have been dealt with already in the clause. If my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary can assure me that a claim made under subsection (5) can be withdrawn at any time prior to determination of the capital gains tax assessment for the year, even my slightest doubts about the clause will be immediately withdrawn. If, on the other hand, it is intended that a claim under the clause should be irrevocable, I should like to draw my right hon. and learned Friend's attention to the possibility of bolstering the relieving provision by introducing what is known in the Department of the Environment as a cost floor. As a result, the valuation arrived at after a claim under subsection (5) could be no less than the actual cost of the asset. In that way, my right hon. and learned Friend would ensure that the clause achieved what I understood it originally set out to do, which was to provide a measure of tax relief where it was needed rather than an arbitrary tax charge in certain cases.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I am not quite following the point made by the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern). It seemed like a piece of special pleading. I smelt a Rees about half way through his speech.

If the hon. Gentleman was saying that the backdating to March 1982 does not apply unless there is a claim so capital gains is charged on the whole increase in value since the date that the asset was purchased after 1965—in other words, the consequences of the two great inflations, that of Labour and that of the Conservatives — it seems a little mysterious. Perhaps the Chief Secretary will explain when he winds up. Does it mean that the taxpayer has to claim that the gain measured is only since March 1982 for it to be the operative gain? If not, is he then assessed on the whole gain accruing since the date of purchase?

Mr. Stern: If the hon. Gentleman reads the clause, particularly subsection (4), he will find that the indexation allowance dealt with under the clause is indexation of a valuation at March 1982. Subsection (5) brings in valuation at March 1982 whereas the existing law provides for indexation on original cost.

Mr. Mitchell: Surely that means a Domesday assessment of what valuations were at 1982. I was making the point simply to show the difficulties under which some of us in the Opposition, particularly myself, labour when dealing with such a measure. For me, it is extremely complex and difficult to follow. That is why the Government have been able to get away with so much. Such a change in the legislation brings about quiet, back-pocket giveaways. It is difficult for the non-accountant and non-specialist tax person to understand it. Conservative Members are away making the money while the Government slip money into people's back pocket, with the capital gains that will be sanctioned under the measure. Mum's the word. I suppose that the message is, "Mother sent the money." In the meantime the rest of the country is not clear about what is going on. It is another of those back-door giveaways carried through under the guise of complex legislation, with no warning to the country as to exactly what is going on. That is why I have worn trousers of this bright colour today, to express my opinion of the legislation and the basic principle behind it—it stinks.

Clause 64 takes more of the teeth out of capital gains tax. In a sense, it might be a measure of the Government's political menopause, a confession that the fight against inflation is not over, but certainly lost. If the Government are to index gains, they are admitting that inflation is about to accelerate, as most of the figures seem to show. No more can they give us the stern imperative, "Don't worry about the taxation of inflationary gains because we are bringing down inflation, thanks to the brilliant success that we have had." It has been a success in ruining the economy. That struggle has now failed. Our inflation rate is still higher than that of our industrial competitors, certainly higher than the rate in countries with which we are competing most directly. Our unit costs are going up more rapidly, and the Government are seeking to cushion the effects of that failure for their supporters by the change in capital gains tax. The Prime Minister is obsessed with fighting inflation and with the value of sound money. She wants it sound because she has more of it than most other people.

The indexation provisions cost about £10 million and the giveaway costs £155 million. Those are substantial sums, given to a section of the population that has no claim to that money and does not deserve it. It could be used for other more important and, from the point of view of economic development, more useful purposes.

On whose behalf is the measure being carried through? An interesting example is given by The Economist on 23 March 1985. Joe Bloggs bought a second home in 1975 —presumably in Wales, so that he could keep warm in the winter. It cost £30,000. He sold the house in 1985 for £100,000, realising a gain of £70,000. Supposing that retail prices have trebled since 1975, and have risen by 15 per cent. from March 1982 alone, before the Budget the man would have subtracted for inflation only £4,500, which is 15 per cent. of £30,000, bringing his taxable gain to £65,500. Supposing his house was worth £80,000 in 1982, he would subtract £12,000, reducing his taxable gain to £58,000. If he had no other capital gains to eat up his allowance, now increased to £5,900, he would pay £15,630 in capital gains tax, which is £2,250 less than under the old system, and substantially less than it would have been under our system. Inflationary gains should be taxed.

That is an example of a person with a substantial profit on the sale of his second home. One might also make a substantial profit on the sale of shares. Such people benefit by the measure. It is an interesting reflection of the attitudes and perceptions of the Government. They are deaf to the pleas of the sections of society who have been hardest hit by the unemployment and depression that the Government have generated. They are deaf to the pleas of the disabled and the charities. They are deaf to the pleas of the unemployed and the pensioners. However, they are ever alive and alert to the pleas of the small section of people who benefit massively from such measures.

The Chancellor talks about capital gains tax now being "on a sustainable basis". He means "on a declining basis". A chart in the capital gains tax revenue forecast by the Institute of Fiscal Studies shows, on the basis of the measure, even more than on the basis of the 1982 measure, a substantial and steady falling away in the revenue from capital gains tax. Even on 1984-85 prices, there will be a substantial and steady falling away in capital gains tax revenue after this year. By the 1990s, it will be down from the present levels to about £600 million. By the turn of the century it will be down to £400 million at 1985 prices.

The Government are literally taking the teeth out of the capital gains tax by this clause, which is why we should oppose it. It is a particularly tawdry part of a tawdry Budget. Perhaps the Chief Secretary can tell us the scale of wealth of those who will benefit from this measure, and what effect it will have on incentives. The Government are constantly telling us about incentives, but this is a gift to those who have, and has nothing to do with incentives for business or for those who put money at risk for the growth of the economy. It is a giveaway to people with substantial sums of money, second homes and shareholdings. Will the Chief Secretary give us examples of the people who will benefit from this measure and explain what benefit that will bring to the economy and to incentives generally?

This Budget is only a pathetic half-measure, but the fact that it is cautious and restrained does not mean to say that the giving has stopped. It goes on, but at a lower level and to a narrower class and a narrower section of society—the giving slows down. What does it have to do with improving the real wealth and the dynamic strength of the British economy and bringing jobs to our people? It is shovelling money into the pockets of the well-off.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I understand the wish of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) to introduce teachers' and nurses' pay into the debate on capital gains tax, but the relevance and the logic, if there were any, of the argument were lost. It is a misconception that pay increases at or above the level of inflation provide any long-term protection against the effects of inflation. Experience suggests that such a process has the effect of stoking up inflation to the detriment of all, but particularly to the detriment of those on fixed incomes.

Seeking to ensure that capital gains tax is levied only on real gains and not on inflationary gains, which erode the underlying value of chargeable assets, has no such inflationary effect. Therefore, I welcome the measures in clause 64 to extend relief against taxation on inflationary gains. The Labour party would like to see a tax that should be described not as capital gains tax but rather as inflationary gains tax. With its appalling record in government of high inflation and its desire to impose ever higher capital taxation, one can see the attractions of the two. If a Labour Government could stoke up inflation and then heavily tax capital on those inflationary gains, they would have a strong source of revenue but not a moral one.

Like my hon. Friends the Members for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) I am sorry that it was not possible this year to go further in providing fuller indexation relief against inflationary gains for capital gains tax purposes. However, I recognise the need to make choices in the Budget judgment about how the limited resources available for tax relief should be deployed. I have made it clear on previous occasions that I believe that the choice of concentration on national insurance contributions and over-indexation of income tax thresholds were the right priorities this year.

However, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary will not close his mind to the possibility of extending the indexation allowance in later years. It could be done on a creeping basis by moving back to 1981 then 1980 and so on. If he cannot be persuaded on that, it could be done on a time exemption from capital gains tax, which would provide a more simple basis for the tax, and one that would not be too inequitable.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): The title of this clause sounds modest — "modification of indexation allowances". That sounds an innocent proposal, but having listened carefully to the admirable and lucid exposition of what it implies from my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), I begin to understand that this is not the simple measure implied by its title.

The principle of inflation-proofing or indexation is not anathema to Labour Members. We are in favour of it when there is obvious cause and justification, for instance in indexation of benefits. There is not a philosophical divide but a pragmatic divide, which is on whether this form of indexation will be either effective or desirable, and whom it will affect and profit. This is not similar to the indexation of benefits.

There is a good case for indexing at times of high inflation, but we are constantly being told by the Government that this is not a time of high inflation and that they have cured inflation, and it seems a strange moment for the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor to introduce such a proposal. There have been higher stages of inflation under the Government, but they choose now to introduce something that would protect investors, perhaps with some justification, from the ravages of high inflation. However, this is being done at a time when, although inflation is rising again, it is rising from a fairly modest base at a fairly slow rate. It remains to be seen whether that will continue.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has conceded in principle the idea of indexation. He has said that now inflation is low, the proposals are not necessary, and somebody who had bought an asset after inflation fell will benefit little from the indexation proposal. However, a good many people purchased their assets in the 1970s and have had a considerable amount of inflationary gain that would be taxed as a capital gain. Protection is still needed for them.

Mr. Fisher: It is strange to do this now, when the Government could have made a more effective and urgent case for it at other times. I take the point that we are including in this measure assets that reflect back to a period of a lower base.

The Committee should be concerned with the financial effect of clause 64. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock quoted from the Investors Chronicle, and made it clear that some individuals—we should remember that these are well-off individuals, whose gains will be well over £5,000 in any year—may be paying less tax. Will the Chief Secretary confirm that this is the case? Is it true that the typical investor who makes gains of £6,000 a year on his investment income will be paying less tax? The Committee would benefit from clarification of those points, or confirmation.

Will the Chief Secretary confirm that the yield for the Treasury will fall, and will he specify what the fall in revenue yield resulting from this provision will be? Will it be more or less expensive to administer this? Hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise that capital gains tax is an expensive tax to collect. I suspect that the fairly long and technical provisions of the Bill will make it a great deal more expensive. Will the Chief Secretary include in the net gain, to the Revenue—or loss as I fear it will be—the figures for increased administration costs, if there are going to be some?

The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and others have said that this measure could have some effect on the incentive to invest and to take risks on the stock market. We have constantly urged the Government to take more steps to encourage greater investment in the future of this country in both tangible and intangible forms, so the desire for greater investment is common to both sides. What we want, however, is more investment in good projects. We want good and intelligent investment. By indexing losses and allowing marginal gains to be turned into losses, this measure will effectively reward unfortunate and ill-judged investment. Is that really the intention? Will the Chief Secretary explain why those provisions are included in the clause? Both sides wish to encourage good investment, but we do not wish to encourage poor or faulty investment.

5.30 pm

I hope that the Chief Secretary will also address himself to the fact that only very wealthy, large-scale investors will benefit from the measure. The Government are always telling us how much they wish to encourage small investors through the sale of British Telecom and the proposed sale of British Gas. If the Chief Secretary is honest, however, he will confirm that this clause is utterly irrelevant to any widening of the base of individual investment in companies in this country and will benefit only the well off who already invest in shares. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not try to argue that this is an incentive for new investors. Anyone in a position to benefit from it—that is, anyone making more than £5,000 per year in capital gains—is almost bound to be investing in the equity market already, so I hope that the Government will not try to imply that this is all part of their move to widen individual share portfolios.

The question is whether the provision will be effective even as an encouragement to those who are extremely well off and already invest. Recent history shows that in the past 10 years private investors have to a large extent failed the country in terms of investment in United Kingdom shares. In replying to the first amendment, the Chief Secretary referred to the substantial investment in United Kingdom land in the early 1970s, which drove up land values for both agricultural and building land. I suspect, however, although I do not have figures to prove it, that the individual investor has not done well by this country in terms of investment in manufacturing industry and the Financial Times index generally. Indeed, I suspect that a considerable proportion of the £40 billion capital outflow from this country has been the result of investments by very wealthy individuals.

I hope that the Chief Secretary will give figures to show the significance of individual investors in our equity market, as I suspect that the percentage of the equity market taken up by individual shareholders is very low indeed. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will also tell us how many individual investors will benefit from the clause.

The hon. Member for Tatton referred to the encouragement that the clause would give to greater mobility of investment. I hope that the Chief Secretary will comment on that. I do not know a great deal about the stock market, but I should have thought that, above all, companies seek stability of investment. Those which have performed very well in the past 10 to 15 years seem at a cursory glance to be those with a stable, steady investment base—Marks and Spencer, for example—because they know what their level of investment and security has been, rather than those which have been the subject of wild speculation and have gone up and down. Perhaps hon. Members who are more expert in these matters will confirm that mobility of investment and frequent switching of investment does not benefit British industry. If the clause is designed to encourage that, as the hon. Member for Tatton suggested, is it really a good thing?

I am very confused about why the Government want this change at all. Will the Chief Secretary tell the Committee how effective the present tax situation is? Does he have figures showing capital gains tax as a percentage of all capital gains made in any one financial year? I suspect that the effective rate of tax as a proportion of capital gains is very low. I believe, as I am sure do Conservative Members and tax lawyers throughout the country who are experts on these matters, that the complexities of the tax make it relatively simple to avoid even without these indexation provisions. If the Chief Secretary has figures for the effective rate of capital gains tax, the Committee would be very interested to know them.

If capital gains tax is effective—I fear that it is not—why should the Government seek to change it? If it is ineffective but the Chief Secretary believes that there is validity in it, surely he should tighten and not loosen the tax. The Government are moving in entirely the wrong direction. The clause is not the moderately worded measure that it appears to be from the title in the margin of the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has said, it is an example of the Government being extremely sensitive to the supplications and vested interests of those who are already very well off. Although we all want to improve performance and investment in manufacturing industry, I doubt whether the Chief Secretary can prove that these changes will benefit manufacturing industry in this country. These changes will merely benefit those investors who are very wealthy already. For those reasons, I am confident that Opposition Members will vote against the proposal.

Mr. Peter Rees: The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) made a characteristically speculative intervention. He queried whether this was a modest clause. The most powerful evidence of the modesty of the clause came in the powerful speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) and for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and in the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) which they supported. My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) also pressed us to go further.

There is clearly a divide between Members on the scope and importance of the clause and it is perhaps a deep philosophic divide. That was the tenor of many speeches from Opposition Members. They may not attach so much importance to private property or to the operation of the capital market and private investment in the British economy as we do.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central asked how many people would be affected and what would be the width of these changes. The best I can say is that the changes will affect about 120,000 people and institutions within the area of capital gains tax, corporation tax and chargeable gains.

I was asked about the current yield. If one takes capital gains tax, which is the tax on individuals, and corporation tax on chargeable gains, it is just about the £1 billion mark. The tax likely to be forgone is of the order of £155 million. That, I would have thought, amply demonstrates the modesty of the clause.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) advanced a theme which seemed to find favour with several of her hon. Friends. They said that this would benefit a very small, privileged section of our community. That was the thrust of the case made against the clause and the schedule. That is an extraordinary proposition—that equity is to be denied to those who have a certain amount of capital assets and is to be reserved only for those who are not likely to be within the charge to capital gains tax. If there is a case for equity—and I shall demonstrate that there is—it applies just as surely to those who have capital assets as to those who do not. We can debate whether there should be a tax on capital gains, but I hope that there will be unanimity in the Committee that where the tax goes a little further, and because of the ravages of inflation, particularly in the 1970s, it bites deeply into gains which are largely inflationary—I take account of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington — we should, so far as possible, try to eliminate those inflationary gains.

I have searched the powerful debates in 1965, when long-term capital gains tax was first introduced. I cannot attribute to the Labour members of the then Treasury Bench the intention that it should bite on inflationary gains. I should like to think that what we did in 1982, and what I am commending today, is in harmony with the underlying concept of the tax as it was introduced in 1965.

From the Opposition's contributions to this debate I am led to suppose that the Labour party has perhaps changed its philosophic approach. We have not heard a great deal about the Opposition's plans for capital taxation, and it would have been helpful had the hon. Member for Thurrock — speaking with all the authority of the Opposition Front Bench—told us what kind of capital taxation system they would have devised had they been in power.

It is a rather one-sided debate if we are purely defending the ameliorative measures that we are introducing without knowing what is in the Opposition's mind. They have been very frank on the basic philosophy and are saying that equity should be reserved for those who are not likely to be within the charge of capital gains tax. They seem to be suggesting that, in relation to capital taxation in the fiscal sector, equity is as dust in the balance.

Let me give some of the underlying figures to explain why we believe that this modest clause—over-modest to some of my hon. Friends—is long overdue. In the 20 years between 1965, when capital gains tax was first introduced, and 1985, the retail price index has risen by 535 per cent. It is worth pondering that sombre figure because it indicates the extent to which so-called chargeable gains subject to capital gains tax contain a very large inflationary element. In a philosophic or economic sense they do not represent true gains — they are inflationary gains. If one believes in a properly operated capital market and that people should be encouraged to save and invest in this country, this is a problem to which any Government are bound to address themselves.

5.45 pm

The hon. Member for Thurrock made a powerful speech and asked many questions with which I shall attempt to deal, but she and her hon. Friends have not faced this essential question. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central should have done so, because he said that the private investor had failed this country. He also made the extraordinary proposition that we should encourage good investments and discourage bad ones. So say all of us, whether we speak from the Treasury Front Bench or as private investors! We all want good investments.

Does the hon. Gentleman take this a stage further and argue that we should deny loss relief to those who have made unfortunate investments? Of course we all want good investments in both a private and public capacity, but the hon. Gentleman must recognise—I am sure that he has devoted his keen intellect to this problem — that there is a risk dimension to investment.

After all, our great economic institutions often started as small risky enterprises. Had the Opposition's philosophy prevailed—thank heaven it did not—there would not have been very much investment to nourish those great institutions. There may be an opportunity in the Committee to hear from the Opposition how we should encourage good investment and identify it. When the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central has told me, I shall no doubt profit from his advice and will be able to see how I can translate his views into practical legislative form.

While recognising the imperfections and weaknesses of our judgment in this area, we think it is fair to cream off a modest amount of real gains for the state and to afford relief for real losses. That is the underlying philosophy behind the clause. I have given the expense, but that is a fair price to pay to try to reduce the charge to what I believe was the Labour party's real intention when it introduced capital gains tax in 1965. It could, dare I say it, have thought a little bit more about the detail. On some other occasion we shall no doubt be privileged to hear what the Opposition's long-term plans are for the future. We want to know how far they have advanced beyond 1965.

The hon. Member for Thurrock and the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central asked about administrative costs. That is a pertinent question. The hon. Lady gave a figure of 460 by 1989, whereas I would suggest 455—but what is five between both sides of the Committee? This may seem an increase in the administrative burden to Somerset house. The Economic Secretary will shortly commend the abolition of development land tax, and there is a point which may just change the hon. Lady's mind on whether to press abolition of DLT to a Division. That will release about 250 people expert in the valuation of land and buildings who will be available to take on that role in relation to capital gains tax.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Chief Secretary confirm that this is already a very expensive tax to collect and administer? Is it really wise to introduce changes to that tax which make it still more expensive to administer? Notwithstanding the fact that savings will be made elsewhere in the Finance Bill and that 200 staff will be released to deal with this, the Minister seems to be putting additional expense on a tax which I am sure he will concede is one of the most expensive that the Treasury collects.

Mr. Rees: Perhaps the most expensive is development land tax, but the Economic Secretary will give the full figures in a moment. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. This is not a very cost-effective tax, particularly when one takes into account the compliance cost of the individual taxpayer. The Committee should always bear that dimension of our fiscal system in mind, and should ask whether we are placing an unfair burden on individual taxpayers. As the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central will know, we do not allow tax relief for professional advice. The Government must always reflect whether this is over-complex and upon the administrative burdens that we are placing on the Inland Revenue. As Chief Secretary, I am deeply conscious of that point. I am charged with overseeing the costs of running the Government, if I may put it that way. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central is absolutely right. We have to be sensitive about compliance costs as they affect the individual taxpayer.

I should like to pretend that this will result in massive simplification. However, when I contemplate schedule 16 I do not put that forward as the paramount reason. The real conclusion to which the hon. Gentleman's shrewd questions drive me is that possibly capital gains tax ought to be abolished altogether. I do not know whether he wishes to impel me in that direction if he is serious about simplification, the reduction of the administrative burden and compliance costs. I have probably taken the hon. Gentleman's arguments a little further than he intended. Nevertheless, he may care to ponder that point.

The hon. Members for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, for Thurrock and perhaps for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) asked about the small taxpayer. The Committee recognises that the Government have increased the threshold to £5,900, which will take the small investor out of capital gains tax liability. If a beneficent Conservative Government continue to preside for some time over the economy it is possible that the small taxpayer will not be brought back within liability to capital gains tax. To return, however, to the philosophical point, I hope I carry my right hon. and hon. Friends with me when I say that I believe that the large investor is just as entitled to equity as is the small investor.

Mr. Fisher: Equity is what he has already got.

Mr. Rees: This is a play on words. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's wit. He knows that he is dragging a rather malodorous red herring across my track. The hon. Member for Thurrock asked me a shrewd and complicated question about an investment in Black and company. It is not for me to advise the hon. Lady on her investments. Professional advisers formerly went away and reflected upon Finance Bills after they had become law in order to advise their clients. Now, it seems, they are to obtain free advice from the Opposition Front Bench. We live in stirring times. This will enliven our debates in Committee. If I understood the full complexity of the hon. Lady's bed-and-breakfasting scheme, which would continue for a period of five years, the tax result would be the same. However, if the hon. Lady chooses to bed and breakfast year after year she will get her relief or pay her charge a little earlier. When I have read the full report of this debate in Hansard I may find that I have not fully appreciated the subtlety of her scheme, in which case I shall write to her and make my reply public. I should not wish the outside world to be misled either by my advice or by hers.

Since we are dealing with technical points, may I say that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) put forward a very important point about a claim for relief. He was absolutely right to fasten upon this point. We do not wish to saddle the taxpayer with a burden which he may be unable to foresee due to valuation eccentricities. Provided that the assessment has not been finally determined and that revocation does not take place within the period of two years during which a claim can be made, it can be withdrawn.

As for the hon. Lady's interesting technical points, she raised matters which have been canvassed in both the Financial Times and the Investors Chronicle. The tax is broadly in a sustainable and acceptable form. If, however, imperfections are revealed we shall be ready to look at them if they disadvantage either the taxpayer or Somerset house.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Is it recognised by the Treasury that there is an imperfection in the tax, in that it still remains a levy purely on an inflationary gain?

Mr. Rees: As my hon. Friend will recognise, it will not be a levy on future inflationary gains. However, total relief will not be offered for pre-1982 inflationary gains, and that is a matter of profound regret. The full cost of the amendment supported by my hon. Friend would be £550 million. Although the whole of that figure does not represent inflationary gains, a large proportion of it—about three fifths—is represented by such gains. I take my hon. Friend's point, and as I say it is a matter of profound regret.

To return to the point made by the hon. Lady, the suggestion has been made that the indexation provisions could be used by those seeking to establish a short-term capital gains tax loss on gilts and other debt instruments where counterbalancing gains do not normally arise. If the Government were to conclude that countervailing action was necessary, we should be prepared to introduce amendments at a later stage. I hope I have reassured the hon. Lady that it is no part of our philosophy that anything the Government do should contain imperfections of that kind.

This has been an interesting debate. It has ranged from points of fine detail to points of high philosophy. I hope that at the end of the day the Committee will be persuaded by the equity argument: that this tax should bite on real, not inflationary, gains. Whether a person has £70,000 worth of investments, or more, or less—I pick on that figure only because the hon. Lady chose that figure and I know exactly why she did so—he is entitled to a broad measure of equity from the tax system of this country. The measure will also encourage further savings and investments and a freer working of the capital markets. This must lead to an even greater and better flow of investment into the manufacturing and service industries. On both counts I hope that the Committee will accept the clause and agree that it does justice to a very important case.

Dr. McDonald: May I deal first with two points of detail before I comment upon the general principle? First, on Black and company, the Chief Secretary has dodged the point and he ought to look at it again. One receives the compound allowance and a greater indexation allowance if one bed and breakfasts every year rather than if one holds for five years without bed and breakfasting. The Chief Secretary ought to examine that example again and introduce amendments to avoid a gain of that kind. As for extra staff and simplification, the class IV contributions would have been reduced from 6·3 per cent. to 5·3 per cent. if the Government were serious about simplification, yet that has not been done. It was made clear by the Financial Secretary in last night's debate on the class IV contributions that 60 extra staff would be required. A figure of over 400 extra staff was given for the administration of capital gains tax.

The Financial Secretary suggested that this increase would be offset by the transfer of about 250 staff because of the abolition of development land tax. We do not support abolition, but because of the Government's majority presumably this measure will be passed. The result is that the Government will still have extra staff, extra expense and more complicated taxes to administer. Those points have not been fully answered by the Chief Secretary.

The Chief Secretary accused us of holding the view that equity should be reserved for those who are not likely to face the possibility of paying capital gains tax. That is not our view. We are committed to a fair tax regime for capital and income. The point is that the treatment should be fair between one group and another. We must face the fact that only those who will make a gain of at least £5,900 in any one year are likely to pay capital gains tax. Moreover, additional allowances are available as a result of those measures. That is far more, just like the exemption limit, than many people in Britain receive as their total gross income in any one year. That is why we want equal and fair treatment for all taxpayers, not just that group with whom the Chief Secretary is so much concerned. We are most concerned that those who have suffered most at the hands of the Government—those on average and below average earnings—should be taxed fairly.

As the Chief Secretary well knows, because he has considered these matters for a number of Budgets now, any Budget that is put before the country and Parliament has a number of priorities. Certain inequities might need to be ironed out in some sections of the tax system. The removal of each of those inequities will have a cost. It is a matter of the Government's priorities. The Opposition's quarrel with the Government's priorities is that they constantly choose to redress what they see to be inequities and injustices in the tax system for the better off. That is why we object to clause 64. The Government continually fail to give priority to those on average and below average earnings, who have suffered at the Government's hands.

At the end of my previous speech I referred to those who benefited last year from the abolition of the investment income surcharge and who will benefit this year from the changes in capital gains tax to the tune of about £500 million. I also referred to the payment of long-term supplementary benefit to the long-term unemployed. In the use of that £500 million, the Government have shown where their priorities lie. It has gone to 120,000 taxpayers who are liable to capital gains tax instead of to the 1·2 million long-term unemployed who are idle through no fault of their own.

It is not that we think that people who pay capital gains tax should not receive fair treatment. Of course they should. We quarrel with the Government's priorities. They will not treat the poor with fairness, justice, consideration and sympathy. That is why we oppose the clause.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I rise to intervene only briefly because a part of my annual ritual activities in the House is to speak on this matter. We have never in any way managed to influence the Government by any amendment to capital gains tax or capital transfer tax legislation since 1979, when I was elected to the House. The reason is simple: the Government do not want to know. All they want to do is press on with the substantial tax reductions for the better off in society. Once again, the Minister sits in his seat, as he has done for the past three years, and laughs because he finds these matters most amusing. The Government simply intend to press on making these reductions which everyone knows to be quite immoral.

Last week, during the county council election campaign I took a chair and put it on the pavement outside a chemist's shop in Maryport in my constituency. I stood on the chair and set out to explain to my electorate exactly what had happened in the Budget. I went through each of the measures and when I got to taxation I spent a few moments commenting on the reduction in capital gains tax. As I began to explain what had happened, I saw increasing expressions of anger on the faces of the people who were standing across the road listening to my speech.

Suddenly, a motor car came round the corner covered in Tory streamers and a man opened the window, leaned out and told me that I was talking rubbish in addressing my comments to the £150 million allocation to the small group of people in society to whom we have referred today. Suddenly, from the back of the crowd that had gathered around where I was speaking, two eggs appeared. Both of them shot across in front of me and landed on the bonnet and windscreen of the car. The Conservatives protested and drove off.

The point that I am trying to make is simple. When the public learn from Budget debates such as this where the money is being spent, in so far as it is being spent on subsidising the better off in society, they become increasingly angry. The problem that Labour Members have had over the past six years in trying to get that message out of the House.

Last year, during my contribution to a debate on the Budget, I addressed myself to the press lobby. I told them not to refer to me because I was irrelevant, but just to the issue when they reported what happened in Parliament that day. I told them to refer to the fact that in that Budget statement the Government were handing back £280 million in the form of free tax concessions. As usual, none of that reached people outside the House and nobody knew.

This year, in the allocation of time for debates in the Chamber on this year's Budget, we have tried, through the normal channels, to ensure that this debate took place during prime time in the House of Commons so as to ensure that people outside learned what was happening. Once again, we must tell them that on this occasion the Government are now spending a further £150 million—money which is being raised on the back of the deprivation of the great majority of people in British society.

The Minister does not give a damn. He is not interested. He believes that as part of this incentive society, which he is always telling us is at the heart of conservative philosophy, there is a need to interfere with capital taxes in this way. That is a load of tripe. It is a load of old rubbish. We all know that the only thing which motivates business men in this society is the demand for their products. First, the product must be right, and, secondly, a market must exist with a means of distribution into that market. That is the only incentive that a business man needs. He does not need interference in the capital gains tax and capital transfer tax mechanisms to ensure that he has the incentive to go out and start a business. In representing that position to the House once again this year, the Minister completely misunderstands the very people he represents. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might say that I was not here to hear his reply, but I was upstairs in the Public Accounts Committee where we were dealing with another equally absurd area of Government policy — the rate support grant and its allocation to local authorities.

In every area of financial management, the Government are wrong. They will continue to be wrong because they start from the wrong base. Next year the Government will introduce yet again an indexation measure. "Indexation of losses" is an absurd term. It is another little mechanism introduced by the Government to ensure that those who make are able to cover themselves when they lose. It is a grubby little measure, typical of this Government's Finance Bills.

I only wish that the public could hear the Chief Secretary. I do not support the televising of Parliament, but I wish that they could see and hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I should like the public to be able to respond to the insensitivity which the Minister has repeatedly demonstrated over the years. If the public were able to hear one of our debates on capital gains tax and capital transfer tax, they would understand the Government's real priorities and the Conservatives would never survive another general election.

Clause 64 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 16

INDEXATION

Question proposed, That this schedule be the Sixteenth schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I do not wish to detain the Committee, and will speak briefly about paragraph 19, My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) and I tabled two amendments only yesterday which, understandably, were not selected. I wish to seek advice from Treasury Ministers on the contents of paragraph 19, and do not argue a particular point.

There is an element of confusion among substantial financial institutions, such as the pension funds, about the meaning of paragraph 19 and it would be helpful to clarify the position. The Inland Revenue press circular said that in relation to holdings paragraph 19

"provides the general ordering rule that securities shall be identified with those acquired earlier rather than later."

It than has in brackets the initials FIFO, which I assume mean first in, first out.

If I understand the paragraph, it sets out for the purposes of capital gains tax the order of identification of assets disposed of. Paragraph 19(2) changes the rules that have applied since 1 April 1982. No doubt the Chief Secretary will confirm my understanding of that.

Under the 1982 legislation, assets were identified on a last in, first out basis, which ensured that indexation relief was kept to a minimum. The Budget statement provided that indexation relief should be extended, but the Finance Bill goes beyond anything mentioned in the statement—it provides for the introduction of a first in, first out basis of identification.

Financial institutions have built up their holdings over many years. The new rules entail identification of disposals with the earliest acquisition, so that disposal of part of the holding will give rise to a significantly higher gain than would have obtained under existing legislation. In large part that gain will reflect inflation before the introduction of indexation. The practical consequence will be that the institutions will not sell any holdings that have been held for many years simply to avoid the penal taxation that might apply if my understanding of the schedule is correct.

That would be undesirable. It would inhibit the institutions' freedom to manage their portfolios efficiently. More importantly, it would reduce the tax take to nil. Portfolio managers are not daft and they will freeze their holdings. The intention of the Budget statement was to relieve inflationary gains rather than increase the yield of capital gains tax.

The amendment that we tabled yesterday sought to establish whether we understood the position correctly. Treasury Ministers should make the position clear so that appropriate adjustments can be made and steps taken by portfolio managers to resolve these questions.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Is the hon. Gentleman trying to reduce the capital gain and therefore reduce the tax, or is he trying to increase the capital gain and therefore increase the tax?

Mr. Kirkwood: That is a fair question. I am not arguing a case. I followed the debate yesterday——

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): You are sitting on the fence.

Mr. Kirkwood: No, I am not sitting on the fence. If I am given the opportunity, I want to say that I freely supported the attitude taken by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and the Labour party in our previous debate. I agree that we should seek to maximise the amount of money from capital gains tax. I am worried about the position where the changes by default would end up with the tax take being reduced. Portfolio managers will freeze their holdings if the first in, first out principle applies. I hope that I have answered the question as clearly as possible.

There is confusion about the interpretation of paragraph 19. I am not trying to be clever—mine is a probing speech. Senior portfolio managers, who know far more than I about these provisions, are confused. It would be useful if the Chief Secretary could clarify the position.

6.30 pm

Mr. Peter Rees: I had noticed the amendments that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) had tabled. I appreciate his concern and I shall respond to his remarks as lucidly as I can.

The hon. Gentleman will recall that between 1965 and 1982 the FIFO rule—first in, first out—applied. After a measure of indexation was introduced in 1982, both the FIFO and LIFO—last in, first out—rules applied. Now we are reverting to the original intention of the legislation, to FIFO, and I shall list the advantages that we see in returning to that.

We hope that it will leave taxpayers at the earliest opportunity — of course, it is within their control whether it will be so—with one holding of shares and one pool of expenditure. It will therefore be a considerable simplification, and simplification is sought by hon. Members in all parts of the Committee.

It will no longer be necessary to keep details of shares acquired more than 20 years ago. That should be particularly helpful for those with computer programmes. The effect of the rule on individual taxpayers — I appreciate that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire was concerned more with institutions — will depend on the price and acquisition date of their holdings. They will have to check on their position in that respect.

The hon. Gentleman pointed out that people with big, pre-1982, gains might be frozen, as it were, into a particular position. I regret that, but it must be for them to judge. I explained clearly in answer to the first set of amendments to clause 54 moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and when replying to the debate on the last series of amendments that, in our view, the tax is now in a sustainable and acceptable form. That does not, however, rule out minor amendments. It is for people to draw their own conclusions on that.

I do not believe that the provision will necessarily have the consequences that the hon. Gentleman forecast, but he is right to say that the position should be made absolutely clear. While the language may seem somewhat convoluted —it is a complex subject—I hope that I have explained what the provisions convey. We shall look again at the wording. In the meantime, I hope that I have conveyed the intention of the Government.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It would not be in order for me to ask questions about amendments that have not been selected. However, if the wording of those amendments were set out in a document other than the Order Paper and were submitted to the Chief Secretary, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman reply that what was proposed would cost or save the Exchequer money?

Mr. Rees: It is difficult to forecast. It would depend on the judgment of the managers of individual portfolios. It would vary according to the composition of the portfolio, how much of it was pre-1982 and post-1982, what the shares were and whether the managers took the view that eventually something more dramatic might happen to the tax in question.

I hope that I have conveyed the Government's intention. I hope, too, that the schedule conveys our intention. I promise the Committee to look again at the words of the provision to see whether there is any possible ambiguity. If there is, we shall return with a suitable amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 16 agreed to.

Clause 87

ABOLITION OF DEVELOPMENT LAND TAX AND TAX ON DEVELOPMENT GAINS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Terry Davis: For three hours, we have been debating provisions which give away £155 million to people with some of the highest incomes in the nation. As we come to clause 87, we debate provisions which give away more money — another £50 million — to people who are very well off.

We are debating what is called development land tax, which was introduced some years ago as a tax on the development value of land. In effect, it is a tax on the increased value of land, usually agricultural land, resulting from planning permission being granted by a local authority.

I hope that the whole Committee will agree that such an increase is a windfall gain — a gratuitous gain. The land has increased in value as a result of planning permission. That increase has been created by the community, and we oppose the abolition of development land tax because the Labour party believes that part of that increase should be returned to the community.

The tax was originally introduced by the then Labour Government in 1976. It accompanied the Community Land Act of the previous year. That Act was repealed by the Conservatives on their return to office.

It can be argued, therefore, that the raison d'etre for development land tax was removed by the abolition of the Community Land Act. However, our case is that the development land tax is justified in its own right. We believe it right that society should insist that part of this windfall gain should be used for the benefit of society and that the money should be recovered through a special tax.

There have always been exemptions from development land tax. When the tax was introduced by the Labour Government, there was an exemption for local authorities and similar bodies. Charities were also exempt; the exemption in that case applied to land which they already owned on 12 September 1974. That ensured that they would not pay tax if the land was developed after that date. It is interesting to reflect—in view of yesterday's debate in Committee about charities and the extension of VAT to newspaper advertisements—that when Labour Members argued yesterday for an exemption from VAT on those advertisements to be given to charities, the Conservatives resisted our pleas. Conservative Members did not take that attitude in 1976 when development land tax was introduced. They then claimed to be friends of charities and pressed the Labour Government to extend the exemption to charities which acquired land after that date, so enabling them to develop it and make a tax-free development gain. In considering this issue, we are entitled to contrast the words of Conservative spokesmen some years ago on the introduction of development land tax and the dogmatic and doctrinaire attitude — they would describe it as fiscal neutrality — which prevailed in the Government's arguments yesterday.

There has always been another exemption from development land tax. That applied to a person building a house for his or her own use. The increase in value in that instance, resulting from the granting of planning permission, has always been exempt from the tax.

Similarly, exemption has always existed for industrialists who develop land for their own use. Under the scheme introduced by the then Labour Government, payment of the tax was deferred until the property developed by the industrialist was eventually sold, if it should ever be sold. No tax arose at the time of development because the Labour Government wished to encourage industrialists to build factories and expand industry.

The Labour Government gave another exemption. From the beginning, the first £10,000 profit made from the increased value of the land as a result of planning permission was exempt. An individual, company or trust could profit to the tune of £10,000 a year as the result of planning permission being given for land which was to be developed, and was not taxed on this profit.

That exemption of £10,000—call it a tax allowance—applied from 1976. When the Conservatives came to power in 1979 they increased that exemption to £50,000, and at the same time they reduced the rate of tax from 80 to 60 per cent. Those changes cost the Revenue £10 million in a full year.

Two years later the Conservatives extended to commercial developments the deferment applying to industrialists. In other words, if a person built an office block in a city, the tax did not apply until the office block was eventually sold by the developer, provided that the developer had been using it for his own purposes. I have not been able to ascertain the cost of that minor change. I accept that it was probably quite small. I mention it only so that we may have a full picture of the way in which the Government have gradually cut the revenue from this tax on windfall gains.

In 1984, the deferment became an exemption for industrialists and commercial developers. In that year, the Conservatives—fresh from the election victory of the year before—decided that, if a property had not been sold within 12 years, deferment would become exemption, and the developer would not be liable for development land tax. We were told that the change cost the Revenue £4 million. In the same Finance Bill, the Government increased the threshold from £50,000 a year to £75,000 a year, at a cost to the Revenue of another £9 million.

Finally, this year, the Chancellor announced that he intended to abolish this tax and that the measure would cost £50 million in a full year to the Revenue.

We have seen a series of changes and slices in this tax. It reminds me very much of the way in which, some years ago, Russian foreign policy was described as "slicing the salami". We are told that the final act of abolition will cost £50 million. The true cost of Conservative policy on development land tax has been at least £73 million in a full year.

I emphasise that this abolition of development land tax does not mean that the person who benefits from the windfall gain resulting from planning permission will not pay any tax on the gain. Of course, that person will still be liable to pay capital gains tax, which is levied at 30 per cent. The figures that I have cited—£50 million for the cost of abolition and £73 million for the total cost of what the Government have done—are net figures after allowing for the offset effect of capital gains tax.

It is important to note that more tax will be paid by the small landowner because of the abolition of development land tax. He will have benefited in the past from an exemption of £10,000 under the Labour Government, which was increased progressively to £50,000 and then to £75,000 under the Conservative Government. The person who was exempt from tax will become in the future liable to pay capital gains tax at 30 per cent. because a similar exemption from capital gains tax amounts to only £5,900. The Government are benefiting not only the people who receive windfall gains resulting from planning permission given by local authorities but the people who make the greatest gains. They are not benefiting the people who make only small gains.

It is important to contrast the effect of the abolition of development land tax on the tax rate, because there will only be a capital gains tax of 30 per cent. on these development gains. I contrast that tax with the taxes that this Government levy on earned income. People pay income tax on their earned income at a rate of 30 per cent. increasing to 60 per cent. This year, the rate of corporation tax is 40 per cent. The tax on the windfall gains which have been wholly unearned and undeserved will only be 30 per cent.

When the Development Land Tax Bill was introduced by the Labour Government, the Conservative party opposed it. Conservative Members were, however, always careful in debates to distance themselves from any suggestion that those unearned profits should not be taxed. Indeed, on Second Reading the spokesman for the Conservative party—he is now a Minister—moved an amendment that accepted and the Conservative party did not vote against the Second Reading.

"that increases of land values resulting from planning decisions should bear a special tax"

6.45 pm

In an earlier debate, the Chief Secretary told the Committee that the Economic Secretary would reply to this debate on the Government's behalf. I know that the Economic Secretary took great interest in the introduction of this tax. He told the House during the debate on Development Land Tax Bill that he had some personal experience of increases in development value because of his directorship in a company that had developed a site in London for a hotel with the additional aid of a special grant. He could therefore bring his experience and expertise to the subject—I make no criticism of that—so the Economic Secretary—the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart)—participated in the Second Reading debate on the Development Land Tax Bill. He told the House that he regretted the fact that there was not a common approach between the Conservative and Labour parties. He accepted that there needed to be a tax on the gains made as a result of planning permission being given. He said:

"we accept that planning gains should attract some special tax."—[Official Report, 15 March 1976; Vol. 907, c. 954, 1035.]

I emphasise the words "special tax". Those words were also used by some of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues.

When the Economic Secretary explains the Government's decision to abolish development land tax, will he explain where the "special tax" is? Where is the special tax which the Conservative spokesman when in Opposition, agreed should be levied on these windfall gains resulting from planning permission?

During the debate on the Development Land Tax Bill and elsewhere, Conservative spokesmen argued for what they described as an "infrastructure charge" to be paid by developers. Where is the infrastructure charge to be introduced by the Conservative Government on the abolition of development land tax?

Any fair-minded person reading the debates on the introduction of this tax would have expected a Conservative Government, if they abolished development land tax, to introduce a new tax. Conservatives would regard it as a tax on better lines, but it would nevertheless be a tax on those unearned profits that arise solely as a result of a line drawn on a map by someone in a planning office. In those days, when in opposition, the Conservatives did not dare to contest the need for an additional tax. They only complained about its level and the method by which it would be levied. They said that they thought that a rate of 80 per cent. was too high and argued in the House and in Committee for a rate of 60 per cent. In one sense, it follows that we cannot complain about the reduction to 60 per cent. in 1979. Anyone who looked at the debates could have expected a Conservative Government to reduce the rate from 80 per cent. to 60 per cent., but could not have expected the tax to be completely swept away without being replaced. This tax was described repeatedly by Conservative spokesmen in the House and in Committee as a special tax that was entirely justified.

The Conservative party manifesto in 1983 did not refer to the abolition of development land tax. The Chancellor has boasted of abolishing three taxes. He refers to the abolition of the national insurance surcharge, an abolition that we supported; the abolition of the investment income surcharge, a measure which we strongly opposed; and the abolition of development land tax, which we oppose equally strongly. The abolition of development land tax gives back £50 million in a full year to people who are already well off. It does not fulfil a Conservative party manifesto commitment or election pledge. The Conservative party manifesto in 1983 did not refer to the possibility of the abolition of development land tax. I understand that it was referred to in the guide issued to Conservative candidates in 1983, but they were not encouraged by the Government to expect the abolition of development land tax.

I have not read the guide but I am told that it contains the statement:

"The tax remains in place to control the possibility of abuse."

What will happen about those abuses? The 1983 guide for Conservative candidates admitted that there were some abuses. What else does that sentence in the guide mean? What will be done to control the abuses that two years ago Conservative central office admitted were liable to take place if the tax was abolished?

The Labour party will oppose the abolition of the tax not just because it gives £50 million to people whose need is far less than that of many others in our society, but because it goes back on everything that the Conservative party said when in opposition.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): I rise, as is the custom in these matters, to declare an interest as a consultant partner in a firm of chartered surveyors which might in the past have earned fees from acting for clients who were contesting tax claims with the development land tax office in Middlesbrough. In a sense, I am declaring a reverse interest because that firm may lose fees it might otherwise have received had my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer not made that welcome and overdue announcement in his Budget speech.

I remember when the Government of which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) was not a member introduced the Community Land Bill in 1975. It was an act of political vindictiveness. At a stroke it froze the supply of land that builders—the largest employers of skilled labour — wanted to enable them to build homes for the first-time buyers over whom that same Government were weeping crocodile tears.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If that tax was so bad why were those record house building years in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Heddle: They were not record years for house building in the private sector. They may have been record years for house building in the public sector, but that record did nothing to reduce council house waiting lists.

I remember the introduction of the Development Land Tax Act 1976 by the Government of which the hon. Member for Hodge Hill was a member. They introduced it because the Community Land Act 1975 was seen patently not to work, to do the reverse of what it was designed to do, and to freeze the supply of land. What happened? The supply of land dried up completely. When bank finance became more readily available, the money fell into the hands of secondary and tertiary banks and property speculators who made profits hand over fist and contract against contract. No foundations were dug. No brick was laid. No house was built, and the level of homelessness increased.

The supply of land will increase only through the operation of market forces — supply and demand working in partnership—and if this punitive tax, which last year was 8 per cent. higher than corporation tax and which is now well above the level of that tax, is abolished. Land prices will stabilise and the construction industry will feel that it can buy land at realistic prices and offer properties built on that land at prices that people can afford.

Opposition Members fail to accept that an impost of 60 per cent. has the effect of increasing the cost of land by 60 per cent. It discourages the land owner from bringing that land forward for development. The hon. Member for Hodge Hill said that he looked for a replacement tax to contribute towards infrastructure costs. That tax exists. Capital gains tax will continue to be paid by the private landowner and corporation tax will be paid by the company that sells land. How can he say that a reduction in taxation which will guarantee to increase the supply of land and stimulate the construction industry, and the jobs created thereby, is not a good measure? How can he say that with a corporation tax rate of 35 per cent. there is no replacement taxation? How can he say that a form of taxation whereby development gains cannot be offset against development losses is a good form of taxation? How can he say that a form of taxation that costs the development land tax office in Middlesbrough more to collect than the Exchequer receives is a good form of taxation? It is nonsense.

I look to the construction industry to respond now to my right hon. Friend's welcome announcement in the Budget speech and to buy land, and for landowners to make land available at realistic prices so that builders can employ the skilled labour that a boost to home ownership will require which is waiting for the jobs. That will benefit young married couples on council waiting lists in my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Hodge Hill who want to get on to the ladder of home ownership. A reduction in the 60 per cent. punitive rate of taxation will release more land at realistic prices.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). He plainly represents interests connected with land speculation.

Mr. Heddle: On a point of order, Mr. McCartney. The hon. Gentleman has made a statement which, with respect to him, I believe is a slur. I declared an interest as a consultant in a firm of chartered surveyors, not an interest in the matter to which he referred.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Hugh McCartney): I did not hear any slur.

Mr. Randall: I shall not discuss the interests of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire any further, but if the cap fits he should perhaps wear it.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) said, development land tax was introduced by the Labour Government in 1976. It was introduced to offset windfall profits made from the sale or the development of land. Many of us will remember what happened to land prices in the early 1970s. In the south-east of England prices went berserk. There was enormous abuse in the sale and exploitation of land. Ordinary people suffered. For that reason, I oppose the abolition of development land tax.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill pointed out, the profit arises from the land tax at a time when a local authority grants planning permission to a developer of a piece of land or to somebody who wants to sell a piece of land for a particular purpose or use. However, I think that the development land tax legislation introduced by the Labour Government was reasonable. It created exemptions. As a result, organisations such as charities and local authorities which serve community interests were exempt, as were people who built houses for their own use on land that they owned. That to my mind seems perfectly reasonable.

In the years since the last Labour Government introduced the development land tax, the Conservatives have been chipping away at it. I would like to have been a fly on the wall listening to all the lobbying that must have taken place by property speculators and the like of the various Ministers and Departments, pleading to be given an opportunity to make the kind of profits that they had made hitherto.

In 1981, the fairly new Conservative Government extended the exemptions to which I have referred to cover commercial organisations.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: If I may pursue the point that my hon. Friend made about lobbying and arm twisting, things are done in a far more genteel fashion in the Conservative party than they are in the Labour party. It is in fact not arm twisting or anything similarly painful, but the dangling of prospects. I suggest to my hon. Friend that, as part of the inquiry into the processes that went on behind closed doors, he should ask how many property companies made substantial donations to the Conservative party.

Mr. Randall: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because in fact that was implicit in my comments. That is why I said that I would like to have been a fly on the wall listening to the various probing questions. I am sure that all the briefs coming into the various ministerial offices would have suggested that, if there could be a relaxation of the tax, there must be good prospects for the Conservative Government. I would not like to say that that actually happened, but there are doubts in my mind as to how all this took place.

The 1981 change provided an opportunity for the organisations concerned with the development of office blocks to have a relaxation of this form of taxation. In my view, we are discussing here large organisations and rich institutions that invest in office blocks and other real estate. The debate is really about whether we should be giving relief to organisations of that kind or helping the ordinary man in the street. That is the general thrust of what is being said. The clause is yet another measure introduced by the Conservative Government that results in money going from the less well off to the ultra-rich and to the very well off. That has been the philosophy of the Government since they were elected in 1979.

After the change in 1981 came the 1984 change whereby, the Government altered the deferment arrangements of development land tax for industrial and commercial development to complete exemption. Certain conditions had to be met. One was that the property would not be disposed of within a 12-year period. This was another chipping away of the development land tax for the benefit of landowners who, I think one could say, would generally be pretty rich people or institutions.

The Government seem to be intent on encouraging land speculators and land speculation. When the Labour Government were in power, they introduced the development land tax at 80 per cent., but soon after coming to power in 1979 the Conservative Government relaxed the rate to 60 per cent. The original scheme introduced by the Labour Government in 1976 was reasonable in that the first £10 million of profit—this is on a per annum basis—was exempt from development land tax. That was a reasonable legislative measure and, for the life of me, I cannot understand the reason for this change except, as I said earlier, that I believe that there has been some arm twisting and, as we know, the Government are intent on supporting the very rich at the expense of the less well off. These facts can be substantiated. The people and institutions whom we have been discussing are a tiny minority of very well off people.

In 1984, the Conservative Government increased the exemption allowance to £75,000. Now they propose to abolish development land tax. I understand that that will cost the Exchequer about £50 million in 1985-86. If the Minister and some of his hon. Friends would only visit my constituency to see for themselves the social conditions, the appalling housing and the deprivation in the area, I feel almost certain that they would understand why I am so bitterly opposed to the priority of the Government in taking £50 million and giving it to property speculators.

In Committee yesterday, we debated advertisements in newspapers. In a long debate, many hon. Members expressed strong feelings about this form of taxation, which I believe is approximately equivalent to the amount of revenue that would be lost by the complete removal of the development land tax. In the debate, hon. Members said that many ordinary people wish to insert advertisements in newspapers at the time of a family bereavement or on the occasion of a birth or silver wedding. These advertisements are important to many people. As a result of the Government's measure, a tax of 15 per cent. will be imposed. This is just one example of the Government's priorities. They are giving £50 million to landowners and speculators and adding to the cost of advertisements in local newspapers to the detriment of ordinary people.

Many changes have taken place since 1979. Hon. Members who took part in last year's debates on the Finance Bill will realise the insidious way in which the Government have introduced these taxation changes. We heard then of tax relief for stud farm owners, and a form of tax relief for company directors whose children are educated at their companies' expense. The most galling thing is that, when Parliament was debating that legislation last year in the early hours of the morning, the Press Gallery was empty. As my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) pointed out, it is galling to realise that the general public are often unaware of the extent to which taxation changes are taking place.

[Mr. Randall]

This is a question of priorities. As someone has said, Socialism is the choice of priorities. That is why we are so bitterly opposed to the clause. Why did the Government not use the money to avoid petrol costing £2 a gallon? That would have helped those who live in rural areas and those who must use their cars to collect their prescriptions. The increase in the cost of petrol is tough on many people. It is right that we should oppose the abolition of development land tax.

I am delighted that we are debating this matter on the Floor of the House rather than in Committee. I hope that the press will pick the matter up, and that people will realise the extent to which the Government have been taxing the poor and giving money to the rich for almost six years. The net effect is that the rich have become extremely rich and the poor extremely poor. About 18 months ago, "Breadline Britons" reported that nearly 8 million people were living in poverty. The way in which the Government are allowing poverty to continue while at the same time they are feathering the nests of rich property owners and speculators is shameful.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I had not intended to speak, until the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) referred to some figures for which he did not produce statistics. I went to the Library to examine the statistics and they make interesting reading. They show that the Government have no case for introducing this concession. There is no need for it. The hon. Gentleman was right that there are more private sector starts than previously. In 1977, the first year for which the tax existed, 134,810 houses were built in the private sector. In 1978 the figure increased to 157,000, and in 1983 it had reached 167,000. There is always a need to build more houses, but these figures show a successful policy, which is based on raising development land tax. The tax paid does not impede growth in the private sector; indeed, it is supporting the private sector house building programme.

Mr. Heddle: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and ask him to consider the following fact. The properties built in 1977, 1978 and 1979 were built not on land which was bought between 1977 and 1979, but on land bought by builders up to five years ahead of their building programme. Therefore, his statistics are of little relevance. The hon. Gentleman referred to the welcome increase in starts in 1983. The houses were built on land which was subject to a lower rate of development land tax —it had fallen from 80 per cent. to 60 per cent.—which was introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget of 1980 — not 1979 as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) said earlier.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: As that is the hon. Gentleman's response, perhaps he will examine the position a little further back to see whether his argument continues to hold water. In 1973, there were 215,000 private sector starts. By 1974, the figure had collapsed to 105,000. It then increased to 149,000 and to 154,000. My point is that the policy has not damaged the growth in private house building. Every suggestion that it has is negated by the figures that I have produced today. When the Minister replies, he must prove to the House that there is a need to remove the tax, to ensure that growth can take place where it has not taken place. He cannot prove that, because the statistics show that growth has taken place.

I wish to ensure that people outside the House do not misunderstand the figures. Although there has been a growth in private sector housing development, there has been a collapse in the public sector from 132,000 in 1977 to 47,000 in 1983. The figure is even lower this year. That means that this year the total figure of 214,000 for all dwellings is lower than for any year under the Labour Government. We have won the argument in every respect.

The hon. Gentleman said that the benefit from the reduction in tax would be passed on to the consumer, but that does not happen. That is not how the market works. The benefit is not passed on in the free market. What happens is the same as what happens in the enterprise zones. Although there has been a rates subsidy, its effect has made little difference to the market cost to the manufacturer or tenant in taking a site. Rents have merely increased. The market, not the question whether there is a tax, determines the cost of land. We are merely handing over the £50 million or net £20 million to landowners. The whole exercise is a waste of time. If it could be proved that the abolition of DLT could lead to an abundance of new land coming onto the market, there might be an argument for it. However, it will not do that. Abolition of DLT has no influence on the number of private sector starts.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): We can show that. It is clear that if the tax is removed, a substantial number of landowners would put their land on the market. That would increase the supply of land on the market, which would, of necessity, reduce prices. In my professional capacity, I have seen that the phasing effect, which takes place to take account of annual exemptions, has meant that many landowners have released their land in parcels in order to take maximum account of the annual exemptions available. That has delayed the flow of land on to the market.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I only wish that my memory were better. I recall a time during the past four years— my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) may have served with me on that Finance Bill —when we discussed an amendment which dealt with land banks being held by building companies. It appeared that they had a tax problem because they were holding such large tracts of land. There is no shortage of land available to building companies today. Indeed, some companies say that they are carrying too large a pool of land. They want a demand for homes and an expansion of public sector moneys to ensure a construction programme. Building companies say that they have the land, yet the hon. Gentleman seeks to prove that more land will be forthcoming. It may be that the building companies do not need the land, as it is already available.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire is a free marketeer and is in the estate agent business, land valuation, or whatever. He is in that set and he knows exactly what I mean. He knows that the only determinant of land values is the free market. If we hand over the net £20 million, we will merely give it to people who do not need it. If it could be proved that the provision would reduce the value of housing, we might have to take the clause seriously, but it cannot be proved. When the Minister replies, he must prove that the abolition will lead to more houses being built, and that the consumer will benefit. If he cannot do that, he should withdraw the clause.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) should disregard the siren voices from the Conservative party, because arguments along those lines can always be produced to defend a concession to a vested interest, which this clause essentially is. The fact that they cannot produce better arguments than the ones that we have heard during this debate is a testimony to how tawdry the concession is.

The argument that the concession will increase housing starts is completely fallacious. That depends on interest rates, and the Government's prolonged policy of high interest rates has crucified not only house buyers and those who have mortgages, but house builders. It inhibits them from buying land and building the land banks that they need to ensure continuity. Interest rates will be the real determinant of housing starts, not this concession, which will go straight into the pockets of the developers and the property companies. It will certainly not come back to the consumer.

I cannot emphasise enough what is happening here. The Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen were right to pick this clause on development land tax, and the earlier clause on capital gains tax, for debate on the Floor of the House. There is no need for either concession.

This concession will do nothing to stimulate the economy or the housing market beyond what is determined by interest rates. It will do nothing for economic efficiency, jobs or growth. It is the straightforward concession of a substantial sum of money to the Government's fat friends——

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth) rose——

Mr. Mitchell: I give way to one of the Government's fattest friends.

Mr. Dickens: Perhaps I am one of the Government's fattest friends. I am an engineer, not a property developer or a financier. The hon. Gentleman said that there would be no advantage to the consumer. Is it not right that many British institutions hold many acres of land? The trade unions and other bodies invest their pension funds in those institutions. Therefore, if there is a tax advantage to those institutions in the sale or development of their land, the money will accelerate and enhance the pension funds in which trade unions and many other disadvantaged bodies are pleased to place their money. Would they not obtain a better yield? The hon. Gentleman's argument is incorrect.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman's intervention takes us completely away from the point, but it demonstrates the paucity of argument for this measure. His was an especially far-fetched argument. If he is advocating that the pension funds should be allowed to buy and sell land more easily so that their money will be, not far-fetched but far-carried and invested overseas—following the huge outflow of investment from Britain—that will stimulate the free market, but it will be of no great advantage to British citizens or to the creation of jobs.

This measure is a straight giveaway of the sort that is normally trundled through Committee at dead of night. My hon. Friends were right to ask that it be debated in the early evening. Regrettably, the press, with their usual inattention to such sordid manoeuvrings, are not here to highlight it. But what is happening deserves to be screamed from the rooftops, because houses will continue to be built, provided that interest rates allow it. This concession to the Government's fat friends is justified by double talk and by devious and largely inaccurate arguments.

The day after the measure was announced by the Chancellor in his Budget statement, The Times carried an article stating that the property industry welcomed it. But the industry did not say, "Thank you, Chancellor, for £50 million," which is what it is about. It said that the tax would consume much of its time. The £50 million would appear to be purely incidental. It is a straightforward benefit about which nothing is said.

Development land tax, which was rightly introduced by the Labour Government in 1976, is part of a long tradition of attempts, some more successful than others, to ensure that the return on the increased value of land, which comes through no effort on the part of the owner, accrues to the agency which causes that increase in value — the community. Is it not right, in principle, that that unearned windfall should accrue to the community? There are always practical difficulties in that, but they can be solved. The principle of development land tax is so glaringly right as to be incontrovertible.

The tradition goes back to the unearned increment of land tax which Lloyd George introduced in 1909. After the "people's Budget" of that year, Trafalgar square was filled with an enormous crowd singing:

"The land, the land, 'twas God that gave the land,
The land, the land, the ground on which we stand.
Why should we be beggars with the ballot in our hand?
God gave the land to the people."

That crowd was led by Winston Churchill. They were celebrating the taxing of the unearned increment of land value, which is part of the development land tax introduced by the Labour Government. It is a long-standing principle that the increase accruing as unearned profit to developers and owners should be taxed for the benefit of the community.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The 1947 Act removed from landowners the right to do what they wished with their land. They had to obtain permission. Before 1947, a man could do what he wished with his land. The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the concession whereby those rights may be given back should then be the subject of taxation. It stands logic entirely on its head.

Mr. Mitchell: That was not my argument. I was saying that it is right to take back some element of the unearned improvement in land values. The principle has been a long-standing part of fiscal legislation and endeavour, dating back to the "people's Budget" of 1909.

One can argue about planning permission and how it should be pursued, but one cannot argue that people who have done nothing to increase the value of land should benefit from that increase, as they would if development land tax was abolished. It is an unearned profit, and it is right to tax it.

It has been shown that the income can be taxed without inhibiting development. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) produced telling figures in support of that argument. Despite all that the Government have done to increase interest rates, depress the building industry and drive builders into bankruptcy, there is still development, except in public sector housing. It is not true to say that the tax has inhibited development. The increase in value should be taxed because it is a socially produced increase from which the full benefit should not accrue to the landowner. It should accrue to the community.

Labour introduced development land tax, which accompanied the Community Land Act. It was intended as a step towards public ownership of all development land. That would seem to be right in principle. One can argue about the way in which it is operated and about whether one needs to go to the full 100 per cent., but the tax is an attempt to see land values accrue to the community, which in itself, is right. The idea was that there should be public ownership and that the profits should accrue to the community. That was the essence of the argument. It was a tax on the windfall profit.

7.30 pm

The exemptions allowed under the Labour Government were adequate to ensure that the system functioned efficiently and fairly. Local authorities, charities and anyone building a house for his own use have always been exempt. If an industrialist developed land for his own use, the tax was deferred until the property was sold, under Labour's scheme. Labour exempted the first £50,000 profit per year by any developer. Therefore, there were sufficient exemptions and allowances to make it a fair system and to embody the principle that I have emphasised is important.

I am glad to see the Liberals here in their serried ranks to back us, as they did in 1909, with the people's Budget. However, their Social Democratic party allies are not here — they were not here yesterday either. The new members of the alliance are not as strong in the defence of Lloyd George's tradition as we are in the rest of the House.

The principle is right and fair and should be maintained. What has been done by the Government is a straightforward, vicious, nasty, sordid and tawdry concession to their fat friends.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I am glad to respond to this debate on development land tax, particularly because, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) reminded us, I was involved in the legislation when it was originally introduced in 1976.

The hon. Member for Hodge Hill rightly said that the measure does not represent the removal of all tax from transactions which, up to now, have been subject to development land tax. The amount concerned will fall to be taxed not only under income tax but under capital gains tax, or corporation tax for companies. However, I must correct one thing that he said. I understood him to say that a small landowner would be worse off because tax would be payable if there were no DLT whereas, had there been DLT, the amount would have fallen within the exempt amount. That is not correct. The exempt amount may exempt the taxpayer from DLT. However, as with the exempt amount on transactions that give rise to DLT, all the remaining part of any profit or gain is taxable in the ordinary way. Therefore, it will not have the adverse effect that the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Several hon. Members reminded us that DLT was part of the community land scheme arrangements of the previous Labour Government. Under Labour, there was the Central Land Board in 1947, the Land Commission and the betterment levy in 1967, and the Community Land Act and development land tax in 1976. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that he thought that nationalisation of development land was the direction in which we should go. Not only do I disagree with that in principle as a Conservative, but in practice the consequences of all those proposals have not met the expectations of those who introduced them.

Development land tax has caused many problems, many foreseen by my hon. Friends and me when we were considering the proposals nine years ago in Committee. A tax at a rate of 80 per cent. rising to 100 per cent., backed with powers for local authorities to acquire all development land, was more in tune with the theoretical ideas of Socialist planning than with the practical realities of the construction industry, in development and in bringing forward land for building. That is the way in which things have turned out.

I should like to correct another impression that Labour Members give. It is that development land tax is substantially the province of rich landowners and that the windfall gains of which they speak are such a social evil that they should be taxed at penal rates. In fact, less than half of those who pay the tax are individuals. Most of the tax charges are assessed against companies, statutory undertakers, builders and so on. It is because the groups involved in building and development are most subject to the tax that so many problems have been caused.

I was asked by the hon. Member for Hodge Hill to say why the Government were proposing the abolition of the tax when, nine years ago, in Committee on the Development Land Tax Bill, I and other spokesmen for the Conservative Opposition had accepted that there was a case in principle for the taxation of such gains. The simple answer is that there was a case in principle for the taxation of such gains in the circumstances of the 1970s, with high prospects of inflation and substantial speculative gains at that time. However, not only is there no case for such a tax today because inflation is now much reduced—the inflationary conditions that encouraged speculation no longer apply, and so long as the Government have anything to do with it, they will not return—but there is no case in the foreseeable future for such a tax, which has such an adverse effect on development and construction.

I was asked to give proof. Of course one cannot prove the future, but nine years ago we gave projections of what was likely to happen under the tax. They have proved far more accurate than the claims that were made by Labour Members at that time. I can quote some opinions to justify our belief. Several estate agents such as Savills, Knight Frank and Rutley and Grant and Partners have said that abolition of DLT will increase the supply of residential building land. They have said that it will have an entirely beneficial effect by releasing sites for development, enabling industrial companies to move to more suitable sites, and helping housebuilders. The House Builders Federation believes that it will encourage landowners to sell land for development. The Incorporated Society of Valuers and Auctioneers says that it will "encourage the building industry and employment".

Those comments are on the positive side. The strongest case for the abolition of DLT is the inhibiting effect that it has had on commercial activity and on building and development in recent years. It is expensive and difficult to administer, not only for the Inland Revenue but for the taxpayer. It has provided a significant impediment to the functioning of the market, and has undoubtedly damaged industry and commerce——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How?

Mr. Stewart: I shall elaborate on what I have said because I am invited to do so by the hon. Gentleman.

I give one of many examples which have been brought to the attention of Ministers by assiduous Members. For example, a major firm in west London employing hundreds of workers and exporting the vast bulk of its products to overseas markets felt unable to move out of its present outmoded premises and into a larger factory because of the threat of development land tax. It did not have the resources to finance the cost of replacement premises. In another case, an export-oriented firm in the Midlands was faced with a choice of staying put or moving to a better site with a reduced work force because of development land tax liability on the disposal of its existing site. These are the restrictions to expansion and limitations to employment that are being removed by the abolition of development land tax.

Lest Labour Members should repeat their charge that this is merely Conservative rhetoric, I point out that representations along these lines have come——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister's examples have all been on commercial properties. Can we have an example on residential properties, because the Bill covers that?

Mr. Stewart: I have given the Committee a number of comments from those who are more expert than I am to judge the impact on building land. Examples could be produced from many constituencies where shortages of development land have made difficulties for house building. This tax goes far wider than house building because it affects commerce and industry. Many hon. Members have been pointing out in the past few years the difficulties that development land tax has created for them. The fact that such examples are put to Ministers by Labour Members should show that the tax that the Labour party introduced is doing the damage that we had the foresight to see at that time.

This is an inefficient tax because it is extremely complicated and at a punitive rate. The cost of collecting this tax is higher than that of any other tax on the statute book. It is more than three times as expensive as capital gains tax to collect, more than twice as expensive as capital transfer tax and seven times as expensive as stamp duty. That is the gross cost against the gross yield. The gross yield of development land tax is, in part, offset against other taxes that would be payable in the normal course of events if development land tax did not apply. The cost against yield tends to be significantly higher than 7 per cent.

Over the nine years in which it has been in operation, the gross yield before the cost of collection and the offset against other taxes that would have been paid has only been, on average, about £40 million a year. The latest year for which we have figures, two years ago, shows that the cost of collecting it gross is £1 to every £13 of tax, so it is extremely inefficient and expensive for the Revenue to administer the tax.

The tax is also burdensome to the taxpayer. One case has come to the notice of the Inland Revenue recently in which the taxpayer, assessed for liability of £1,800, could demonstrate that the incidental costs of dealing with that transaction to the taxpayer were £10,000 — more than five times the amount of the cost itself.

Mr. Heddle: We have heard the exorbitant incremental cost of collection as against the net tax yield, after taking into account taxes that would otherwise be paid, but that assumes that that tax is paid in one year. Does my hon. Friend agree that that tax is phased over an eight-year period, so the net benefit to the Revenue is even less than this figure suggests?

7.45 pm

Mr. Stewart: Payment is phased over a 10-year period as a result of a Conservative amendment that somewhat alleviated the burden of the tax. However, despite the improvements that we have made since we have been in office, such as the increase in threshold and the improvement in instalments, there are inherent problems in a tax where so much of the liability is deferred. The number of cases in which tax on deferred liability has been collected is still in single figures, although there are probably several hundred, if not thousands, of cases where this is being stored up, and continuing to produce problems for the future. Only one in 10 of the inquiries made about the potential charges of development land tax by the Inland Revenue results in a charge to tax.

However, a great deal of Revenue staff and taxpayers' time is taken up in dealing with the necessary inquiries and investigations. Not surprisingly, this tax has acted as a drag on the market, has discouraged development and caused congestion in the building and property markets.

The circumstances of inflation, speculation in the 1970s and so on have changed the markets. However, there is another important change that has come about recently and made it untenable to continue with this tax. That is the change in the rate of corporation tax. While it was at a rate of 52 per cent. against 60 per cent. for development land tax, the latter charge was higher than that of the corporation charge, but not catastrophically so. Various allowances could not be offset against it, so it was a more demanding tax than corporation tax.

When corporation tax is reduced to 35 per cent., as it will be next year, the gap between the rate of corporation tax and the rate of development land tax will be so wide that there will be a significant difference to the taxpayer according to which he is assessed. Therefore, the exact valuation of how much profit or gain should fall on development land tax and how much on corporation tax will be a more significant factor that taxpayers will have to take into account. That will increase the burden both to the taxpayer and the Revenue and to the problems of valuation, adjustment and so on.

[Mr. Stewart]

Under current circumstances, all the practical arguments are against keeping this tax on the statute book. It is the most inefficient and expensive tax and it has done increasing damage as years have gone by and more and more cases have become liable, either through deferment of liability or through locking in cases that could otherwise be treated in the normal way in the market. The tax has produced little revenue and done a great deal of harm to development. I am glad that tonight we have the opportunity to remove it for good and all.

Mr. Terry Davis: The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) said that the 1967 Act did not work, and that the Labour Government had therefore introduced development land tax in 1976. The Economic Secretary also had several omissions in his list of previous attempts to tax development gains. Like the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire, he forgot to mention that the 1967 Act, which may or may not have worked, was not the reason for introducing the tax in 1976. The tax that was introduced in 1967 was abolished by the 1970-74 Conservative Government. However, that Government had a change of heart, and this fact was omitted not only by the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire, who could be forgiven for forgetting about it because he was not in the House at the time, but, more significantly, by the Economic Secretary. When he read his list of taxation measures on development land, he forgot to mention that in 1973 the Conservative Government re-introduced a tax on development gains.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire then used the adjective "vindictive". He thought that the introduction of a tax on development gains was vindictive. Is he then describing the Economic Secretary as having been vindictive in 1976 when he said that there should be a special and additional tax on development gains? All those words were used by the present Economic Secretary and many other Conservatives when development land tax was introduced. Is the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire accusing his right hon. Friend the present Minister for Overseas Development of having been vindictive? We all know that that would be totally out of character.

Many other Conservative Members also accepted the need for such a tax. I have always observed the convention of not referring to hon. Members unless I have told them that I intend to do so, but I believe that that convention arose due to the possibility of hon. Members being attacked in their absence. As I am not making any attack, I make no apology for referring to words, used by Conservative Members in 1976, with which I fully agree. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), with whom I rarely agree, said:

"I accept that it is right that there should be an additional tax upon those values which arise from the granting of planning permission"

and

"We accept that there should be some level of taxation at a higher level than the rates for capital gains tax generally".—[Official Report, Standing Committee J, 23 March 1976; c. 15-18.]

Another Conservative, the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury), said:

"We accept the need for a special rate of tax on the granting of planning permission. Our argument is not whether there should be a tax but what its rate should be." — [Official Report, Standing Committee J, 23 March 1976; c. 33.]

There was no reference to inflation or speculation, but a clear reference — not a vindictive reference — to the community's justification for taxing these windfall gains arising from the granting of planning permission, so I think that the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire went a little over the top in his comments today.

Mr. Dickens: The hon. Gentleman may be surprised to hear that a developer in this country, like so many others, went abroad because of this stupid tax and is now building large housing estates in Canada instead of continuing to provide jobs and homes for the people of this country. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is not all take for the speculators because many get their fingers severely burnt and suffer great personal financial losses?

Mr. Davis: It is always difficult to discuss individual cases when they are not identified, but the hon. Gentleman cannot have appreciated the impact of development land tax. It does not apply to developers. It applies to people who own land and sell that land after planning permission has been given. There is a difference between a developer and a landowner. In one of those previous debates the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) referred to the people who would pay the tax as land vendors. There is a great difference between a land vendor and a developer.

The Economic Secretary has said today that development land tax is justified only if there is inflation or speculation. I regard that as merely an excuse. Conservative Members made no reference to inflation or speculation when they supported the introduction of a special tax on these development gains in 1976.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire has described the tax as vindictive. My experience of debates on Finance Bills has been that Conservatives always claim that taxes on the rich are vindictive.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire also said that a tax of 60 per cent. on these unearned, windfall gains increased the price of land. If that is so, why was that rate suggested by Conservative Members in 1976? The Labour Government introduced a rate of 80 per cent. The Conservatives did not argue about the principle of the tax, although they might have done things a little differently and allowed more exemptions, but they urged that the correct rate was exactly the rate that is now being abolished.

Further, as my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has pointed out, the price of land and of houses is determined not by the tax but by the market. Contrary to the claims of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire, development land tax has not been responsible for the increase in house prices.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) offered a much more sophisticated explanation of the economics of development. He said that, if the tax is removed, landowners will put land on the market, which will reduce the price. But when the rate was reduced from 80 per cent. to 60 per cent. and the exemption was increased from £10,000 per year to £50,000 per year and then to £75,000 per year, no evidence emerged—and the Economic Secretary has produced none today—to suggest that those changes resulted in any extra land coming forward. When the Labour Government introduced the tax at 80 per cent., Conservative Members claimed that if only the rate could be reduced to 60 per cent., land would be put on the market. The rate was reduced to 60 per cent. six years ago, but we are still waiting to see all that land being released for development.

Then the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire says that the supply of land will increase only if there is free operation of market forces. I prefer the words used by the hon Member for Wolverhampton, South-West when he pointed out on a previous occasion that the granting of planning permission was a distortion of the free market. It is disappointing that there has been no contribution on this from the Liberals on this issue today. I understand that they were much more forthcoming some years ago. When John Pardoe represented the constituency of Cornwall, North, he pointed out that there was no such thing as a free market in development land and that the supply was limited by definition to what the planning officials were prepared to draw their pencils round. In other words, the supply is artificial. The supply is created by planning decisions, and the value of the land is created by those planning decisions. It is thus right that a proportion of that value should return to the community.

If there were any validity in the argument that a change in the fiscal arrangements would release land for building, why did the report on land for housing produced by the Select Committee on the Environment in the Session 1983-84 fail to mention this point? That three-volume report identified a whole list of obstacles to the release of land for housing, but there was not one reference to the effect of development land tax. There is no valid evidence to suggest that the tax is preventing land from becoming available for house building.

The other argument adduced by the Economic Secretary in his attempt to justify the abolition of development land tax was that the tax was paid not by individuals but by companies. I believe that he is wrong. I have studied the assessments for the calendar year ending 31 December 1983 by status of taxpayer set out in the Inland Revenue statistics for 1984. Those figures show that over a period of four years, disposals of land by individuals and trustees were greater than those made by companies and builders, that the value of the land involved was greater, and that the tax paid by individuals and trustees was more than double that paid by land companies and builders. I think that the Economic Secretary has got his figures wrong. If there is a fault in my research, no doubt he will write to me to explain why his statistics do not match those of the Inland Revenue.

The Economic Secretary also told us that the tax should be abolished because it is expensive to collect. He informed us that collection cost 7 per cent. of revenue, and he also referred to the calculation—it is the same figure put differently—that it cost £1 for every £13 of revenue. Those figures were valid in 1983. In the Finance Act 1984, this Conservative Government increased exemption from £50,000 to £75,000, and when asked to justify it, they told the Committee that it would remove no less than one third of the transactions from liability to tax—the transactions which produced the least revenue. Therefore, I suggest that the Economic Secretary has got his figures wrong. He referred to the figures for 1983, but the position was changed by the Finance Act 1984. He voted for that provision, whereas the Labour party voted against it. The hon. Gentleman was there, but obviously was not listening to the Chief Secretary.

The Economic Secretary was most unfair to the Committee when he referred to two companies—which understandably he did not and could not name—which would not move from their factories because they feared the imposition of development land tax. The hon. Gentleman knows that there are exemptions for companies which use premises for their own manufacturing activity, and that if they were in those premises for 12 years or more, they were not liable for tax.

I do not accuse the Minister of breaking faith as a Treasury Minister in referring to them because he was given the information by his hon. Friends. However, such evidence should be placed before the Committee so that the Opposition can know who these companies are. We need to know much more about those companies and their circumstances before the Minister can reasonably expect the Opposition to accept his argument.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a list of organisations which welcomed the abolition of DLT. I did not write the names down, but I was left with the thought, "They would, wouldn't they?" He said that they claimed that abolition would lead to more land being made available. We do not believe it. That is an excuse to justify the giveaway, just like the excuse to justify the reduction of tax paid by people on the highest incomes. This Government always say that a reduction in the tax paid by people on the highest incomes will lead to more jobs for the unemployed, but after six years we are still waiting for the evidence.

Not only Socialists support the idea of taxing unearned gains from the development value of land; as my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, this cause has been advocated by Liberals and radicals for years. Past and, I hope, present Liberals believe that this tax should be levied. Only a few years ago, the Conservatives also joined us in a great consensus on this issue, but they have now changed their minds. When the tax was introduced, Conservatives accepted the argument for a special tax on these windfall gains. That was when they were in opposition. Now they are in government, and they are using the opportunity to give away £73 million to wealthy landowners.

Sports and Recreational Facilities

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

8.17 pm

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): During the last Adjournment debate that I initiated, on the subject of sporting links with South Africa, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment commenced his remarks by telling me that he felt that I had said some things which, in his words, were better left unsaid. Since we now have a fair amount of time for this debate, I hope that he will take ample opportunity, as possibly will other hon. Members, to explore this very relevant and important subject of the loss of playing fields and sports facilities.

I am particularly grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to enlarge upon this subject because of my deep disappointment that on 25 January I was allowed only a few minutes in which to introduce my Sports Fields and Recreational Facilities Bill. I was disappointed because of a seemingly deliberate Government tactic to prevent me from developing the argument. I was also disappointed because other hon. Members who wanted to speak were unable to do so. My disappointment was best summed up by Mr. Peter Lawson, the secretary of the Central Council of Physical Recreation, who referred to the Bill being

"callously talked out by indifferent and insensitive politicians."

Many sportsmen and others cannot understand parliamentary procedure, and it is disappointing that a fairly modest Bill which would have cost the Government very little was deliberately talked out and now has very little chance of reaching the statute book. That is why I am particularly grateful for this opportunity, not to go over old ground again but to provide fresh evidence and, moreover, give my hon. Friend the opportunity to make a full and detailed reply.

At a time when relations between Parliament and sportsmen are probably at an all-time low because of the various controversies involving football hooliganism, the abolition of the Greater London council and the consequential uncertainty for sport and the controversy surrounding the Sports Council, it does this House no good if certain modest and reasonable Bills which have all-party support are prevented from being discussed on the Floor of the House. I hope that this Adjournment debate will give an opportunity to the Government and my hon. Friend to mend a few of the fences which were broken on the previous occasion. That is the first reason that I bring this subject to the attention of the House.

The second reason is the welter of correspondence that I have received since the Bill was launched in December and the mass of evidence that has been brought to my attention, to the attention of other hon. Members and to the CCPR of the real threat to our sports facilities and playing fields. There is a real danger that some of those facilities are being lost. Perhaps the biggest problem of all is that nobody seems to know, not even Her Majesty's Government, exactly how much land has been lost and what land is in danger of being developed.

Since the short debate on the Sports Fields and Recreational Facilities Bill, I have received numerous pieces of evidence from a mass of individuals and some fairly high-powered organisations. For example, the National Playing Fields Association has been in touch with me, as has the London Sports Council; the National Council for Schools' Sports; Hampshire county council; Highgate Harriers athletics club, an old and famous club; the Football Association; the Association of Kent Cricket Clubs; numerous residents groups throughout the country, mainly from England but some from Wales; numerous parent-teacher associations, local councils and local councillors and numerous individuals from cities, towns and the countryside, all with a genuine fear that our sports fields and facilities are under threat from developers and that we in the House, and we as a Government, are not taking enough notice of that threat.

Let me quote three examples to illustrate my point. An article appeared in The Birmingham Post which will be of particular interest to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell), who I am pleased to see in his place on the Opposition Benches. A long article talks about "The lost fields of glory".

It talks about the fight that various authorities and interested parties have been taking to Birmingham over the past few years and the rather desperate plight in which they now find themselves. As the article says:

"in the past five years they have been too late to save 10 industrial or social club football pitches"—

"they" being the Sports Council—

"too late to stop four cricket squares and one rugby pitch from being ploughed up; too late to prevent 11 netball courts, three bowling greens and 21 tennis courts from closure; too late to rescue 43·3 acres of lost land in Birmingham 1972-80, 24·6 acres in Wolverhampton, four acres in Dudley, 11·1 acres in Sandwell, 11·5 acres in Walsall; nearly 100 acres in all. And these figures are by no means complete. They were supplied by industry—who, often the guilty party, was being asked to give evidence against itself."

In the same article the local area chairman, Judith Mackay, is quoted as saying:

"We must take aggressive action to preserve and improve. And people must be alert to possible closures. One borough council asked us what we knew about one site and it was discovered by accident that five or six others were in jeopardy."

I do not believe that Birmingham is an isolated case in the instances that I have just listed.

I received a letter from the British Amateur Rugby League Association which, again, will be of particular interest to my hon. Friend the Minister, who I believe was at the magnificent rugby league cup final on Saturday.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): It was a good result as well.

Mr. Carlisle: It may well have been. I accept that from the hon. Gentleman.

In a letter to me dated 25 January 1985 the British Amateur Rugby League Association said:

"One of our major problems has been acquiring playing fields to cope with our phenomenal growth in recent years, and I know that many other sports also have difficulties in acquiring playing fields."

The third quote I received only this evening from the chairman of Chelsea football club, from where I was prevented from going to watch my team, Luton, in action by the earliness of this debate. I spoke to Ken Bates, the chairman, who has been in correspondence with me about the Bill and who has expressed his disappointment that the Government did not see fit to give it more time. He says:

"We owe it to succeeding generations to preserve our playing facilities at all levels of the game."

That is from the chairman of one of the most successful first division sides in the country.

[Mr. Carlisle]

Finally, let me quote the words of my hon. Friend the Minister at the CCPR conference on 23 November 1981 in Bournemouth, when he talked about land use. He said:

"We must all use our imagination. With land, for example, that precious resource we must harbour for our and future generations, we must keep and make the most of what we have. We must also watch opportunities for extending our stock. For example, there is sometimes available land of apparently poor potential; that is small or oddly shaped and of little use to the conventional builder or developer. This land may well be sold cheaply and could then be used for a range of sporting activities — squash courts, or urban ski slopes, kick-about areas or playgrounds."

I am sure that my hon. Friend will remember that well and I think that every hon. Member will support those words.

Of the various powerful lobbies that have brought evidence before me, the two most powerful are the CCPR, which I have already mentioned, and the Sports Council. At the annual general meeting of the CCPR about two weeks ago the matter was brought up yet again. In his report at that meeting, the chairman again emphasised the sale of so-called surplus playing fields and the CCPR's alarm that that matter was not being closely monitored by the Government. That particular meeting was presided over by His Royal Highness Prince Philip. He is an interested party in this subject and is also president of the National Playing Fields Association.

The chairman of the CCPR, speaking with the authority that he does, has time after time brought the matter, as indeed has the CCPR, to the attention of hon. Members and the Government. They have fought and instigated a vigorous campaign which resulted in a document which they circulated to all hon. Members, called "Sports Fields at Risk".

The CCPR also has a national register which in 1982 reported that some 2,370 acres were on the land register for disposal, and within a year another 1,277 acres were added to that survey. The estimated acreage now is some 5,500 which is on the register of land subject to disposal. The CCPR has for some time urged the Government to remove that land from the land register. I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend has to say about that. Suffice it to say that vast tracts of land are at risk because they are on the land register.

Of course not every acre and playing field could justifiably be kept for sports facilities, but those figures show the magnitude of the problem that we face. In the "Sports Fields at Risk" pamphlet, the CCPR concentrates almost entirely on falling rolls in schools. It quoted DES figures that between 1983 and 1990 rolls will fall by some 23 per cent. in the secondary sector. There is no doubt that local education authorities, under the DES instruction of pamphlet 909, are considering selling more land now for building than ever before.

We should not be surprised at that, given the falling rolls. I understand that some fields are bound to come up for reasonable disposal. But what worries me is that when the numbers start to rise again, as they will—there is already some sign of that — some sports fields and facilities will have been developed and will be concrete for ever.

I am also worried that in some inner city and urban areas children whose only fields are school sports fields will, when that school closes, find that a blade of grass is almost a rarity, which people have only in their gardens. Space in towns and cities must be conserved. It is a sad fact that the Inner London education authority is bussing children out of town because no space for games is available near their schools.

Another powerful lobby, the Sports Council, has expressed concern about the Minister's co-operation. I add my tribute to that of the Minister to the retiring chairman, Mr. Dick Jeeps, who spoke up for sportsmen and for their freedom to play wherever they want to play. He was a tireless worker and will be a great loss to the Sports Council. I regret the manner of his going. But perhaps we should not discuss that tonight. He will be sorely missed and it is unfortunate that he thought it necessary to resign.

The Sports Council produced in 1984 a document on the loss of industrial sports grounds and set out the targets that should be acknowledged as interest in sport grows. For example, about 3 million people play soccer—and the numbers are rising. In almost every town and village all the available pitches are used fully. In Birmingham, 44 pitches are still needed by the Birmingham football association.

The Football Association says that in 1971 a total of 36,904 clubs were members. In 1980, the last year for which figures are available, membership had risen to 39,730 clubs. The Rugby Football Union reported a membership in 1965 of fewer than 1,000 clubs. In 1979 it reported 1,840 clubs as members. If sports fields continue to disappear and be developed, the need for them will outstrip the facilities, particularly as the amount of leisure available increases alongside the popularity of the sports.

The Sports Council, funded by the taxpayers, states in its document:

"The basic conclusion is that the loss of one strategically located playing field can be critically important."

A field which is no longer available is lost forever.

We should look ahead and hope for constructive movements. I salute the Government's attempts, through the Sports Council, to make people more active in sport, but the facilities must be made available. It is nonsense to spend £500,000 on encouraging people to be active in sport when pitches are being lost to the developers. We must take account of the increasing number of school leavers who will want sports facilities. All our citizens are bound to have more leisure time. We must consider the health of our citizens. The Government are trying to promote healthy activities, but they must provide facilities for the various sports.

We must also think about conservation. The Wildlife and Countryside Act is popular and well used. It has conserved parts of the country that would have been lost without it. Perhaps special parcels of land should be set aside for sport so that they cannot be built upon. In terms of national prestige I am also worried about the quality of our national games, particularly those played upon grass fields. If pitches are not available that must have some effect on how well we do.

I support the Government stance on the Olympic games. It would be a great fillip to sport if the Olympic games came to Britain, but it would be a shame if the number of pitches and fields available on which people can train were reduced.

No one seems to know exactly what the problem is. No Government Department has been able to tell me what acreage of school playing fields has been lost. I pay tribute to the initiatives taken industrially with the 100 firms. However, the Government should not be remembered for losing playing fields and other sports facilities for ever.

8.36 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I disagree deeply with the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) on a number of issues, but tonight he has done a considerable service to the House by choosing this subject and by the manner in which he has described some difficult problems.

I am a member of the main organising committee of the 1986 Commonwealth games in Edinburgh. My capacity is not merely honorary, because I have attended all but one of the meetings and I have taken my membership extremely seriously.

I must say bluntly that bids for hosting the Olympic games — whether by Manchester, Birmingham or London—will be harmed unless we can be sure that the Commonwealth games will be organised efficiently in the best British tradition. It will do no one a disservice if I say that that is in doubt. I speak frankly as a member of the organising committee, with butterflies in my stomach about what will happen in 1986.

My right hon. Friend for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) and I went to many of the functions and events organised in 1970. We were relaxed because we thought that the Edinburgh games would be a success. I pay tribute to Sir Herbert Brechin, who was chairman of the games committee, and others. We never had any doubts that on the day all would be well. However, today, a year ahead, I have a queasy feeling about the 1986 games. Does the Minister share the uncomfortable feelings and suspicions that all might not be well on the day?

There are a number of issues involved, one being the vexed question of the velodrome. Rightly or wrongly, it has been open to the wind and rain and is warped. I have seen it and I know that it is unsafe in anything like its present condition. It will not be acceptable to cyclists riding at any speed. Does the Minister share our concern? If so, what should be done? If we do nothing, either we will come into disrepute not only with the cycling fraternity but with many others who believed that Edinburgh could provide the facilities. We need a new velodrome, which must be covered at considerable expense or it will go the same way as the present velodrome in the Scottish climate. We must face the fact that we cannot have an open-air velodrome. That means money with a capital M——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I realise that the hon. Gentleman is raising an important point, but it is a little wide of the subject of the Adjournment. The Minister might find it difficult to reply to his points. Perhaps he could relate his remarks to the subject of the Adjournment, which is the loss of sports and recreational facilities.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): With the greatest respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I understand your ruling, you will appreciate that all the facilities to be provided for the Commonwealth games and, if we have them, the Olympic games, will be designed and intended for the recreation of the mass of ordinary people. Therefore, the subject of the velodrome to be provided for the Commonwealth games in Edinburgh must be important to the recreational needs of Scotland. I ask you to consider that aspect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I am sure that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) will be able to link his remarks to the subject of the Adjournment.

Mr. Dalyell: The subject on the Order Paper is the loss of sports and recreational facilities. I am talking about the loss of a velodrome, which is definitely a sports and recrational facility. Because of a whole series of circumstances and because of an unwillingness to pay the money to cover the velodrome last time around, we now have an unsatisfactory velodrome. Are we to turn to our Commonwealth partners and say, "Sorry, we cannot afford to do anything about it."? At the end of the day, the reputation of the British people and the Government are at stake. If we say sorry to the cyclists at this stage, questions will be raised about our fitness to provide facilities. I emphasise that it is no good bidding for the Olympic games if we have a smudge on our copy book because we have not provided the promised facilities for the Commonwealth games.

I do not want to go into the problems of facilities for boxing and various other sports, unless the Minister would like to say something about that. The problems are real, but the subject may be out of order. However, it is legitimate to raise a matter that worries the organising committee of the Commonwealth games. What happens if, at the last moment, Commonwealth countries decide to pull out of the games because of the New Zealand rugby tour? It is high time—and the sooner the better—that the Government made it clear to the New Zealand Government that we disapprove of the rugby tour of South Africa——

Mr. John Carlisle: No.

Mr. Dalyell: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a different view, but I am entitled to say that we are concerned about a fiasco at the last moment. I want to know what the Minister thinks about it. There is only a year to go and time is not on our side.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), amid some ribaldry during Question Time this afternoon because he was thought to be paddling a Scottish canoe, said that if there was a bid for the Olympic games we should do what other countries have done and have some of the events 400 or 500 miles away from the main centre—as, indeed, happened at Los Angeles. I support the serious bid by Manchester, which I visited recently. There is a considerable argument for staging the Olympic games in a city in the north of England. However, I hope that serious thought will be given to the possibility of spreading some of the events.

I have known Colonel Satterthwaite since my Army days and I pay tribute to him for what he has done. At one stage he had the dubious distinction of being my commanding officer. I think highly of him. For more than 30 years he has played a great part in the provision of facilities. Like the hon. Member for Luton, North, I have listened to his arguments and I hope that the work of the National Playing Fields Association will be fully supported. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the CCPR and the falling rolls—a problem that has been fully explained by our mutual friend, Mr. Peter Lawson.

[Mr. Dalyell]

I was attracted by the hon. Gentleman's idea of SSSIs. Planning permission for valuable community land is far too easily given by local authorities of all parties, which should know better, for short-term financial gain.

Mr. John Carlisle: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will agree that in many cases unfortunate decisions are made by the Secretaries of State on appeal. In several cases where local authorities have been against development, the Secretary of State concerned allowed the development to go ahead. That is why the Government should be involved.

Mr. Dalyell: I know of two such cases, and it was wrong of the Secretaries of State involved to give assent to development plans. They involved traditional sporting facilities in communities, and one was the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland. It is no good saying that there are alternatives, because they all take time.

I echo the question posed by the hon. Member for Luton, North. What about SSSIs for sporting facilities? Together with my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath I spent 100 hours of my life in the Committee stage of the Wildlife and Countryside Act and I know the difficulty of SSSIs, but, given the frailty of certain local authorities and certain Secretaries of State —and not confined to one party—there is an argument for SSSIs. I do not expect the Minister to produce an answer off the top of his head tonight, but it is an idea worth consideration.

I do not want to rub salt in the wounds, because I know that the Scottish Conservative party conference is taking place and I do not want to take advantage of grief. The West Lothian county cricket club ground at Bogfall, which is a modest ground with small attendances, is paying twice the rates of the place where I shall be making a speech on Monday evening—the city of Worcester. Worcester has a famous county cricket ground that welcomes the Australians and heaven knows who else, but it pays half the rates of the modest Linlithgow ground.

This is not the time to go into the problem of Scottish rating, but there is a heck of a problem for junior football clubs, cricket clubs and other sporting facilities that are being hit amidships by the level of rates. However, if anyone could have offered comforting words on that subject, it would have been done before now. I cannot restrain myself from saying that it is a very real problem for sporting facilities in Scotland.

8.50 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): I was pleased to be a co-sponsor of the Sports Fields and Recreational Facilities Bill which my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) presented some weeks ago. In that measure, he sought to establish a form of registration of sporting land, and I entirely support his concern for the protection of land that is suitable or is currently being used for sporting and recreational purposes.

In a climate of high unemployment — a social problem that will be with us for a long time—the ability to offer the people an outlet for their energies by way of sporting activities is a small but important way of easing the depressing burden of enforced idleness due to unemployment.

I accept that not all land is being used properly. I have no doubt that, on careful inquiry, it might be found that some land is surplus to requirements or is unsuitable. However, we should handle this issue with the greatest care because land currently being used for recreational purposes, once lost is extremely difficult to bring back into that use.

I particularly draw the attention of the Minister to what I can only describe as the extraordinary activities—I am being remarkably polite in using that phraseology—of my county council in Nottinghamshire. A memorandum in October 1983 said:

"As you know, neither the Chairman of the Education Committee nor the Director of Education is aware of the investigations which have been taking place."

In a letter, one of the officers wrote:

"No site has been discussed with the District Councils and it is quite possible, therefore, that these proposals may well conflict with the thoughts and ideas of the District Councils."

I was one of those district councillors. I was indeed highly surprised at the outcome of those so-called investigations and the bald announcement that large areas of land in my area were up for grabs. Many of them were school playing fields that were properly being used for sport and recreation, and they should continue in that use. Happily, some of our district councils have used the planning mechanism to ensure that that little subterfuge did not become a practical reality, at least not in large measure.

Precisely because of that behind-closed-doors practice, which is still possible, we must seek from the Minister some way of protecting ourselves against the loss of sporting and recreational land in that way. We talk of local autonomy, local democracy and so on. Nevertheless, this place must have a role in national policy in this sphere and must offer hon. Members a means by which we can protect ourselves if and when a local authority abuses the autonomy that it is given. There must be a means by which we can say, "That is unreasonable. That is unjust. You are selling land in your area that is rightly reserved for recreation."

It was reasonable, therefore, for my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North to seek a mechanism by which the public at large would be aware of the existence of a register of land designated for sport and recreation. Then, if a local authority — it would be acting properly in certain circumstances — claimed that certain land was surplus, that would be public knowledge, there would be public discussion and the ultimate decision would be reasonable and fair and be seen to be so. At present, under existing legislation, that protection is not available because there is no such register. I know what happened in my county. I would not wish it to happen elsewhere.

8.55 pm

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): I congratulate the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) on taking advantage of the opportunity to widen the scope of the Adjournment debate that he has initiated. I also congratulate him on following through from his unfortunate experience with his private Member's Bill.

We have far too few debates on sport, as I know from experience. I am sure that the Minister shares that view. Indeed, it does not help Ministers if pressure is not placed on them by hon. Members and if insufficient interest is shown in the whole subject.

As we are discussing recreational facilities for the broad mass of the people, I can tell the House from experience that sport is a cultural pursuit—it is the people's culture — which attracts the excitement and attention of a greater proportion of the population than is attracted to any other leisure pursuit, and I define "sport" in terms of recreation, too. We are, therefore, grateful to the hon. Member for Luton, North not only for providing this opportunity but for raising half a dozen or more subjects of considerable interest.

I join him in expressing appreciation to Mr. Dick Jeeps for his work as chairman of the Sports Council. He was originally appointed by me. He brought a breath of fresh air into that organisation and we are grateful to him for that. The hon. Gentleman referred to Mr. Jeeps' comments about sportsmen playing wherever they wished to play. I am not sure that in public Mr. Jeeps went as far as the hon. Gentleman suggested, although in private he may well have done so, and that is the one reservation I have about his chairmanship. Nevertheless, the House should express its appreciation to him, as I do from the Labour Benches and as I am sure the Minister will.

The Minister will forgive me for saying that if the newspaper reports are accurate about Mr. Jeeps' successor, we on these Benches will be glad to welcome him. When I was Minister, Mr. John Smith produced an outstanding report on the future of lawn tennis. He is chairman of one of the most successful football league clubs and is a business man of great acumen.

I do not ask the Minister to comment on whether the rumours are right, in advance of his statement tomorrow, but if the rumours are right, as I believe them to be, we shall be fortunate to get Mr. Smith to give time for the chairmanship of the Sports Council. We wish him well and assure him of our support.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised two important points concerning the Olympic games and the Commonwealth games. I have always believed that one cannot divorce the relationship between sport at the highest echelons—the winning at that level of gold medals and the rest — from the inspirational effect that that has for large numbers of youngsters at the grass roots of society. The two aspects are linked.

Whenever Britain has been successful in sporting events—recently, we had four distinguished gold medal winners in ice skating events and, going back to my days as Minister, I recall when Ann Jones won at Wimbledon —there has been an upsurge of interest in sport. The tragedy is that we are not prepared to provide the necessary facilities for people who think, "If Torvill and Dean can win a gold medal, perhaps I should have a go at that." The justification for Britain's participation in international sport—apart from the fact that it inspires pride in our country, establishes goodwill internationally and sets standards—has always been the inspiration to play sport that it creates throughout the land, and that should not be taken lightly. Britain's bid for the Olympic games, in which, I believe, the Under-Secretary of State is very much involved, is justified on the ground that the games will create enormous interest and result in new facilities.

It is important to consider who will finance the games, which may cost several hundreds of millions of pounds. I understand that the Under-Secretary of State says that he would like a private enterprise Olympic games, as was the case in Los Angeles. That is why the hon. Gentleman has supported the proposal and has encouraged various cities, including London, to bid for the games. One would hope that private money would be raised to finance the games, but an enormous amount of public money must also be found and decisions of great public importance must be made. Each of the cities involved in the bidding — whether it is London, Birmingham, Manchester or anywhere else—is short on infrastructure and facilities. It will cost a great deal of money to provide them. For example, London has nowhere to put a village. It would have to build a village capable of housing between 16,000 and 18,000 people. That would require public investment. That was the point that I was trying to make during Question Time today. Even if London has the necessary stadiums and private enterprise facilities, an enormous amount of public investment is still required.

The bid to host the Olympic games will not be taken seriously until the Government state their intentions with regard to providing opportunities and infrastructure. The Government's silence on those matters has created great concern.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned those cities that are bidding to host the Olympic games. I join him in hoping that Britain succeeds. Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in putting Nottingham's claims to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State? That city — the "queen of the midlands" — has the national water sports centre and has the ability to be the venue for three of the Olympic disciplines. It does not need a penny to be spent on infrastructure, because the infrastructure is already there.

Mr. Howell: As I was partly responsible for the decision to site the national water sports centre in Nottingham, I fully endorse the hon. Gentleman's point. We are unlikely to be able to hold the rowing and canoeing events in a city other than Nottingham. Nottingham is bound to play a central role. A word of warning is necessary, however. It is a city that must bid for the Olympic games. With the exception of the rowing and canoeing events, possibly the shooting and equestrian events and the yachting events, which obviously cannot take place in a city but must take place near a coastal area, the International Olympic Committee will expect all events to be held within a city. The IOC will expect one village and not two, as was the case in Los Angeles, to be created. That is why I referred earlier to the siting of an Olympic village. I think that what happened in this respect in Los Angeles will never be repeated.

Mr. John Carlisle: I regret that I was not in the House this afternoon at Question Time, but I was helping to open a sports facility at Flitwick in my constituency. Will the right hon. Gentleman allay the fears that some of us have about some of his earlier reported remarks? When it was mooted that the Olympic games should come to a British city, he gave the impression that he was somewhat against the idea. Can we have his categorical assurance that he would fully support the British Olympic Association and any part that the Government may have to play if the Olympic games were to come to this country?

Mr. Howell: I do not know why Conservative Members persist in leading with their chins. The hon. Gentleman has done so. I shall support the bid and in 1979 when I was the Minister responsible for sport I said that the British Olympic Association's bid to bring the games to this country had the Government's full support. I do not blame the Minister, but the incoming Conservative Government promptly ditched that bid. If they had not done so, we should have had the 1988 Olympic games, which are due to be held in Seoul. The Conservative Government were completely opposed to the idea and refused to support the British Olympic Association. I do not want to go over history. I am glad of the conversion and I support the bid.

The hon. Member for Luton, North may have misunderstood my comments. There is some scepticism in the world of sport about the ability of anywhere, except possibly Barcelona, to hold the 1992 games. Barcelona is the home town of the president of the International Olympic Committee. He is likely to retire in 1992 and he is committed to having the games in his country in that year. I understand that.

I fully support the bid, if it is a practical proposition, but I think one is entitled to express realism or scepticism.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow for mentioning the Edinburgh games. We are back to the essential problem of the Olympic bid—what money are the Government prepared to put into the games? My hon. Friend kindly mentioned the 1970 games with which I was considerably involved. The Labour Government gave financial support. The existing stadium — not the swimming pool which, to its credit, Edinburgh council built—and the velodrome were the result of considerable Government investment.

As I understand it, the Government have not offered a penny to Edinburgh for the 1986 games, and have no intention of doing so. That is not the way to convince the world that we are serious about international sport. Some things are rightly left to private enterprise. I am not against that, but I am against them being left completely to private enterprise.

The Minister should ensure that funds are available for the velodrome, which is a matter of great anxiety. It will be a tragedy if those facilities are not provided. I know that the Minister is as anxious as we are that the games should succeed. I ask him to intervene, and if funds are a difficulty, to ensure that the problems are quickly overcome. It is not asking too much of the Government that they should put some money into facilities for the Edinburgh games.

I shall not comment at length about what my hon. Friend said about the New Zealand rugby tour. I am not sure that he is being as fair to the New Zealand Government as he should be. No Government could have been more forthright. In conference, the Commonwealth Prime Ministers have twice asserted their support for the Gleneagles agreement and the importance of maintaining it. It is no credit to the Rugby Football Union that it persists in following a selfish attitude.

Mr. John Carlisle: They are free people.

Mr. Howell: Of course people are free to take their own decisions, but freedom means accepting responsibilities as well as asserting liberties. The difficulty with the RFU is that it asserts its liberties but refuses to accept responsibility for the state of sport within the Commonwealth or for any sport other than its own. That is a lamentable situation.

I deal next with some of the important points that were raised by the hon. Member for Luton, North. I can endorse almost all that he said. I am grateful to him for referring to the Birmingham experience. A large number of sports grounds have been lost in the area. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Ottaway) made an important point in giving his experience, particularly with regard to planning refusals.

Nothing like enough is being done by planning committees, and certainly by Ministers and Government, to assert the importance of green belt and open space land. When planning requirements are being considered, the role of open space in an urban situation, particularly for people living in towns and cities, is a matter of cardinal importance at an inquiry. I must accept a little responsibility because I served as a Minister at the Department of the Environment, so I am in no way trying to make a point against the Minister in party terms. However, we do not assert sufficiently the need, when inquiries are being held, to include in the equation the community good and the importance of open spaces, playing fields or sports fields.

Industrial sports fields in Birmingham have been lost mainly because industrial sports on a Saturday afternoon are no longer as important as they were when people worked a five-and-a-half-day week before the last war. There has been an enormous change in the number of industrial sports fields. To go back almost 20 years, an inquiry into these matters was conducted by a member of the Sports Council. I asked an eminent executive of ICI, Bob Gibb, to conduct it. We might do well to take the Gibb report on industrial sports fields out of the pigeon hole and consider it again. Its theme was that when a sports field becomes surplus to the use of the employees of a firm, it should go the community as a whole. He also said, rightly, that industrial sports fields should not just be open air, but the concepts of an industrial sports club must include the provision of indoor facilities.

I hope that the Minister will tell the House that he can do something to instruct planning committees and inspectors to take into account the recreational needs of the community as a whole when taking their decisions.

The Government got into difficulties when they issued a recent circular to education authorities and universities instructing them to sell off their surplus land. In an urban situation there cannot be any such surplus sports land at a time when 4 million people are unemployed. The need for a leisure service is greater now than it has ever been in the history of the country. How can we talk about football hooliganism on the one hand, which is an inevitable result of the boredom of the unemployed in society——

Mr. John Carlisle: Nonsense.

Mr. Howell: I take issue with the hon. Gentleman. If one makes an analysis of many of the people who get into trouble, one will discover that this occurs because the discipline of work and of the workplace no longer exists in their lives.

Mr. Carlisle: I challenge what the right hon. Gentleman has said. He stated that football hooliganism was almost a direct result of unemployment. He will understand, because he is much travelled and is experienced in these matters, that in the worst unemployment areas, particularly in the north and sometimes in Scotland, the amount of football hooliganism relative to the the population is tiny. All the problems that have arisen in the last few months in particular have been in the south. How does the right hon. Gentleman relate the lower unemployment rate in the south and the higher unemployment rate in the north to what he has just said?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are going rather wide of the Adjournment debate, which is about the loss of facilities.

Mr. Howell: The problems last Saturday with Manchester City supporters in the hon. Gentleman's constituency had nothing to do with the south of England. That adequately answers the hon. Gentleman's intervention. It could not have had anything to do with the south of England because Notts County was playing Manchester City. The hon. Gentleman will not deny that vandalism and associated problems are on the increase. This debate is about whether we have the facilities, whether they are available to the public and whether we have leadership. It cannot help the 4 million unemployed to sell educational playing fields. I would be astonished if the hon. Gentleman denied that. That is the simple point which I have sought to make in this part of our discussions. I am glad to see from the hon. Gentleman that at least we have reached agreement again.

I shall now deal with the pricing policy of many local authorities for facilities. Although we are debating the loss of facilities, the Government's policy on rates, which effectively prices out the people whom we wish to attract to our sports facilities, is doing no good. I hope that the Minister will think it right to take an initiative on that. Unless we see sport as a social service to the whole community, in the same way as the health and education services are, we shall never get the matter right. It depends on pricing policy.

Many people have come to see me, including some Manchester United supporters. I asked them why they got into trouble, and they replied that they wanted to play five-a-side football but none of the local sports halls would let them in because they could not afford the high charges. Pricing policy is an important aspect of sports halls, swimming baths and similar facilities.

I now come to the rating policy, from which we are suffering. In Birmingham we have recently had an action sport programme. It was well thought out, and designed to have sporting leaders, such as great athletes, going out into local communities to persuade people to use the facilities and to be active. In answer to a question earlier today, the Minister or one of his colleagues said that all our programmes were pump-priming exercises. The Government get them on the road and then hand them over to local authorities. The Sports Council suddenly told Birmingham city council that, although it had paid the whole cost last year, it would pay 50 per cent. this year, 25 per cent. next year and nothing thereafter. That would be all right if Birmingham could spend what it wanted to spend on the programmes within its rate resources. However, a Department of State has told the council that it cannot do that, and that if it does, that Department will rate-cap it and ensure that it limits its expenditure. There is an inherent contradiction in the social policies that the Government wish to follow and the rating policy which prevents local authorities from following that same policy. I do not want to be party political——

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The right hon. Gentleman is doing very well on that.

Mr. Howell: All the most intelligent statements come from the Labour party, as the hon. Gentleman knows. I am seeking to raise genuine problems, which I hope the Minister will consider. Certainly, rating is a matter of the greatest importance.

Another aspect of rating policy——

Mr. David Ashby (Leicester, North-West): Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that rating is a matter of priorities? The local authority must work out its priorities. If it works them out badly and goes over the limits, it will be rate-capped. The right hon. Gentleman's argument is false.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the House will not get into a debate about rating policy, which is wide of the subject of the Adjournment debate.

Mr. Howell: You will appreciate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I move on to the removal of buses to take school children to playing fields and swimming pools, how related those matters are. It is no good having swimming baths if the local authority cannot afford to transport children to them. That is happening in my constituency. School after school is writing to me and saying, "Because of the restrictions on rating expenditure, the education department has told us that our children cannot go to the playing fields or swimming baths." I simply relate the problem without dwelling on it for too long.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The right hon. Gentleman is using the licence of the Chair to an extraordinary extent. Nottinghamshire county council is seeking to prevent children from non-maintained schools—private sector schools—from using swimming baths, playing fields or other facilities that their parents have paid for through rates and taxes. The loss of school buses has nothing to do with the problem. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) said, the priorities are in the hand of the local authority, which has thoroughly abused them.

Mr. Howell: I do not understand the language that the hon. Gentleman is using. If what I said has nothing to do with the problem, why is he raising it? Why is he telling us that the action of Nottinghamshire county council is adversely affecting those people? I shall acquaint myself with the problem, because the leader of Nottinghamshire county council used to be a councillor in my constituency. He is a good friend of mine and I shall talk to him about the matter. I believe that all schoolchildren should be encouraged to use facilities for physical education——

Mr. Ashby rose——

Mr. Howell: I shall not give way, because I should incur the displeasure of the Chair.

Mr. Ashby: May I intervene on that point?

Mr. Howell: I cannot give way again, because I have given way many times. I am glad to provide this seminar for Conservative Members.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: We are interested in the subject.

Mr. Howell: I am glad to hear that, but I shall not give way, because I wish to move on from playing fields and swimming baths——

Mr. Ashby rose——

Mr. Howell: No. I am a good referee, and once I have taken a decision I, like you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, stand firm. I do not wish to produce yellow or red cards.

I commend to the Minister the policy in Birmingham, in the hope that he will review it sympathetically. The city council has just decided—it is a magnificent all-party decision — that the use of schools and educational facilities outside school time should be the responsibility of the leisure services department. The Minister and I have made many speeches about the importance of educational facilities being used outside school hours and at weekends. I am glad to report to the House that Birmingham has agreed such a policy. There will be difficulties with the present financial climate, but the policy is that all Birmingham schools, playing fields and swimming pools can be used by the entire community at all times outside school hours. We should be grateful for the lead of Mr. Demian, the director of leisure resources in Birmingham, and for the fact that the proposal has been taken up enthusiastically by party leaders on both sides of the council.

Mr. Ashby: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howell: Is it on this point or on the previous point?

Mr. Ashby: It is on this point.

Mr. Howell: I put the hon. Gentleman on his honour.

Mr. Ashby: It is interesting that the right hon. Gentleman has said that Birmingham is trying to encourage all school children to use the facilities. Will he prevail on the Greater London council, particularly the Inner London education authority, to do exactly the same? The GLC has what is really an apartheid policy, in that if one is in the state system, one may use all the facilities, but if one is outside the state system, one does not have a hope. Can we not have equal treatment, because, after all, children are children? Will the right hon. Gentleman prevail on the Labour ILEA to do the same for all children?

Mr. Howell: I am sorry that I gave way, because it is obvious that the hon. Gentleman was referring not to the point that I was on, but to the point made by his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo). I shall comment on it only to say that I shall acquaint myself with the problem, which I undertook to do with the hon. Member for Nottingham, South as well.

It is not for us in the House fully to endorse the policy of any one local authority. However, a local authority has now decided unanimously, on an all-party basis, to endorse, after all these years, the very policies that we have been putting forward, to ensure that school facilities are used, and opened up for the adult population at times other than school time. I hope that the Minister will find it possible to say a word of support.

I should like to refer to children's play. I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said about Colonel Bob Satterthwaite and his wonderful work with the National Playing Fields Association. That organisation has embraced the needs of children's play. The Minister has been coy recently about that area. I remember the Prime Minister making a statement that the hon. Gentleman would be specifically responsible for children's play in future. That announcement was made about two years ago, since when not one word has been uttered about it as far as I can trace. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is not true."] I am pleased to hear it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): Where has the right hon. Gentleman been?

Mr. Howell: I have been watching the Minister, which is probably why I have not heard anything.

If the Minister has been active in the area, perhaps he can tell us what initiatives have been taken to extend play facilities for children around the country. As the National Playing Fields Association does not feel that much has been achieved, I hope that the Minister can set its mind at rest. Only three weeks ago I went to a conference in another part of the House, in which Colonel Bob Satterthwaite was a leading participant, speaking on this subject. He gave instance after instance of the effect of rate support grant policies on the withdrawal of playing facilities for children. Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman has been active and if there is a good story to tell, by now it should have percolated to the National Playing Fields Association and others in that area. I am happy to raise the matter now so that the Minister can inform us about what is happening.

This has been an interesting opportunity to raise many matters that are of mutual concern, even if we do not entirely agree on everything. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Luton, North for raising the matter, and giving the Minister the opportunity to reply in detail to the many points that have been raised.

9.23 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I checked the Order Paper for 8 May 1985, and began to wonder where I should have been tonight. It states:

"On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 1 Mr. John Carlisle proposes to raise the subject of the loss of sports and recreational facilities."

That is a most important subject. Many equally important subjects have been raised by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but they will understand that the most important element and main thrust of the debate is the subject raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle).

My hon. Friend has pursued the matter for some time. He feels passionately about it. I regret that a certain air of levity has entered into the debate with one or two comments by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell). He must understand that one of the first things that I shall do is to ask my officials to guarantee that between 1964 and 1970, and 1974 and 1979, not one half an acre of land was lost for alternative development purposes. That is one of the most important things that I shall check.

I endorse the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North and by the right hon. Member for Small Heath about the chairman of the Sports Council. I wish to be associated with their comments, and those remarks in the media should not be pursued too far. I regret that Mr. Jeeps is resigning and we all wish him well.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has raised a number of points, and it is difficult for me to comment in too much detail on them. I have been to Edinburgh twice in the past 21 months, given the concern of Kenneth Borthwick and his committee, to have a look at the various facilities. The hon. Member for Linlithgow understands the roles of the Scottish Office and my Department in this and he knows that I should like to have an update to see where things stand and how things are. I guarantee to pass on his comments to my hon. Friend in the Scottish Office and to try to find out a little more about the programme. I understand the urgency in all this and I wish to try to find out from the organising committee what its views of his comments are, because that is important.

Like the right hon. Member for Small Heath, I do not wish to be party political. However, there must inevitably be a question mark whenever there is extremism in county hall or city halls. There must be mounting anxiety about some people who have made observations and comments, and we see that in a number of city halls.

I shall not comment about the effect of rugby tours because it is too early to do so. The British Lions tour is due to take place in South Africa next year and a tour by the All Blacks may take place next year. That will undoubtedly force its attention on members of the Commonwealth, but I am satisfied that the Government do all that they can to ensure that everybody understands that the Government are full supporters of the Gleneagles declaration. I understand the hon. Member for Linlithgow's concern about these things, but I cannot comment because I am not up-to-date about the precise preparations for the various facilities on which he touched. I shall find out a little more and come back to him later.

Mr. Dalyell: When the hon. Gentleman goes on his visit, will he have a quiet, listening meeting with the Edinburgh district council? It is all very well to talk about extremism in city halls, but they have extreme problems. I assure the hon. Gentleman that Alec Wood and his colleagues have a serious point of view to put. The Minister should listen and talk to them.

Mr. Macfarlane: I listen and talk to everybody who is elected. Sometimes, the vibrations of the actions of people in city halls can have an adverse effect and give rise to failure and lack of confidence, as my hon. Friends would agree.

Many matters have been raised this evening. I cannot comment on all of them, because my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) has caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and is to introduce an Adjournment debate on a subject that interests him. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North has rightly drawn some specific matters to the attention of the House. Like him, I am anxious to ensure that the Sports Council and the provision of opportunities for sport and recreation today meet the needs of the communities. We are all familiar with the growth in the demand for all manner of sporting activities. We all welcome the increasing participation in recent years, as everyone's leisure time has expanded. We recognise the benefits for the community in health, fitness and sheer enjoyment. As the right hon. Member for Small Heath said, it is the people's culture.

The Government have made clear their commitment to help meet this important need, particularly in the deprived urban and rural areas, so I understand the broader anxieties behind the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North shares our concern that there should be adequate facilities for local communities. The debate is not about aims and concerns, because we share them. It is about gaining a balanced assessment of overall provision, taking account of the gains and losses of facilities to gauge the nature and level of a problem about which my hon. Friend has talked, which is undoubtedly real in some areas and situation. I do not deny that for a moment.

My hon. Friend has concentrated on the losses, but we must also consider the general context. He gave a graphic illustration of the losses in Birmingham, as did the right hon. Member for Small Heath, but from my knowledge of that excellent city I should have thought that what the city council has achieved more than compensates for the losses. There are some superb new facilities which automatically reduce the net loss.

All the providers of facilities in this country — the public and private sectors, the voluntary movement, and so on—are united in the aim to achieve more and better facilities and opportunities for sport and recreation. The common efforts have been successful and we must all strive to ensure that that trend continues. There are more and better facilities in this country than there were 20 years ago when some of us here today were more actively and pleasantly employed participating in sport on a regular basis.

For example, we now have the better part of 1,000 public swimming pools and more than 1,000 indoor sports halls of more than 26 m by 16·5 m. In 1970, there were only 24 sports centres in the whole of England. There are now 27 ice rinks, a net gain of 10 since 1970. We have 66 synthetic athletics tracks compared with 12 in 1970, and 210 purpose-built tennis courts compared with 100 in 1970. We now have 50 all-weather artificial grass pitches. In 1970 there were none. There are also many non-grass artificial pitches. We now have more than 1,000 golf courses, 185 indoor bowls halls and 65 artificial ski slopes. It seems that we are now tending to go indoors.

Mr. John Carlisle: I acknowledge those improvements; both Governments can take pride in the additional facilities that have been provided. My hon. Friend will, acknowledge, however, that some of our great national sports — including cricket, his own first love — need grass pitches. Does he agree that if those grass pitches disappear, the compensation offered by indoor or all-weather pitches will not necessarily produce champions in those sports?

Mr. Macfarlane: I sympathise with that observation and I shall come to it in a moment. I wish to emphasise the Government's record, which I am sure is important to my hon. Friend and indeed to the whole House.

First, I remind the House that we have increased the Sports Council grant from £15 million in 1979 to more than £30 million in 1985—a cash increase of more than 100 per cent. In addition, there has been a substantial investment in sport and recreation facilities through my Department's urban programme and other relevant programmes such as the derelict land scheme. Such investment is currently about £35 million per year. More than 1,700 facilities have been built with the aid of central Government funds in the last two years alone.

Of course, the major contribution to providing new and improved facilities has come from local authorities and from the efforts of voluntary bodies and the private sector. In sport and recreation we can still find a common thrust uniting all sectors of the population which I am sure many of us would like to see repeated in other areas of endeavour. The private sector, too, has risen to the challenge of increased demand for provision—both on its own and in partnership with the public sector. Excellent examples of recreation provision for all ages and interests are Thorpe Park and Alton Towers and partnership schemes include the new docklands arena and the Westminster children's sports centre.

As the House knows, there has been a particular growth in minority sports. Traditionally, when most of us were at school we played football or rugby and cricket and did some running when it rained. There was not much variety, but nowadays the range of opportunity is almost endless. When the right hon. Member for Small Heath first came to office he probably grant aided about 20 sports. There are now more than 140 governing bodies of sport. This is reflected in the diversity of sports grant aided by the Sports Council. We recognise 150 governing bodies of sport and other sporting bodies such as the British Olympic Association, the Central Council of Physical Recreation, the Sports Aid Foundation and the National Playing Fields Association. I, too, pay tribute to Colonel Satterthwaite and I am much relieved to know that the background of the hon. Member for Linlithgow includes a spell of service under his excellent leadership.

Current grants to governing bodies for 1983-84 totalled £5·8 million for administration, coaching, training and international competition. At the grass roots level, the Sports Council grant aids many clubs and organisations throughout the regions to encourage participation. In 1983-84 it gave capital grants and loans totalling £5·7 million to a wide range of projects.

Many of the new facilities are geared to the boom in interest in indoor activities. This may in part be due to the desire to escape the British weather, but needs change, and the type of provision must reflect that. Indeed, the general household survey has shown that participation in indoor sports more than doubled, from about 10 per cent., or nearly 4 million, of the adult population in 1973, to a massive 22·7 per cent., or more than 8·5 million, in 1980.

The continuing growth in demand for indoor facilities is reflected in the phenomenal increase in indoor sports centres which I quoted earlier. Phenomenal growth means constant demand, and one way in which that demand is being met is the Sports Council's standardised approach to sports halls. This was introduced in 1984 as an off-the-peg local facility built to a standard design with the aim of providing a venue for many facilities. This has developed in partnership with the construction company Bovis. Ten "SASHes", as they were called — standardised approaches to sports halls—were built in 1984, and at Bitterne in Southampton, 6,000 people used the facility on its opening weekend. In Eastbourne, 2,000 memberships were sold during the first two weeks of the operation.

It is interesting to note that the Sports Council has invested some £2·25 million in that initial programme. In 1983-84, grants totalling £2·8 million were allocated towards the provision of 30 local indoor dry facilities, 22 dual indoor dry facilities, six new playing pitches, six upgraded playing pitches, 18 changing room pavilion accommodation facilities, 14 artificial outdoor surfaces, nine new swimming pools, three refurbished pools, 10 water recreational countryside schemes and 19 specialist facilities—for example, for bowls, riding and golf.

I do not apologise for giving that shopping list, because my hon. Friends must understand exactly what the alternative development and diversification now is as a compensation towards the losses which may be occurring in the traditional sort of sports which we played.

Another example is the huge increase in artificial grass pitches, which have many obvious advantages over natural grass. They lend themselves more readily to multi-use, such as hockey, football and volleyball, and to more intensive use. Thereby, they reduce sport's dependence on natural grass.

This range of opportunities and type of provision represents a substantial change and achievement which we should not ignore in a debate of this kind. Some playing field losses may be a result of this change of character of demand, which is now catered for through new provision of a different kind. We now go indoors more than previous generations to play sport.

The general household survey has shown a fall in the number of adults participating in football—perhaps the sport most associated with outdoor "natural grass" playing fields—from 3·3 per cent. of the population in 1977 to 3 per cent. in 1980. The growth rate of football clubs has slowed significantly in the last decade, although there are still some 40,000 clubs, with 1 million people playing each weekend. Perhaps the advent of artificial pitches with their more intensive use may prompt an upward swing in participation. I do not know, but we must be ready for that moment.

On the other hand, water sports recreation has grown phenomenally over the last decade, both in participation and provision. This is an additional sector which my hon. Friend must consider. For example, in 1970 it was estimated that there were 3,280 members of water ski clubs; by 1980, membership had increased to 10,000. In 1970, there were about 31,000 members of sailing clubs; by 1980, that had reached more than 65,000. To match the growth in participation, new facilities have been developed, including Grafham water, Rutland water, Kielder, Cotswold water park, docklands and Thorpe park.

However, our proud record is not just in new provision. We are also very good at making the best use of existing facilities. I am in a particularly good position to make that statement, because a year or so ago I took an initiative to find out how much community use there was of sports facilities owned by industry and commerce. As my hon. Friend knows, I wrote to the chairmen of the 100 top companies and nationalised industries asking them about community use of their facilities. I learned that most of these facilities are already open to the local community, and I am glad to say that the companies concerned have confirmed their commitment to local people and to continuing this vital contribution to the community.

There remains, of course, some potential for expanding community use of industrial facilities. The Sports Council has undertaken discussions at the local level with some of the companies I wrote to, and it looks as if some new opportunities may emerge. The Government, the Sports Council and sports bodies generally must all continue to look for fresh or improved opportunities of this kind, but it is clear that we are already doing very well, and I express my gratitude to all those companies which are helping us nationally and locally to make the best use of the facilities we have.

Additionally, my colleagues in the Department of Education and Science have confirmed in a recent survey that most schools allow some dual use of their sport and recreational facilities. All of us involved in sport regard schools as a vital stock of facilities. I was encouraged by what the right hon. Member for Small Heath said about Birmingham. My admiration for the director of leisure services in Birmingham is endless. There is scope for opening up new opportunities. We have therefore launched with the Sports Council a new initiative, under the tital "Opening Doors". A very useful booklet has been issued setting out the lessons of good practice through examples from all around the country. I am grateful for the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North on this subject. Backing up this fresh publicity is some additional money in the Sports Council's grant for this year and next year for allocation to new dual-use schemes.

In this general context of achievement and progress, losses in facilities must not become a negative force. I understand the concern that we should not take more steps backwards than forwards. That is clearly not the case, as the record of provision shows. A recent survey by the Sports Council clearly showed that in all areas losses are well outweighed by gains in facilities.

No doubt, however, there are losses in particular places that the local community regrets. That is a matter of genuine concern, which I can understand. Some losses are inevitable, as they always have been, when owners, public or private, dispose of land. Land obviously remains a scarce resource in this country. Sometimes it will be used for other pressing local needs—for example, for housing or industry—which my hon. Friend will understand only too well. People need houses in which to live. New units for the new technologies are needed. Progress in this direction is essential.

Here is another important context for this debate. The Government encourage local authorities to dispose of surpluse land. I am sure my colleagues will agree that that must represent sound financial management. We must all take the broad view of need. Sometimes the urgent requirement locally will be for a use other than recreation. That is inevitable. It is up to the local authority. The House will also be aware that falling school rolls inevitably mean that some schools can shed facilities. Statutory instrument 909 prescribes minimum requirements. We should regard it as a protection rather than as a threat, because for the first time ever it provides minimum requirements. I take my hon. Friend's point about the possibility of a marginal increase in the birth rate in some areas which will affect attendance at certain schools. This is possibly a threat, but we can pursue the matter with the Department of Education and Science and find out what the trend is.

There are realities that the House will accept, but let us continue to agree about the objectives and concerns in sports provision. My hon. Friend and I can agree about these, as well as about the realities. However, let me come to the question of what actions might be considered to overcome the problem of losses.

My hon. Friend has suggested in the past, through his recent private Member's Bill, and today that there is a need to centralise control, monitor the loss of sports facilities and introduce new statutory provisions. Is there a need for a new and centralised control? I am bound to wonder whether this is appropriate. The need and demand for any sports facilities can only be assessed locally. Let us look at the existing statutory and local controls to see whether they meet the concern expressed by my hon. Friend.

There are provisions in the planning Acts which give ample opportunities for organisations and individuals to express views and objections on proposed disposals, or changes of use, of recreational facilities. Local inquiries into planning appeals and applications called in for decision by the Secretary of State are normally held in public, giving a further opportunity for interested organisations and individuals to put their views and objections. In addition, schedule 23 to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 requires local authorities to publish notice of their intentions to dispose of open space land in the local press for at least two weeks. Local authorities are also required to consider any objections before taking any final decisions. Also, of course, any development of privately owned recreational land requires planning permission and must thus be subject to local scrutiny and objection. That is how the system works.

My hon. Friend has also proposed that local authorities and other owners of recreational land should be enabled to sell that land to sports organisations at less than the market value. Local authorities are already able to do this, with the Secretary of State's approval, and similar provisions apply to other bodies mentioned in schedule 16 to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

My hon. Friend has also suggested a need to introduce a new requirement, that an applicant for planning permission shall be obliged to accompany his application with a certificate stating whether the proposed development does or does not involve sports facilities, and, where such facilities are involved, that the applicant should notify the Secretary of State of the application.

The first of those requirements, which would apparently apply to all planning applications, would further add to the documentation accompanying applications for planning permission, and to that extent would be contrary to the Government's general policy of reducing such documentation to an absolute minimum.

Moreover, if, as it appears, the essential aim of the proposal is to ensure that all applications involving the development of sports facilities are brought to the attention of the Secretary of State so that he may consider calling them in for his own decision, there are existing powers —in section 25 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and article 15 of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977 — by which that purpose could well be achieved.

However, it would be most unlikely that there would be an extensive use of the powers of call-in of applications relating to sport and recreation facilities. Under the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, Parliament has entrusted the primary responsibility for the day-to-day control of development to local planning authorities. Therefore, it can only be in the exceptional case, where, for example, matters of more than local importance arise, that the Secretary of State's intervention could be justified.

Additionally, the Secretary of State already has a power under section 25 of the 1971 Act to prescribe the form of applications for planning permissions.

Mr. Denis Howell: I am grateful to the Minister for what he has said in the last four or five minutes, because it is of considerable importance. It would help to give confidence to sports bodies if he were able to assure the House that when any contested planning application is being decided in his Department where a sports issue has arisen he will be involved in that decision. If he can tell us that, I am sure that it will go a long way to assist us to accept what he is saying.

Mr. Macfarlane: Where applications are brought to the attention of my Department and not resolved locally, I involve myself very much in such issues and developments. That is an integral part of my responsibilities in the Department.

This is a useful debate because it was a pity that technically my hon. Friend's Bill was talked out some months ago. That is a slightly unfair assessment because the Opposition spokesman had only about two minutes on his feet. I do not want the House to be misled. Time was short.

Somewhere there is a misunderstanding by the CCPR about the application of land registers and the role of the Secretary of State and local authorities. It is important to understand that. The suggestion that the Secretary of State should compile a register is inconsistent with our wish to reduce administrative burdens on local authorities and also with the nature of what is essentially a local matter. I do not want us to compile another central register.

Land registers exist to promote the better use of land. They are designed to bring to light the unused and under-used land in the ownership of pubic bodies and expose their plans for that land to public debate. Equally, local authorities are required to make the registers available to the general public. My Department has instructed public bodies not to include on the registers

"land which is both held and used as public open space or for recreation."

Thus, any playing fields that are recorded are either unused or under-used.

An instruction also states that land held for future operational needs should be included. Therefore, it does not follow that land on the registers is to be disposed of or lost to sport. I want to make it clear that using the registers as a basis for assessing the loss of pitches is, at best, misleading.

Already, the Sports Council regional offices are using the copies of the registers at my regional offices to identify sites of odd shapes, sizes or locations which properly command low prices in the general market. I am touched that my hon. Friend referred to my excellent words of 1981 at the CCPR conference, because they get better with the passing of years. One of the better ways to use sporting and recreation organisations is to try to find land which can be used.

My hon. Friend raised many matters, including the Olympic games. I shall write to him about aspects with which I cannot deal tonight. We shall have to wait for the feasibility study. I am aware of the limitations and shortages and of what has to be done. We can speculate, but we all know about the gaps in the network of facilities in our major cities. I do not push the interests of any one city, but I am anxious to ensure that the Government work closely with the British Olympic Association. I remain at its disposal when it has completed its feasibility studies.

Mr. Denis Howell: I understand what the Minister says and I have every confidence in the British Olympic Association. It has to make an assessment of the various cities which have put in a bid and as that involves substantial public investment the Government cannot opt out, even in the early stages, of assisting in the making of that assessment.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government are not opting out, nor will they. Some of the right hon. Gentleman's earlier remarks were a little fudged in that because of the passage of time, they did not bear any resemblance to the facts. No guarantee was given that the games would come here in 1988. The selection depends upon many factors. There was no guarantee of a London selection.

We must examine my hon. Friend's arguments closely. I shall reply later to any points with which I do not deal tonight because the subject is important, although it has been exaggerated in some respects. I do not single out any individual, but we should not deny that substantial progress has been made in recent years. Public, private and voluntary sectors have co-operated to expand local opportunities for sport and recreation. We must continue that progress. In doing so, I agree that we must guard against hurtful losses, especially in sensitive areas.

This debate is about means and not objectives. It is not for the Secretary of State or me to sit in judgment on local losses of sports fields, except where that is necessary and appropriate through the planning appeal system.

However, perhaps more locally based machinery of some kind is needed to provide a reliable database of overall provisions which, in turn, might better inform local decisions. I therefore suggested at a meeting that I had in February with the chairman and secretary of the Central Council of Physical Recreation that they get together with the Sports Council to see whether there is a need for, and a means of, better monitoring gains and losses in sports provision in the regions. Something might be done through the Sports Council regional offices, or the regional councils for sport and recreation which already play a vital role locally. Any new proposals will I hope take account of my comments today. I shall keep the House informed.

Berkshire (Development)

9.58 pm

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): I appreciate the opportunity to discuss excessive development in Berkshire. I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for his courtesy and understanding, particularly when I led a delegation of constituents to his Ministry recently. I believe that his courtesy was a result not of his being a Berkshire resident, but because he appreciates the problem.

We in Berkshire who are opposed to excessive development are not Luddites. Over the years we have accepted large scale development with good grace. We are happy to allow modest infilling and further development, such as providing a five-year supply of building land. However, we are no longer asked to provide only that. Our area is one of natural growth and development and because of that the Ministry has decreed that we should find land for 8,000 extra houses in the central Berkshire area.

Berkshire is a narrow, east-west county. The eastern end, which covers part of my constituency, is within the green belt, so it cannot be developed. At the western end, there is an area of outstanding natural beauty on the downs, which also cannot be developed. Therefore, those 8,000 houses——

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Major.]

Mr. MacKay: Those 8,000 houses have to be crammed into a relatively small area between Reading and Berkshire. The bulk of them will be north of Bracknell, which has been asked to provide 5,150 houses. That will destroy the local village communities—such picturesque villages as Warfield, Binfield, Chevey Down and Winkfield Row will be flooded with new houses. There are no more than 600 or 700 houses in Warfield, but it is expected to provide an additional 3,000 houses.

We have a responsibility to future generations to preserve these communities and our countryside. The development will take place immediately north of the town of Bracknell, which most independent observers believe is the most successful of our new towns. It has already exceeded its natural level of development and to extend it further would be not only dangerous to the surrounding villages but would do a great harm to Bracknell itself. That is why the campaign against further development has the people of Bracknell shoulder to shoulder with the villagers. They wish to have green fields and open countryside near their new town that they can use and enjoy.

We do not have the infrastructure to accommodate the new houses, and there is no way that in the foreseeable future funds will be available to provide adequate roads or ample schools and hospitals. Therefore, if we proceed with the new houses there will be terrible bottlenecks on the roads, longer waiting lists in our hospitals and further overcrowding in our schools where the pupil-teacher ratio is already far too high.

The developers tell us that there is a demand for the houses. I refute that, because there is not a local demand. Anyone visiting Bracknell will see a number of "For Sale" boards, many of which have been erected for many months. There is no shortage of houses for sale or to let. If the new houses are built, they will be purchased mainly by people moving out of London where, mainly under Labour-controlled councils and the GLC, they have suffered high rate increases. They will commute back to London each day on our good rail and motorway links to the capital city.

We have no objection to commuters living in our county, but it is fair to say that they do not take part in the local community in the same way as established residents. I do not see that the desecration of local communities and the countryside is right simply to provide additional houses for commuters who work in London as opposed to people who work in local industry.

National issues are also at stake. There is all-party support for the Government's excellent policy for rejuvenating the inner cities. However, that policy will not succeed if developers can build on green field sites in Berkshire and elsewhere instead of utilising inner city sites. I fear that by encouraging developers to move to green field sites, they will not take up the opportunies that the Government are creating by providing land through the register in the inner cities.

The taxpayers' money and the efforts of the Government—efforts which hon. Members in all parts of the House applaud—to rejuvenate the nation's inner cities will fail or, at best, succeed less than fully, if ample provision is made for houses to be built on green field sites. I assure the Minister, being myself a sometime builder and developer, that developers prefer to build on green field sites than in inner cities, if they have the choice.

Another important issue is the north-south divide. As an hon. Member who first represented a constituency in the great city of Birmingham and who now represents a seat in the south-east, I perhaps see this more vividly than most.

We should be encouraging development, employment prospects and industry to set up in those regions of the country where there is genuine unemployment. In my area there is not genuine unemployment. We have an extremely low level of unemployment and I submit that the majority of those who are unemployed in my constituency choose to be out of work, are unemployable or are playing the black economy to the absolute full. That is not true of the midlands and many parts of the north.

We in the Bracknell district council area have encouraged national and multinational firms to come to Bracknell and we have exclusively reserved our remaining few industrial sites for their future expansion, which has been greatly appreciated. At the same time, we have encouraged those starting up in business to proceed by way of small industrial units. In other words, we have encouraged industry extensively. But now the time has come to say that there are other parts of the country that need industry more than we do, areas whose employment prospects are grim by comparison with ours.

That was never more clearly illustrated than by the fact that more than 80 of my hon. Friends signed an early-day motion on the subject that I recently sponsored. It objects to excessive development in the south-east and encourages employment in the regions.

New issues have arisen since I last raised the subject on the Adjournment. Bracknell district council has unanimously passed a resolution condemning massive development and the Government's policy in that respect, and I remind the Minister that that council consists of 40 Conservative councillors with no opposition. In addition, each of the parish councils, where the councillors are either Independent or Conservative, have equally forcefully condemned Conservative Government and previous Labour Government policies of excessive development in the area.

Companies in Bracknell — many of them large multinationals with names that will be familiar to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—have all agreed through their trade and commercial organisations that they do not want further development. They say to me, "If we need a highly skilled, high-tech scientist to come to Bracknell, we know that he can find a house, because there are plenty of houses available to purchase. If we want a semi-skilled man to move from the regions to Bracknell, we know that houses are available to rent from the local authority. So there is no shortage of housing to affect our future prosperity as a company. When, however, we are fighting hard to find the right type of highly qualified people to work for us, we must offer an attractive environment, and that means an attractive new town with countryside around it. If you build on that countryside, as the Ministry wants, we shall face great difficulty in persuading people to join our company."

At the latest election on 2 May, Berkshire bucked the trend, unlike the rest of the country. There had been a hung county council. At the election, substantial Conservative gains were made and the Conservatives took control of Berkshire. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will agree that that was the exception to the rule on the rather sad evening of 2 May. The reasons for that result were twofold. First, we had known about the hung council and the Lib-Lab pact which had led to a 27 per cent. rate increase—an experience that some of the other county councils will face during the next few months. My electors in Berkshire objected to that. Secondly, there is a majority of eight at shire hall because five Conservative seats were gained in and around Bracknell. The Conservatives who stood as candidates in the wards stood on a staunchly anti-mass development ticket and each signed a declaration that they would do everything legally possible to fight that development at county and national levels. They hit the right note with the electors.

Berkshire, which was the sole light for the Government on the evening of 2 May, would not have shone so brightly if the Conservatives had not won those five crucial seats that gave us our majority. We won those seats only because of our staunchly anti-development stand. Every group in the constituency — the Tory-controlled Bracknell district council, the Tory and Independent parish councils and all my electors—totally oppose that development.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State must realise that there are not only environmental reasons why the Government must change their decision, or only economic or regional effects that should cause the Government to change their policy of mass development in central Berkshire. There are also good electoral reasons. If we believe in a democracy and elected representatives and if, after winning the county election on this firm ticket, we are stabbed in the back by the Ministry and the Government, I am not sure how we could go again to Berkshire electors with confidence to advise them that a Conservative Government believe in conservation of the environment, in listening to people of individual areas, in employment in the regions and in inner city rejuvenation.

I make a strong plea to my hon. Friend, who I know is immensely sympathetic, to ask our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Cabinet carefully to reconsider that out-of-date and misconceived policy initiated by the late Anthony Crosland and proceeded with by successive Secretaries of State of both political parties. It is time to rethink and time to change. We are making a grave mistake by proceeding in that way.

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nell Macfarlane): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) for raising the subject of the extent of the problems of housing and development in Berkshire. It is a subject that has taken a great deal of his interest and time since he returned to the House as Member for Berkshire, East. His constituents should be grateful for his endeavours on their behalf. He regularly raises the issue on the Adjournment and at Question Time, and frequently comes to the Department to discuss the matter with my right hon. Friend and myself. He is diligent on his constituents' behalf, which is why I welcome tonight's debate. His constituents will be grateful for the clear and forceful way in which he has put the matter once again.

The issue is of local interest and anxiety. I have been taking a great interest in the matter and have met delegations led by my hon. Friend and other hon. Members who represent constituencies not far from Berkshire, East. They are equally interested.

I am conscious that the pressures for development and conservation in the area must be balanced in the interest of prosperity. I shall ensure that I remain fully conversant with the area and its problems as a basis for discharging in due course my responsibilities in respect of development planning.

I understand that there is widespread local feeling that new housing developments should be contained. For the moment, however, the matter rests largely with the county council as the structure planning authority for the area. Last year, the county council published proposals for a replacement structure plan for the county as a whole to replace the existing structure plans for the west, central and east Berkshire areas. Recently, the county council published a stage 2 consultation document upon which it invited comment before 3 May.

It is now for the county council to decide what proposals to include in the replacement plan. Only when the replacement plan has been submitted to him will the matter come before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. MacKay rose—

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, and I hope that he will convey to those involved the congratulations of many Conservative Members on the excellent results of 2 May. There are lessons for everyone to be learnt from those results. They show the importance that constituents and ratepayers attach to local plans.

Mr. MacKay: I shall be delighted to convey my hon. Friend's congratulations. I know that they will be greatly appreciated by my friends and colleagues who have been elected to shire hall.

On the point about the revision of the structure plans which are being considered by the county council, I believe that the county council would like greatly to reduce the numbers in line with public feelings. At the public meetings, it has been made clear, as I illustrated in my speech and in other conversations with my hon. Friend, that the development is not wanted. If the county council put up good reasons, as I think that I have tonight, to reduce dramatically the number of houses that the Ministry wants, will it be permitted to do that and, if the case is a good one, will it be favourably construed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Macfarlane: If I may speak for myself and for my right hon. Friend, I hope that all those points will be taken into consideration. We would have to take account of those requests, and clearly we would do so. I cannot give any assurances to my hon. Friend this evening, as he will understand, because we still await a completion of the documentation. I hope that it will be possible for the county council to push ahead with its proposals as quickly as possible and to present them to my Department for comment. Only when that process is brought to a conclusion will the present uncertainty at the rate of development not only in north Bracknell but in central Berkshire as a whole be brought to an end.

Given that that is the stage reached in revising the structure plans, it is not for me to comment definitively now, as my hon. Friend will understand. However, I am well seized of the anxieties that he has represented and of those of the 10 organisations that he brought to the Department. I thought that the case was presented in a balanced and coherent manner.

There is concern that the rural character of the area contributes to its economic buoyancy and to the readiness of employment generating activities to locate there. As a matter of general principle, and without in any way seeking to prejudge the issues and arguments relevant to the matter that my hon. Friend has raised, it is important that we should maintain the economic buoyancy of areas that are among the most thriving in the country. I endorse what he said, and I understand his arguments fully.

In maintaining it, planning authorities and, indeed, my right hon. Friend, will be faced with some hard choices, as they often are at national and local Government levels, in seeking to balance the need for development with the need to preserve the many good features of the areas concerned.

My hon. Friend has mentioned his doubts about the ability of the local infrastructure to keep up with substantial residential development. That most important fact was brought to my attention by other hon. Members who accompanied my hon. Friend when they came to the Department of the Environment, as was the pace and rate of development of the big cities and small towns in the outlying areas. Those who know the county well understand that. That is a matter of fact and judgment which I have no doubt the county council will seek to establish in the process of producing the replacement structure plan.

My hon. Friend referred also to the capacity of outstanding planning permissions to accommodate a considerable proportion of extra residential development which builders may seek to promote as they respond to local demand. Again, at present it is for the county council to form the best judgment that it can of the extent to which such consents can cater for the residential growth which it concludes is necessary in the area. It is for the county council to assess as best it can all the different matters such as population trends, household growth, employmemt, economic activity and so on, as well as the need to safeguard the quality of life in coming to a conclusion as to the proper provision for housing which should be made.

As I hope my hon. Friend will understand, time does not allow me to develop or to research as thoroughly as I should have liked many points that he raised in his speech. He knows that he can rest assured that we shall do everything that we can to ensure that his constituents can have faith in the workings of local and central Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Assembly (Running Costs)

2. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the estimated costs of running the Northern Ireland Assembly in the current year.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): £3·2 million.

Mr. Baker: Is my right hon. Friend aware that support for the Assembly came, perhaps reluctantly, because many of us thought that it was the last chance for the Northern Ireland politicians and people to learn to live together and work out their constitutional future? Will he now tell the political parties of Northern Ireland that the Assembly represents the last constitutional chance for them to do that, and that the patience and purse of the British taxpayer are not inexhaustible?

Mr. Hurd: I would hesitate to say that anything is a last chance. I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. Much patience is needed, and also a very clear sense of purpose. Since the constitutional parties have such a responsibility for helping to create political stability, I hope that they recognise that that includes a responsibility to listen and to consider concessions in return for concessions.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: What steps are taken to ensure that reimbursement is not claimed inadvertently for the same expenditure by Members of the Assembly who are members of other Assemblies and bodies?

Mr. Hurd: The claims made in respect of Members of the Assembly are rigorously scrutinised, and I am sure that the inadvertent possibility to which the right hon. Gentleman refers is covered in that scrutiny.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend review the whole question of the usefulness of the Assembly before the next elections to that body?

Mr. Hurd: Yes Sir. I have learnt to respect the efficiency and thoroughness of some of the scrutiny work carried out by the Assembly, but it has not yet succeeded in the main task set for it by this House, which was to work out proposals for the devolution of powers which would command widespread acceptance.

Mr. Michael Brown: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the time will have to come when he must say to the Northern Ireland Assembly that, since it has not accepted the challenge put to it by this House, other circumstances will have to prevail and the Assembly cannot continue?

Mr. Hurd: We are not at that point. I hope that the Assembly, through its Report Committee or in other ways that it thinks proper, will continue on the main task that I have described.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, if rugby came into being by changing the rules when someone handled the ball, the Government may have to change the rules under which the Assembly is currently asked to operate?

Mr. Hurd: We are not at that point yet.

Constitutional Talks

3. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has had about the constitutional future of Northern Ireland.

4. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secrtary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his discussions with party leaders in Northern Ireland.

13. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about recent ministerial conversations with political parties in the Province.

16. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent consultations he has had with representatives of political parties in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: At my request, my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) has met representatives of the Ulster Unionist, Social Democratic and Labour, and the Alliance parties privately to explore and clarify their positions. He has also had an informal discussions with the Northern Ireland Assembly Devolutiou Report Committee. His conclusions will help me to assess how best progress can be made towards new devolved arrangements for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Canavan: Instead of pussyfooting around with an expensive and relatively powerless Assembly with representatives from only six counties of Ireland, is it not time that more radical steps were taken to set up some form of all-Ireland parliamentary body? Is any progress at all being made towards that end in the talks between the British and Irish Governments, or is the British Prime Minister afraid of a few Unionist Members who represent only a minority of opinion within Ireland as a whole?

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister perhaps has a keener sense of the point of Parliaments than has the hon. Gentleman. It would be for this House, or the Westminster Parliament, and, I suppose, for the Dail on the other side of the Irish sea, to decide whether the Parliaments wanted such an organisation.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the impatience expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker), which my right hon. Friend appeared to echo, is matched by the frustration felt by the majority parties in Northern Ireland at his refusal to countenance the normal operations of democracy, namely, rule by the majority? Could not a useful role be found for the present Assembly by making it an upper tier of local government and allowing the proper processes of democracy to take place within it?

Mr. Hurd: I am perfectly ready to consider any suggestions — that one or others — which appear to command widespread acceptance. By "widespread acceptance" we must mean acceptance across the division between the communities. The House would think me foolish if I suggested some new proposition without being convinced that it had that widespread acceptance.

Mr. Hunter: Leaving aside the immediate question of the Assembly, will my right hon. Friend tell us the extent to which, in his deliberations with representatives of political parties in Northern Ireland, he has come across an awareness that, ultimately, it is only through compromise that social harmony can replace social discord?

Mr. Hurd: That awareness is scattered across various pronouncements and pamphlets which appear at different times, and I always welcome it. We need to bring together those hints of greater understanding and a greater willingness to listen to others into detailed and practical discussions.

Mr. Benn: The right hon. Gentleman will recall that during the war Winston Churchill, as Prime Minister, offered to reunify Ireland. He made an offer to Dublin without consulting Stormont. Defence considerations were then dominant in his mind and are now dominant in the minds of the British and American Governments. Were the Republic to be persuaded to join NATO, would not the British Government's objection to reunification almost certainly completely disappear?

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir, that is not so.

Rev. William McCrea: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland are British and proud to be so, and that no decision taken by anyone else will change the Britishness of the Ulster people? Does the right hon. Gentleman not agree that the House must respect the supremacy of the ballot box, and that any politician wishing to defy the democratic wish of the Ulster electorate would make a mockery of all our battles for freedom?

Mr. Hurd: Northern Ireland's status as part of the United Kingdom rests not on any perception of ours about the foreign and defence policies of the Republic, but simply on the wish of the majority of the people who live in Northern Ireland. I believe that their wishes are clear.

Mr. Skinner: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many people on the mainland are asking why the Tory Government, and others before them, have set up ramshackle organisations in Northern Ireland which have cost a small fortune to run and why decent councils in Britain, which are being run well, are being demolished by the Tory Government while that in Northern Ireland never even gets rate capped?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is taking me a little wide of the original question.

Mr. Jackson: Will my right hon. Friend and his colleagues impress on the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), the leader of the SDLP, the importance of that party's participation in the Assembly at the earliest possible time?

Mr. Hurd: It is highly desirable that the SDLP should take its place in the Assembly, although I understand the present difficulties in doing so. We shall not reach the political stability in Northern Ireland which every right hon. and hon. Member here would like unless there is an unfreezing of attitudes, including the attitudes of representatives of both communities, towards the desires and anxieties of the island.

Mr. Archer: May I tempt the Secretary of State to be a little more cheerful about the prospects of progress and co-operation with the Republic? Does he agree that, whatever decisions fall to be made by Parliament, the initiative must come from the Government? Does he further agree that the Taoiseach and the Irish Foreign Minister have shown generosity and courage in an attempt to invite progress? Will he accept that the alternative to pessimism might not be optimism, but that it is at least hope?

Mr. Hurd: I have not yet said anything cheerful or uncheerful about co-operation with the Republic. I was dealing with the proposal about a parliamentary tier, which surfaces from time to time. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman is a constitutional expert, I would expect him to honour my point, which is that if these things are to endure as parliamentary institutions, they must be parliamentary proposals.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

5. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is (a) the current strength and (b) the total establishment of the Royal Ulster Constabulary; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The full-time strength of the Royal Ulster Constabulary on 30 April 1985 was 10,802, and the authorised establishment on the same date was 11,000. This represents a significant increase in the size of the force in recent years, increasingly reflecting the police's primary responsibility for all aspects of law and order in Northern Ireland, aided where necessary by the armed forces. I should like to take this opportunity to pay the warmest possible tribute to the courage and professionalism of the officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and their growing success in controlling terrorism.

Mr. Bruinvels: I also would like to congratulate the RUC and its Chief Constable on how they protect the people of Northern Ireland. Is my hon. Friend satisfied that there are enough police to protect the people of Northern Ireland and the police themselves? What is the RUC's present policy on overtime, which seems to be needed quite a lot?

Mr. Scott: As I said in my original answer, the size of the RUC has been increasing steadily. More operational hours are being worked now than at any time except during the hunger strikes; more operational hours were worked in the past 12 months than in the previous 12 months. That reflects the primary role of the police. I and the Chief Constable are anxious that overtime should be at a level which helps the working of the RUC. Too much overtime can cause damage. By increasing the numbers, we can decrease the amount of overtime worked by officers.

Mr. Maclennan: Has there been some success in increasing the recruitment of members of the minority community into the RUC?

Mr. Scott: The Chief Constable's report for last year shows a small but significant improvement. The RUC and the Chief Constable are determined to do their best to secure a continued improvement.

Security

6. Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest security situation in the Province.

8. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Northern Ireland.

10. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation in the Province.

Mr. Hurd: Since I last answered questions in the House on 4 April, two civilians have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province.

The security forces' efforts to defeat terrorism continue, and since the beginning of this year a total of 171 people have been charged with serious offences, including 20 with murder. 89 weapons, 3,327 rounds of ammunition and 2,222 lb of explosives have been recovered. The bulk of the explosives—about 1·5 tonnes—was found near Dungannon on 25 April. By denying the terrorists the use of that murderous material, the security forces undoubtedly prevented them from inflicting a great deal of destruction and suffering on the community, and I echo the earlier commendation of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary.

Mr. Powell: Is the Secretary of State aware of the negative effect on security in Northern Ireland of such events as the visit of the Irish Premier to Londonderry, especially in view of the apparent acquiescence of the Northern Ireland office in that context?

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure that I follow the connection made by the right hon. Gentleman. The Prime Minister made clear the position about Dr. FitzGerald's visit to Londonderry. He is entitled to come and go there, if he wishes. We were informed of his arrangements, but the decision, timing and arrangements were his. We neither were asked for nor gave advice.

Sir John Farr: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the whole House is full of admiration for the efforts of the security forces? Is he entirely satisfied with the co-operation that he gets from the security forces in the Republic, especially at senior officer level, when a fugitive is fleeing from the law? Do we get full co-operation in that eventuality?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his first remark. Yes, we get co-operation. As the Irish Foreign Minister said in London earlier this week, such co-operation is in the interests of both Governments. I should like to see it improved. The right summary of the position is that co-operation is good, but could be improved.

Mr. Proctor: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the anxiety of the Prison Officers Association and of others in Northern Ireland and elsewhere about the potential closure of Magilligan prison? Is he further aware that it is one of the few prisons in Northern Ireland which are fully following the Government's policy of integration in prisons? Will he assure the House that that prison will not be closed?

Mr. Hurd: I am aware of that anxiety, which has been expressed direct to my Department. Certainly, it is part of our continuing policy to work for integration in prisons. The impact on the prison system as a whole in Northern Ireland of the prospective opening of the new prison at Maghaberry is still being considered.

Mr. William Ross: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that if Sinn Fein were to make a significant advance in the local government elections next week it would be a setback for security? As the Government discovered only on 24 April that the advice given to the House on 30 November 1984 about the foundation stone of identification policy — the medical card — was completely wrong, what further steps does he intend to take to ensure that such a matter does not happen again and to correct the present problems?

Mr. Hurd: I admire the hon. Gentleman's ingenuity in linking the question. As soon as the chief electoral officer drew our attention to the problem, we carefully considered what we could do. We came to the conclusion that it was not sensible to amend the legislation, for reasons of timing and substance, which the hon. Gentleman knows. Instead, we have given the maximum publicity to the possibility of exchanging the old medical card for the new, and have streamlined and accelerated the administrative arrangements for doing that. According to my information, that is proceeding quickly and well.

Rev. William McCrea: Does the Secretary of State agree that the call by the Labour spokesman for Northern Ireland, the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), for the disbandment of the Ulster Defence Regiment is wholly irresponsible, causes only delight to the members of the IRA and all enemies of peace in Ulster, and in no way assists security in the Province? In acknowledging the debt that Ulster owes to the UDR, will the Government clearly affirm their support for the UDR as a crucial part of their efforts to fight terrorism? Would it not have been better for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to suggest that the loony Left of the Labour party should be scrapped instead?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman may be right, but I thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman skated round that awkward recommendation in a recent Fabian Society pamphlet, and did not commit himself to disbanding the UDR. He knows perfectly well, as does anyone who studies such matters seriously, that the UDR plays an indispensable part in the security of the Province.

Ms. Clare Short: Is the Secretary of State aware that there is a mounting feeling in the South of Ireland that its major problems of law and order require it to spend less on policing the border and more on policing its own country? If there is no major improvement in relations between the North and the South of the island, is there not a real danger of a withdrawal of support for security in the North, which will have major implications for all the people of Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: Mr. Barry has made it clear that the efforts of the security forces of the Republic along and behind the border are made, not from a desire to do the British Government a favour, but from a calculation—I would say an accurate calculation—of their interests, given that the provisional IRA is clearly and explicitly determined to end the system of government, not only of Stormont and Belfast, but of Dublin.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: What recent evidence, if any, does my right hon. Friend have that terrorism in the Province is still encouraged and supported, not only with finance, but through training in terrorism supplied by such good friends of democracy as Colonel Gaddafi, Mr. Castro and Mr. Gorbachev, in ascending order of merit?

Mr. Hurd: I had better confine myself to the first. There is evidence from publications in the Libyan press that the Libyan Government believe that it is part of the responsibilities of the Libyan people to keep the provisional IRA in a good state. We must take that seriously.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will the Minister admit that, although he thought that the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) had skated round the issue, that was not the impression created in Northern Ireland? Would it not be advisable for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw his statement, because it would be an insult to the entire British Army if, because some people had acted wrongly, an entire regiment was so slurred? Does he recognise that it is not the Protestant involvement in the UDR which causes concern, but the fact that it is a regiment of the British Army?

Mr. Hurd: I am not interested in helping the right hon. and learned Gentleman out of the problems created for him by his party. My opinion chimes with that of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Holt: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in the final analysis, the answer to the security problem is to bring together the two halves of the community, and that that can be greatly achieved through sport? Does he agree that the excellent marathon run last week was a demonstration of the way in which people who wish to work together can do so?

Mr. Hurd: The Belfast marathon was clearly a great success. It attracted people not only from all over Ireland and the United Kingdom, but from many parts of Europe. The more people, whether sportsmen or others, who visit Northern Ireland to see what is happening there—the difficulties and the opportunities—the more satisfied the people of Northern Ireland will be, because they suffer greatly from the impression given in the media.

Mr. Dubs: Will the Secretary of State confirm that Dr. FitzGerald's recent visit to Derry posed no problems for security in the area? Why does he not say that the Prime Minister of the Republic is welcome to visit any part of the United Kingdom at any time?

Mr. Hurd: I said that Dr. FitzGerald was free to visit Londonderry or any part of the United Kingdom at any time——

Mr. Dubs: Welcome.

Mr. Hurd: —but I also said that the timing and the programme were, naturally, matters for him.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my right hon. Friend talk urgently with the local radio authorities in Northern Ireland, because radio stations are causing great difficulties for the security forces by interviewing IRA terrorists, who threaten Great Britain and Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: This matter has been discussed often, and I have no statement to make on it today.

Mr. Benn: In view of the right hon. Gentleman's statement that people should visit Northern Ireland, did he notice that Geraldine Ferraro, the former Democratic vice-presidential candidate, went there last week and joined the growing number of people who express their opposition to the mass show trials, without juries, using informers who are subject to inducements by the Government to give evidence to get convictions? Is he satisfied that that form of justice should be maintained anywhere in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hurd: I noticed that Mrs. Ferraro joined a number of people, including the right hon. Gentleman, who choose to spend a few hours in Northern Ireland and go away making definitive pronouncements about the conduct of the judiciary and judicial affairs. I do not understand the view that because evidence comes from an accomplice it should be disregarded, regardless of its merit. In the system that operates in Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland and federal cases in the United States, it is for the court and for the court alone to judge whether such evidence is justifiable. That is the right approach.

Mr. Nicholson: Does the Secretary of State agree that not only Mrs. Ferraro but many other people come to Northern Ireland on these bucket-shop trips and go away experts—including some hon. Members sitting not too far away from me? Will the Secretary of State wholeheartedly add his support to the UDR, which has suffered much over the past 15 years in Northern Ireland? Is it not time that he brought security back to the people in Northern Ireland and solved the problem after all this time?

Mr. Hurd: I gladly repeat my tribute to the UDR, which is an indispensable part of security in Northern Ireland. It is an excellent thing that right hon. and hon. Members and friends from other countries should visit Northern Ireland. I simply plead that they do not come just for a few hours and then release a draft statement pontificating about matters which they have not had a chance to study. They should come with a balanced programme, see a wide range of people, and stay a day or two. I am sure that then they would be far wiser.

Mr. Archer: Is the Secretary of State at least persuaded that the most effective method of improving security is to win the hearts of the people of both traditions for a system of law enforcement which they can see is manifestly fair? Is it not clear that if that can be achieved the roots of paramilitarism will wither? Whatever the reason why the UDR is perceived as sectarian, is it not the case that doubts about whether it can now perform an effective role are entertained not only by the Fabian Society but by senior RUC officers and officials of the Security Committee?

Mr. Hurd: It is true, as the Chief Constable made clear in his recent annual report on the security forces, that they need the support of as wide a section of the population as they can achieve. While the Army, including the UDR and the RUC, are, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, active and energetic in trying to bring that about, there is a responsibility on the elected representatives of the minority community and on their friends in the House to play their part in this process. I have made my position on the UDR clear and I have nothing to add.

Tourism

7. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what initiatives the Government have made to increase tourism in the Province.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): Government initiatives in support of the Northern Ireland tourist industry include an expanded programme of marketing and promotional campaigns at home and abroad by the Northern Ireland tourist board and the provision of grant assistance by the Department of Economic Development to encourage the development of tourist amenities and accommodation in the Province.

Mr. Parry: I welcome the increase in tourism and the benefit it brings to the economy. Will this initiative to alleviate the serious unemployment problem in the Province be continued? Are there any plans to increase the sailings between Liverpool and Belfast?

Dr. Boyson: Like the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Perry), who is interested in the passage to and from Great Britain and Northern Ireland, we welcome the increase in tourism. There has been an 8 per cent. increase in the number of tourists coming into Northern Ireland and the number is now approaching 1 million. That helps employment—about 8,000 people are employed in the tourist industry in Northern Ireland. I know that the hon. Gentleman is very interested in and concerned about Northern Ireland. I welcome his support for saying that Northern Ireland is a good place to visit, in particular because his constituency is so close to the Province. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said, if only people would spend two or three weeks in Northern Ireland instead of a few hours there, more sense might be spoken in the House.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the tourist attractions of Northern Ireland are very considerable and that not least among those attractions is the warm welcome that tourists receive from at least 99 per cent. of the population? Is my hon. Friend satisfied that the opportunities given to the Northern Ireland Tourist Board by our missions abroad to bring this home to foreigners, who, in large numbers, already spend time in Northern Ireland, are adequate?

Dr. Boyson: May I underline what was said by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about the hospitality of both communities in Northern Ireland. I am eight pounds heavier than when I first went there on 10 September 1984, which demonstrates that wherever one goes in Northern Ireland some of the best food in the world is offered to visitors. My healthiness at present depends in more ways than one upon what happens in Northern Ireland. As for my right hon. Friend's second point, there are now tourist board representatives in Scotland, West Germany and the Republic, and 350,000 visitors from the Republic came to Northern Ireland on holiday last year. We are examining whether the Northern Ireland Tourist Board is spending its money effectively and what more we can do to help.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: While sympathising with the Minister's encounter with Ulster pride, is it not the case that those who spend a holiday in Northern Ireland and experience not only the beauty of the country but the friendliness and peaceability of the inhabitants obtain a much truer insight into the truth about the Province than those who, with preconceived political notions, flip over and back?

Dr. Boyson: I can only agree with the right hon. Gentleman about holidays in the Province. It is beautiful. A great deal has been done to the loughs and harbours to make it even more attractive than before. Anything that any right hon. or hon. Member can do to encourage other people to come to the Province will be of advantage to all concerned.

Rev. William McCrea: Can the Minister tell the House what positive steps he and his hon. Friends have taken to encourage touring sports teams to come to Northern Ireland, bearing in mind the teams which have cancelled their visits because of threats by the IRA and the INLA?

Dr. Boyson: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are doing all that we can—and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), similarly—to encourage teams to come to Northern Ireland. It was undoubtedly due to the Government's encouragement that there was the recent excellent snooker result involving the Province.

Republic of Ireland (Talks)

9 Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any palns to hold discussions with the leaders of the Republic of Ireland.

11. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Irish Government to discuss matters relating to Northern Ireland.

Mr Hurd: I meet representatives of the Irish Government from time to time but I have no firm plans for a meeting at present.

Mr. Flannery: In view of the dismissive attitude of the Prime Minister to the Forum report, when she voiced the trilogy "out, out, out", will the Minister consider the extension of the friendly attitude which we are assured exists in Northern Ireland to the Republic in order that the political set-up in the whole of Ireland may be discussed? For instance, when talking about British justice, will he try to justify to the Prime Minister of the Republic just how the supergrass trials fit in in any way, or do any good whatsoever, to the political situation anywhere, especially in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: I believe that peaceable citizens are now living in greater security in Northern Ireland because in the past people have been correctly, according to the courts, convicted of terrorist charges as a result of the evidence of their former accomplices. Therefore, I should have no difficulty in explaining to Irish Ministers, if I met them, or to Mrs. Ferraro or to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) that the system by which supergrass evidence in trials of this kind is tested by the court, and not before it comes to court, is correct.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Secretary of State willing to comment on the merits of an Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier and its bearing on relationships between the two countries and on the problems of Northern Ireland? May I press him further? Is he aware that there is no possibility of such a tier being established unless he and the British Government positively discuss it with the Irish Government and set it up? The House of Commons has no mechanism for doing that on its own.

Mr. Hurd: I must hold to the answer that I have given on this. If there is to be some new form of parliamentary arrangement between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, its solidity, endurance and life will depend on that being a genuine parliamentary initiative. Governments can then facilitate and discuss it to the extent that Governments have to. But the impetus must come from Parliament.

Mr. Hayes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that discussions with leaders in the Republic of Ireland are certainly not helped by Americans such as Mrs. Ferraro coming over to the Province and stirring up sectarian hatred for cheap political gain?

Mr. Hurd: I do not want to be unjust to Mrs. Ferraro; she did not do that. She was rather careful in her comments. My criticism is that she did not spend long enough in the Province for her comments to be valid. It would be going too far to make the accusation that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Bell: Will the Secretary of State accept that it cannot and should not be beyond the wit of Her Majesty's Government to reach agreement at this historic time, following the report of the New Ireland Forum, to resolve with the Irish Republic the manifold problems that have separated us in the past? Will he give us an assurance that any discussions he is having with his counterparts in the Government of the Irish Republic are not being placed on the back burner and will be pressed vigorously and resolutely to an agreement?

Mr. Hurd: The dialogue between ourselves and the Government of the Republic that was mentioned in the communiqué after the last Chequers summit is continuing, as the hon. Gentleman knows, and we are putting the necessary energy and good will into that.

Milk Quotas

12. Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he has made in achieving equality with other regions of the United Kingdom for small dairy farmers in respect of milk quotas.

Dr. Boyson: My right hon. Friend has continuing contacts with his agricultural colleagues, but it is not yet possible to announce what relief can be given to small dairy farmers in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Nicholson: Following the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food earlier this week that small dairy farmers in England and Wales would be brought back to the 1983 levels of production and that hardship cases would be met in full, will he assure me and the House that small dairy farmers in Northern Ireland will receive the same treatment, to which they are entitled?

Dr. Boyson: I know of the hon. Gentleman's anxiety and that of many other hon. Members about small dairy farmers in Northern Ireland. The outgoers scheme has not been taken up in Northern Ireland to the same extent as in the rest of the United Kingdom, and that has created a problem. However, we are planning an early meeting of the three territorial Secretaries of State with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about that very problem.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

14. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will meet representatives of the textile industry in the Province to discuss renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Dr. Boyson: The multi-fibre arrangement is principally a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and there will be a debate on the matter this afternoon. If I receive any requests for a meeting I will of course give them full consideration.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Minister's response, but will he recognise that the matter concerns not only the rest of the United Kingdom but has specific implications for job opportunities in Northern Ireland? Will he use his influence with his right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade to have such an agreement speedily implemented, for the good of all the textile industry?

Dr. Boyson: I realise, as does the hon. Gentleman, that the percentage of people employed in the textile and clothing industries in Northern Ireland is three times greater than in the rest of Britain, and that is an important matter. If the hon. Gentleman is staying longer this afternoon, I suggest that he tries to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Bell: Does the Minister not realise that that answer is not acceptable to those who work in the textile industry in Northern Ireland? Does he not recognise that it would be socially intolerable to increase the existing pressures on employment in Northern Ireland through non-renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement? Will he give the House an assurance that he is prepared to fight his corner with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry?

Dr. Boyson: Obviously, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I put forward the views of Northern Ireland. But, as the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) knows, the decision is made by this Parliament and not just by Northern Ireland. Indeed, those hon. Members who are integrationists want the decision to be made by this Parliament. Consequently, this afternoon's debate will be the decisive factor.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Winnick: If it is true that today the Cabinet decided to abolish or phase out the state earnings-related pension scheme, how can the Prime Minister justify 11 million people being swindled out of their right to be able to spend their retirement in comfort and dignity? How many of those 11 million people who will be adversely affected by the Cabinet's decision believed the pledges that were given at the time by herself and her colleagues to the effect that the scheme would not be touched?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman must contain himself in patience. Today the Cabinet completed its consideration of the social security review. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services will now finalise the Green Paper, which is to be published following the Cabinet's decision. He hopes to be able to publish it and accompany it by a statement to the House soon after the Whitsun recess.

Mr. Holt asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Holt: During her busy day, would my right hon. Friend care to reflect on the fact that at the Endeavour school in Middlesbrough handicapped children who are confined to wheelchairs are being abandoned by their teachers at lunch-time, in connection with the dispute, and that so-called professionals are causing great distress to both parents and children?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the information that my hon. Friend has given about the school in his constituency is correct. I understand that for a time the head teacher was trying to cope on his own but was unable to do so. I am amazed that the teachers should have taken this action, and my sympathy lies with the children, many of whom are in wheelchairs, and with their parents.

Mr. Steel: Is the Prime Minister aware that a very warm welcome awaits her on her visit to Scotland tomorrow? As we have just passed the 10th anniversary of her pledge to abolish the rating system, will she recognise that no announcement of temporary relief—however welcome—will be a substitute for redeeming that pledge?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, we have made some provision for temporary relief on domestic rates in Scotland—as was announced some time ago—amounting to about £90 million. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes to be able to make a further announcement to the House next week, which will help with commercial rates. We are also studying the longer-term reform of rates, and we hope to be in a position to make an announcement about that when the studies have been completed.

Mr. Michael Morris: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the reasons stated for the loss of the Bosporus bridge contract was the time taken to put together an aid and trade project? Is she further aware that although she returned from her highly successful visit to Sri Lanka three and a half weeks ago, we still await the result of the aid and trade negotiations on the Samanala Wela dam?

The Prime Minister: When I was in Sri Lanka I announced a further aid package of £20 million for Sri Lanka, following the £115 million aid package that was given to enable the building and completion of the Victoria dam. My hon. Friend asked about the Bosporus bridge. The contract went the other way because the rival consortium gave heavy aid, not only for the bridge, but for the road contract. We are still in contact with the Turkish Government and hope that we can rescue something from that contract.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister had what she quaintly called her rates summit at Chequers six weeks ago. Was it there that the decision was made to rush through a panic Bill for Scottish commercial rates relief, or did the decision come later, without the benefit of a seminar, but with the benefit of the knowledge that the right hon. Lady was going to a Scottish Tory party conference that is on the warpath?

The Prime Minister: The relief that has already been given to domestic ratepayers in Scotland has been very welcome, particularly bearing in mind that of the 17 per cent. average increase in domestic rates in Scotland this year, two thirds is attributable to council overspending. Overspending councils are to blame. Even if the right hon. Gentleman does not like it, the ratepayers of Scotland will be pleased if further relief were given from those high-spending Labour councils.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister knows that she is talking nonsense. The Comptroller and Auditor General has said that by far the biggest reason for increases in rates in Scotland and elsewhere is the withdrawal of Government support for local authorities. Is the Prime Minister aware that she is engaged in a U-turn and is to give back to Scotland the £1,000 million that she has taken away from local authorities there in the past five years?

The Prime Minister: I stand by the statement that of the 17 per cent. average increase in domestic rates in Scotland this year two thirds is attributable to council overspending. The offset of 8p in the pound to domestic ratepayers at a cost of about £90 million has cancelled out the increases which are directly attributable to revaluation. There is also great difficulty because of high-spending Labour councils. It is they who cause the trouble. The right hon. Gentleman should remember the example of Edinburgh.

Mr. Kinnock: May I—[Interruption.]—refer the Prime Minister to the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General and the Audit Commission? Will the Prime Minister take up these matters with that body so that she does not mislead the House with her recital of figures that are not based upon reality?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friends are, of course, considering the Comptroller and Auditor General's report, which will not always favour the viewpoint of the right hon. Gentleman. In the meantime, perhaps he will acknowledge that two thirds of the increase in domestic rates in Scotland is attributable to council overspending and that the overspenders are Labour-controlled.

Mr. Churchill: As we commemorate our momentous victory over Fascism—a victory that could never have been won without both our American and Russian allies—is it not a matter for regret that the 40th anniversary should have been marred by the trading of insults between the two super powers? Will my right hon. Friend and Great Britain take an especial lead in seeking in the months ahead to bring closer together the United States and the Soviet Union, so that we may together win the peace as we so victoriously won the war?

The Prime Minister: I believe that it is in the interests of the Western Alliance and of the Soviet Union that there should never be conflict between us. To achieve that we have to be prepared to defend our way of life at a rate that will deter any aggressor, and in the meantime to enter into discussions with the Soviet Union on how best to reduce the large stores of weaponry, which we all want to see diminished.

Q3. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May 1985.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Powell: Is the Prime Minister aware that some of my constituents were heroes in the last war and fought for a country fit for heroes to return to and live in? Is the right hon. Lady further aware that those same heroes are now unemployed? Is she aware that in Maesteg 24 per cent. of the male population are out of work and that if a colliery closes at St. John's, Maesteg, 45 per cent. of the male population will be unemployed? If the right hon. Lady has a message for the Tory party conference in Scotland tomorrow, could it be that she will join the ranks of the unemployed?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government are as anxious as any other and Conservative Members are as anxious as Opposition Members to increase the number of jobs that are available. That increase will not come merely by sharing out the number of jobs among more people, which would mean lowering wages as we increased the number of employed persons. I do not believe that overmanning is the answer to our problems. The answer lies in the private sector increasing the number of small businesses and thereby increasing the number of businesses that can expand and take on more people. There is no other answer in the long run to getting more jobs.

Q4. Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend welcome the forthcoming Local Enterprise Week? Does she look forward to a reduction in interest rates as a further encouragement to new businesses?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I welcome the Local Enterprise Week, which is being run by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment with responsibilities for small businesses, my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier). I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) is running a meeting to further the objectives of the week. Its purpose is to help those who are able to start up in business on their own by ensuring that they obtain all the expert advice that is available to them. I hope that meetings in Bolton and elsewhere will be successful.

Mr. William Ross: Does the Prime Minister recall that during the passage of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Bill it was decided that the foundation stone of stopping personation by Sinn Fein at local government elections should be the medical card? Is the right hon. Lady aware of the exchanges that took place between my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) and the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), on 28 November 1984, when it was alleged that all medical cards would be sufficient for this purpose? Is she further aware that at the end of April it was discovered that only medical cards issued after 1973 would be valid and that this has resulted in anything between 15 and 20 per cent. of the electorate being disfranchised? What steps does she intend to take to ensure that this does not happen again? Does she agree that the officials and Ministers responsible should be removed from office?

The Prime Minister: I am aware that the validity of medical cards has been a source of some concern for those who represent Northern Ireland seats. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland answered a question on the issue before I entered the Chamber to the effect that he is taking every step possible to ensure that valid medical cards are available.

Q5. Mr. Budgen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to welcome the proposed privatisation of British Gas? Will she explain why this future private monopoly cannot be broken up according to region and function?

The Prime Minister: I join my hon. Friend in welcoming the decision further to privatise, and to privatise the gas industry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy considered whether the gas industry should be broken up either by region or by function. He came to the conclusion that it would take far too long to break up by region and that that would be far too expensive. He recognised, too, that that could have an adverse effect on the price of gas in some areas. For these reasons he decided that it would be better to go ahead by privatising the gas industry as a whole.

Mr. Leighton: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to congratulate the membership of SOGAT, the country's largest printing union, which has recently voted by a majority of nearly 4:1 to retain its political fund?

The Prime Minister: The SOGAT members vote exactly as they will on whether to retain their political fund. They have an opportunity to vote and we insisted that there should be a vote. How they use their vote is a matter for their decision. I shall be only too delighted if more trade unions believe in giving their membership the right to vote by secret ballot. This advance has come about only as a result of the Government's actions.

Mr. Lyell: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the leader of the National Association of Head Teachers that the NUT's refusal to meet the Secretary of State for Education and Science was ill-judged? Does she further agree that the country is entitled to expect an honourable profession not merely to seek to increase its pay by striking, to the sufferance of children, but to come forward with sensible proposals for a restructuring of its profession so that a wise, overall solution can be achieved?

The Prime Minister: Yes, it is disappointing that the NUT will not take part in any meeting with my right hon. Friend. It has said that it wants an improved offer in Burnham and will discuss only this year's pay offer. My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right to say that we need a restructuring of the profession, proper appraisal provisions and proper contracts of service. Then we can, perhaps, have a much more fundamental talk about the whole pay structure.

Security

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement on security.

On 22 February I received the report of the Security Commission on its inquiry into the case of Michael Bettaney, the former security service officer who was tried for offences under the Official Secrets Acts and was sentenced to 23 years imprisonment in April last year. The report is being presented to Parliament as a Command Paper this afternoon.

The commission has fully examined Bettaney's career in the security service, with the object of identifying any errors on the part of management in relation to Bettaney's employment. It finds that the process of recruiting Bettaney was carried out consistently with the procedures at the time. There is, in fact, no reason to doubt his loyalty at that time, or to suppose that he had at that stage ever contemplated the possibility of turning spy.

The commission makes a number of serious criticisms of the errors by the security service in relation to the management of Bettaney's career. In particular, it concludes that there came a point in October 1982 when there should have been, but was not, a very full investigation of Bettaney's lifestyle, which probably would have led to the removal of his positive vetting clearance and the cessation of his employment in the security service.

It remains the case, however, that Bettaney's attempts to get himself recruited as an agent of the Russian intelligence service were not successful. The security service's investigation that led to Bettaney's eventual conviction was effective and conclusive.

Although in the course of his attempts to get himself recruited Bettaney did communicate some secret information to the Russians, he was arrested before he was able to pass over the major proportion of the secret information that he had collected, and the grave damage that would have ensued by such communication was averted.

In the light of its investigation, the commission makes a number of recommendations for changes in positive vetting procedures in the security service. The most significant of these is that, at quinquennial review, special and separate reports should always be called for from all those who have supervised the subject since clearance was last given.

The commission also recommends that the revised and improved arrangements which apply at present only to the more senior grades should now be extended to all staff. These recommendations are being put into effect.

In the course of its investigation the commission received evidence of a more general character which was critical of various aspects of the internal organisation and management of the security service. It did not attempt to pass judgment on those criticisms, but has recorded its impression of aspects of organisation and management which seem to it to require examination and reassessment. The last chapter of the report makes some suggestions for changes in management attitudes and arrangements, and indicates a number of matters which, in the commission's view, call for particular consideration.

These criticisms and suggestions are being thoroughly examined and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I are determined to see that action is taken to remedy management weaknesses.

The new director general is giving the utmost care and attention to the Security Commission's criticism of errors in relation to Bettaney's employment, as well as to the general management criticisms to which I have referred. He will make the changes that are judged to be necessary to improve the organisation and management of the service and will report to my right hon. and learned Friend and me later this year. I shall arrange for his conclusions and measures to be reported to the Security Commission for any further comment that it may wish to make.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed concern about the handling of members of the service who are troubled over particular matters and activities within the service. The director general has been asked to consider, and to report to my right hon. and learned Friend and me, what developments he proposes by way of internal outlets for the expression of grievances or anxieties of individual members of the service.

Finally, I emphasise that the criticisms of management do not extend to operations or overall efficiency.

Indeed, the Commission says:

"nothing in this report is intended in any way to call in question the professional and operational efficiency of the Security Service, which we believe to be of a high order".

Nevertheless, the criticisms that the Commission makes of the handling of Bettaney's case are serious, and every possible effort will be made to see that the shortcomings that it describes do not occur again.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): The Security Commission's report reveals great managerial inefficiencies within the security service, and I am sure that the whole House and the country will share the concern expressed by the Commission.

Plainly, Britain needs an effective and efficient security service. May I, therefore, welcome the Prime Minister's announcement that she will immediately implement the Commission's recommendations on positive vetting and that the new Director General will attend to the other criticisms made by the Commission?

May I also make it clear to the Prime Minister that, unfortunately, her statement does not meet the real seriousness of the problems illustrated by the Bettaney case? When she says:

"Bettaney's attempts to get himself recruited as an agent of the Russian intelligence service were not successful", it seems that the right hon. Lady betrays a certain complacency. The fact is that no man could have tried harder than Bettaney to get himself recruited to the Russian secret service, and his fortunate incompetence is not a sufficient reassurance about the general condition of our services. Yet another internal reorganisation cannot, and will not, allay the widespread concern about the state of Britain's security services.

The Michael Bettaney case is only the latest in a series of incidents which have shown that our security services are not as proficient as they should be—indeed, must be—in clearing spies from within their own ranks and in detecting and defeating the spies from powers that seek to do us harm.

Does the Prime Minister agree with me that it is wrong that the security services should dissipate time and resources in conducting the surveillance of loyal British people, who have no connection with espionage and pose no threat to the security of this country, when they should be concentrating entirely on real subversives, real spies and real terrorists who do wish us harm?

The Prime Minister has told us of her decision simply to pass to the Director General the evidence to the Security Commission from, as the report says,

"present members of the Service at various levels and from former members".

That evidence is "highly critical" of the service. The right hon. Lady's response to those authoritative criticisms from various levels within the service is not good enough.

Following the report from the Director General, which the right hon. Lady expects later this year, precisely what action will she be prepared to take to remove the problems identified in confidence by those within the service who have made criticisms?

Finally, is the Prime Minister aware that people who share her political affiliation, as well as those who share mine, and people with no political affiliation, believe that it is essential to establish a system of external oversight, representative of all parties, and answerable to the House, with the appropriate safeguards for necessary secrecy? Will she place the security services on a proper statutory footing and establish a parliamentary review procedure so that we can satisfy ourselves and the country that this nation's security is being properly protected?

The Prime Minister: On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, it is a fact that Bettaney was arrested before he was able to hand over some of the information which he had accumulated—[Interruption.] That is a fact. He was arrested and therefore he was caught within his own organisation before he was able to hand over the information.

Secondly, the Security Commission had two main criticisms. The first concerned the handling of Bettaney's career. The right hon. Gentleman will see that in the paragraphs and chapters of the Security Commission's report it argues very carefully and closely its reasoning. I think that we should leave it to be read in detail and leave the new director general of the security services to deal with that matter, as I am certain he will.

The commission also made a general criticism that it had received from other members of the security services adverse comments on the way in which the service was managed. The commission did not go into that. The commission did not validate those criticisms, for it is sufficient both for the commission and for us that they were made, and clearly that whole matter must be inquired into. When the Director general has come up with his proposals and put them into operation we shall also refer those proposals to the Security Commission for any further comment that it may make. Therefore, I believe that we have met the legitimate concerns and the serious criticisms of the Security Commission.

The need for external oversight has been argued at length in the House and came up again during the passage of the Interception of Communications Bill. All Governments run the security services in the same way and on the same lines, because they know when they are in power that that is the best way to run them. They must be run under unified management. They cannot be referred to an external group.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Does my right hon. Friend agree that all that has happened in the past emphasises and underlines the need for a safe and efficient way of dealing with complaints by members of the security services? Will she consider the recent proposal of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House, including two former Home Secretaries, to appoint a complaints commissioner to deal with complaints internally and without any breach of security by members of the service? Bearing in mind that the American CIA has an ombudsman with powers of oversight — an appointment which has proved to be highly successful, so far as one can gather—does my right hon Friend agree that such an appointment of a comparable kind here would be the safest of all safety valves?

The Prime Minister: I saw the speech that my hon. and learned Friend made to this effect during the passage of the Interception of Communications Bill. It was generally in line with what he has just said. We are naturally concerned that for those in the security service who have certain strong feelings about duties which they are asked to perform there should be a channel through which they can make their views known.

I believe that quite a lot will occur through a change in the style of management there. I listened carefully to my hon. and learned Friend's comments. Before jumping to any specific conclusion, I have asked the new Director General to consider this with the staff and to put forward proposals. My hon. and learned Friend's proposal will, of course, also be considered.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): The professional and operational efficiency of the secret services surely must come into question when Bettaney was not competent enough even to be able to be recruited by the Soviet security services. Although Sir Anthony Duff is a very distinguished public servant, will the Prime Minister give careful consideration to the proposal for a complaints ombudsman covering both the security and intelligence services? If the CIA and the FBI are both capable of being subjected to an ombudsman and also to a Select Committee of Congress, surely it is time now for an all-party parliamentary Select Committee of both Houses to be able to scrutinise the secret Vote of both the security and the intelligence services.

The Prime Minister: No. I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman is correct in the latter part of his question. He did not do that when he was Foreign Secretary, for, I believe, very good reasons. I think that we should continue to enable the secret services to run in a secret way—after all, those against whom they operate always have the benefit of secrecy—and carry on in the way that we have done in that they are responsible to Ministers, whether the Home Secretary or the Foreign Secretary.

With regard to the internal complaints, I have nothing to add to what I have already said about that matter in answer to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner).

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Will my right hon. Friend discard the obviously fatuous suggestions of the Leader of the Opposition, which would be likely to prove positively harmful in their effect? Nevertheless, will she recognise that the spasmodic reviews of the security services by the great and the good are not adequate for the purpose, and that a permanent inspectorate within the services would be likely to prove the best solution?

The Prime Minister: I have noted my hon. Friend's comments, but I am sure he will agree that the best way is for the new Director General to consider these matters first and make his own recommendations.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): As part of the consideration of what the Prime Minister described as internal complaints, will she report to the House later this year on the ideas of the new Director General on this matter? Several of us agree with the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee that the best channel would be a sort of ombudsman inside MI5. It took the Bettaney case to achieve any consideration of the matter, and I accept any criticism that might fall on me because of it. It is a serious matter, and the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) has made a very good suggestion.

The Prime Minister: Without any commitment, may I consider what the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) has said? It is important to find a solution, and it is important that I report that a solution has been found. I would need to consider whether it would be wise to report the solution precisely.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that in the aftermath of the Blunt revelations about six years ago both she and the then Home Secretary, Lord Whitelaw as he now is, indicated that there would from then on be the tightest possible ministerial oversight of security services? Is it not an uncomfortable fact that the weaknesses revealed by today's statement show that pure ministerial oversight, however good the Ministers may be, is not quite good enough? Will she now be a little more sensitive to the views, held in all parts of the House, that some form of Privy Councillors' committee or ombudsman would reassure public opinion in this area?

The Prime Minister: I think that my hon. Friend would be the first to accept that Ministers should not get involved in the day-to-day management of any service. I am sure that he would accept that. The criticism in the Bettaney case was of that kind of management. That is being inquired into and, I believe, will be put right. There are also certain proposals as to what should happen on the quinquennial review of vetting, which was where the problems arose. I do not think that it would be helpful to the security services to have their operations and their management exposed to cross-examination in this House. I think that it would be highly damaging to them.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Would a purely internal outlet for the expression of grievances of individual members of the service have dealt with the situation where a senior official of MI5 believed that the then Director General, Sir Roger Hollis, was a spy and found himself under investigation for pursuing that line of inquiry?

The Prime Minister: I have already made my views on that quite clear and given the official statement. Therefore, I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman raising it again under the Bettaney case.

I believe that there could be an internal route under a different style of management. It is being considered. The hon. Gentleman heard the reply that I gave to the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many people feel that she is doing her level best to restore the credibility of the security services, but that some of us feel, in the light of the infiltrations at a very senior level and the continued catalogue of errors such as the one we are now facing, that that must call into question not only the management but the actual operation of the security services? For that credibility—which is the key issue—to be restored, surely nothing short of forming a new service will suffice?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with my hon. Friend. As he will be well aware, the security service has had its very considerable successes, and those successes have received much less publicity than problems of this kind.

I do not believe that we need a new service. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise the excellent work that the security services do, and try to boost their morale rather than to lower it.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the right hon. Lady aware that what is so disturbing about her report is that she refuses to comment on, let alone take action over, the allegations that a number of people have been investigated by MI5 and the special branch, not because they were subversive in any possible sense, but because of their opinions? I remind the right hon. Lady of the case of Mrs. Haigh in the west midlands.

Secondly, may I ask the Prime Minister why, in replies to me, she has said that she would not give permission for the newly appointed Director General of MI5 to give evidence, if invited, before a Select Committee, or to come here perhaps once a year to answer questions from hon. Members? Does the Prime Minister not recognise —unlike some of her hon. Friends—that if there is to be confidence in MI5 and the security services, some degree of parliamentary accountability is necessary?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of Lord Harris's definition of subversion. Only when activities fall within that definition are they investigated. The hon. Gentleman referred to further accountability to the House. I remind him of the view taken during the lifetime of the last Labour Government. On 28 July 1977 a Home Office Minister said:

> "I am inhibited from commenting on the allegations in any detail by the long-standing and well-established convention that these matters are not discussed across the Floor of the House." —[Official Report, 28 July 1977; Vol. 936, c. 1223.]

I believe that in the case of this service it is necessary to continue that practice.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Is the right hon. Lady satisfied that the personal information that is held and is exempt under section 27 of the Data Protection Act on the ground of national security is relevant to national security, and that no irrelevant information is held? In view of what has been said by hon. Members after her statement today, will the right hon. Lady consider what may be the best way of reassuring the British public that that is so?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that that question arises from the commission's report on the Bettaney case. I believe that these matters were discussed during the passage of the Interception of Communications Bill, and I have nothing to add to what was said then.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a very important debate to follow. I shall take one more question.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): In view of the serious statement on security by the Prime Minister, will she consider withdrawing a statement sent to me from the Cabinet Office Management and Personnel Office? The Minister concerned said that it was the Government's "declared policy to introduce competitive tendering for services, including security guarding, in Government Departments . . . I cannot go into detail about the steps which are taken to ensure the suitability of commercial guarding companies".

That is what I was told, and yet the Prime Minister makes statements about her concern for national security.

I am not prepared to allow private companies to be responsible for the security of the correspondence of hon. Members. [Interruption.] Hon. Members may laugh. The citizens of this country are entitled to security for their correspondence with their Members of Parliament. To place that security in the hands of private companies——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the question have anything to do with the security services?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order afterwards.

Mr. Skinner: It is relevant to the statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the point of order afterwards.

Later——

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be brief, as we have a busy day.

Mr. Cohen: My point of order arises from the Prime Minister's statement. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, there were only four hon. Members standing at the end of the Prime Minister's statement—myself, my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who had been trying to ask a question all the time, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who began to seek to ask a question in the middle of questions, and the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), who began to seek to ask a question at the end of questions. You, Mr. Speaker, moved on without calling us, but at the end of business questions you said that you would take questions until 4.15, but called all those hon. Members who had been seeking to ask questions up to now, 4.24. That is wrong, Mr. Speaker, because——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me stop the hon. Gentleman right there. These are different matters. The hon. Member will accept that business questions are prized Back-Bench opportunities to put questions to the Leader of the House. He will know that I always seek to call as many hon. Members as possible on business questions. I cannot always call everybody on statements; it would be impossible to do so. More than 32 hon. Members wish to take part in the next debate. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not wish to delay that, because many of those hon. Members are colleagues from his side of the House.

Mr. Cohen: I understand that, Mr. Speaker, but the point needs to be made. I appreciate your point about business questions being prime time for Back Benchers, but so are statements on security services. The chances for hon. Members to ask questions are fewer on this subject than on business questions. When we try to raise the matter, it is blocked by the Table Office. I wanted to raise three clear points with the Prime Minister, none of which were made during the supplementary questions. I wanted to ask that anyone in the security services——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot do that. I have to exercise discretion. He will know that there are other opportunities to put his questions. I try to be as fair as possible in allocating the available time. I cannot take further points on that now.

Mr. Cohen rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is being selfish in seeking to keep out other hon. Members. The only sanction that I shall have is to call more hon. Members from Conservative and alliance Benches if the hon. Gentleman wishes to take time from his colleagues.

Mr. Cohen: A question arises out of your first ruling, Mr. Speaker. You said that there are other opportunities for Back-Bench Members to raise this matter. Where are those opportunities for debate on the security services? The Leader of the House said that there will not be a debate next week.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will have to find other opportunities.

Mr. Cohen: There are none.

Business of the House

3.54 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement concerning next week's business. It will be as follows:

Monday 13 May — Until seven o'clock, private Members' motions. Remaining stages of the Surrogacy Arrangements Bill, and of the Prosecution of Offences Bill [Lords].

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

Tuesday 14 May — Second Reading of the Oil and Pipelines Bill. Remaining stages of the Ports (Finance) Bill.

Wednesday 15 May—Opposition Day (11th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion titled "The Government's Neglect of British Industry and the New Technologies."

Motion on the Unfair Dismissal (Variation of the Qualifying Period) Order.

Thursday 16 May — Motion on the Spring Adjournment.

Second Reading of the Administration of Justice Bill [Lords]

Friday 17 May—Private Members' Bills.

Monday 20 May—Debate on a Government motion on the report of the Auld committee of inquiry into proposals to amend the Shops Acts, Cmnd. 9376.

The House will wish to know, Mr. Speaker, that it will be proposed that the House should rise for the Spring Adjournment on Friday 24 May until Monday 3 June.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his statement.

In view of the hostility that the Unfair Dismissal (Variation of the Qualifying Period) Order will arouse among hourly paid workers, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that more time is given for that debate next Wednesday so that more right hon. and hon. Members can participate, as the subject will affect many workers in Britain?

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, for the sixth time, for a debate on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality and tell him that we want such a debate to be held on a day and at a time when it can be reported fully in the press?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is growing anxiety among management and workers at the prospect of the social security review and its findings undermining the state earnings-related pension scheme, which workers depend on to provide them with pensions that will free them of the need to claim social security in retirement? The Prime Minister said earlier that the discussion of these matters in Cabinet had been concluded. When will we have a statement? Will it attend to each of the subjects separately, or does the right hon. Gentleman hope that they will be lumped together, thereby somewhat restricting the discussion that should take place?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman will have heard that it is proposed that the White Paper should be published shortly after we return from the Whitsun recess and be accompanied by a statement to the House. I note what he said about the desirability——

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): It is a Green Paper.

Mr. Biffen: I am most grateful for that correction. It is a Green Paper. We are linked in a dream partnership that has saved me from those incautious words. I take the right hon. Gentleman's point about the ambit of the statement and will refer it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I note what the right hon. Gentleman said about a debate on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality. He will appreciate that this matter has been attended to through the usual channels. I shall ensure that the matter is further attended to.

I take account of the right hon. Gentleman's request for extended time on the debate on the unfair dismissal order on Wednesday. That matter can be helpfully attended to through the usual channels.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Did the Leader of the House notice that the House got on to the Adjournment last night at 8.17 pm? Is this not difficult to reconcile with any suggestion that the Government might find it difficult to provide a little time for the passage of measures desired by the House?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to travel hopefully. It is in the essence of Parliament that it should be unpredictable, above all, about the Committee stages of Finance Bills, which are greatly influenced by the wishes of the Opposition. I am not sure whether the Government can be blamed if business ends a little early.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an appropriate moment to say that there is nothing unpredictable about the number of hon. Members who wish to participate in the debate on the multi-fibre arrangement. In view of that, I shall allow business questions to continue until 4.15 pm.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): In view of the damage being done to schoolchildren and schools by the Militant Tendency and the Young Socialist organisation of the Labour party office, which are subverting schoolchildren dangerously, keeping them out of school and closing schools, may we have an early statement from the Secretary of State for Education and Science, on which hon. Members may question him and seek an assurance from him that schools will not be closed because those organisations are damaging children's chances of education?

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer my hon. Friend's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. He makes a legitimate point about a matter which has caused a great deal of anxiety. However, I must point out that he has a chance of raising the matter on the motion for the Spring Adjournment.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Will the Leader of the House bear in mind the report in the media that the Secretary of State for Scotland will today make a statement about rates in Scotland at the Tory party conference? Will he ensure that the Secretary of State for Scotland makes the self-same statement in the House, and apologises to the House for making the statement outwith the elected Chamber?

Mr. Biffen: If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is locked in conclave with the Conservative party conference, he deserves our good wishes, not our abuse. Any substantive statements that must be made about rates will undoubtedly be made to the House next week.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): As many Conservative Members are anxious that the Government should get their conclusions right following the social security reviews, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that there will be the fullest possible opportunity for debates on those matters soon after the Green Paper is published? Can he further confirm the point to which he alluded in answer to his dream partner, that it will be a genuine Green Paper?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of what my hon. Friend says about the desire for a debate in the Chamber. It must be held in the wider context of a national debate, which will attend the topic. I confirm that it is a Green Paper.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The right hon. Gentleman will recall that I have frequently pressed him for a debate on the Export of Goods (Control) Order, which brings into operation the COCOM agreement. Indeed, he has gone further and given a generally sympathetic welcome to the value of such a debate. Has he had time to see the reply from the Minister for Trade, who said that the order would probably come into effect on 12 June? Will he show more clearly whether the Government are prepared to give time to discussing this matter which is vital to British high technology industry?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly consider that point and be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): Regarding the Auld report on unrestricted Sunday trading, is my right hon. Friend aware that, although Conservative Members accept that the anomalies in the present law need to be rectified, we have grave doubts about the need to introduce unrestricted Sunday trading? Will he bear that in mind when he prepares for the debate?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. Clearly the matter evokes a wide range of opinions across the House. He will be interested to know that the Government motion will go down this afternoon and, therefore, will be available for consideration.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): As we now know that the largest political donation in history is enmeshed in fiduciary impropriety, will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate so that we can discuss proposals to prevent future double-dealing, double standards and double hypocrisies on the part of the double Davids?

Mr. Biffen: I have always sought delicately to avoid the big Ds. The matter could conceivably arise on the motion for the Spring Adjournment. I should love the opportunity of answering such a debate.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that hon. Members have recently received from the Fees Office a letter about their mileage allowance? For cars between 1,300 cc and 2,300 cc hon. Members will receive 28p, and for cars over 2,300 cc they will receive an embarrassing 42p. Is that not an open invitation to hon. Members to buy foreign gas-guzzling cars? Is it not absurd at a time when the Government seek to contain public expenditure, and should we not debate the resolutions again?

Mr. Biffen: It is an interesting development of the argument—I think that it has now been lifted from the columns of the Daily Express—to suggest that the only large capacity cars are foreign cars. If my hon. Friend wishes to become an expert on gas-guzzling cars, he will find plenty of home grown varieties. I shall be happy to see him if he wishes to raise any serious points on the matter.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Is the Leader of the House aware that both sides of the House wish to establish an Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier? When Ministers are asked about it they say that it has nothing to do with them and that it is up to Parliament. Can the right hon. Gentleman either find time for a debate on the matter, or suggest a way by which the House can express its views and achieve that end?

Mr. Biffen: No time has been provided for such a debate next week. If the hon. Gentleman believes that there is such universal support for the proposition, he has other ways of testing it.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): My right hon. Friend will be aware that in the past there has been criticism on the Floor of the House of the ability of the Church of England to represent great national occasions in our religious services. May we place on record that yesterday the service in Westminster Abbey and the remarks of the Archbishop of Canterbury were highly acceptable and splendidly delivered?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure that next week's business is the obvious way to place on record praise for yesterday's sermon. However, that shows that Parliament has its ways and means.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Will the Leader of the House make it clear whether, when we discuss the Auld report on 20 May, we shall have a firm declaration from the Government about the report's proposals on wages councils? As a Member sponsored by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, I must declare my interest. I listened yesterday to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) about the declaration of interests. The Leader of the House should examine closely the interests of hon. Members who may participate in that debate, especially private interests in garden centres, DIY stores, Sunday opening and amendments to the Shops Act. Will he assure the House that he will ensure that those hon. Members declare their interests, especially regarding a firm called GJD?

Mr. Biffen: I will draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to the hon. Gentleman's point about a debate and a statement of Government policy about wages councils, as he will take part in the debate. I think that the House understands the expected conventions about the declaration of interests, and I am sure that it will abide by them.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Is my right hon. Friend prepared to consider sympathetically the request by the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) for more time for the debate on unfair dismissals, in view of the fact that many of the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends are threatened with unfair dismissal by their general management committees and may wish to bring their problems to the House for discussion?

Mr. Biffen: I thought that my warm reaction was so transparently sympathetic and devoid of any code that it must be for the reasons stated.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Does the Leader of the House accept that the Prime Minister and several of his ministerial colleagues have given specific, categoric and repeated assurances that the NACODS agreement would be scrupulously observed? Is he aware that the National Coal Board has shown a considerable disdain for, and appears to be rejecting, the agreement? If he will not provide time for the House to debate the agreement, may we at least have time to consider the meaning of words such as "sacrosanct", and to allow Labour Members to use such words as "inexactitude"?

Mr. Biffen: I realise that this is a matter of general concern on both sides of the House. There is no provision for a debate next week, but I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy to the point that has been made.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that yesterday, on a bogus point of order, the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) launched a scurrilous attack on the Liberal party, suggesting that the British School of Motoring had bought it with a bribe of £188,000. My right hon. Friend said that this would be a suitable matter for the Spring Adjournment debate, but we must all wish to be fair to the Liberal party. Would it not be more appropriate to have a three-hour debate so that we could find out precisely what happened?

Mr. Biffen: It is an imperfect world, and next week only the Adjournment debate is available.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): May I ask the Leader of the House a serious question for a change? Will he arrange the business of the House in such a way as to give us the opportunity to debate the peremptory closure of coal mines in the north-east of England, especially Blyth Bates colliery and a pit in Durham, where the National Coal Board has completely ignored the existing review procedure and peremptorily closed both pits without notice, without negotiation and in breach of promises made to the NUM in both areas? Will the right hon. Gentleman treat this matter as extremely urgent, since more than 3,000 jobs in the north-east are involved?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman raises a matter of great constituency interest, to which he has already drawn the attention of the House through the Standing Order No. 10 procedure. I can offer no Government time for a debate next week, but I shall report the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): On Monday afternoon, the House will be given an opportunity to debate civil liberties. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is disgraceful that the National Council for Civil Liberties (sic) is trying to deny to some people the most fundamental civil liberty of all—the right to go to one's place of work free of intimidation and mobs? In the light of the disgraceful goings-on in the council, will my right hon. Friend try not to put in too many statements on Monday afternoon so that the true guardians of civil liberties on the Conservative Benches can speak in the debate?

Mr. Biffen: Private Members' debates on Monday afternoons have been known occasionally to lapse into torpor. I am glad that my hon. Friend gives notice that that will not be the case next week.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 672?

[That this House believes that, in order to carry out their responsibilities to their constituents and to play a more effective role in the legislature, it has become urgently necessary for honourable Members to have, as a minimum requirement, the resources to employ a secretary and a research assistant paid direct by the Fees Office; and expects Parliament to provide these resources as a matter of urgency for every honourable Member who wishes to make use of such facilities.]

Has he noted the many hon. Members from both sides of the House who have signed the motion? Is he further aware that many hon. Members believe that our efficiency is greatly impaired by the lack of secretarial and research resources, and will he arrange for an early debate on this matter, which is taken seriously by all hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise that it is a matter of considerable seriousness to many hon. Members, but I must tell the hon. Gentleman that no Government time is available for such a debate next week.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in the event of hostilities, Britain would be largely denuded of its regular forces, leaving a key role to be played by reservists, the civil defence force and the police? Is he further aware that some Socialist-controlled police authorities are preventing officers from their forces from taking part in exercises, such as "Brave Defender" which will take place in the autumn of this year, and that that will have a detrimental effect on our national defence? Does not interference with national defence by local authorities deserve a debate?

Mr. Biffen: I endorse wholeheartedly the importance of the topic, but there is no Government time for the debate that my hon. Friend wishes. I suggest that he pursues whatever opportunities free enterprise presents.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Does the Leader of the House recognise that his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will have angered many hon. Members on both sides of the House? It was not an acceptable answer. The names on the early-day motion represent only the tip of the iceberg. If the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to become like the captain of the Titanic, rearranging the deck-chairs as the ship goes down, he would do well to make Government time available for such a debate.

Mr. Biffen: I notice the friendly advice about lifebelts.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Although I said that questions would stop at 4.15, I shall call those hon. Members who have been rising. Perhaps I could say to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that I shall trade a question from him for his point of order.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in 1984, 4,100 youngsters under the age of 18 went missing in the Metropolitan police area? Is that not a worrying figure? The child of one of my constituents was kidnapped and taken to Pakistan only two weeks ago, but the Foreign Office did not keep in touch with the Home Office, so that when the child returned to Britain there was no check at the airport. May we have a debate on missing children as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot offer Government time for such a debate, important though it is, but I shall draw my hon. Friend's point to the attention of Ministers in those Departments.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that, this week, the European Parliament debated a motion concerning the plight of Cypriot refugees, and that it will debate another such motion in the near future? Would it not be appropriate if the House — [Interruption.] If Conservative Members want the name of my tailor, I shall gladly give it to them. This is the latest in summer wear. It is British-made.

Would it not be appropriate to debate the position of Cypriot refugees who were not covered by the 1982 partial amnesty decision? Several families living in Britain are threatened with deportation to a part of Cyprus where their homes are occupied by someone else, and Caterina and Vassilis Nicola have taken refuge in a church in Camden Town to avoid such deportation. Should not the plight of those families and of Cypriot refugees in general be fully debated by the House, as it never has been since the war in 1974?

Mr. Biffen: I must give a disappointing reply to the hon. Gentleman. No Government time has been provided for such a debate next week. If he wishes to pursue the subject, he should try the avenue of an Adjournment debate.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Has my right hon. Friend read early-day motion 634?

[That this House notes with concern the British Broadcasting Corporation's intention to defray the damages and costs of the libel action incurred by the That's Life programme team out of money generated by licence fees, which have recently been substantially increased; does not believe that this is the purpose for which low wage earners and pensioners pay a television licence fee; and hopes that in future the British Broadcasting Corporation will take greater care.]

If so, is he aware that an increasing number of hon. Members and of British citizens are becoming worried that the BBC can, with impunity, libel innocent citizens, knowing that the damages that it may incur will be paid from licence fees? Does that not enable the BBC to blackmail people because they cannot afford to sue it for defamation?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's important point arouses a strong response on both sides of the House. However, no Government time is available for such a debate. I hope that she will pursue the matter through other channels.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House reconsider what he said about a properly organised debate on the British School of Motoring's expenditure of £188,000 to purchase the Liberal party? Does he recall that a few weeks ago the Liberal party and the SDP lost about an hour from an important debate about ballots and trade union money? It would be a good idea if the Leader of the House were kind enough to give them back that hour so that they might defend their position. They appear to be whiter than white but are receiving money—£188,000—about which there was no ballot in BSM. One man, Anthony Jacobs, cast £188,000-worth of votes. We now hear, according to stories today, that further scandals are about to emerge arising out of people who are living in tax havens which are not unknown to the Liberal party. I am sure we should find time for a debate about that.

Mr. Biffen: I am glad that, in the scale of values of the hon. Member, I rate a notch higher than a point of order. Although but a little more, how much it is. It shows what political choice reveals. His judgment of political cannibalism is to grill slowly over a persistent heat. I do not think that he wants the whole matter resolved in one grand debate, and therefore I shall be guided by him.

Civil Aviation Bill

4.21 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I refer you to question 179 on today's Order Paper, tabled in the name of the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery):

"To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the Civil Aviation Bill."

I have from the Library a copy of the reply. It says:

"I undertook not to proceed with the Civil Aviation Bill until decisions had been taken on the inspector's report on the Stansted/Heathrow terminal 5 planning inquiries. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Housing and Construction and I will not be in a position to announce those decisions in time for the Bill to complete all its remaining stages this Session. I am therefore withdrawing this Bill."

Is it in order to announce such decisions via a written reply when the Committee deliberating on the consequences of the Bill is due to meet again on 14 May further to discuss this matter? Is it not a gross discourtesy to the House to sneak through such decisions without notifying those hon. Members on both sides who were appointed to the Committee as long ago as December last year?

Is it not sadly typical of the Secretary of State for Transport that, having flouted the London Regional Transport Act and tacked undebated legislation on to the Local Government Bill, he should seek to conceal the depth of his latest self-inflicted defeat in this shabby manner?

Mr. Speaker: I have not seen the answer to which the hon. Gentleman draws my attention, but, as the hon. Gentleman kindly gave me notice that he was to raise this matter, I have had an opportunity to think about it. If he checks "Erskine May", he will find that it is in order for an hon. Member in charge of a Bill in a Standing Committee to give notice at the Table that he proposes to withdraw it. I note that transport questions will be answered on Monday, and there will be an opportunity then to discuss the matter.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Act 1985.
2. Betting, Gaming and Lotteries (Amendment) Act 1985.
3. Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Act 1985.
4. Gosport Borough Council Act 1985.
5. National Bank of New Zealand Limited Act 1985.
6. Lloyds Bank (Merger) Act 1985.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

4.28 pm

Mr. Speaker: More than 32 hon. Members have shown their interest in this debate, and there may be others. I propose to apply a limit of 10 minutes on speeches between 6 pm and 7.50 pm. I hope that that will be the norm for the other speeches that may follow, because I should like—and I am sure that the House will agree—to call as many hon. Members who have a constituency reason for taking part in this debate as possible.

4.29 pm

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): I am glad to have the opportunity to introduce this debate. The House will know that the multi-fibre arrangement, which clearly will form the centrepiece of this debate, comes to an end in July 1986, and Governments all over the world, both in developed and developing countries, will have to take a view as to the next steps. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said in answer to business questions last week that this debate comes at a formative stage, and before positions are fixed. The Government have, of course, had to come to some preliminary views as to the next steps, but the House can be confident that its views are being expressed at the beginning of a long negotiation, when positions are still fluid.

My right hon. Friends and I will listen extremely carefully to what is said in this debate and it will be an important element in helping us to come to a final view on these issues. Perhaps I ought, at this stage, to remind the House that, of course, the British Government, in isolation, will not necessarily get their way in full. We shall have to establish a common position in the European Community, which the Community will negotiate in the general agreement on tariffs and trade, where, no doubt, the developing countries themselves will have strong views to express.

The starting point of the debate must be the state of the British clothing and textile industries. I am sure that the House will be in no doubt about the importance of the textile and clothing industries, both in terms of employment and skills. The industries have been through a process of painful adjustments during the past few years. Major changes have been made and the industries have made great strides in competitiveness. Output of the clothing industry, after having fallen very sharply in 1980 and 1981, has grown steadily in each of the last three years. The upturn in textiles started later than in clothing, and remains more modest, but again output is now moving in the right direction. I am glad to see that the profits of textile and clothing companies seem to be improving, too.

At the same time, there have been some encouraging improvements in export performance in some sectors and some markets. Knitwear exports to West Germany increased in value by 77 per cent. between 1982 and 1984. Our exports to the United States have also been impressive. Between 1982 and 1984 textile exports were up 100 per cent., knitwear exports up 121 per cent. and clothing exports up 195 per cent. More generally, our wool textiles exports increased from £426 million in 1983 to £538 million last year.

How has this happened? It is the result of much hard analysis of markets, much rethinking of product ranges and much reorganisation of production. Many firms have been focusing their efforts on more specialised, higher valued items, where design flair and other British strengths can be made to count.

A leading figure in the textile industry said recently:

"New products have been brought to the market and older ones up-dated — production methods have been adapted to improve quality and to reduce processing time and energy consumption. Customers' changing needs, more variety, more designs, more seasonal changes, shorter lead times — have been anticipated and met."

I am sure this is the type of effort that points the way for the British textile and clothing industries.

In the light of that, the House and the Government have to consider the future situation. The present system of controls in the developing countries' exports of textiles and clothing is due to end in July 1986 and discussions are just beginning about whether it should be extended. This system, known as the multi-fibre arrangement, is an internationally negotiated derogation from the general agreement on tariffs and trade and applies to the vast majority of textile and clothing products. In this country it has led to 500 quotas being applied to some 80 textile and clothing items from 27 developing countries.

In July of this year the GATT textiles committee will be discussing whether the MFA should be extended, modified or discontinued. The Community will need to agree its policy stance in advance of this, so in recent months I have been consulting a wide range of bodies interested in the future of the import regime for textile and clothing and, of course, many hon. Members as well.

First, we must look at the effect on the textile and clothing industries. Of our national expenditure on textiles and clothing, our domestic industry supplies 60 per cent. In addition to supplying this proportion of the home market, our industry exports 27 per cent. of its production. Therefore, 60 per cent. is supplied domestically by our industry and 40 per cent. of our home market is supplied from abroad. Out of the 40 per cent., 25 per cent. is supplied by foreign suppliers who face no restriction on their exports to the United Kingdom, mainly other Community and western European countries. The developing countries of the Third world, where exports are restricted by the MFA quotas, supply some 10 per cent. of our market—I emphasise that they supply 10 per cent. of our market—and approximately 5 per cent. comes from Mediterranean countries. Of the suppliers restricted by the MFA, Hong Kong is much the biggest.

Imports from the European Community have risen from about one third of the total imports of textiles and clothing in 1974 to almost one half in 1984, while the share coming from MFA suppliers has fallen. Developed countries as a whole now provide almost two thirds of our imports. This is partly because of a shift in demand in the United Kingdom towards higher value products, which favours developed country suppliers. In common with trade generally, our trade with our Community partners in textiles and clothing has increased in both directions. All this means that British textile and clothing firms are exposed to changing patterns of demand and to strong and shifting patterns of competition.

In addition to the MFA, the Community also has unilateral restrictions on textile and clothing exports from certain state trading countries and Taiwan, and has agreed voluntary restraints with a number of Mediterranean suppliers, of which Portugal is the biggest.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Although one accepts the change in the pattern of imports, will the Minister accept that the impact of imports from MFA countries is significant and that the Silberston report predicted that if the MFA were to be abandoned there would be 50,000 more job losses than he predicted in the industry?

Mr. Channon: I am not seeking to argue that their impact is not significant. I want to get the figures straight and to give the facts to the House. I shall deal later, and in detail, with the Silberston report. It has been agreed during the accession negotiations that Portugal and Spain will have some restraints on their textiles and clothing for up to four years, but after that Spanish and Portuguese textiles and clothing will be subject to the normal Community rules of free circulation. In all, the low-cost suppliers whose textile and clothing exports are subject to quantitative controls of one sort or another amount to about 14 per cent. of our home market.

The point that I am making, which I take up with the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), is that, although the MFA is clearly an important issue for the British textile and clothing industries, it must be kept in proportion. Whatever happens to the MFA, the British industries' capacity to compete against the developed world—West Germany and Italy, for example—in both home and export markets will be crucially important for their future.

In considering our attitude to the renewal of the MFA, we must bear in mind the strenuous efforts being made to halt the spread of protectionism. This, of course, has far wider ramifications than for textiles only. There is general agreement among all the Governments—I emphasise all the Governments — of the summit countries that spreading protectionism would be a disaster for the growth of the world economy. Since the war, the open trading system has led to an eightfold growth in trade. Surely we must not fall into the trap that our predecessors fell into in the 1930s. This is particularly true for the United Kingdom, where I emphasise that exports are equivalent to 30 per cent. of our gross domestic product and where so many of our jobs are dependent upon our ability to sell abroad. The House must face the facts. I shall deal with policy in a moment or two. Not only do we need markets to sell our goods abroad, but we have to face the fact, not always palatable, that the poorer developing countries need markets, too, to sell their goods so that they can both afford to buy imports, including British imports, and also, incidentally, so that they can be in a position in many cases to pay their debts, to, among others, British firms and British banks.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): While the general tenor of my right hon. Friend's statement is probably widely accepted, will he also address the crucial point that competition must be fair as well as free?

Mr. Channon: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. I shall deal with that point, I hope in not too great detail, in about three minutes.

One of the subjects discussed at the Bonn summit, and earlier, both in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and in the Community, is the need for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations under the GATT. It is clear that the new GATT round is acquiring increasing international momentum and that it will happen in the near future, notwithstanding the fact that one or two Governments find it difficult to set a target date for getting the new talks launched. There has been concern in many countries that the multilateral trade system is being eroded by an increasing resort to protectionism. We share this concern—I come now to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham)—and see the GATT round as an opportunity to achieve a better balance in the rights and obligations of all contracting parties to the GATT, to strengthen the GATT disciplines, which are so important to us as a trading nation, and to make sure that the rules are observed.

The negotiations, when they start, will be many sided. No serious objective should be left off the agenda. The negotiations will deal, of course, with tariffs, and especially with anomalously high ones, although tariffs are not in general the area where protection has grown. They will deal with many non-tariff issues, including trade in food, and in services—of prime importance to Britain.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will my right hon. Friend be considering the question of origin marking? At present the British housewife cannot make an intelligent decision on whether to buy goods with which she is presented because she does not know where they come from.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend raises an important point. We are considering the recent judgment of the European Court. I am not yet in a position to give the Government's reply to that, but my hon. Friend's point is well taken and I shall bear it in mind.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am seeking to follow the Minister's argument carefully, but when he turns his head towards his own Back Benches the microphones do not pick him up. He was dealing with an important point about the European Court's decision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): No doubt the Minister will take on board what has been said.

Mr. Channon: I apologise to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). I shall attempt to address my remarks to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but in such a way that the hon. Gentleman can hear.

One of the most important and difficult tasks facing the negotiators will be the restoration of confidence in the fairness of the the open trading system. Unless that is achieved, none of the other aims will be achieved.

We need GATT commitments on better access to the markets of the more advanced among the developing countries. It is one of the most unsatisfactory features of the GATT as it has grown up. Under part IV of the agreement, added with the best of intentions in the early 1960s, GATT rules exempt "developing" countries from any need to reciprocate the tariff reductions and other concessions to which the developed countries have committed themselves in successive rounds of negotiations. In other words, the rules as they stand give them the benefit of all the rights of the agreement, including open access to industrialised countries' markets, without giving comparable benefits in their own.

The history of commercial relations between developed and developing countries since then is perhaps an object lesson in the unwisdom of unequal treaties; the developing countries have not gained in practice in the way intended.

The treaty was bound to fall into disrepute, as it was felt to be unreasonable, and the result has been the imposition of restrictions on the developing countries' trade.

Moreover, developing countries, which are a numerical majority of the members of the GATT, are a purely self-selecting group. There are no rules about the stage of economic development at which the privileged enjoyment of rights without obligations ceases to apply. Successive British Governments have been willing and ready to accept that situation, but this bizarre and unbalanced relationship can now be acceptable to Governments and business in the developed world only if the stronger developing countries, those which are rapidly industrialising and already competing successfully in our markets, progressively shoulder the normal obligations of full GATT membership. Fairness in trade is essential, and we shall need it in textiles as well as in other fields.

Even if the new GATT round — this is strictly relevant to the MFA — is launched early next year, it will be some years, perhaps four or five years or more, before it is finished. It is clear, however, that the tasks facing the negotiators in these talks are not such that trade in textiles and clothing can simply be set on one side. It is not open to us, or, indeed, to any other Government, to consider the renewal or termination of the MFA in one watertight compartment and the new GATT round in another. Indeed, we must recognise that whatever British and other observers in developed countries may think of the MFA and the bilateral quotas under it, Third world countries regard it as an outstanding example of the way developed countries discriminate against them. For the most part they restrict the textile and clothing exports only of the developing countries to the developed countries, and not of the developed countries between themselves. We should not forget that textiles and clothing are much the most important of the developing countries' manufactured exports.

Nor must we be under any illusion that protection is costless. Protection does not solve problems; it creates them.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Does the Minister intend to say something about the unfair competition in the form of support given by our fellow Community Governments, notably Belgium, France and Italy, to their industries compared with the British industry?

Mr. Channon: Indeed, as the House knows, the new Commission is taking a much more rigorous stance on the whole question of state aids in the textile and other industries. That is fair enough provided that it applies to everybody, not just to some.

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): We have been told that for 10 years.

Mr. Channon: I have not been saying that for 10 years, but it happens to be true nevertheless. The Belgian and the Dutch schemes have been cut back. If hon. Members have evidence of other schemes which are going ahead which are not meeting the Community rules, we shall be happy to pursue them energetically. Indeed, the Commission is presently studying an Italian scheme and we are determined to ensure that the rules are applied fairly to everyone in the Community, not just to some.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Does my right hon. Friend agree that steps are always taken after the event? Our European colleagues have always spent the money, which has given their industries the advantage, whereas when we submitted our CLOFT scheme to the Commission it was turned down and a modest scheme of £20 million spread over four years was not implemented at all?

Mr. Channon: I regretted what happened over the CLOFT proposal, but we shall pursue energetically cases of other countries taking an unfair advantage in that way and would welcome any evidence from hon. Members or, indeed, the industry.

The House will be aware of Professor Silberston's report, published last December, which provides an independent assessment of the impact of the MFA on the economy. He found that the MFA raised the price of clothing in this country by about 5 per cent., costing British consumers some £450 million per annum. He said that the greater part of this cost benefited foreign rather than British manufacturers. He considered that the MFA protected some jobs in the textile industry, but said that in the economy as a whole the MFA was, if anything, doing more to reduce employment than to increase it. It seems clear that higher prices for the products of one industry must leave consumers with less money to spend on those of others.

The Silberston report has aroused wide debate not merely about the effect of restricting trade in the textile and clothing industries but on the economy as a whole. I am grateful to Professor Silberston for his work. Neither he nor the House will expect me to endorse every figure in the report, nor every conclusion. I am conscious of the fact that the industry has disputed a number of his calculations——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: All of them.

Mr. Channon: I do not think that it has disputed all of them. The report is a carefully considered one which has received wide study.

The subject has also received international attention. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has recently published a report entitled "The Costs and Benefits of Protection". It shows that protection has a wide variety of consequences — trade diversion, price increases, enforced changes of product mix and transfers of wealth to foreign producers. All of that is echoed in Professor Silberston's work. Most important of all, the OECD study agrees with Professor Silberston that protection does not in the long run save jobs in the economy at large but reduces the scope for new employment by forcing some sectors of industry to bear the cost of protecting other sectors.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): It is all very well to talk about the generality of the economy, but what matters is the concentration of the textile industry in some parts of the country, particularly for certain categories of workers, such as part-time women workers and the ethnic groups. Frankly, that is spurious logic. I do not see how Ministers can argue, on the one hand, that if we reflate the economy most of the money will go on imports, but, on the other hand, if we suddenly put £400 million back into the economy it will somehow go on British manufactures, not on imports.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend knows me well enough to know that I will be coming to that specific point in a moment.

[Mr. Channon]

During the past several months I have been holding detailed consultations with all the British interests affected by the MFA. I have been anxious to get a balanced picture of the views of all interested parties. I have met trade associations, consumers, organisations and many hon. Members. I have also had many letters from hon. Members, some of them in identical terms.

As was to be expected, wider debate about the costs of protection has led to growing pressure, not only in this country but in the Community and elsewhere, for the MFA to be brought to an end. Within this country, consumer bodies, importers and retailers have called for a firmer commitment that special restrictions on textiles and clothing trade should be phased out. Consumers' organisations, in particular, expressed concern that the MFA bore especially heavily on lower-income consumers, and on the price of children's clothes.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) rose——

Mr. Channon: I must get on. I have given way about eight times and about 32 hon. Members wish to speak. I do not wish to be rude, but I must press on.

The consumers' organisations argued that the cost of the MFA for consumers was disproportionately heavy in relation to any benefit that it brought to the industry. On the other hand, I have received strong representations from the textile and clothing industries and from trade unions, which have urged continuation of the MFA. Some trade bodies, such as Comitextil, the European trade association, on which the British industry is of course represented, have argued for a further four to five years of protection. Others have said that there is no telling how much longer protection should continue. I have been left in no doubt about its importance to particular areas of the United Kingdom. The industry has also drawn attention to the barriers which its exports encounter in many parts of the world. It has rightly pointed out that the MFA allows what it calls an orderly development of trade in textiles and clothing.

Although employment in the textile and clothing industries has fallen, it still represents 2 per cent. of employment in the economy as a whole. In addition, although employment in the clothing industry is dispersed fairly evenly across the country, employment in the textile and knitting industries is more heavily concentrated in particular regions. For example, in the Yorkshire and Humberside region, which has the strongest concentration of textile employment, more than 3 per cent. of all employees work in textiles. In the east midlands region, more than 4 per cent. of all employees work in the knitting industry.

It is, of course, precisely because parts of the country have been especially affected by the rundown that has taken place in the textile and clothing industries—as in some other industries — that the Government have launched the business improvement services scheme, with funding from the European regional development fund, over a four-year period up to 1989. Grants are available towards the cost of plant and machinery, and also for consultancy on computer applications, marketing and other matters. Some £63 million has been allocated to help small firms in these areas, including funding from the Community and from the Exchequer. Of this amount, the textile areas are rightly receiving the biggest slice. The better business services scheme in Scotland and Northern Ireland has been launched for the same purpose. There has been a very heavy take-up of those aid schemes.

In the light of all those factors, the Government must decide what action is needed. What action should we urge upon our Community partners, and what common position do we want the Community to adopt in the GATT? In all this the Government will, of course, have the interests of the textile and clothing industries very much in mind. When the new GATT round gets under way, as I said earlier, one of our key objectives will be to get the basic principles of the agreement accepted and observed on a reciprocal basis as obligations of all contracting parties to the agreement. Any exceptions should be confined to the poorer developing countries. It is time everyone realised that we are not prepared to be a soft touch any longer. Our aim must be mutual, not unilateral, disarmament of special exemptions or derogations.

I cannot disguise from the House the fact that the developing countries will tell us that we have had an MFA, designed as a temporary breathing space, for 12 years; and this, too, is a special derogation which must be brought to an end. Nor is it realistic for us to assume in the GATT negotiations that we and other developed countries will get our own way without us, too, having to make concessions. It will have to be a two-way process, and countries which do not think that it will be are deluding themselves. Any agreement along the lines that I have suggested would be strongly in our interests and those of developing countries as well.

There is also the question of state trading countries, whose trading policies and methods are different from those of the market economies. Those countries have required, and will continue to require, somewhat different provisions.

What, then, should be our position in this period of change? Despite pressures from developing countries and consumers' organisations in this country, I am convinced that the MFA should be renewed next year. I believe that it would be wrong to end such a long period of protection with a sudden jolt. A further period of protection will give the British textile and clothing industries time to establish their international competitiveness, not only against developing countries but against the developed countries, which are both the major source of imports and the major market for our companies' exports.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Channon: I am about to deal with the details.

Mr. Hughes rose——

Mr. Channon: I have already given way about 10 times.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister is clearly not giving way.

Mr. Hughes: I thought that the Minister might be persuaded.

Mr. Channon: I should prefer not to give way, as I must press on.

I believe that the renewal of the MFA in some form will be widely supported among our Community partners. We must now consider on what terms the MFA should be renewed, and for how long. Clearly, with the new GATT round approaching, any renewed MFA will be in some sense a transitional measure. Some of our European Community partners may press for a prior commitment that thereafter all special restrictions on textile and clothing trade will come to an end—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—but despite my hon. Friends' views I think that it would be premature to give such a commitment unconditionally at this stage. This is a matter that will have to be negotiated in the GATT round. In those negotiations all the major participants should be prepared to see all the major derogations and exemptions from the basic rules of the GATT put on the table for negotiation. For the developed countries this cannot exclude the MFA. [Interruption.] As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, the British Government are extremely anxious that there should be talks on agriculture. For the more advanced developing countries, that cannot exclude their own exemptions from GATT obligations. The important point is that the process of the GATT round will take several years, and it is in this context that the longer run future of the MFA should be decided.

I shall now give way to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. The House welcomes the fact that the Minister has committed himself to the principle of renewing the MFA, but will he go further and commit himself to the principle that the MFA will not be phased out? Will he give us an assurance that we are not talking about an arrangement that will last for five or six years and then end? Unless he has that basic principle in mind, he will be driven into a transitional arrangement and the MFA may come to an end.

Mr. Channon: As I have said, some of our partners may press for a prior commitment that thereafter all special restrictions will come to an end, but it would be premature to give such a commitment unconditionally at this stage. We cannot tell. I am saying that the renewed MFA should be designed to carry us from July 1986 into these wider GATT negotiations. In the negotiation of this, there will not unnaturally be pressure from the developing countries for the general improvement in economic conditions to be reflected in access levels. Nor can we forget the British consumer. So a rather more liberal arrangement than the present one seems inevitable and surely right.

I am sure, for example, that some of the existing quotas can be dispensed with altogether. I have in mind especially those whose costs are disproportionate to the amount of British production protected and some textile quotas which seriously handicap British clothing firms. Increases in other quotas are likely to be justified. In particular, I accept the indications that the restrictions have borne especially heavily on the price of children's clothes, and we shall be seeking to liberalise these restrictions where administratively practicable.

We shall also seek above average improvements in the access levels for the poorest developing countries, and for those whose own trade barriers to British exports are low. More advanced developing countries whose own trade policies are restrictive should not be looking to enjoy much liberalisation of their quotas unless, as I naturally hope, they are prepared to open up their own markets.

I said at the beginning of this speech that the Community would need to agree a broad policy stance by July, and I have outlined what, in the Government's view, that stance should be. This, however, will be only the beginning of a negotiation. The MFA does not expire until July of next year, and the bilateral agreements negotiated by the Community under it last until the end of 1986. As the negotiations proceed, the positions of other major participants will become clearer. Plainly, the Community's position will have to evolve to take account of this. The position of the United States will obviously be specially important.

We shall, of course, keep in close touch with the industry and with other interested parties, as well as with the many hon. Members who clearly take an interest in this subject. The House will have seen the early-day motion in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). It has attracted 110 signatures from hon. Members in different parts of the House — [Interruption.] Although I may not be in complete agreement with all of its preamble, I have accepted its main conclusions. We have agreed to work, as the motion says,

"for an effective renewal of the Multi-Fibre Arrangement which provides developing countries with guaranteed and growing access to the markets of the European Community and ensures a framework of order in international textile and clothing trade that would not otherwise exist."

We are at the beginning of a long road. The House will not expect me to give away all of my hand at this stage, but I am glad to have had the opportunity of bringing the issue to the attention of the House in order to give hon. Members an early chance to debate the subject, and I look forward to hearing their views. We shall consider the debate very carefully and will bear hon. Members' views in mind throughout these long negotiations. I have a sneaking suspicion that this may not be the last debate that we have on this subject.

5 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): The debate provides a timely and welcome opportunity for hon. Members to tell the Government the targets that they should set for the renewal of the MFA in the forthcoming discussions in the EEC and GATT and in the bilateral negotiations with supplier countries.

In recent months the Minister for Trade has been asked to state the Government's attitude to the renewal of the MFA. Time after time he has been unable to say whether it would be renewed. Not until today towards the end of his speech was it possible for him to say that the MFA would be extended in principle. He was not able to answer in the robust terms that we prefer.

If we say today that we are glad that the Government have at last said that they favour the renewal of the MFA it is thanks for small mercies. The Government's position should never have been in doubt. It should have been possible for the Government view to be articulated clearly and confidently long before today. At least the Government are at the starting gate, but they have a long way to go. Our fears about the Government's resolve to negotiate a satisfactory renewal of the MFA have not been laid to rest.

Much of the Minister's speech was a ramble round some interesting issues to be discussed in the wider GATT talks. He quoted from a number of documents which seemed to take the criticisms before the defences of the present arrangement. He offered a rather lukewarm endorsement of the principle of continuing the arrangement, with the clear hint that the Government thought that this was likely to be the last exercise on the MFA. I believe that some of the Minister's advisers, who are known to take a prominent free trade position, had a little too much to do with the preparation of his speech.

Before I deal with the Minister's observations in detail I shall make clear the Labour party's view. We are strong and convinced supporters of the concept and basic structure of the MFA. Since 1974 it has provided a framework for regulating the terms of trade in sensitive textile and clothing goods from supplier countries to the markets of the major developed countries—primarily the EEC, the United States of America, Canada, some Scandinavian countries and Austria. We are familiar with the defects of the arrangement, but we believe that it has contributed greatly to the stability and orderliness of this extensive trade and that it has permitted imports to the developed countries to increase substantially without wrecking the textile and clothing industries in those receiving countries.

That does not mean that the textile and clothing industries in Britain have had an easy time. They have had to face major contractions and a great deal of unemployment in recent years. The MFA, which is only an umbrella agreement affecting the terms of trade, could not secure the industries against the massive recession, or the foolish Government policies which have accentuated the effects of that recession. It could not protect the industries from the depression of domestic demand, the erratic fluctuations in the exchange rates or the destruction of regional industrial assistance which Conservative economic policies have visited upon them.

Without the arrangement the difficulties for the industries would be much worse. Some of the encouraging signs in the industries would probably not have appeared without the arrangement to guide the decisions of those who have recently made important investments.

I hope that the alliance, whether it has one view or two, will make its view crystal clear. We have no doubt that the arrangement must be renewed on a basis which gives security and confidence to our textile and clothing industries. That is not the MFA's only objective, but it is crucial and we in the Labour party support it unreservedly.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Does the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) recall that a Labour Secretary of State, when renegotiating the second MFA in December 1977, described it as a historic turning point in the history of the textile industry? Does the right hon. Gentleman now imply that the arrangement should become a permanent part of our world trading scene?

Mr. Smith: The MFA has proved its worth since 1977. I argue not for the extension of the MFA, only for a further period. We should seek to extend it for a longer period than is contemplated. We should negotiate that now so that we have a 10-year run with an opportunity perhaps to review it after five years.

Another objective that we regard as being of great importance is to secure greater access for the products of the least-developed supplier countries to our markets. Currently the dominant suppliers are the so-called newly-industrialised countries such as Hong Kong, Macao and South Korea. They cannot be regarded as being among the poorest of the developing countries. They have prominent and robust economies.

The suggestion that the MFA is directed against the poorer and starving countries of the world reveals a gross misunderstanding of its purpose and its effect. The MFA is the mechanism which allows some of the poorest countries access to our markets against competition from some of the stronger, newly-industrialised countries.—[Interruption.] I notice cries from the Government Benches. Some hon. Members are keen on the principle of free trade. I wonder whether the enthusiasm for free trade of those who represent agricultural constituencies takes them far enough to condemn the common agricultural policy. Whenever their vested interests are challenged they run a thousand miles from free trade.

More room should be found in the arrangement for the least developed countries. That is a reasonable objective and I am glad that the Minister noted it. For the least developed countries the MFA offers a better prospect of orderly access than any other method.

Any objective evaluation of the MFA shows that it has helped to achieve two important objectives—order and opportunity in the world trade in textiles. Those twin objectives are at the heart of the matter. We need order to prevent surges of imports which could wipe out important industries, destroy companies and jobs and further imperil the declining manufacturing industries in the United Kingdom. We need opportunity to encourage growth in trade and to stimulate the market.

Let us be clear that the textile and clothing industries make a major contribution to the United Kingdom economy and that important issues and interests are at stake in the discussions. It is fashionable in the present Government to look disparagingly at manufacturing industry, particularly in the traditional areas of activity. I remind Government Members and others that the sales worth over £10 billion in the textile and clothing industries represent an added value of £3·9 billion. That is greater than the value added of the whole of the motor vehicle industry, more than half as much again as that of the aerospace industry and over twice that of the computer and office machinery industry.

Perhaps most important for a country labouring under the heavy burden of unemployment, which Conservative economic policies have placed upon the nation, almost 500,000 people are employed directly in the textile and clothing industries. Many are concentrated in areas which are particularly vulnerable to unemployment—the north-west, Yorkshire, Scotland, Northern Ireland and the inner cities. A large number of women are employed in the industry and their wages are often crucial to family incomes A large proportion of employees in the industries belong to our ethnic communities.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): My right hon. Friend will know about the Courtaulds proposal to close two factories in north-east Wales. Will he underline the need for a fourth MFA to prevent the further contraction of the textile industry? Does he agree that it is vital to have an effective MFA to keep the industry at its present level without further cuts in jobs?

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making an apposite intervention. He is more aware than most of us of the effect that the Courtaulds closures have had in north Wales and the fears which exist. The House is aware that his constituency has been affected directly by one of the closures. It is a stark example of the fragile nature of a great deal of the clothing and textile industries. It shows that we cannot afford to take any risks with their future or with the employment that they provide. The Government must bear that in mind when they enter the negotiations. I hope that Ministers will keep the Courtaulds example in front of them and recognise what might happen on a much greater scale if the negotiations are not concluded satisfactorily.

Extremely important social considerations involving the welfare of people throughout the nation are at stake. The Silberston report refers to a possible job loss of 48,000 if the MFA were not to be renewed. However, there are many in the industry who take the view c the TUC that that estimate is far too low and that if the arrangement were not renewed satisfactorily 100,000 would be a more realistic figure. I happen to know that that is the view of the employers' organisations as well.

Britain cannot afford to lose any more jobs in these industries. It would be intolerable if in our handling of these matters we were to add to the serious unemployment in the areas and categories to which I have referred.

Another important aspect of the MFA is that it has permitted a considerable increase in imports from supplying countries. It has created substantial opportunities even in a period when market demand in the United Kingdom has been static or falling. The rate of import growth has not been restricted to growth in market demand, with the result that in sluggish market conditions the increase in low-cost imports has far outstripped the growth in the market itself. Between 1978 and 1984, market demand in the United Kingdom appears to have fallen by about 1 per cent. In the same period imports from suppliers under MFA bilateral agreements increased by 15 per cent. If we include imports from the preferential Mediterranean associates, there was an increase of 23 per cent. It is not true to suggest that the arrangement has set up an unyielding set of barriers to growth in trade. The supplying countries saw a substantial increase in access to our markets between 1978 and 1984.

These are the facts and it is unfortunate that many of those who contribute to the argument about the arrangement believe that facts are much less important than theory. Those who believe almost theologically in free trade—I am looking straight at some of them on the Conservative Benches—have always regarded the MFA as objectionable. For many years there has been no greater disparity between theory and practice and profession and action than in talk about international trade. There is a tendency throughout the world to state the principles of free trade almost to the point of tiresome repetition and behind the scene to set in train actions which, by whatever means, secure and protect markets without the slightest acknowledgement to the meaning of the principles which were so piously pronounced shortly before the actions were taken.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has talked about the practical effects of the MFA. Does he recall the dispute with Indonesia in 1980 about the MFA, involving about £10 million-worth of goods? As we could not reach a conclusion on that disagreement, we lost exports of about £160 million. Is that theory or is that practical?

Mr. Smith: I think that it is theory because we do not know whether we would have secured the order. It is always extremely doubtful to say that we would have secured certain orders. The hon. Gentleman knows that every country has to balance such considerations. If I gauge his line of thinking correctly, he is suggesting that without having secured anything on the export front we should bilaterally rid ourselves of the arrangement. His words can have no other meaning than that the arrangement acts against our national interest—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes".] There we are. That is confirmed by several Conservative Members. There are substantial sections of the Conservative party which are willing to throw away the regulation and protection which the arrangement provides.

Mr. Fallon rose——

Mr. Smith: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman previously and it is not reasonable to expect me to give way to him again.

I have been drawing attention to the difference between theory and practice. That is bad enough, but when it comes to the argument about the MFA an illusion is added. Those who argue that the choice is between the MFA and free trade do not live in the real world. If the arrangement were to be discontinued or, which is more probably the prospect, become so weak as to be an ineffective influence, we would be more likely to set in train a series of beggar-thy-neighbour trade sanctions than to establish free trade. Such sanctions would do enormous harm to textiles and clothing and the damage would extend across a much wider trading front. The rules of the GATT in the absence of an effective MFA are not adequate to ensure conditions of free trade in textiles and clothing.

If the MFA were to be abandoned or rendered ineffective, it is virtually certain that the United States would act unilaterally to introduce import restraints. About eight months ago, the United States Administration introduced a new series of rules of origin, which reflect its present tough disposition. We know of the intense pressure which currently exists upon and from Congress. The United States would act either under its domestic legislation or would take unilateral recourse to article 19 of GATT. Whichever course were followed by the United States, the EEC countries would in turn face the import consequences of abandoning the MFA, which would be serious enough, and an additional flood of imports diverted from the United States. I doubt that even the most theological of the free traders whom I am observing could stand idly by in the face of such a development.

If the United States were to act under article 19, the effect would be even worse. The difficulty of this article, which I think Professor Silberston, who rather blithely advocates its use, fails to understand, is that it cannot be used selectively. It has to be universal in its application. Therefore, a very wide restriction has to be imposed. Article 19 confers also the right of retaliation by way of compensation, which could be in any area of trade, so the danger of trade interruption spreading beyond textiles and clothing is very real.

If there were no MFA, the poorest of the EEC's 130 supplying countries would suffer. The MFA provides them with a guaranteed level of access to the EEC market. In the absence of the MFA, it is likely that they could not compete with the commercial power of newly industrialised countries such as Hong Kong and South Korea, or with the huge potential of China.

We must be realistic about the existing trade barriers. True free trade cannot exist while so many countries block our exports to them with high barriers, both tariff and non-tariff. With the exception of Hong Kong and Macao, which are tariff-free, and Singapore, which is largely tariff-free, we face very high tariffs in both the developing and the developed world. Brazil has a tariff of 200 per cent. In the developed world, considerable restrictions are imposed by Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and, in some areas, by the United States.

Let us not waste our time in the heights of the theory of international trade. Let us come down to the dusty plains of the real world and deal with the real relationship, the real prospects and the real gains and losses. We did not hear much about those from the Minister.

The Silberston report concluded that the MFA should be phased out after being renewed one last time. That seems to be the drift of the Government's thinking. We believe that that conclusion is unsound and wrong headed and that there are such serious errors and omissions and wrongly based assumptions in the report that it will not do as a basis for judgment. For example, in a document that has been given such attention, the misunderstanding of the effect of article 19 of GATT is one that I find surprising. The lack of selectivity in action under article 19 makes it hopelessly ineffective and potentially dangerous.

The report bases its views on prices entirely on evidence from Hong Kong, although no reason is given why evidence should be so restricted. Hong Kong is not an average situation because of the pressure on quotas, and the effect of the MFA on prices is at its highest in respect of imports from Hong Kong. It should not be used as a basis for generalisation, as is done in the report.

It is misleading to believe that a reduction in landed prices will reach across to a similar reduction in retail prices, given the large mark-ups involved and the undoubted propensity of retailers to pitch prices at what the market will pay. Conclusions on prices do not appear to be based on a sound analysis of fact.

On unemployment—which, if anything, is a more serious matter—the report concedes that abandoning or weakening the MFA will affect jobs adversely, although three different estimates are given—one of 10,000 jobs, which is absurd; one of 48,000 jobs, which is nearer the mark; and the third of an unspecified number.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I draw the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attention to a document that he may have missed, which is the report of the Manpower Services Commission entitled "Labour Market Trends Midland Region 1985-1987". It is quite a long report, and has one critical paragraph summarising the views of the MSC on the MFA. It refers to it as a structure for permitting certain regulated imports from Third world countries, and says that, in view of the tremendous efforts that have been made by our textiles and clothing firms in the midlands to modernise their production methods to become competitive, a lack of renewal of the MFA would be a disaster. I thought that that might help the hon. Gentleman in deploying his argument.

Mr. Smith: I am glad to find that there are some realists on the Conservative Benches. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will speak to some of his hon. Friends. I seek not to cause division among Conservative Members, but merely to spread the enlightenment that has obviously reached the hon. Gentleman, and of which some of his hon. Friends are in need.

The hon. Gentleman drew our attention to the real world. Those engaged either in running the industries or in working in them take that realistic and sober view of the prospects of the industry and the need to cater for its interests in the negotiations. The Silberston report did not give due weight to that, and insufficient weight was also given to the drastic effect on employment and confidence in the industry if its profitability were to be sharply affected by changes in the MFA. The true job loss is more likely to be about 100,000, and I hope that all sides agree that that is plainly unacceptable.

In the assessment of employment prospects both within and without the textile and clothing industries, the report places too much emphasis on theoretical arguments and assumptions. I would not place so much emphasis on the effect of changes in the exchange rate. Important and direct factors, such as currency movements and interest rates, affect the exchange rate, which, as we know, has varied widely and erratically in recent years, very much to the detriment of these industries.

We should be extremely careful not to assume that if we were to lose industrial interest in one area we could recoup it easily in another. Apart from the fact that it is cold comfort to those who go out of business or who lose their employment, recent experience shows that ground lost is not easily regained as the relentless decline in manufacturing industry continues. The removal of the MFA or its serious weakening would cause serious job losses. Hypothetical countergains in other areas would be extremely uncertain given, among other things, the general trend of Government policy towards manufacturing industry.

We seek a renewal of the MFA. The crucial question is, what will MFA4 be like? What should be sought? I hope that the Government will not listen to those who argue that this should be the last MFA. If it is believed that this is the last agreement and that the Government give credence—as I believe they are near doing—to that proposition, that will be bound to undermine the status of the agreement and to render it terminal in character. The loss of confidence that could flow from that would affect long-term investment, which is badly needed in the industry, and could have a dramatically adverse effect. The way to counter that problem is not to consider ending the MFA, but to argue as vigorously as possible, both within the EEC and GATT, the case for renewing the MFA for 10 years, with a break after five years.

A serious attempt should be made to improve upon the inadequacies of earlier versions of the MFA. I fully understand that the Government are only one of the parties to the negotiation. We are asking them, as previous Governments were asked, to do their best to eradicate some of the difficulties.

In recent years, supplier countries have been permitted substantial increases in quotas, despite the poor growth of consumer demand. Under the bilaterals negotiated in 1982, increases of 4·5 per cent. per annum were agreed.

Given the likely estimate of demand, especially if present economic policies continue, high quotas will pose serious problems.

We agree with the TUC's submission to the Government that the quotas should be based on 1985 actual import levels. The quota growth should be related to consumption growth, although there should be higher growth for the less developed countries. That could be more easily achieved if quotas were re-based on the actual levels of existing imports.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North) rose——

Mr. Smith: An important part of the negotiations should be to seek ways of increasing the access of the less developed countries. There is a strong case for coming back on the quota levels——

Mr. Eggar rose——

Mr. Smith: We believe that——

Mr. Eggar rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is not giving way. Many hon. Members are waiting to speak.

Mr. Smith: I am not disposed to give way to the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), who interrupts in such an arrogant manner. He is a little——

Mr. Eggar: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have had a fair and open debate and my right hon. Friend the Minister gave way on a number of occasions. I should have thought that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) would give way more than he has.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is up to the right hon. and learned Gentleman to decide whether to give way. I shall take account of interventions in making judgments about who should take part in the debate.

Mr. Smith: We believe that there should be more room —as I said before I was partially interrupted— for the less developed countries to get better access to our markets.

There are a number of more technical matters which must be taken into account by the Government. The anti-search mechanism, which has not worked successfully, would not be necessary if quotas were re-based. If, however, that is not achieved, the mechanism would have to be retained but should be strengthened and made more effective.

Similarly, if the basket extractor mechanism was strengthened—it, too, has been the subject of justified criticism, despite improvements that were thought to have been made in the last round of negotiations—it would be possible to reduce the number of quotas.

I was a little alarmed at what the Minister said about reducing some quotas and increasing others without clearly indicating which quotas he had in mind. It is one thing to take a negotiating position, but he should be more frank with the industry if his purpose is to assist it to face the difficulties. I hope that the doors of the Department of Trade and Industry will be opened to more frank discussions with the industry while the Minister prepares for, and even during, the negotiations.

Mr. Channon: I have never yet refused anyone who wishes to come to me about these matters. Throughout the negotiations I shall be only too delighted to see representatives of the industry.

Mr. Smith: I do not doubt that the Minister is willing to see the representatives. I am asking him to listen to what they have to say. I am familiar with the ministerial technique of listening to delegations. As the right hon. Gentleman knows — and this can be said of Governments of all colours—access does not necessarily lead to comprehension or action. I am asking the Minister to listen carefully and patiently because these are important matters. The industry would have more confidence in the Minister's advocacy if it felt that it was being listened to in an attentive and understanding manner.

It should also be the Government's objective to bring the Mediterranean suppliers, who enjoy preferential status, more into line with the low-cost suppliers. The Minister mentioned the accession of Spain and Portugal. We believe that measures should be introduced to ensure an even spread of Spanish and Portuguese exports of textiles and clothing to other member states.

During negotiations, the Government should seek a reduction of the tariffs against our goods imposed by some supplier countries that are clearly successful economies. It is difficult to describe them as developing countries. The Minister suggested that that might be one of the Government's objectives.

I hope that the Government will also support the TUC's argument that a new article of social development should be written into the MFA. After all, article 1 of the arrangement states that its principal aim is to further the political and social development of developing countries. There are undoubtedly many cases of labour exploitation in supplier countries and the MFA should provide a stimulus for improvement by requiring minimum standards to be met.

Any agreement needs to be enforced effectively, which has not always happened. That has not always been the fault of the British Government, but improvements need to be made to the capacity of United Kingdom and EC authorities to monitor and ensure the implementation of what is agreed.

On behalf of the Opposition, I state our scepticism about the value of outward processing and our objection to any special quotas being established for outward-processed goods.

If the Government are to carry out their obligations, they will have to negotiate with determination and conviction. I did not get the impression that the Minister is approaching the matter with sufficient determination or with conviction about the efficacy and usefulness of the MFA. I wish that I could feel more convinced that the Government will negotiate with conviction.

We know that the United States will approach the negotiations with a determination to achieve a robust agreement that safeguards its interests. We know also that in the preliminary assessments within the EC the United Kingdom has veered more towards countries such as Germany, which are less enthusiastic about the MFA— some are frankly against it—and away from France and Italy, which take a different view. The role of the United Kingdom is important and I hope that the Government will not see their role as that of tipping the EC against a new, strong MFA.

[Mr. Smith]

The Government have important obligations to the people of this country. If those obligations are neglected, great perils will face our important industries. I hope that the Government will be determined to secure, as best they can, the economic prosperity of our industries and of those who depend on them and to seek a better deal for least-developed countries. Above all, they should seek an agreement that will work effectively and fairly and provide a long-term basis of order and opportunity, which is essential for these crucial industries.

We shall watch the discussions with great care, and the Minister will be required to answer questions from time to time about the progress of the negotiations. However, before they start, the House must make it crystal clear to the Minister that important interests are at stake and that we expect the Government to pursue them with much more conviction than has been apparent up to now.

5.33 pm

Mr. Marcus Fox (Shipley): My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade should ignore the less than generous remarks of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). Conservative Members with textile interests in their constituencies are delighted that my right hon. Friend has announced the renewal of the MFA. Hon. Members who have no textile interests in their constituencies are entitled to their view, but if they differ from me I shall await their speeches with interest.

The MFA has brought stability to the textile and clothing industries. Without it, the industries would have been decimated. When I became an hon. Member in 1970, the textile industry was the largest employer in Shipley. Today, it is nowhere near that. However, after years when there was only bad news, we see a different story, with sales of £10,000 million and exports of £2,700 million, which gives me great encouragement. Productivity is rising relatively faster than that in other industries. Huge investment has taken place and the companies are innovative and are more conscious of marketing and design. They are earning profits, most of which go back into those companies. Surviving firms have fought back to win orders at home and abroad.

I know the argument that protection is bad because it leads to feather bedding and slothfulness. However, that has not happened in the textile industry, as can be shown by the fact that the clothing component of the retail prices index has gone up more slowly than other items, and certainly at nothing like the rate of inflation. In addition, the public have not been held to ransom by restrictions on imports.

I do not believe that developing countries have suffered anything like as much as some people try to make out. Again, that is proved by the figures. The GATT study of 1984, covering the years from 1955 to 1982, showed that developing countries increased their share of world textile trade from 15 to 30 per cent., while the share of developed countries fell from 79 to 60 per cent. In clothing, the developing countries did even better. Their share increased from 10 per cent. to 48 per cent. No one can claim that, whatever restrictions have been placed on those countries, they have not had at least some opportunities.

We should also remember that under the MFA the quota allowance has increased by about 5 per cent. a year. My figures are different from those of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East. I am told that over the past six years the market has increased by 2·5 per cent., yet imports affected by quotas have increased by 16 per cent. Any reduction has not come from other countries. If there has been a fall, it has been within our industries.

Talk of "total freedom" in this area is nonsense. It would certainly be free, but it would not be fair. There would be dumping on an unprecedented scale and I have no doubt that the United States, which has already started to take unilateral action, would take even more such action. The surpluses would not go back whence they came; they would be dumped in Europe. Low-cost countries would not hesitate to do that.

Too much attention should not be paid to the Silberston report. Professor Silberston is well known for his views on liberalising trade. Perhaps those views are the reason why he was appointed.

A major criticism of the report is the fact that the terms of reference mention barriers to our exports, but the subject was dealt with in only a few short paragraphs, as if it were of no importance. In addition, it is unbelievable that Professor Silberston should dismiss the consequences of unemployment. He seems to forget that the textile industry is concentrated in a few areas. He talked about 2 per cent. unemployment as if it did not matter, but there are no other jobs in those areas. If 50,000 or 100,000 jobs were lost, people could not find work elsewhere.

Professor Silberston claimed that a reduction of 5 per cent. in import prices would lead to shopkeepers reducing their prices by the same amount, so that customers would benefit. I find that hard to believe.—[Interruption.] I am delighted that Opposition Members are on my side, for once.

To demonstrate that these are not my own views, let me quote a letter from the managing director of a company employing more than 600 people in manufacturing. He writes:

"we cannot compete with the unfair competition from the political pricing countries of the Comecom or the low cost, highly subsidised, poor working conditions in the Far East . . . At the present time my own company imports very little, mainly components or machinery, and we are proud to be able to say that we use in excess of 95 per cent. British outer fabric for our clothing. If the MFA is not renewed we shall certainly have to review our policy as the last bastion of concentrating primarily on British materials and manufacturing."

I believe that that is the true position. By his action today the Minister has shown that the Government care about our textile and clothing industries. There have been occasions when they have been accused of thinking that the textile industry was expendable and that only the high-tech, sunrise industries held the key to the future. We can already see the results of that policy. Many of these so-called high fliers are already in deep trouble. I am very glad to say that the Minister has shown by his speech that the Government care about the textile and clothing industries, and so they should.

It would be a kick in the teeth for the industries if this renewal had not been promised. A loyal, hard-working work force, good management and, dare I say, shareholders who deserve a return, to say nothing of the country, will be better served by the renewal than they will be without it.

5.42 pm

Mr. J. D. Concannon (Mansfield): Today, I am sure that we shall find a great deal of unanimity across the Floor of the House. Those of us who have many constituents working in the clothing and textile industries will be making sure that our point of view is put forward.

It is understandable that so many right hon. and hon. Members want to advance their constituency cases. However, it is incumbent upon us all not to wait for the 6 o'clock rule to come into operation. In my view, we should all keep our speeches as brief as possible. We have had good examples from the Minister and from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). The Minister said that he accepted that the MFA should continue and that he would be working hard for that. That has made my task of trying to restrict my speech to 10 minutes that much easier.

If the Minister had not put forward that view, I hate to think what might have happened to employment in my constituency. No one should be surprised that my name and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) and for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) appear in the top six of the list of names appended to an early-day motion about the MFA. We represent major industry constituencies. Hon. Members of long standing know that we usually talk about our coal mining industry and the effect of that on our constituencies. However, that major industry causes an imbalance in the area, because there are not many females working in the coal mining industry. Over the years, that imbalance has been absorbed by the lighter industries which are the subject of today's debate. In our area they employ thousands of our wives and daughters. Over the years, in the northern end of Nottinghamshire, we have become familiar with such companies as Pretty Polly, Courtauld and Mansfield Hosiery Mills. All the household names are to be found in our region.

I was glad to hear the Minister acknowledge the importance of the MFA. It is extremely important to the thousands of our women folk who are employed in the industries, and they would have been disappointed if any other answer had come from the Minister. What is more, the words of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East will go down very well with the vast majority of the work force in Mansfield.

Not only have the industries been beset by unfair competition and dumping, but they have been beset by the impact of modern technology. Modern technology has seen the upgrading of factories and equipment and the closing of some of the old mills, which none of us regretted. But others have advanced with the times. Companies have put a lot of capital into their factories, only to be met with cheap imports. They might have been cheap imports in the eyes of the public, but they could have been very damaging to the nation.

A few years ago I was invited to one of the mills in my constituency where I saw row upon row of new machinery costing hundreds of thousands of pounds. The machines were not even working, having only just been installed. The intention was to make what is now the old-fashioned silk stocking, which was very fashionable in those days — many a tale can be told about them. The manager spent a couple of hours showing me round the factory, telling me about the massive investment and how well he would do in the new market. After giving me two hours' good talking to about the massive investment, he said, "We have just done this, Don, and some Italian so and so has invented tights and flooded the market with them." He is still trying to sell that machinery for any price that he can get.

With so many right hon. and hon. Members wanting to put forward their constituency interests, we must impress upon the Government the importance to our areas of the MFA. It is not perfect by any means, and there is no doubt that it demonstrates an element of protectionism, but it is necessary to protect our jobs from some of the unfair competition from overseas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield holds an important position on the all-party committee which tries to look after the interests of the industries. He has done a lot of work over the years. I represent the constituency next door to his, and I thank him on behalf of all those who work in the industries in my area.

This is a very important issue. I hope that the Minister will listen carefully to right hon. and hon. Members for whom the MFA is so important. I feel that the only hon. Members likely to speak against what the Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said are those in whose constituencies these industries are not represented. I shall be very interested to hear their arguments.

The feeling in my constituency has always been that it is we who play the game of cricket, whereas the others bend and break the rules as they see fit. It is time for the Minister to take off the gloves and make sure that he goes into battle on behalf of the many thousands in our constituencies to whom the MFA represents some kind of future for their jobs and for the industry.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me early in the debate. It is a very important debate which is vital to many regions of the United Kingdom.

We are debating the future of what has become known as the multi-fibre arrangement. We are not simply discussing whether one specific measure should continue to attract the commitment of our Government in their negotiations with our trading partners and competitors. We are discussing the future of the United Kingdom textile and clothing industry. As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, it is an industry which employs nearly 500,000 workers. That is without the tail — those industries, serving the textile and clothing industries, which account perhaps for a further 150,000 to 200,000 workers. We heard that those industries realised annual sales of almost £11,000 million, and a value added of £3,900 million. Those figures are larger than for the motor vehicle manufacturing industry, and more than half as large again as those for the aerospace industry. I add—with my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) particularly in mind — that those figures are twice as large as those for computers and office machinery.

The textile industry is a traditional industry in the United Kingdom and has played a valuable part in wealth creation and the provision of employment. It has stood the test of time in producing the jobs and wealth on which the nation has been founded.

In itself, the MFA is indeed a controversial policy, and numerous studies and commentaries have been produced by those who question its value and would rather see the unrestricted market of a free trade ideal, whatever that might be. But in the course of our deliberations we must not lose track of the fact that we are talking today about people. We are talking about 500,000 or more people employed in the textile and clothing manufacturing industries. We are talking about their families. We are talking about the firms which supply those industries with textile machinery, factories, and so on. We are talking of the building and construction industry, the energy industries, and of those who supply the textile and clothing industries with transport and many other services.

We are talking about the devastating effect upon people who have spent their entire working lives in the industry that would have followed a failure to reintroduce a robust MFA. We are also talking of industries which were never able to look to Government for the sort of support or material rewards which have been showered upon the workers in other manufacturing and extraction industries. I do not think that I need to outline those industries to the Ministers on the Front Bench.

We are talking about the future of an industry that is vital to the United Kingdom and is its fourth largest employer. It is one of our nation's most valuable resources. We are talking of whole communities and the way of life which has evolved within them. Coming from the north-west, I am proud to have associated myself with those industries from the very day that I set foot in the House of Commons. They have had a just cause for which hon. Members on both sides of the House, under successive Governments, have struggled for many years.

We are not talking about the sections of an industry which has become unprofitable. We are not talking about an industry which is uneconomic. I say to my hon. Friends who apparently represent the consumer lobby that we are not talking about an industry for whose products there is no longer a demand. We are certainly not talking about an industry which has received massive Government investment; in fact, the opposite is true on all counts, especially the last.

As we have heard, since 1980 productivity in the textile and clothing industry has risen by a magnificent 30 per cent. — a much faster rate than in manufacturing industry as a whole. Demand for clothing and textile products rose by 4 per cent. in 1984, and the longer-term trend still indicates an expected annual rise of about 1 per cent. Yet, despite those superb achievements and the existence of the MFA, imports of clothing and textiles are at record levels. This is a fact, and I hope that my Back-Bench hon. Friends, the consumer lobby addicts, will accept it. I hope that they will appreciate the vital importance of the industry to various regions—a point that was highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox). Despite those superb achievements, clothing imports into Britain are running at record levels.

The textile and clothing industry is one of the largest exporting sectors of our economy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley said, the figure last year was £2,700 million. Although that was an increase on the previous year's figure, it is still much lower than could be achieved if our exports were not subject to the excessively punitive restrictions imposed by countries whose protectionist policies attempt to exclude United Kingdom products altogether. I pay tribute to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East for making that point.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the low figures for textile exports in the 1980s owe far more to the grossly overvalued pound sterling than to any difficulties with certain markets abroad? Is there not a chance now, with a much more realistic value of sterling vis-a-vis the dollar, that textile exports will continue to improve, as they are doing?

Mr. Winterton: I share the optimism of the hon. Gentleman, who speaks for the Liberal party. But in respect of the MFA and its importance, I am sure that he will regret the speech that one of his colleagues—if he catches Mr. Speaker's eye—is likely to make. I would prefer to go by the information that is submitted to me, virtually unanimously, by the industry, and by the work force, through the papers submitted to the TUC.

I agree that much of what goes on in the industry can be affected by Government policy. Interest rates, the rate of inflation and currency values are all vital. I respect the hon. Gentleman's experience in the industry, but, if he takes a rather different line from the one he has taken previously, no doubt voters throughout the country will take note of it. I believe that the MFA is vital, and the industry and its work force believe so. The British Textile Confederation should know what is good for the future of the industry. I see its members and have discussions with them. I have come to the conclusion that they are right and that a robust MFA is absolutely vital.

The question of the severe restrictions which other countries place on our exports is important and must be borne in mind when considering the future of the MFA. We have heard much about the prospect of free trade. Desirable though it may be, it cannot be realised while many of our competitors around the world block our exports—which in quality terms are often world beaters — with crippling tariff and non-tariff barriers; none more so, perhaps, than Japan, which has featured in criticism by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

With the exception of Hong Kong and Macao, which are tariff-free, and Singapore, which is largely tariff-free, our exports face severe high tariffs in many parts of the world. That applies not only to developing countries but to developed countries such as Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and even that epitome of private enterprise the United States of America. So long as those and other distortions of trade exist, the need for the MFA will continue.

There have been many false claims circulated about the effect of the MFA, and I am sure that other hon. Members will touch on those issues during the debate. I wish to comment on the fallacy that the MFA has simply brought about a diversion of trade. Contrary to such claims, a detailed study of trade flows in textiles and clothing between 1978 and 1984, on a category-by-category basis, reveals no—I do not say some—justification for the claim that is often made, that the MFA quotas have been responsible for diverting trade and increasing imports from non-MFA suppliers.

The reasons why imports from non-MFA suppliers have grown rapidly are overwhelmingly due to factors other than controls on MFA suppliers. Therefore, it is the United Kingdom's clothing and textile industries that would be most severely affected by the relaxation or termination of the MFA.

The use of aggregated data does indeed suggest, at first glance, that quotas on suppliers controlled under the MFA have led to a diversion of trade on a huge scale, to the benefit of other supplying countries. The proposition, based upon such aggregated data, has been made that the MFA has been of limited value to the United Kingdom and to our textile and clothing industries, and has benefited United Kingdom suppliers in other developed countries, particularly in other member states of the EEC. Certainly a study of the aggregated data reveals a growth of only 23 per cent. from MFA suppliers compared with a staggering 73 per cent. in imports from our so-called European partners.

A more detailed study—this is where Silberston let us down—reveals that this is not a simple diversion of trade. Such a consideration leads inescapably to the conclusion that the reasons why imports from non-MFA suppliers have grown so rapidly are overwhelmingly based on factors other than controls on MFA suppliers. Professor Silberston utterly failed to give the issue such detailed consideration. In his abysmal failure to do so, he produced two highly questionable hypotheses. First, he suggested that simply because the MFA has coincided with a period during which imports from non-MFA suppliers have risen faster than those from MFA countries, the MFA must have been the main cause. He suggests a causal relationship with no evidence to back up his claim.

Secondly, Silberston claimed that, because there has been a particular development or trend in the import pattern for textiles, the same trend can be directly extrapolated into the future. We all appreciate the value of historical evidence in formulating policies and anticipating market direction, but it cannot, in a complex market environment, be accorded such infallible status.

Let us glance briefly at the changes in volume of imports from MFA and non-MFA sources. To take one example, total imports of men's suits have risen from 2·1 million in 1978 to 2·9 million in 1984. It is certainly true that there was an increase of more than 30 per cent. in such imports from EEC countries. However, that must be set in the context of the overall increase in the volume of such imports. There was an overall rise of 38 per cent., with increases of 27 per cent. from low-cost non-preferential suppliers and of a staggering 200 per cent. from low-cost Mediterranean suppliers. In short, imports from low-cost sources have risen faster than those from what we should call the EC, and few MFA quotas for men's suits are in fact fully used at present. The only logical conclusion, if the figures are studied, is that no diversion of trade has occurred because of the MFA.

It is important to note that over half the total rise of 107,000 tonnes in textile imports from the Community between 1978 and 1984 was accounted for by rises in just three categories—filament synthetic yarn, carpets and non-woven goods—in which MFA suppliers were only of marginal significance, with virtually no quotas. Without any question of trade diversion, there was an increase of 106 per cent. in the volume of imports in those categories. A further 54,000 tonnes of the increase in imports from the EEC was in categories in which MFA suppliers are of comparatively minor significance and for which MFA quotas are relatively few and substantially under-used, such as cotton yarn, dyed and printed fabrics, spun synthetic yarn, pile and wool fabric.

No doubt my right hon. Friend will say that adjustments and amendments can be made to the current quotas under the MFA. In these categories in which there is little scope for diversion of trade as a result of the MFA, the increase in European imports was still 57 per cent. The remaining 43,000 tonnes import increase from the EEC includes products heavily subject to the MFA.

Without doubt, the fact that imports from MFA suppliers have risen more slowly between 1978 and 1984 than those from non-MFA suppliers is only marginally attributable to the MFA. Detailed study of the evidence should have been accompanied by consideration of background developments such as the progressive integration of the United Kingdom into the EEC trading framework, the fluctuations of the United Kingdom's exchange rate, the recent trend towards increasing design and fashion content, the state aid available to our competitors in Europe, and the World Bank assistance that increases the competitiveness of industries in those countries. Such detailed study was glaringly lacking in Professor Silberston's report, and it points to numerous other factors being responsible.

Products by MFA countries show especially high growth rates from non-MFA countries, but since the MFA is not the major reason for the sharp rise in imports from non-MFA suppliers there is no reason for the Government to believe that the brunt of relaxation of the MFA would be borne by overseas supplying countries rather than by the United Kingdom. As I have said many times, I for one am not prepared to accept the devastating blow to our industry that a relaxation of the MFA would undoubtedly bring about. I trust that the Government will not abrogate their responsibility to act in the national interest, and to stand up for the interests of more than 500,000 people who work in our clothing and textile industries.

We have heard that the MFA is to be renewed. I hope that the Government will take a robust position and that the agreement, which has been good for the developing world as well as for the United Kingdom, will have the support of the Government. I hope that they will go to Brussels for the discussions with a positive policy as well as, I believe, with the overwhelming support of the House.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): The secretary of the Oldham and Rochdale textile employers' association wrote to me the other day to remind me — I needed little reminding — of the continuing importance of the textile industry to Oldham.

Oldham was built on the textile industry and upon spinning in particular. For perhaps five decades the industry has been in sad decline, but even today there are 106 textile and clothing units in Oldham and 142 in Rochdale. Many of the firms are small, but there is a substantial number of large employers. In total, the firms account for about 25 per cent. of employment in manufacturing industry in Oldham. Oldham is a town of 250,000 people, and 25 per cent. of those who are employed in manufacturing industry work in textiles and clothing. There is a real interest in my constituency in the future of the MFA.

The negotiations are now getting under way and we hope that they will come to fruition in perhaps 18 months. The negotiations are complex and difficult to follow. However, it is important that we should realise that the MFA is not merely a restrictive arrangement of benefit to the United Kingdom. I listened to the Minister's speech with interest, and I welcome his assurance that we are determined to have a new MFA, but I thought that he was rather defensive. He seemed to suggest that we were doing no more than defending our interests. I do not believe that that is so.

The MFA is not an arrangement to shut out the textiles and clothing of the main exporting nations of the Third world. It is an attempt—sometimes unsuccessful from our point of view—to regulate in an orderly fashion the opening up of the markets of the United Kingdom and other developed countries to textile and clothing imports.

No one who has studied the figures for import penetration or for the decline of employment in the textile and clothing industry would accept the allegation that the MFA is a device to restrict trade to the advantage of our own industry. Employment in the United Kingdom textile and clothing industry has declined from about 1 million to 500,0000 in 12 years. Import penetration of the United Kingdom market for textiles and clothing has risen steadily in the past 30 years. At one time it was less than 10 per cent. Now it may be three times that figure, and much worse in some sectors of the industry. Those who oppose renewal of the MFA, even in its present imperfect form, forget that we do not live in a perfect laboratory environment. There is no such thing as free trade. As the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) said, we have recently heard complaints in the Chamber about the Japanese Government's restrictions on imports and excessive assistance to Japanese firms. Those complaints refer to trade in general.

The tariffs on textile and clothing products operated by MFA supplier nations range from 128 per cent. in Pakistan to 22 per cent. in Malaysia. The tariff is 97 per cent. in Egypt, 60 per cent. in Thailand, 34 per cent. in South Korea, and in Spain, which is waiting for accession to the EEC, it is 30 per cent. The average EEC tariff is 11 per cent., and it has been reduced by more than one third in the past five years. There has been no equivalent reduction in the tariffs charged by supplier countries. I welcome the Minister's assurance that there will be some attempt to ensure reciprocal arrangements among those countries. Perhaps I might put in a word about Hong Kong, which has no tariffs or barriers against our goods. If we are to be generous in any respect, we should realise the efforts that Hong Kong has made.

The textile, clothing and footwear industries committee of the Trades Union Congress has produced an excellent booklet entitled "A Fair Balance in Textile and Clothing Trade", which I am sure the Minister has read, in which it says that it strongly believes that there should be another MFA lasting 10 years, perhaps with a review after five years. That is important as it would give the industry some stability. The booklet also sets out many desirable improvements. I do not intend to list them because my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) mentioned many of them. However, three of the suggestions are in the finest tradition of trade unionism. I refer to the fine tradition of unions associated with the textile industry.

In my maiden speech I said with pride that textile workers had stood side by side with those in the United States who were fighting to free slaves there. They refused to touch cotton imports from the southern states during the civil war because they supported the fight against slavery. They did so at considerable expense to themselves. Mahatma Gandhi visited Manchester at the height of the Indian boycott on cotton goods in the north-west. Rather unexpectedly, he was well received and cheered in the streets of Manchester by textile workers, although his action was to their detriment. They did that because of their compassion for people who were worse off than themselves.

The trade union movement has made similar statements in the booklet to which I have referred. It says that it wants a new MFA to give more favourable treatment to the least developed countries and that it wants to encourage improvements in the social development of all member states. It also wants to reduce the gross exploitation of labour in member countries. We have all seen films of young children employed in the textile industry in some of the countries that export to us. They are remembered in the trade union document.

Lest it is felt that I have concentrated solely on what the trade unions have to say, I should like to quote from the letter sent by Mr. John Longworth. He writes:

"All of us, unions and employers alike, are deeply concerned about the effects on employment if the MFA is not renewed on similar or better terms than the present Arrangement. There is no doubt that there would be a large increase in imports from countries such as Hong Kong and Korea, and especially from China, which is a major threat. At the same time it would be impossible to argue for voluntary restraint arrangements with countries like Turkey if the MFA restraints on other suppliers had been removed. Without doubt these increased imports would mean thousands of further job losses in Oldham and Rochdale.

You may possibly be wondering why we cannot meet this competition head on. The reason is quite simply that government aids and subsidies given to overseas industries coupled with the distortion caused by unrealistic exchange rates make free and fair trade an illusion. Furthermore the overseas industries frequently operate behind protective barriers giving them a firm and profitable base from which to support their exports."

Conditions overseas are not beyond the minds of trade unions. I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind.

6.16 pm

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): Even if I had not been caught by the 10-minute rule, I would have been brief because it is important that as many hon. Members as possible should have the opportunity to take part in this debate, thereby reflecting the strength of feeling on both sides of the House. It is encouraging that so many hon. Members wish to take part and that so many signed the early-day motion to which my hon. Friend the Minister referred.

When I made my maiden speech 18 months ago, I urged the House never to forget that Britain had prospered through the skills and hard work of the people in the textile industry and said that the situation could be summed up by the old slogan, "Britain's bread hangs by Lancashire's thread." I went on to suggest that people in textile areas such as Hyndburn were proud and independent and would rather give help than receive it, but now they desperately needed that help. Consequently, in common with many other hon. Members, I am delighted to hear the Government's commitment to work for a renewal of the MFA. I hope that they will support renewal on the most effective terms possible. To do otherwise would be to increase the existing pressure on employment in areas that are already unemployment black spots. Anything less than the commitment to which I have referred will simply accentuate the economic and social problems of areas such as Hyndburn, caused by the decline in the textile industry for many years.

I support the renewal of the MFA not so much because of my constituency interest in textiles, which, alas, is now small, but because I have lived in a textile area all my life. I have seen at first hand the problems caused to ordinary working people by job losses in textiles. Mill towns such as Accrington were devastated. I would not want that to happen to other areas. It was tragic to see such skilled and hard-working people, who worked hard for relatively low wages, whose industrial relations record was second to none and who readily accepted the need to be competitive by agreeing to shift working, time studies, job flexibility and low pay increases—even in some cases reductions —thrown on the scrap heap. It was a bewildering experience for them. There were no £30,000 redundancy payments for them. Even if the MFA is renewed, it is, sadly, too late for the vast majority of textile workers in my constituency. Certainly it is too late for Messrs. Highams Ltd., a name synonymous with Accrington and textiles, which announced six weeks ago that it is closing with the loss of 300 jobs. The loss of such a well-established company is a severe blow to the morale of the area and a tragedy for the employees concerned.

Such closures add to the severe problems of unemployment and industrial dereliction in my constituency. Fortunately, because of the help of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who played an important part in ensuring that a development grant application from the only remaining textile firm in my constituency was dealt with swiftly, 120 of the jobs were saved. Speed was essential, and without the Minister's intervention the jobs would have been lost. I wish to place on record my thanks to him. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said that access to Ministers did not lead to comprehension and action. In this case he was wrong.

The textile industry and the fine people in it deserve our support. The industry has acted to improve its competitive position, productivity has risen by 22 per cent. since 1980, which is well above the average for manufacturing industry, investment is rising, even in the uncertain conditions which now prevail, increasing importance is being placed on design, and Enfield Manufacturing has succeeded because of the combination of all those factors and a determination to break into the often difficult export market.

The continued survival of such firms depends on the further improvement of their competitiveness in both home and overseas markets. The investment required in new technology will be achieved only if they have confidence in the future. Without the present system of low-cost import restraint, the prospect of reasonable stability would be removed and with it much of the confidence on which investment depends. That is why the renewal of the MFA is vital.

I support help being given to Third world countries —the world's poor—but it must come from the country as a whole. Indeed, it must also come from other countries, and not from one section of one country. I cannot say to the remaining textile workers in my constituency that they must accept an increased burden when workers in America, Japan and Australia are not prepared to do so. Far from being protectionist, the MFA has allowed EC imports to grow, even in a declining market. By providing guaranteed and growing access to developed markets, it has greatly assisted developing countries in advancing their export interests in an orderly trading environment.

If we were to abandon the MFA, it would lead to chaos, which would hurt everyone, not least the less developed countries. Without any such international agreement, political pressure would build up in each developed country to enact strong protectionist legislation. Such legislation would have serious and mainly negative implications for both textiles and world trade generally.

I recorded earlier my thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister for helping to save 120 jobs. That action shows that the Government care about the textile industry, and also their care and anxiety to renew the MFA. Clearly the British Government in isolation cannot have their way in the important discussions ahead, but we look to them to argue Britain's case forcefully. Anything less would fail the industry and those employed in it. I believe all that the Minister said and thank him for what he said when he opened the debate.

The Silberston report made many forecasts of what might happen if the MFA were rapidly phased out after 1986. Those hon. Members who live in and represent textile areas know what would happen, and we would not support it.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): There can be no doubt that the textile and clothing industry is one of the United Kingdom's greatest industries. There is no point in repeating the figures to point out that fact. There can be no doubt that the industry has made great strides in profitability, efficiency and modernisation, and all hon. Members must join with the Minister in paying tribute to it for that. There can be no doubt that the industry is centred around the present centres of unemployment. Unemployment is often highest where the clothing textile industry is situated. There can be no doubt that it would be folly, and, in the light of the present unemployment trends, dangerous folly, for the Government not to do all they can to create a climate and framework within which the industry can prosper. That must be common ground to us all.

We must consider whether an essential part of that framework is the multi-fibre arrangement. One may imagine that there is little else. Our capacity to assist our clothing and textile industry is woefully inadequate compared with that of the Belgians who put £90 million a year, which is equivalent to £500 million a year for an industry the size of ours, into the industry, or the Italians who provide, it is said, assistance worth £1,500 million a year.

The fact that for many people the MFA is the only instrument with which we can assist our industry accounts for some of the strength of the reactions to the debate whether it should be continued.

There are only two reasons for continuing the MFA: is it good for the industry, and is it right for trade? No one can want the MFA because he wants protectionism—at least I imagined that until I heard the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). It is strange to hear from the mouths of a party which has such a proud tradition in internationalism, which professes to care greatly for the Third world, and which says it wishes to ensure that the poor have reasonable access to cheaper goods, protectionism in that form and manner.

As a trading nation we depend on a free and fair system.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I recognise that I have said one or two things which will have annoyed him, but with only 10 minutes to speak I cannot afford to give way.

With the mood of protectionism rising, few people can want to put permanently in place a protectionist measure, such as the MFA, for longer than necessary. Is the MFA necessary? There are two parts to the question. First, is it necessary to the structure of world trade for stability; secondly, is it necessary for the industry itself?

The first question is easier to answer than the second. The MFA has provided a framework for stability during a period of great change. It would be wrong brutally and precipitately to dismantle it now as the period of adjustment is not yet complete. However, it is nearing completion. Allowing for transport costs, the West German industry, for example, would need only a 3 per cent. duty on yarn and a 12 per cent. duty on cloth to compete with the Korean industry. It is calculated that the United States industry needs no duty. The need for the MFA in world trading terms has diminished and is diminishing. I accept that it will be needed—but for how long?

What I do not accept is the view that the MFA has been a benevolent instrument for the less developed countries, especially the poorer less developed countries. Seventy per cent. of our net imports come from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, whereas under MFA 1 the figure was 65 per cent. The drift continues in the same direction. More than half of our net imports come from Common Market countries. The less developed countries', share of the market has fallen from 32 per cent. to 26 per cent. If it is so beneficial to less developed countries, why did 21 of the leading less developed countries in the MFA ask only last month for a return to a genuine multilateral form of trading?

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman will make a full speech and no doubt he can make his points then.

I accept that the MFA has had a stabilising effect on world trade, and that it still has a role to play. However, that role is diminishing. The MFA was set up as a temporary structure, and I see no reason to change its temporary nature now.

Is it, therefore, necessary to the United Kingdom industry? That is the contentious question. Silberston said that it was not. I recognise that many hon. Gentlemen disagree with that. However, careful analysis and consideration of the criticisms will show that some of the criticisms are also ill-founded. I have considered Silberston's report and the criticisms of it, and I believe that he got it about right in general direction, if not in detail. We could pick holes in many of the details, but in general the thrust is about right. [HON. MEMBERS: "The hon. Gentleman knows nothing about it."] There are textile firms in my constituency, and not in insignificant number.

I agree that our textile and clothing industry needs support and a framework to help it in the struggle to adjust to difficult world trading conditions. I do not deny that the MFA has provided such assistance, although the assistance may have given too little weight to some consumer views. We must remember that the consumer, not the taxpayer, has paid for the MFA. There is an argument that the MFA is a hidden tax that falls most heavily on those who purchase cheap clothes or children's clothing. Be that as it may, I agree that the MFA has been useful in providing a framework to allow our textile and clothing industry to restructure itself, and that it will continue to have a similar role, albeit a diminishing one, in the immediate future.

However, I cannot accept the fact that the MFA must be enshrined as a permanent structure. We should renew it for a last term—MFA 4—roughly similar to that of MFA 3. The Government should seek a commitment, through the EC, that this will be the last renewal. The Minister may not wish to say that now, but a case could be made for it. Furthermore, as a commitment to a more liberal rather than a more restrictive MFA, we should investigate the possibility of exempting the poorest exporting countries from quota provisions. They occupy a tiny fraction of the textile markets, so such action would cost us little enough.

If we are to provide the support that this great industry needs, there must be better long-term ways of doing it than the MFA. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said in June last year, we need a decent EC plan for textiles to consolidate and build on the great advances that have been made by the industry. By all means, let us renew the MFA for a final term, but let us also begin to draw up a proper and efficient system for assisting our textile industry—a system that will provide the support that is needed, where it is needed, rather than relying solely on a structure of import quotas, which cannot last for long and which, in any event, is an extremely inefficient way of assisting such a great and vital industry.

We have allowed ourselves to hide behind the MFA as an excuse for not making proper provision for the industry. The textile and clothing industry deserves better from us than being put in a position of relying on such a temporary measure. If the Government wish to do something of real importance for the industry, they should press our EC partners for a European plan for textiles rather than the indefinite retention of this essentially temporary structure for ever.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): On the surface, this debate is about the multi-fibre arrangement and the textile and clothing industry, but in reality it goes much wider and touches on matters of great importance to the United Kingdom. We must decide whether we want free trade or protection, and I believe that, as a trading nation, we must take the course that expands our trade most.

Just as the debate goes wider than its title, so must hon. Members lift their sights above their narrow constituency interests. I sympathise with my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), who made a moving speech, but he, too, must lift his sights, as a Member of Parliament, to what is best in the long term for a trading nation.

Britain is a trading nation, and it exports a larger share of its output than does any other country. As a result, it does better when world trade is buoyant than when it is weak—that is self-evident. Free trade undoubtedly helps trade to grow and generates wealth, whereas protection has always had the opposite effect. It reduces economic activity and increases poverty, and in this respect I am glad to be on the same side as the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). It is sad to hear the constant cries for protection from both sides of the House, and especially from the Labour party, because that would reduce prosperity and jobs.

Let us consider a practical example. I am always impressed by how much of what is manufactured in my constituency is exported. Ruston Gas Turbines, our biggest employer, exports more than 90 per cent. of what it makes. If one adds direct exports to the components that go elsewhere to be assembled into exports, most firms in Lincoln export 50 per cent. or more of their output, and I am sure that many other industrial centres have a similar record. Therefore, if we drift towards protection, barriers will be erected, markets will shrink, and jobs will be lost. It is folly to believe that demand at home or in the Common Market will take up that slack. In an earlier intervention, I gave the example of Indonesia in 1980, when our reactions lost us jobs at home. We must be under no illusion that protection which expands without ceasing would have that effect repeatedly.

Britain is right to fear a drift towards protection. With our Common Market partners, we must stem and reverse that tide. If we do not, we shall suffer. We must achieve our aim of having a new round of GATT talks. We must stop the growing lobby in the United States towards protection, and we must use all the levers we have and all the power of our market to get other countries to open their markets to our products, and to introduce true free and fair trade.

Those who advocate protection have much more to answer than the sole charge that protection reduces wealth. It also narrows choice for the consumer. It increases prices here, as competition is reduced and cheaper goods are kept out. It is estimated that the textiles which come in under quota protection cost the British consumer £500 million more than they would cost if there was free competition. That money is prevented from going elsewhere in the economy to generate its own wealth. In addition, the countries affected by the MFA send us more expensive goods to make the best use of their quotas. Therefore, in all ways, the poorer families in Britain suffer from the MFA, because they must spend more on textiles and clothing than they should.

The consumer has a right to be heard—we are all consumers—and his interests must not go by default. They must not be swallowed by narrow constituency interests.

Many people claim that we should do more to help Third world countries, but one of the best forms of help is to provide British markets for their products. The MFA restricts choice, increases prices and damages poorer countries. We stomach all this because we claim that we are buying time to change our textile industry so that it will compete fairly. But import quotas are a bad way to help the industry, and history proves that. In 1974, the MFA was introduced temporarily, but since then it has been extended twice, and now we hear cries that it should be extended for another 10 years. Protection never promotes the change that is needed; therefore, protection endures for ever.

There are better ways to help industry. I welcome the scheme started in March 1984 to help smaller firms to invest in new technology. If help is needed, let us go down that route, not the protection route. The main argument for the MFA has proved itself to be a delusion. Jobs will be created by creating a climate of more exports from Britain and of having cheaper goods for the British consumer to buy. We shall have greater spending power.

The practical lesson that we have learnt since 1974 is that once protection starts it is difficult to dismantle. I have two practical suggestions for new talks. First, we should use existing quotas as a lever to secure reductions in barriers against us in other markets. We must use the force and power of our markets to reduce barriers in Taiwan, South Korea, the United States and other markets. If we do this, we can relax barriers here. Secondly, we must analyse the strengths and weaknesses of the various sectors of the clothing and textile industries. The Silberston report sketches out a sensible timetable for the reduction of the MFA. It does not suggest doing this all in one go, and it tries to meet the practical situation.

I end as I began. As a trading nation we must allow our skill and efforts to stem the drift towards protection because that drift can only harm freedom of choice, prices, our ability to compete, our markets and hence jobs. For prosperity, future and the jobs of our people, we must turn the world back towards free trade and away from this ominous drift towards protectionism.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I declare an interest as a Member sponsored by the Transport and General Workers Union, of which the textile group represents many workers in the industries that we are discussing. Many of them are extremely low paid, and all of them, I remind the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), are consumers. Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), I believe that it is sad that it has taken so long for this debate to take place. Because of the Government's equivocation and public uncertainty about whether they were committed to a renewal of the MFA, there has been considerable uncertainty in the industry and outside it. That has been damaging and the Government have only themselves to blame for the damage that they have done to the confidence in the British textile and clothing industries.

The Government have an opportunity to show—I am glad that they have done so to some extent in this debate — the importance of the British textile and clothing industries to our economy, to our manufacturing industry, to exports and, vitally, to employment. It is important that we should never overlook or understate the importance of the textile and clothing industries to employment. They are concentrated in areas that have already been ravaged by high unemployment.

Both sides of the textile and clothing industries support a renewed MFA, even though there are clear and divergent interests among those involved in the industries. It is an insult for those who oppose renewal of the MFA to attempt to dismiss those who support it as being entirely motivated by vested interest. It is equally insulting for them to misrepresent the aims of the MFA and its past and future impact, and to mislead or misrepresent its effect. The most important argument to address is the one that seeks to persuade us that ending the MFA in favour of free trade and intensified competition serves all interests best—the textile and clothing industries, consumers and foreign textile suppliers—including the poorest.

It is clear that if the MFA were to end, or to be substantially weakened, the international textile and clothing industries would not find themselves in a pure free trade environment invigorated by fair competition. Britain, with all other textile suppliers, including the poorest, would find itself in a trade jungle, unregulated, subject to constant and major disruption, with the weak being even more exploited than they are now, or in some cases being snuffed out altogether. Pure free trade and unfettered competition would no longer exist.

The Minister pleaded with us to face the facts, and talked a lot about the 1930s. I wish that he had faced more facts about the world in 1985. Free trade is an obsolete concept in a world in which real economic power, including economic decisions that affect the daily lives of all of us, is wielded by a small group of giant multinational companies. In many cases their individual economic power, or sometimes their power in small groups, is greater than that of Governments of independent sovereign states. Multinationals rather than Governments now determine the location of investment, or its withdrawal, without giving a second thought to the social consequences.

Courtaulds has probably taken more taxpayers' money than many other companies of which I can think. It has recently announced the closure of two companies in Wales, with the redundancy of 1,100 workers. Rumours are circulating that the product that was made in Wales is now to be made in India through a joint venture between Courtaulds and the Indian Government. I support investment in the Third world, but I deplore, if it is true, the social irresponsibility of a company such as Courtaulds engaging in such a venture and throwing 1,100 people in a high unemployment area on the dole.

The profits earned by multinational companies are artificially manipulated to minimise tax payments, and profit or loss is determined by deliberate transfer pricing. Free trade is the fashionable belief among a dwindling band of Thatcherite Ministers, Whitehall mandarins, Adam Smith Institute pamphleteers and those dreaming of higher things at the Institute of Directors. Sadly, to judge from the speech of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), there seem to be lingering supporters of Gladstone in the Liberal party. For the first time, we may be having a second speech from the Liberal party, but one of a different flavour. Perhaps in future we shall have not one member of the parliamentary Liberal party seeking to speak from the Opposition Dispatch Box, on behalf of his party, but two. Perhaps the Procedure Committee will take note of that.

Only this week we witnessed the economic and trading realities of the world in 1985. Our tender for the Turkish bridge was the lowest, and our bid matched or beat that of others bidding for the contract, but the Japanese won the order because they offered to subsidise the approach roads to the bridge. That is an ill reward for those senior Tories who have over years been apologists for the Turkish Government and sought to conceal or excuse their appalling record on human rights and their appalling deeds. We failed to get the contract despite the embarrassing behaviour of senior Tories.

Free trade offers the consumer little, and the poorest countries in the Third world even less. The poorest textile suppliers will survive and expand only if they can look to relative stability and assured access to markets, and have some confidence of a sustained demand to maintain their markets and open up and sustain new markets. Above all, we need increasing world demand, and that is why the Labour party is constantly urging economic expanion, because such things come only from economic expansion. The internationalism about which the hon. Member for Yeovil talked is meaningless unless there is a determined international effort to expand economic activity throughout the world and allow the poor countries to find new and larger markets for their products.

The MFA is all about trying to assist an orderly growth in trade and about our negotiating a planned growth in trade to the mutual benefit of all textile suppliers, especially the poorest. It is necessary to dispose of the myth, again fashionable among those who still cling to free trade notions, that British textiles are a sunset industry, locked into inevitable and terminal decline, and that the MFA might as well dwindle because it is merely postponing the inevitable death of the textile and clothing industries. That myth must be nailed. As many hon. Members representing textile constituencies have made clear in the debate, the Government need to provide more investment and support for the British textile and clothing industries. They must "talk up" these industries.

It must be emphasised that by any economic yardstick or any economic criteria our textile and clothing industries represent a most important part of the British economy. They employ 500,000 people, many of them women, large numbers of whom belong to the ethnic minorities. Much understandable importance has been placed upon that aspect. These industries represent a major part of Britain's shrinking manufacturing base. They are major British exporters. Their performance, not least in productivity growth, can be compared favourably with any other part of our manufacturing industry.

Unless the multi-fibre arrangement is strengthened, the loss of jobs within the industry will be intensified. Only last year 200 textile workers went on the dole queue every month. Most of these jobs will be lost in areas where there is already high unemployment — in Yorkshire, Humberside, the east Midlands, the north-west, Scotland and in some parts of the south-east. Many of those men and women are the only wage earners for their families. Already in some areas unemployment is as high as 60 per cent.

This is a valuable debate. I hope that the Government's indication that this industry's trade is being renewed will be followed up by a full-hearted and determined commitment. I am worried about some of the comments on transitional arrangements and about the hint that the MFA may be only a temporary measure. For the sake of the industry, of the men and women who depend upon that industry and of the world economic community, I hope that a strong and effective MFA will be negotiated. Anything less than that will be a gross betrayal of a British industry and of the men and women who have devoted their lives and energies to it.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): In the last Parliament there were several fairly gloomy debates, most of them initiated by the Opposition, on or related to textiles. This is the first major debate on textiles in this Parliament. To some extent this reflects the more confident state of the industry—at least of the wool sector of the industry. Confidence, however, is relative. Today, the industry is very much leaner, albeit fitter, than it was and employs far fewer people, but its future remains extremely uncertain.

Some people, among whom I include my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), have portrayed the multi-fibre arrangement as a means of rigidly restricting textile and clothing imports. In fact, it is a framework for gradual liberalisation. This can be illustrated by pointing out that the present MFA — MFA3 — allows for an annual growth rate of imports of up to 6 per cent., which in the event has been very nearly four times the growth rate of clothing sales in this country over that period.

Free trade in goods and services must be the ideal, but we do not live in an ideal world. The reality is that many countries have erected barriers to trade which are far less liberal than our own. This factor applies to both developed and underdeveloped countries. The United States must come high on anybody's list of protectionist nations. United States tariffs on woven wool fabrics at 45 per cent. compare with the 13 per cent. tariff applied by the European Community. Australia, too, could hardly be counted in anybody's book as underdeveloped, yet its tariffs of between 70 and 100 per cent. on woven outerwear are ludicrously high, compared with that of 16 per cent. in the European Community.

Of the developed countries, Europe cannot be expected alone to accept responsibility for imports from low-cost countries. If we did, it would have disastrous results. The United States is a much more self-sufficient country than the United Kingdom, and a much smaller proportion of its gross national product is devoted to trade. Britain depends to a much greater extent than almost any other nation on trade. It is not in our interests that there should be increasing restrictions. The United States cannot be allowed indefinitely to use high tariff barriers as a means of protecting its own industry from exchange rates which are largely the result of its own economic policies. I hope that Her Majesty's Government will increasingly take a tough line with the American Administration.

The MFA is not, I believe, a restrictive measure but a way of allowing international trade to develop in an orderly way. It should also be a means of enabling trade to develop more liberally, but this is a two-way process. It depends just as much on those with whom we trade as ourselves. Reciprocity is the principle for which we should aim. When we negotiate the bilateral agreements a tough line should be taken with those countries which have made no effort whatsoever to open up their markets to exports from the European Community, but in no way can any guarantee be given that MFA 4 will be the final MFA. That depends upon others as well as ourselves.

If we were to give away our bargaining hand, as was suggested by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), there would be little hope of persuading other more restrictive states to adopt freer policies. The hon. Gentleman said that Silberston had got it just about right. I presume that he was speaking as the official spokesman for the Liberal party. I challenge the hon. Member to come and say that on Liberal platforms in west Yorkshire, both now and in the future, and see what the result is.

Non-tariff barriers and other distortions of fair competition should also be considered when we conduct bilateral negotiations. Some Governments provide massive aid to their own industries. The social conditions of workers are often quite unacceptable, even allowing for the much lower standards which we would expect to prevail. These are factors which we cannot afford to ignore. Therefore, one would wish there to be in the new MFA a social clause which deals with such issues as working hours and conditions and guarantees against the exploitation of children.

We are entering upon a period of even greater changes in trade patterns than existed in the past. The expansion of Chinese exports in textiles is something of which our own industry is very fearful. If orderly trade development was needed before, it will be needed even more in the future.

It is often suggested that we should relax all barriers in order to aid the Third world, bearing in mind that many poor countries are better able to contemplate the development of a textile industry with the use of low technology than other enterprises which require much greater capital investment. However, without the existence of a framework for orderly trade development it is likely that the most underdeveloped countries will be squeezed out by those who already have a track record. The best hope for the most underdeveloped nations is the existence of reasonable quotas which give them a chance to have some access to the market.

Although we are discussing the renewal of the MFA, this must be viewed in the context in which it appears. In the past, several European Community member states gave various forms of financial assistance and other aid to their textile and clothing industries. One can point notably to members of the Community such as France, Belgium, Holland and Italy. All have extended massive aid to their textile industries. For years complaints were made about this by companies in this country, but the Community failed to act. When, at long last, the British Government proposed a relatively modest scheme, known as CLOFT, involving only £20 million, compared with the hundreds, if not thousands, of millions of pounds which had been extended to industries abroad, the competition policy of the Community was tightened up. It is of little comfort to companies in this country, which have had to face very unfair competition over a number of years, that schemes put forward by other countries will be subject in future to the most rigorous examination. In the meantime, many firms have disappeared and many jobs have been lost. The textile and clothing industries in Britain now look searchingly to the Government to protect their interests in the future and to ensure that genuinely fair competition prevails.

Today's statement by my right hon. Friend is encouraging as far as it goes. The wool textile industry, which is so important to the economy of west Yorkshire, will give one cheer tonight. It will give another cheer if a satisfactory MFA 4 is negotiated, and it will cheer even louder if the subsequent bilaterals are fair to all sides.

6.59 pm

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): I cautiously welcome the Minister's statement that the multi-fibre arrangement will be renewed. I am not convinced that the Government have expressed a clear determination to put up a strong case during the negotiations. The importance of the MFA to Northern Ireland in particular can be demonstrated by a simple reference to my constituency of Antrim, East.

[Mr. Roy Beggs]

At present more than 20 per cent. of my constituents are unemployed. Despite what Professor Silberston says in his report, that high level of unemployment arose directly from the collapse of the synthetic fibre industry several years ago. It has not been possible to create new jobs for those constituents of mine who were formerly employed by Klingers in Larne and by the international companies such as ICI and Courtaulds. Those companies pulled out putting thousands of people on the dole and then made a cosmetic gesture in attempting to attract small businesses to those huge plants.

The MFA, which has been designed to control and restrain the growth of cheap imports into the United Kingdom, must be renewed and renewed in such terms that we do not precipitate futher decline in the textile industry. I believe sincerely that failure to renew the present arrangements would cripple the Northern Ireland textile industry and seriously damage employment opportunities in the textile, clothing and knitting industries in Britain. It could turn the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland, into one big shop for cheap imports from the rest of the world and simply put our people into unemployment.

In 1984 the Northern Ireland economic council reported, and nothing really has changed since then, that:

"There are no measures to show exactly what effect cheap imports have had on local producers but it is clear that this has been an important factor in the decline of the industry over the past ten years. Furthermore, import penetration has been greatest in those products in which Northern Ireland industry has tended to specialise — carpets and the down-market end of fabric production."

The textile industry, excluding man-made fibres, is one of Northern Ireland's largest industrial sectors. The decline of that sector and the loss of jobs there has been almost continuous in the post-war period. Since 1959, 54,000 people, representing 34 per cent. of the manufacturing labour force, had declined to 20,430 people, or 14 per cent. of the manufacturing labour force, by 1979.

Yet output continues to increase due to the productivity of the labour force and the modernisation which occurred as a result of the uptake of capital grants to industry. But even since 1979 decline in the industry has continued. By 1983 the Northern Ireland textile industry provided employment for 13,000 people, representing only 13 per cent. of all persons in manufacturing in Northern Ireland.

We are all well aware of the former dependence for employment in Northern Ireland on the linen industry. I trust that the Government will give every assistance possible to foster the rebirth of that industry, to encourage the development of new products and new composite materials based on linen. It has been clearly shown that these are in demand by high fashion designers throughout the world. Finding markets for new products is still a problem. All those engaged in searching for new markets and promoting exports merit greater support and encouragement from the Government.

Northern Ireland industry has also been dependent on the United Kingdom market but there again growth has been low and demand has been slow. We are well aware of the need to export to survive, but how can we compete, especially when there are high tariff barriers elsewhere? There must be greater incentive and assistance for those who wish to export.

Import penetration by cheap imports from low-cost producers in the developing countries has also caused serious job losses for our home produced products. I am sure that hon. Members are well aware that imports of textiles increased from 21 per cent. of total United Kingdom sales in 1973 to 40 per cent. in 1982.

It appears almost ridiculous for hon. Members to advocate at every opportunity that consumers should buy British when there is inadequate and insufficient protection by the Government for the textile industry and the products that are produced in the United Kingdom to enable fair competition against cheap and subsidised imports.

I remain concerned about the recommendations of the Silberston report. I urge the House and the Government not to accept its main recommendations and strongly to defend the interests of the United Kingdom's textile, clothing and knitting industries to take account of the economic and social importance of those interests in Northern Ireland and in other regions in Britain which are equally depressed.

I wrote to the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office requesting that the interests of the Northern Ireland textile industry should be adequately protected in the forthcoming negotiations and that the MFA should be renewed on such terms as would prevent further decline in jobs. I recognise and appreciate the Minister's awareness of our problems in Northern Ireland. In his reply he said:

"We have examined the Silberston Report on the economic effects of restraints on trade in textiles and clothing and share your concern over the recommendations in the report on the future of the Multifibre Arrangement. The textiles and clothing sector makes up almost 30 per cent. of the total employment in manufacturing industry in the Province and I am well aware that the erosion of the Textile Industry has contributed substantially to the high level of unemployment in Northern Ireland today. It is our intention to ensure that the renegotiation of the Multifibre Arrangement will not jeopardise NI companies."

I hope that the Government will back up that assurance and the Minister's statement that the United Kingdom will not be a soft touch in the negotiations. I also hope that no date will be agreed for the final phasing out of the MFA and that incentives to the textile and clothing industries will mean that we shall quickly modernise and be able to compete internationally with every other producer.

7.9 pm

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): It is always an interesting and curious parliamentary occasion when those of my hon. Friends who occasionally tend to run like lemmings with the free trade argument suddenly draw themselves up on the edge of the precipice on a night such as tonight having doubtless been confronted by the reality of their parliamentary majorities. Perhaps we should be a little courteous to those of them who have the courage to go over the edge tonight. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) has already leapt, and, judging by the noises on the Benches behind me, some others may also leap.

Mr. Fallon: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Malone: I do not intend to give way.

Although I have some sympathy with those of my hon. Friends who may take that step, I believe that their courage is misplaced. If there is any debate in which a fair grasp of reality must be the touchstone from which we proceed, this is it. Indeed, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on what he said in his initial remarks and on having a very realistic approach to an extremely difficult issue. My right hon. Friend's approach was different from that of Opposition Members. He has demonstrated that he is prepared to consider some form of renewal of the agreement while working towards freer trade, but Opposition Members are more than happy to have protectionism and to see the present agreement set in concrete. That is the difference between us.

This debate is extremely important for Scotland. Scotland employs about 14 per cent. of those employed overall in the textile industry. But perhaps more importantly, those people are employed in areas where there has already been a massive rundown in the industry, and they have already faced massive sacrifices. In some of those areas it has proved possible to create new jobs through fresh industries, but there would be a grave risk if anything happened to prejudice those jobs still further.

We must try to balance the interests of those employed in the industry with the interests of the consumer. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln rightly mentioned the consumer. However, in another context my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy pointed out that there is more to matters than simply the consumer. There are, after all, consumers and producers. It is perhaps another interesting parliamentary curiosity that my right hon. Friend's speech has been endorsed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister from the Dispatch Box. Thus, the Government presumably accept that the interests of consumers cannot be considered on their own.

Those who believe that the agreement should simply be scrapped should ask themselves whether it has badly affected consumers' interests. There are three questions to which hon. Members must address themselves. First, has the agreement made the textile industry softer? The answer is that it has not, because the textile industry, almost uniquely in this country, has increased its productivity by 30 per cent. since 1980. Secondly, has the agreement made the textile industry less keen to invest? The answer is, of course not. After all, £200 million was invested last year by the textile industry. Thirdly, has the agreement made the industry complacent about its products? Has there been a shortage of goods in the market place? The answer is no. The industry has diversified and has moved with the times. It has added value to its product to the extent last year of £3·9 billion.

If we had been faced with a complacent industry that had hidden behind a protective shield, I would have agreed with those of my hon. Friends who say that the agreement shoud be thrown over. However, that is not the case. The industry has responded to the challenge set out in 1974, which was that this was a time for change and should be used as an opportunity for change. The industry has taken that opportunity.

It is too simple to state that the agreement should simply be renewed. That is not sufficient. In the past few years it has become tighter and more, rather than less, protectionist. I had hoped that over the period of its development the degree of protection provided would become less restrictive than at the outset. One of the principles guiding the negotiations leading to renewal should be that, although some protection is necessary, it should not be static and should not become sharper and tougher as the years go by.

In attempting to renegotiate the agreement, my right hon. Friend the Minister should move slowly towards a free trade position. That must be the inevitable and long-term consequence of our endeavours. But it is not something that can be achieved instantly; it must be a long-term objective. It is not quite proper tonight to suggest, say, that the agreement should last for five or 10 years. However, the textile industry in this country has taken substantial investment decisions on the basis of the current MFA. Those investments must be given a chance to bear fruit, and the industry must be given a chance to see clearly where its future investment opportunities lie. If my right hon. Friend has that as a guiding principle, he cannot go too far wrong in the renegotiations.

There are some details that it would be helpful to incorporate in any new agreement. We must, of course, move towards a less restrictive approach than we have had during the past few years, which would benefit the developing world. I think that there is a broad consensus tonight on that point. We now have an ideal opportunity to get rid of some of the abuses in the present system. I have always thought it reprehensible that a system of quota renting—a method of passing quotas round—should grow up. That problem must be tackled in the negotiations, and stopped. In addition, we must develop a much less blunt instrument than the unilateral sanctions that exist under GATT as a response to those who abuse the free trade that we wish to see. As hon. Members have already said, such abuses certainly exist.

If my right hon. Friend the Minister pursues that course, he will set a mood that shows that, although we are in favour of renegotiating the agreement on a reasonable basis, we are not in favour of protectionism as a creed. That is the mood that he must set in the talks. It is a difficult mood to create, but I am certain that my right hon. Friend has made a very good start this evening, and I am also certain that the whole House wishes him well in his efforts.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I am glad to have the opportunity of speaking in this debate, because, as many hon. Members have said, the issue before us is crucial for the textile industry. I accept that hon. Members have the right to talk about constituency matters, but on this occasion I should like to underline the importance to Scotland of renewing the agreement.

The economic importance to Scotland of the textile industry is often ignored and almost invariably understated. The industry in Scotland employs about 60,000 people—almost as many as the steel, coal and shipbuilding industries combined, and more than half as many again as the electrical and new electronic engineering industries employ. That means that the industry is responsible for 14 per cent. of manufacturing employment and for about 3 per cent. of total employment in Scotland. Consequently, I need not underline its importance to Scotland.

The threat of job losses if the multi-fibre arrangement were liberalised or abandoned is viewed not with hysterical anxiety but with genuine concern by those engaged in or employed by manufacturing industry. The problems would be exacerbated if the agreement were ended because of the geographical locations involved. Unemployment would result and the effects upon the Scottish economy would be disastrous.

[Mr. William McKelvey]

The high unemployment in Scotland seems to have escaped the attention of the media recently. The latest figures show that more than half of the United Kingdom total rise in unemployment during April took place in Scotland. Last month 2,785 souls in Scotland joined the dole queue, bringing total unemployment to a disgraceful 354,692. The Government's policies are responsible.

In 1982 the textile and clothing sector accounted for nearly 8 per cent. of manufacturing output and nearly 2 per cent. of Scottish gross domestic product. In real terms output per head in textiles rose by nearly 14 per cent. between 1979 and 1982. That compares favourably with the 13·5 per cent. increase in manufacturing industry as a whole. Manufacturing industry in Scotland cannot be said to be Victorian, Luddite or old fashioned. Manufacturers in Scotland, like their counterparts elsewhere in the United Kingdom, have modernised their machinery and cut costs.

The Scottish textile industry is export oriented. About 90 per cent. of total sales in 1976 went either to the rest of the United Kingdom or abroad. In Scotland we regard sending goods to England and Wales as an exercise in exporting.

The Minister said that a great deal of money had been put into the textile industry to alleviate the problems in areas of high unemployment. I hope that the Minister will take my remarks into account when such moneys are doled out in future.

Strathclyde covers about one third of the geographical area of Scotland and supports about two thirds of Scotland's population. It unsuccessfully claimed a share of the £58 million allocated to the United Kingdom under the EEC non-quota programme to assist textile closure areas. Representations were made in respect of the Kilmarnock and Paisley travel-to-work areas where there is a concentration of that type of work and where heavy losses in employment have occurred recently. The EEC Commission and the Government adhered strictly to the 20 per cent. "regional dependency ratio" which works against such a large region because of the pockets devoted to textiles in that region.

The districts certainly lost over 20 per cent. of manufacturing employment but they were denied the grant which could have alleviated suffering in areas with some of the worst unemployment in Britain. I hope that the Minister will bear in mind the needs of that large region. Perhaps he will be able to change the system so that grants are more equitably distributed.

In Kilmarnock and Loudoun the textile and clothing industries provided 4,500 jobs in 1981—almost half of all manufacturing employment in textiles. Because of the many job losses in the BMK carpet factory, that figure has shrunk, but we have managed to hang on to our lace knitting industry. The knitwear industry has experienced a slight improvement in terms of jobs. Once 40 small knitting firms existed in the area but now there are only four. Any further depletion of that industry would be disastrous for an area with no alternaive employment opportunities.

The factories distributed throughout Scotland are not usually large. Mackinnons in Coatbridge employs about 500 people. It was returned to the private sector by the Scottish Development Agency as part of the Dawson international group. Queen of Scots in Irvine employs about 400 people, is part of Courtaulds and produces "cut and sew" knitwear. Cumnock Knitwear employs about 300 workers, Macdougalls of Lanark employs between 200 and 300 and Mansfield Hosiery Mills in Glasgow employs about 200. Any loss of jobs in those areas could be devastating.

There is a modest caution about the way in which the Minister approaches the problem. That is not because he is not sincere, but I should have more confidence if he were more dynamic and forceful in his attitude to the negotiations. If he needs any assistance, I know several shop stewards in the textile industry who are fully aware of what it means for the MFA to be continued. They want to sleep easy in their beds. All the representations made to me on the subject have been made jointly by the trade unions and management. I support them.

Mr. John Watson (Skipton and Ripon): I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate, particularly as two key issues of principle must be discussed before the House can consider the MFA itself. The first is the simple definition of the word "unfair".

Some people are confused about what we mean when we talk about unfair competition. If what is meant is competition from imports which are subsidised by the Governments of the countries from which they come, I would enthusiastically agree with the definition. However, some colleagues take the definition further and apply it to imports which they regard as unfair simply because they are unwelome, inexpensive or based upon pay levels which are lower than levels here. By no stretch of the imagination can I believe that the word "unfair" can be applied to such competition.

Secondly, and perhaps more fundamentally, what exactly do we want industry to provide? Do we expect industry in Britain to be the provider of jobs or of wealth? The prevailing political fashion is to say that it can do both. In the 150 years since the industrial revolution, successful industry has indeed done both.

However, it is unrealistic to expect manufacturing industry to provide both jobs and wealth as the 20th century draws to a close, for two reasons. First, to provide jobs and wealth it is necessary for production each year to exceed productivity by a considerable margin. That can be done only if our share of world trade escalates considerably from its current low level. Second, it means that the employment provided by manufacturing industry, which has been falling consistently for over 100 years, must be reversed and so begin to increase.

Those might both be laudable objectives, but they are unrealistic as assumptions upon which to base an economic policy. I appreciate that, faced with a choice between jobs and wealth, it is consistent that many Labour Members should believe that the correct role of industry is to provide jobs. That is a valid and logical choice, but I ask Labour Members to consider the consequences of opting for it.

It is self-evident that an industry whose task is to provide jobs must be overmanned and will not be competitive in world markets. If it is to exist, it must do so behind a barrier of trade protection, from which a number of consequences inevitably flow. The choice available to domestic consumers will be smaller and the prices enforced on them will be higher. If experience around the world is a guide, our currency would be higher in value, thus making exporting more difficult, apart from any retaliation that might be indulged in by our trading competitors. Our raw material imports would be more expensive.

Any policy that is based upon industry assuming the role of a provider of jobs must be accompanied by a lower standard of living for Britain, not least for those who have the misfortune to be unemployed. The standard of living would, I believe, be lower than the majority would be prepared to countenance.

My preference is for the alternative. I believe that industry should be regarded as a provider of wealth rather than of jobs. That brings problems as well, for we must decide how to distribute the wealth thus created. As a policy that is based upon the creation of wealth cannot be one which offers full employment, we are presented with the problem of how to distribute the burden of unemployment. If unemployment is bound structurally to exist, should it fall upon those who, by default, are currently unemployed, who are largely those entering the working population for the first time, or should we make adjustments to the age or retirement, for example, so that the burden of unemployment, under-unemployment or enforced leisure falls upon those who would find it rather less unwelcome?

It follows that, in principle, I do not like the multi-fibre arrangement. It is clearly a protectionist measure. It fails to distinguish between imports that are unfair and others that are merely unwelcome. However, I shall disappoint those of my colleagues who believe that I should say that the arrangement should be chucked into the Indian ocean. My argument is not based on constituency interests because I do not represent a textile constituency.

I am always suspicious of some of my colleagues whose principles are reinforced by naivety. If it is in our interests to give something away, we should not give it away if instead, through a process of bargaining and negotiation, something can be gained in the other direction. Concessions with the United States and newly industrialised countries could be gained if our ultimate objective were the liberalisation of the arrangement.

It must be acknowledged that some benefit would be provided to some countries if we were to open up our markets in a more liberal way. If we provide that benefit, it is surely only logical that we should have some say in determining the beneficiaries. If we were to throw the arrangement into the water, the principal beneficiaries would be Taiwan, Korea and other newly industrialised countries which are not among the most needy of the developing nations. Some discipline must be maintained to protect the role of the most poor and most needy.

I also support the limited maintenance of the arrangement, at least for the time being, because of the nature of the employment which textiles provide. Professor Silberston's report included the almost notorious assertion that consumers are paying £500 million more for their goods than they would pay if we did not have the arrangement and that 50,000 jobs would be lost if we did not have it, so that the consumers' subsidy per job is about £10,000.

First, I challenge the assumption that all of the £10,000, if that is a true figure, would instead be spent within the United Kingdom. It is arguable that half of that sum would be spent upon other imports into the United Kingdom that had been manufactured in other countries. Secondly, the nature of the employment that is provided by the textile industry is one that is peculiarly difficult to replace. It employs an above average number of women and members of ethnic minorities. Overwhelmingly, it employs those who are not based in the south-east. If we were to devise a job creation programme to fill the gap potentially to be left by the demise of the textile industry, I have no doubt that it would cost the taxpayer more than £5,000 or £10,000 per job.

Therefore, I support the line taken by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. I hope that the arrangement will not be a feature of British industrial life in the long term. However, until we can have some control over who gets the benefits, until we can be sure that we shall receive adequate concessions from our trading partners, and until we have some realistic policies to deal with the unemployment that would undoubtedly result in certain areas, I hope that the arrangement can be maintained for the time being.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): It gives me great pleasure to have the opportunity to take up some parts of the thoughtful speech of the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson), which went beneath some of the superficialities on which some Conservative Members have dwelt. I shall not be joining what amounts to a consensus in welcoming the Minister's announcement on the arrangement, because I shall adopt a rather different approach.

I am sure that the people of west Yorkshire will be intrigued when they learn that the Liberal party's spokesman on these matters has adopted a philosophy that will sell down the river the textile interests of west Yorkshire and other areas. The Liberal party has taken a signal decision and we shall ensure that those in west Yorkshire and elsewhere hear about it, including those who live in Lancashire.

Many Conservative Members are guilty of hypocrisy. There are known to be slavish admirers of the Prime Minister and the free market philosophy. However, when it comes to constituency interests, such as jobs in the areas which they represent, and, most important, to the fear, which interestingly enough was expressed after the results of last Thursday's elections were announced, that they might lose their seats, they depart from the free market philosophy and the belief that the Prime Minister is absolutely right on every occasion. Instead, they start calling for some support for the industries that provide jobs in their constituencies.

There is common ground between us in welcoming the Minister's statement on the arrangement. However, it seems that he has been waving his commitment to the arrangement rather like a figleaf that disguises the terrible damage that the Government have done to the textile and clothing industries over the past five or six years.

In my constituency, the jewel in the crown of the textile industry, we have seen mill after mill closed because of the Government's policies on interest rates and the exchange rate. Against that background, the arrangement has offered a little help. We have seen what the Government's policies have done to the textile industry. To pretend that the Government are concerned about the arrangement, the textile industry and the people who work in it will not go very far to convince Labour Members that the Government are sincere in their professed concern.

There would be a loss of jobs if we abandoned the MFA. Indeed, some 25,000 jobs would be lost in west

[Mr. Barry Sheerman]

Yorkshire. It is also fair to say that retaining the MFA might mean a loss to consumers. Yet the figures show that the cost of clothing has risen less rapidly than any other component of the retail prices index. The proponents of the MFA would play up its advantages, and its opponents the converse.

The MFA is part of a much wider picture, and if that is understood the role of the MFA becomes clearer. I want to sketch it in two parts—the key structural problems, and the framework of policies that could tackle them. Manufacturing industry and its part in international trade is not something that can be comprehended by the accounting techniques of the grocer's shop; nor by anyone whose intellectual boundaries do not extend beyond those techniques. First, the pressures and turbulences of international markets are quite capable of putting paid to a domestic industry in a short time, especially in labour-intensive sectors where low-wage economies have enormous potential price advantages. Secondly, international trade in that area is heavily dependent upon exchange rates, and the absence of a stable system since the collapse of the Bretton Woods agreement has accelerated the fluctuations and increased the turbulences in the trading environment. Thirdly, the domestic conditions of production may create special difficulties. All those factors have conspired to cripple the textile industry in this country.

The Government have delegated to international speculators the job of determining the sterling exchange rate, and the wild see-sawing of exchange rates has been responsible for many of the casualties among textile firms and workers in west Yorkshire and elsewhere. Domestically, the Government have capitulated their responsibilities for economic management to the monetarist mystics and their myopic measures of money supply. By deflating demand and jacking up real interest rates to historic heights, they have caught yet more firms in a dreadful pincer movement, which even the willingness of the textiles work force to take cuts in real wages has been unable to thwart.

On top of all that, there has been the relentless pressure of developing nations wanting to improve—and who can blame them?—their foothold in our markets. They have, quite naturally, built on a price advantage because of the low wages employers pay in those countries. That is where the MFA has played a part in regulating the pace at which market penetration has increased. It has been a modest part in defending the interest of the industry and those who work in it, but the strong consensus is that it has been useful. The underlying structural problem remains that wage differentials between the United Kingdom and the developing nations create a substantial price advantage in the labour-intensive areas of textile production for the developing nations.

This is the point at which to sketch in the framework of policies that are needed. They clearly differ a great deal from the policies of this Government, who tell us that the answers lie not with manufacturing but with the service industries. That is their rationale, if such it can be called, for their cool unconcern at the destruction of Britain's manufacturing capability, both in textiles and outside, and its grossly underused capacity.

The Government tell us that the future lies not with high wages but with workers pricing themselves back into jobs. That is the rationale for the attack on the wages councils—pitifully low though the wages are that they set. They also tell us that the future lies not with skills training for industry but with basic training more appropriate to the low-skill, low-tech, low-wage service industry of the future that they want to see. That is the reasoning behind the abolition of the industrial training boards—and the one covering the textile industry went three years ago—the closure of skillcentres and the crucifixion of our national training system on the cross of market forces.

If that be the framework of policies, the MFA has little or no place, the Government tell us; so an investment policy for the textile industry has no place, so the Government tell us; so an education and training policy geared to textile production has no place, so the Government tell us; and so the industry itself, in the long term, has no place.

However, as some of our captains of industry recently pointed out to the Government—I refer to Mr. Harvey-Jones and the chairman of GEC, Lord Weinstock—to seek salvation in the service economy is an inspiration based on an illusion. There can be no thriving service sector in the absence of a manufacturing sector to service and without the wealth that production and exports generate to purchase those services. Nor should anyone be surprised that Lord Weinstock and Harvey-Jones actually told the Government that they had to begin investing in our manufacturing rather than our service industry.

The truth is that the Government have destroyed the textile industry and are now waving the MFA at the British public to try to show that they care. I believe that people working in the textile industry generally and those manufacturing in that industry—both in management and on the shop floor — will not believe the Government. That is not to say that I do not welcome, in some measure, what has been said, but there is now a need for a further strategy to reinvest in the textile industry, in training, in the infrastructure, in modernisation and in high-tech and to get the textile industry booming again so that it creates more jobs.

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): I welcome what my right hon. Friend the Minister said and hope that he has more to tell us later. We all await his reply to the debate. He is well aware of my interest in this matter as I have made representations to him many times during the past 18 months on behalf of my constituents.

The attractions of free trade—an ability to trade in goods without the influence of authority, be it local, national or international—have to be considered as, in theory, they at least have merit in any free society. The replacement of the current MFA for textiles must be considered in the light of continuing experience and a basic consideration of whether it is really possible to conduct international trade in any commodity on a wholly free basis. I have to say that I cannot find a single internationally-traded commodity that is traded without the influence of some authority or Government.

In that context, virtually all agricultural commodities are traded under EC and world understandings, and in that I include such items as sugar and cocoa. There is no real free trade in metals and minerals—while prices may, on the face of it, monitor supply and demand, the markets are underpinned by international understandings that stabilise them. That stability of markets is what we essentially have now with the MFA for textiles, and it is something that we should maintain.

In this great competitive world, we are often tempted to throw open the markets for many of our products to the complete influence of supply and demand. That has serious dangers of cyclical production and little confidence to invest, and in the longer term it does not benefit the consumer. This year's cheap product is next year's dear item.

I have heard a great deal today about consumers. We are all consumers and must not forget that. As a housewife and mother with two boys, who have recently grown through their teens, I know a little about the purchase of children's clothes, and it is something that continues to interest me.

Consumer organisations have said that the MFA has raised United Kingdom market prices by restricting access of low-cost imports. They say that choice has also been restricted. I have never noticed any real shortage of the cheaper imported ranges of clothes, nor have I noticed any restriction of choice.

Undoubtedly, if the MFA was suddenly abandoned there would be a flood of cheap imports and prices would fall—but, I suspect, for a short time only. The market would find a level — its own level. Certain manufacturers would be put out of business, jobs would be lost and the overall availability would be in balance. Some retailers might see an opportunity to get slightly better margins and prices would move upwards again. In the longer term, the consumer would not benefit.

I suggest that, also in the longer term, the British market is looking for better quality products than some of those generally available from imports. All things being equal, the British housewife wants to buy British, but the value must be right. She is often willing to pay that little bit more to buy British and to have quality—not just in the cloth, but in the finish and the presentation, which are important. I would go as far as to say that the MFA has worked in the consumers' interest, because it has maintained quality in British goods and allowed only part of the market to imported goods.

On an international scale, we are looking for competitive trading within carefully structured constraining rules, such as those provided by GATT and the Lomé convention. For the international textile trade, the MFA umbrella provides the structure and constraint that I maintain are necessary.

At a national level, there is still room for individual initiative. It does not offend my sincerely held Conservative principles to demand controls on international trading, as I believe that there is still plenty of room for competition.

The Yorkshire textile and clothing industry desperately needs a renewal of the MFA, and I call on the Government to acknowledge that they support an MFA 4. We were told earlier that some of us have narrow constituency interests. That is why I am in the House; if I did not reflect that narrow constituency interest in debates such as this, I would have no right to be here.

The EC Commission, which has the job of carrying forward MFA 4, must be told firmly by the Government that the British textile industry needs an MFA 4 and that we should have one. Britain as a whole needs a new agreement and we should make it clear to the EC where its duty lies.

The current MFA may not be perfect—multilateral agreements rarely are—but the overriding factor is that it has achieved its objective:

"The aim of the MFA is to allow for orderly growth of world trade in clothing and textiles."

That overall objective is often lost in the complexity of the arguments.

The developing countries' share of world textile trade rose from 30 to 38 per cent. between 1973 and 1982. Their share of world clothing trade rose from 47 to 59 per cent. in the same years.

In contrast, the industrialised countries' share of textile trade fell from 59 to 49 per cent., and their share of clothing trade fell from 34 to 23 per cent. Between 1977 and 1983, EC demands for textiles and clothing increased by 2·5 per cent., with imports from MFA supply countries increasing by 16 per cent.

The MFA is clearly allowing for a growth in imports to the EC that is well in excess of demand. Experience has shown that, while the excess of imports is unhealthy, it has been tolerated by the industry—a fact which should not be overlooked. The industries in the United Kingdom—I have some in my constituency—are leaner and fitter than ever before, and many have invested in new technology and new techniques, which fit comfortably alongside traditional machinery in a traditional industry. Output per person has increased by 22 per cent. since 1980, a fact of which the industries should be proud.

With the current MFA production, order books are about in balance. The industry is stabilised, and it is stability for which we are looking. It appears, particularly in Yorkshire, that companies are able to grasp market opportunities, but they can and will do so only if they have confidence in the future. In addition to providing stability, we have to provide confidence. Stability and confidence are provided by the MFA umbrella and all its related agreements. Therefore, I call on the Government to renew the arrangements in the form of MFA 4. What is more, I call on them to do so now, to provide the continuing confidence that our industries need.

Throughout the world recession, developing countries have increased their share of world markets. We must have some thought for the poorest countries, and they have been guaranteed access to world markets which, in the absence of an MFA, they would have been denied by the larger, dominating supply countries. They must realise that the MFA brings order to international trade in clothing and textiles, and that must be preferable to the disorder that would ensue without an MFA 4.

I clearly support the retention of an MFA system and the introduction of an MFA 4. The Yorkshire textile industry, and others throughout the country, demand just that from the Government and from the EEC.

7.55 pm

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): I start by telling the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) that, whatever has happened in Yorkshire, textile mills in my constituency and other parts of the north-west were closing long before 1979.

This is the fifth Parliament in which I have served and there have been few, if any, textile debates during those 12½ years in which I have not taken part. I cannot think of a debate on any of the MFAs that have been negotiated over that period in which I have not taken part. I used to work in the textile industry and I have close relatives who still work in it. In the metropolitan borough of Rochdale, 35 per cent. of manufacturing workers are employed in the textile industry and there are 147 companies in the textile industry.

I say that merely to show that I have a deep interest in the subject, and I hope that it will not surprise the House if I take a different line from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). I try to deal with my hon. Friend kindly, so I say simply that it might have been better if my party had decided to leave the speech to someone who knew something about the textile industry.

I make the strongest possible plea for the MFA to be renegotiated and for a fourth such agreement to be reached. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and I are both officers of the all-party textiles committee and we, with the hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond), appealed for a third agreement. Perhaps it is not surprising that we are now appealing for a fourth.

The Minister told us about things that will happen tomorrow, but we were told 10 years ago that those things would happen tomorrow—there would be stability and everything would be all right. I have heard it all before. Until we see all the promises translated into reality, hon. Members who show some common sense in representing textile constituencies will remain detemined that the industries should be protected not from competition, but from unfair competition. That is what the MFA is all about.

The Minister's speech got better as it went on. At the beginning, I wondered what conclusion he would reach. In the end, the conclusion was all right. However, I was intrigued that he told us all about the existing situation in the textile industry, but did not say what it would have been if we had not had the MFA to protect the industry. He may say that a small percentage represented imports, and so on. But that percentage would have been much greater had there not been a multi-fibre arrangement to protect the industry from those imports.

In the metropolitan borough of Rochdale, which covers Heywood, Middleton and so on, 35 per cent. of the population are engaged in manufacturing work in textiles. In the same area we have an unemployment rate of 17 per cent., even after the local authority has taken off 2 per cent. by indulging in Manpower Services Commission schemes, job creation schemes, and so on. To subject my constituents to a higher level of unemployment as a consequence of allowing the textile trade again to be flooded by imports is unthinkable.

The Prime Minister has talked recently about a bridge in Turkey. I ask hon. Members to consider what happened when we experienced a flood of imports from Turkey. At present, one of the greatest threats to our textile industry is China. We have heard little about China today, but it is likely to be a major threat. If we do not protect our industry from such threats — threats which often are based on the experience of other countries—we shall be doing our constituents and our textile industry a gross disservice.

I must stress again a matter which has been mentioned already by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), because it is especially relevant to my constituency, as it is to constituencies such as Bradford which are also heavily engaged in textile manufacturing. A great many of our constituents are immigrants, and a large number of them work in the textile industry. If we did not act to protect jobs in the textile industry, we should be putting more and more immigrants on the dole — paid for, incidentally, by the taxpayer, whatever this clown Silberston says. In his view, 50,000 would be put on the dole, never mind the 100,000 that we see accruing from a failure to renegotiate the arrangement. I understand that it costs a minimum of £5,000 to keep a man on the dole, so how he arrives at his economic statistics I fail to understand.

But we have some experience of academics fiddling about with industry. They know nowt about it. They come into industry and start telling us how to run it. They have never got off their backsides and out of their universities, so they know nothing about it. If I were advising the Government about the Silberston report, I should tell them to put it in the wastepaper basket and forget it. It is written by a man who may be a brilliant academic, but I doubt whether he has much industrial experience.

I was saying that more and more immigrants will be put on the dole. That is an additional reason for protecting the textile industry. Whereas in the past we may have been able to cope with redundancy because other industries were more buoyant, that is not the position today. That is another reason for developing and maintaining the multi-fibre arrangement.

I do not believe that it is a protectionist arrangement. How can it be protectionist when it allows for a greater measure of imports than the growth of our industry? That must mean that our industry gets a smaller share of the home market or itself exports, so how can it be described as a protectionist measure?

What is more, it should not be forgotten that the MFA helps less developed countries by protecting them against a swamping of western markets by goods from industrialised countries such as Hong Kong, Korea and, in the future, China. At least they know that under the MFA they have a guaranteed level of imports on which they can rely. If they were openly competing with some of the more industrialised nations, their own trade in the developed nations might suffer as a consequence.

In my political life, which has not long to run now, I have always tried to be a realist. I like idealism. It is all right for those who have nowt better to do to indulge in it. For our textile industry and for British industry generally I do not believe that free trade is a realistic option. The trouble with free trade at present is that it is all one way: it is all one way coming in, but it is not one way going out.

We have heard tributes paid to Hong Kong, and I join them. It is one of the few nations which allow in a fair measure of imports. But that is not the general pattern. The trouble with free trade is that, although it may be a glorious ideal, it is not realistic, and it is time that some of my colleagues recognised that.

If MFA 4 is not negotiated, it is certain that thousands of people will be added to the dole queue in my constituency, and they will be added to the 3 million people who are already unemployed. That is why as both a realist and the hon. Member for Rochdale I reject free trade as an alternative and strongly urge that a fourth multi-fibre arrangement should be negotiated. When it is negotiated, I hope that the new arrangement will contain effective mechanisms to react quickly and positively to unfair practices.

The industry generally — and that includes both employers and the trade unions — want to see the arrangement renegotiated, and I for one welcome the Minister's statement and congratulate him. It does not matter how long it has taken him to make it. What matters is that he has made it and said that this Government are committed to negotiating a fourth MFA. I welcome that. I wish him well in the negotiations. He can rest assured that many of us will be watching him and judging him on the results that he achieves.

8.7 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I hope that all of us who start from a totally different position on free trade from that of the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) will not be accused of not trying to put forward the best interests of our textile industry and to maximise employment in the industry, both here and overseas. I hope that today's debate is about expanding the textile industry and protecting it from unfair competition, but making certain that it is subject to proper and fair competition.

I believe that that is common ground, even though some hon. Members look at the position differently. I do not agree with many of those who support the existing MFA or a tightening of it. However, there is one notable exception to what I say, and that is the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who clearly was reiterating normal Labour party propaganda and in no way relating his remarks to the debate. The rest of us are all concerned with the way in which we can expand opportunities in the textile industry.

It has been calculated that if our textile industry output stands still but it continues to increase productivity there will be some 60,000 job losses in areas of high textile concentration. Therefore, it seems to me that if we are to look at a static position in terms of the output of our textile industry, we have to make provision for diversifying the economies of the areas in which the textile industry is located. That will have to happen, anyway, if we are looking at the static position.

I hope that, through the policies which my right hon. Friend enunciated earlier, we shall see Britain's textile industry expand and that the fears which have been expressed will prove to be groundless. Therefore, the hon. Member for Rochdale and I have reached the same conclusion — that my right hon. Friend is right in supporting a renegotiation of the MFA, but that we should look for additional ways of inducing better marketing worldwide and domestically in Britain.

I pay tribute to some considerable achievements by many companies in the textile industry. Gents of Barnsley is able to manufacture clothing which it can sell over tariff barriers of every kind, artificial or otherwise, in Japan. A company in Leicester has been set up with the most modern machinery to produce hosiery. It is selling hosiery domestically and has expanded by over 250 per cent. in the past three years, but it is also selling hosiery in Asian countries, such as India, Hong Kong and Japan. Therefore, there is every reason to believe that if our domestic industry invests in the most modern machinery, and is flexible in its response to market demands, it can be the equal of any in the world. We do not need protection so much as expanded markets, and that is what I hope we shall get from the renegotiation.

Mention has been made of the developing countries. Their position is to some extent being used as a sop to our better feelings in relation to the developing world, and to justify a protectionist measure. There is no doubt that the MFA, in the way that it has developed, operates against the interests of the poorest of the less developed countries.

Most speakers in the debate have talked almost exclusively of four countries which are now tabulated as newly developed countries. They are Singapore and Hong Kong in our own Commonwealth, and Taiwan and South Korea. This is the conclusion in the derided report of Professor Silberston, which we should bear in mind when renegotiating the MFA if we wish to improve it. He concludes:

"The MFA does not have negative effects for all textile and clothing firms in developing countries. The long-established successful firms are protected from competition from new firms in their own countries, at least to some extent, through their continuing access to quotas."

That is very important. Therefore, it operates against competition even within those countries.

Professor Silberston continues:

"As has been noted, certain countries are protected from competition from other developing countries, since they historically have had large quotas, and attempts to curb the 'dominants' have had only limited success. It may be that countries such as Hong Kong would do as well as they do now in a completely free market, in spite of their high real wages, but the present system does not allow this to be tested. As it is, the poorest countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America, where low real wages favour clothing production, are prevented from exploiting" that advantage and exporting their product to other countries.

That is the considered opinion of the Silberston report and it accords with my experience in the developing world. That anomaly has to be put right when we renegotiate the MFA and its future.

Indeed, it should be remembered by all those who argue that the MFA now helps countries in the less developed world with low wages that the real wages in Hong Kong per head are now higher in many cases than they are in the United Kingdom. For example, it is not generally known that the driver of a double-decker bus in Hong Kong takes home more in real wages than his equivalent in London.

Hong Kong cannot be categorised as a low-wage economy needing the protection of a multi-fibre arrangement. Hong Kong is an example of what I hope we shall become — a highly efficient country which can compete in textiles with anybody in the world. A modernised and technically advanced industry can be successful and pay high wages, as industry in Hong Kong has managed to do. That should be our objective.

We have to eliminate the protectionist element of the MFA and introduce serious qualifications so that access can be given to the less developed countries. I hope that my right hon. Friend will do that when he helps to renegotiate the MFA. We must ensure that the quota system, if we are to have it in the same form as before, is fair and does not favour certain countries. I hope and believe that my right hon. Friend will pursue robustly a policy of opening the markets of the world to ensure that the developing world will in turn open its markets to us. I hope that my right hon. Friend will help to ensure that our textile exports can get into the United States of America.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What about Brazil?

Mr. Wells: And into Brazil. They do not now.

[Mr. Wells]

I hope that my right hon. Friend will ensure, as a condition of modifying the present MFA, that those markets will be open as well. In that way, by using the MFA in a bargaining sense to open up the markets of the world, the textile industry in the United Kingdom will be able to employ more people and create more wealth. It will be able to operate as a market for other countries wishing to export here, thus expanding the whole of the world economy and benefiting all our people.

8.16 pm

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Like many hon. Members before me, I welcome the debate, but I trust that the Government will act in accordance with the views of the House and of the industry. In the industry everyone — management and trade unions — is in favour of the renewal of the MFA. Across the political divide, there is an almost unanimous agreement—apart from one or two eccentrics on either side — that the MFA should be renewed. Although there will not be a vote on the motion tonight, I hope that the Government will receive loudly and clearly the instructions of the House, and there is no doubt as to what they should be.

Much has been said about job protection, and a great deal has been said about the Silberston report. I quote a passage from page 42 of the report, in relation to jobs:

"At the worst, employment might be unchanged."

That is a reference to technical changes and differences in the MFA. It continues:

"In other words, the fall in employment of 166,000 in textiles and clothing—as well as the subsequential unemployment in associated industries, such as man-made fibres — could be offset, or more than offset, by an increase in employment in other industries. What is more, earnings in these other industries would probably be higher than in the low-paid textiles and clothing industries, so that workers moving from one to the other might benefit from the point of view of earnings."

That shows how much Professor Silberston is in touch with the reality of the situation.

The need to renew the MFA is not related only to job protection. If we were dealing with a dying industry, we might argue that it was purely job protection, but in global terms the textile industry is a growth industry. There may be arguments and questions as to how and where the growth is to take place, but there is great worldwide potential for the textile and clothing industry.

Indeed, the report of the secretariat of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development points out that the value of world trade in textiles increased over the decade 1970-80 by an annual average of 16·1 per cent. Over that decade, the annual growth of clothing manufacture worldwide was 20·1 per cent. Although the figures may vary from time to time, if there is an upsurge in world trade, there is room for an upsurge in training, and even greater potential for the industry.

I welcome the Minister's commitment to a renewal of MFA 3 and a new MFA 4. However, he did not satisfactorily answer the crucial point, which is the period of renewal. The renewal of MFA 3 into MFA 4, simply phasing it out, is not good enough. We need an MFA 4 with a commitment to renegotiation, either in the middle of the period or at the end of it, over 10 years. The need for stability demands that we should know where we are going. The Minister said that some people within the EEC favoured a phasing out, but that he would not accept that as a precondition for discussions. That statement does not fill me with confidence. The Minister has left the back door ajar for phasing out MFA 4 if the opportunity arises. He has left himself an escape hatch. We do not want him to make use of it.

If the industry is to be competitive, we need modernisation and investment. There will be investment only if there is a long-term future extending over at least 10 years. We need investment, but we also need Government help. Change must be fostered. We must recognise that great changes are taking place in various parts of the world. I believe that the People's Republic of China is poised to invest massively in the most modern type of computer technology, by-passing the technology that many of our industries have adopted. We must be prepared to follow suit.

The omens are not good. A year ago, the Government put forward the CLOFT scheme, which involved a sum of £20 million over four years. The scheme was blocked in the EEC. I believe that the Minister of State was as astonished as anyone when the scheme was blocked. A fortnight before, he had written to me stating that he expected the scheme to be approved in the near future because, after discussion, adjustments had been made to the original scheme. I do not know what the adjustments were, but I believe that the Government did all that they could to have the scheme adopted, and yet it was blocked. Does the Minister intend to accept the situation, or does he intend to take a more active line and vigorously pursue a new investment package? We need to know his intention.

The Minister said that he will press for equity of treatment and ensure that other countries do not get away with behaviour contrary to the strict EEC rules. However, the door is being closed after the horse has bolted. Other countries have had investments and preferential treatment. They have had their grants and subsidies, while this country has not. Belgium, Italy and various other countries have enjoyed such treatment. They are listed in the much-maligned Silberston report.

We need to act positively, especially in terms of the so-called social clause. Trade unionists and Socialists are certainly not opposed to development in developing countries. We want development for people, and decent pay and conditions. We understand the importance of textiles to such countries. The UNCTAD report notes that textiles and clothing represent 33 per cent. of the manufactured exports of developing countries. However, in developing countries, textiles and clothing also probably represent the greatest area of exploitation. That is graphically shown in the TUC booklet entitled "A fair balance in textile and clothing trade". Table 7 on page 31 gives the hourly labour costs in some major producing nations in 1984. Seventeen countries are listed. In 14 of them, labour costs were below $2 an hour. The lowest rate is paid in Indonesia. I do not have the precise figure, because the graph does not give it, but the average labour costs in Indonesia were below 50 cents an hour. In the United Kingdom, the figure was about $5·25 an hour, in Italy over $6 an hour, and in the United States $8·50. Clearly, there is great exploitation in Indonesia.

There may be exploitation in terms of conditions as well as pay. On page 31 of the TUC booklet we read that:

"The widespread appearance of free trade zones in these countries over the last five to ten years, in which companies receive considerable tax concessions from host countries and in which workers are frequently denied employment rights laid down in ILO Conventions on Minimum Labour Standards, is a worrying phenomenon."

We take that matter very seriously. I hope that we shall see a change in the sneering attitude of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and of some Conservative Members who have cast doubts on our credibility and our concern for those who live and work in the Third world. Among other things, the Minister must take seriously the strengthening of the social clause.

There is a need for proper labelling. Under the system known as outward processing, without proper labelling, one does not know what one is buying, where it comes from or what quality it is. Labelling applies to goods from inside the EEC as well as outside. I am very concerned about the decision taken by the European Court on 25 April which made it clear that article 2 of the Trade Descriptions (Origin Marking) (Miscellaneous Goods) Order SI 1981 No. 121 is in contravention of article 30 of the EEC treaty. That decision means that our domestic legislation on labelling, especially with regard to countries of origin, is out of court and cannot be applied.

I believe that the Minister said in his speech that the Government were considering the implications of that judgment. I am no expert in EEC matters, but I understand that there is no appeal against the decision. We are stuck with it. However, the Minister should try to get round it. Fair competition demands fair and accurate labelling.

I certainly do not constantly espouse the cause of the employers. I have spent too much time arguing with them about employment practices. However, I take the employers seriously when they tell me that they want proper and fair competition and believe that they can live with it. That, too, must be part of the new MFA.

I come from the north of Scotland, where there are many companies at the top end of the clothing market, such as Crombie's of Grandholm. They are world-famous companies. They argue for reciprocity or equivalence of tariffs. In South Korea, Brazil and Australia, the tariffs are astronomical. In some cases, imported wools and textiles are subject to tariffs of 205 per cent. Such matters must be resolved in detail. However, what is most important is that the MFA should be renewed and that the Government should state specifically that there is not to be a transitional or phasing-out agreement. I understand why Ministers say that we cannot declare our hand now but must wait for negotiations. However, unless the Minister states specifically the principles on which he will not budge, he will be railroaded into a transitional arrangement and, in the end, that will mean a phasing out.

We want an agreement that lasts at least 10 years. We are prepared to accept a break clause to see how things adjust. We want stability. Phasing out must not be allowed. Far too many people in Britain and in Third world countries depend on textiles for jobs. The issue should be examined properly and the Minister for Overseas Development should be brought in with a view to creating a combined aid package concerning imports, jobs and investment. In those circumstances, we should all be satisfied. I dare say, however, that none of us will be entirely satisfied with the final package. I understand the reality of negotiations, but the House is clearly instructing the Government that it wants an MFA 4 and no phasing out in any form, no matter how others might try to smuggle it in through the back door.

8.30 pm

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I welcome my right hon. Friend the Minister's assertion that the MFA will be renegotiated. Any liberalisation should have no significant effect on controls in the present arrangement.

It has been suggested that we can compete in any circumstances and that others should be given a fair crack of the whip. As the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) said, the costs in some countries are so low that there is no way in which we can genuinely compete with them. It is therefore essential to protect our industry. I welcome what my right hon. Friend said about recognising the special circumstances of poorer suppliers. It is generally agreed that the MFA has helped the textile outputs of those countries.

There have been some important developments in textile companies during the past five years. They have slimmed down and we can admire their updating of equipment, methods and design. All that will be wasted if the MFA is threatened as they need its special support to go through confidently with the required investment.

Our principal fear about imports from countries such as Taiwan is that they are at the bottom of the market. My right hon. Friend referred to our producing higher quality goods. That is good, but we must be careful not to be pushed into having a high quality industry with no base in the cheaper end of the market. Some of our other industries have collapsed because they were forced into ever more specialised markets. The great example of that was the motor cycle industry. To avoid repeating that we need the protection of the MFA.

There have been considerable improvements in the industry in my constituency, but the result has not been many more jobs. If our textile and clothing industry suffers, so, too, will others such as the textile machinery industry. We used to have a highly successful textile machinery industry, but the smaller our textile industry gets, the less the engineering industry can develop. We need the home market for development of high technology. Our share of the textile machinery market has reduced considerably recently, to the detriment of areas such as Leicester.

It is good that some companies are investing overseas. Some of our agreements with Third world countries will lead to our investing there, thus enabling them to enhance their use of the MFA. The MFA has led to co-operation between Third world countries and the EC. Such development can continue. The new agreement should not be short term. It will be a major factor in the protection of our textile industry. Although liberalisation is desirable, it cannot be achieved quickly in the real world. We heard from the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) what fairyland is like. Although we must react to a nominally free market, free is a relative term which depends on products, customers and other countries. We do not often work in a genuinely free market and this moderate restriction helps us and the poorest countries of the world.

8.36 pm

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Coventry might not be a place that immediately springs to mind in a discussion on textiles, but the city has been involved with textiles for hundreds of years and, until recently, they provided thousands of jobs for Coventrians and minorities from Asia and European countries in the aftermath of the second world war. Many people from the Ukraine, Poland and Latvia still work in the textile industry.

It is regrettable that many of those jobs have disappeared. We are now down to a plateau of about 2,000 employees, mainly in one company. There are severe doubts that, if a fourth MFA is not negotiated, we could slip off the plateau and the industry could suffer further job losses, if not extinction.

A new MFA would provide a framework for avoiding large and sudden influxes of imports, many of which are in some way subsidised. The manufacturers of such goods enjoy protection for their home market. That is not often recognised by the advocates of complete free trade. Recent events have shown that the market in textiles is still weak and that home demand is not adequate to cope with the already agreed growth in imports. Some countries such as the United States of America are likely to continue to restrict imports, so there is an even greater likelihood of dumping in Europe if there is no effective organisation to control it.

In Coventry, we have been painfully picking up the pieces in an attempt to return to a viable state, albeit at a greatly reduced level. However, serious uncontrolled inroads into the textile market by producers from outside Europe would be a significant setback to the process of regaining even a few of the jobs that have been lost. I remind hon. Members that unemployment in the area is 34 per cent., not 16 or 18 per cent.

The case for MFA 4 is not entirely based on self-interest. Without it, poorer developing countries would lose the guaranteed access to the EEC market that the MFA provides. Disorder would develop in world textile and clothing trades and spread to other sectors of trade. In that connection, it should be noted that, despite a fall in market demand for textiles and clothing in the United Kingdom, imports between 1978 and 1984 from MFA countries rose by 15 per cent. Although United Kingdom industry has benefited from income growth being lower than it would have been without the MFA, developing countries have increased their market share and export earnings.

Labour Members continually stress the need for increased investment in industry to reduce unemployment. To generate the necessary confidence for investments to be made, there must be reasonable prospects. Without the stability provided by an MFA there would be no restraints on low-cost imports, the confidence to invest would disappear, and with it, the prospect of more jobs.

The textile and clothing industries are gradually picking up the pieces, but they are still vulnerable, and the abandonment of the MFA would expose them to an unrestrained flood of disruptive imports from low-cost countries, and cause a return to beggar my neighbour policies.

I am glad that the Minister in his opening speech said that he was in favour in principle of continuing the MFA. However, several of my colleagues and I believe that the Government should work for a renewed and strengthened MFA along the lines set out in the TUC booklet. That would safeguard the livelihood of those still in the industry, and provide hope for the unemployed through a continuation of orderly adjustment in the industry.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): As I was a manufacturer of clothing in the West Riding of Yorkshire for 20 years, I feel at home in this debate. However, the House will be glad to hear that that does not mean that I shall make a long speech. Because of other duties in the House, I had to miss a large part of the debate. It would therefore be inappropriate and unwelcome if I spoke at length.

I shall concentrate on one matter. My hon. Friends will not be surprised to hear that that matter is Hong Kong. I wish to discuss the possible effects of the multi-fibre arrangement on Hong Kong and on our relations with Hong Kong. I do not pretend that a fall or rise of 1 or 2 per cent. in the quota will kill the Hong Kong textile industry. In the past it has shown an amazing adaptability to whatever conditions it faces. My point is that our negotiations could affect our relations with Hong Kong.

At present our relations are good because we have succeeded in negotiating the agreement with China on behalf of the people of Hong Kong. It was not the best agreement for which one could possibly hope, but it was clearly the best that we could manage. The people of Hong Kong could undoubtedly see that we tried hard on their behalf. The Prime Minister took part in the negotiations and we provided a magnificent negotiating team. As a result, there is a general international confidence in Hong Kong.

The agreement is unique in that it is for 13 years. We must, therefore, hold the confidence of that territory for a long time. One can argue that that should not be difficult, that we have a genuine interest in Hong Kong and that we wish to do our duty. However, people in their position are bound to look for signs that we are not as interested as we were or might be.

From time to time we blunder into terrible and needless lapses in our relations, as we did with students' grants. For no benefit to ourselves, we offended Hong Kong terribly and, indeed, did ourselves great damage. I do not want that to happen again.

The manufacturers of Hong Kong are far too sophisticated and realistic to think that we will abolish the MFA, and they would not have been surprised to hear the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister today. However, they would be offended if their quota were reduced further. They expect it to stay where it is. In the early days of the first MFA in 1973 everyone believed that it would increase the opportunities for underdeveloped countries and protect employment in our industry, but the figures do not show that. The developing countries are little better off, but Europe has benefited most. The gap in our consumption has been filled by Europe. To cut Hong Kong's quota further now would have no foreseeable effect and would be offensive to the people of Hong Kong. I hope that we shall be seen to negotiate an arrangement which does not make their position any worse than it is.

Oddly enough, our clothing manufacturers buy a great deal of cloth from Europe when they could buy it from the United Kingdom. That spoils our balance of payments with Europe.

A more severe quota than previous quotas would be offensive. It would be of no practical benefit to our country and it would offend Hong Kong. Indeed, it could do practical damage to our trade. These days we do not believe that sentiment goes far, but from my knowledge of Hong Kong I am certain that we would never have got big contracts such as Castle Peak power station had it not been for our close ties with the territory. With the enormous opportunities in China at hand, we must be careful to deal with these matters with delicacy and good sense.

8.48 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The vast majority of hon. Members present welcome the Government's intention to renegotiate the agreement. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) presented a minority view. I hope that the Minister will take note of the strong views and ensure that the qualifications and reservations that the hon. Gentleman expressed are not overstressed and that we reach a good long-term arrangement. The majority of hon. Members believe that that is what we should seek, and if a vote were held at the end of the debate that would be the clear result.

It is also interesting to note that that is the view of hon. Members on both sides of the House. I represent an important cotton manufacturing town in Lancashire. At the turn of the century it had more cotton looms which wove straight white cotton than there were in any other town in the world. Ever since the end of the first world war the industry has been in decline. There was a recession in the cotton industry between the wars, when about 30,000 people left the town to seek work elsewhere. That is one reason why I was born a southerner instead of being born in Burnley. However, during the war, when the textile industry was asked to produce the cotton and textiles that the country needed, it went back into production and produced the goods.

It must be remembered that in the immediate post-war years, when many people foresaw a return to the depression between the wars and wished to move to other industries, the Government of the day pleaded with the people of Lancashire and other regions to stay in the industry and continue to produce cotton. They have earned the right to demand that the MFA should be renewed and that we should have a mark 4 agreement.

As many hon. Members have said, the campaign for the renewal of the MFA has been made by both sides of the industry. I have received letters from the textile workers section of the Transport and General Workers Union in my constituency, the Dyers and Bleachers Union, the Textile Manufacturers Association of North-East Lancashire, Elgin Manufacturing and Grenfell Garments. I take time to name them because, if those letters did not have headings and signatures at the bottom, it would have been difficult to know who was making the case for the renewal of the MFA.

Many hon. Members have stressed the importance of the industry to our economy. Despite its decline, it is still a major industry and a major employer. I am aware of the work undertaken by institutions, such as the Shirley institute in Manchester, in trying to ensure that the industry is at the forefront and can meet the challenge of the 1980s and beyond.

I have no doubt that if the MFA is not renewed, jobs will be lost and there will be more closures. That will hit the most vulnerable areas, including the north-west, Yorkshire, Scotland, Northern Ireland and the inner cities. It will affect especially women workers and the ethnic minorities. The unemployment statistics are interesting. In Accrington and Rossendale, unemployment is 14·3 per cent.; in Blackburn, it is 15 per cent.; in Bradford, it is 15·1 per cent.; in Oldham, it is 13·8 per cent.; in Pendle, it is 14·6 per cent.; and in Rochdale, it is 17·1 per cent. Those figures speak for themselves, and I have no doubt that unemployment would become worse if the agreement were not renewed.

That does not mean that we are uninterested in the future of the developing nations. I am interested in their future, and wish them to develop and improve the standard of living of those who live there. It will not be to their advantage if the agreement is not renewed. The more industrialised nations, such as South Korea, will benefit, not the emerging nations, which we should be trying to help. The renewal of the agreement will ensure that they get the best deal possible and the best protection possible.

The bilateral trade agreements made under the MFA between the EC and its low-cost suppliers provide guaranteed access to the EC, with yearly increases. It is important to remember that there are yearly increases and that growth is not limited to increased demand. Between 1977 and 1983, market demand in the EC increased by only 2·5 per cent., while at the same time the supplying nations covered by MFA bilateral agreements increased their share of the market by 16 per cent. It is obvious that the MFA benefited them, and that advantage must be provided for in any new agreement.

There has been a massive improvement in productivity in the United Kingdom industry in recent years, which is another reason why it should be assisted to move foward and ensure that jobs and companies are protected. I do not accept the argument that we should not protect some of our industries. The role that the textile industry has played for many years and the fact that it has such a good record of industrial relations have earned it the right to demand the renewal of the agreement.

8.55 pm

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): When the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) began his speech, I was looking forward to full and informed comment on the welcome announcement by the Minister this afternoon that Britain would apply, with the European Community, to renew the MFA. Unfortunately, we heard the usual Socialist diatribe that is wheeled out so often in the House, and his speech had little to do with textiles.

I represent Dewsbury, and I am by nature a free trader. My inclination was to make a speech similar to that made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), but, unfortunately, in Dewsbury we must live in the real world, and the real world is beset by protectionism in many forms. It comes in the form of tariffs, quotas, outright blockades, anti-dumping measures and regional assistance in all countries, including the United Kingdom. It also comes in the form of the multi-fibre arrangement.

I received a rather sad letter from people who describe themselves as,

"All that remain of a work force of over 1,500", at Wormalds and Walkers Limited, Dewsbury Mills, Thornhill road, Dewsbury. All that remains of that work force are 30 names and addresses attached to a letter urging the Government to proceed with new negotiations, which I am pleased to hear they will do. That is an illustration of what happens in the real world. Wormalds and Walkers were manufacturers of heavy woollen cloth and blankets. The MFA certainly did not help that company.

[Mr. John Whitfield]

Since other hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, I shall restrict my remarks to what I believe the shape of MFA 4 should be. We have heard what the guiding principles behind it should be.

Many people have said that the new MFA must recognise the need for competition in the textile and clothing trades so that bilateral agreements concluded with low-cost supply countries incorporate a social clause that deals with working hours and conditions, freedom of association for workers and protection of women and children. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) referred to this. However, the MFA should not contemplate taking that on board.

The issue of low cost and low wage countries is fraught with difficulty, but such countries should not be penalised for what they are. What may be unacceptable working conditions to us should not be held against low-cost countries as a reason to prevent them from trading with us. Subsidisation takes place in all countries, including ours, and if low-cost countries indulge in it, that should not disqualify them from taking part in world trade.

An important principle is reciprocity, which has been referred to several times today. This is essential, and I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to push that for all that it is worth. There is no doubt that there are serious omissions. Japan is the obvious case in point. Another firm in my constituency, Hinchcliffe and Sons, of Denby Dale is a successful company—by contrast to the previous example that I gave—of fine woollen spinners. Among other things, it spins cashmere yarns, for which the raw material is £82 a kilo. However, its competitors in the Scottish borders are able to purchase the raw materials for the same yarn at £70 a kilo from Japan. That is a typical example of the difficulties of protectionism, for what is protectionism for one is a cheap supplier for another.

Japan denies us access to its markets. Therefore, reciprocity is important. I urge my hon. Friend to change the rules for such countries to ensure that they open the doors so that we can have the same facilities in their markets as they have in ours.

It is also said that there is a need for other developed countries to share the responsibility of accepting imports from low cost countries, and the United States in particular is the offender here because it has adopted an extremely restrictive attitude to textile and clothing imports, while Community tariffs are among the lowest in the world. The relevant percentages for wool fabric are in the EEC 30 per cent. and in the United States 45 per cent. Several hon. Members have said that everybody has to jump when the United States takes a decision. That is an unpleasant economic fact of life, and in these negotiations we should try to change it.

An important point is that in negotiating MFA 4 it is essential, as others have said, that we negotiate arrangements in such a way as to maintain confidence in the textile and clothing industries, to sustain a high level of investment. Such investment is essential to increase the use of new technology and improve productivity so that these industries can compete with newly developed countries on an equitable basis. As part of this process, the European Commission must ensure fair treatment for textiles and clothing firms throughout the Community. We have heard about the unfair arrangements that have existed in the past as between ourselves and Belgium, Italy and France.

I welcome the statement made by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. It is the start of a long road, with some long and difficult negotiations. We are all against protectionism in principle, but in practice we have to accept it in one form or another. We must roll up our sleeves and compete in the market place. It is no longer good enough for Britain to play cricket and to play the straight bat while letting everybody else get away with murder, which is what has happened in the past.

I have another example from my constituency. S. Lyles is a firm of yarn spinners in Dewsbury. It complains about competition, not from abroad but from Scotland because of the regional assistance in Kilmarnock. The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) has spoken today. The firm in my constituency is competing with a yarn supplier called William Dawsons and Sons Ltd., a well-known firm that has set up a factory in Scotland and is manufacturing yarns unfairly because it is competing with an unsupported manufacturer in Dewsbury. These are the kinds of problem which have to be wrestled with both domestically and world wide. I wish the Minister every success.

9.5 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): If the House is honest with itself, and to a considerable extent I think that it has been so during the debate, it is faced with a dilemma over the multi-fibre arrangement, a dilemma which in some cases poses the conflicting interests between the less developed regions of this country and the less developed countries of the world economy. But the issue is not that simple. The panacea offered by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) of a golden dawn, as though he has the answer whereas other hon. Members have not, is misleading and mischievous. The multi-fibre arrangement is not a perfect instrument. In fact, it is rather blunt. It may not even be an instrument which can be perfected for the regulation of the textile and clothing trade. It is a means of coping with particular circumstances in the industry, and it should be varied over time in accordance with changes in trading conditions and other policy priorities.

Several hon. Members have referred to the fact that the increase in imports to this country has been especially from European countries rather than from the less-developed countries. It is also important, as several Opposition Members have stressed, that the overwhelming share of the imports from so-called less-developed countries come from the newly industrialising countries and that up to four-fifths of those imports are from the newly industrialising countries. It is understandable that many hon. Members feel that we do not owe some of those countries a permanent living, not least in view of the fact that in terms of gross domestic product per head the real earnings of a bus driver in Hong Kong are higher than the real earnings of a bus driver in London. This point was made by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) who was foremost among Conservative Members in arguing the case for the less-developed countries. Gross national product per head in Hong Kong and Singapore is higher than the GNP per head in Portugal and is more or less the equivalent of that in Greece. Therefore, we are not referring to the least and lesser developed countries. We are referring to intermediate, modernising countries which do not enjoy the liberal political or trade union conditions which are enjoyed in Greece, after the colonels, and in Portugal after half a century of dictatorship.

Mr. Richard Wainwright: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Holland: No, it is very late in the debate, and although I should be perfectly willing to give way, may I point out, with respect, that the hon. Gentleman has only just come into the House.

The problem over the case for liberalisation, as argued by the hon. Member for Yeovil, is that it can in no way guarantee a shift of imports towards the lesser and least developed countries. We simply could not guarantee a shift towards the lesser and least developed countries by liberalisation. It is not only a question of a new international division of labour. Reference has already been made to the very low labour costs in some of the countries concerned, which are one-fifth, or less, of those in Europe. But we also have a multinational division of labour in which many enterprises are using production platforms in some of the least developed countries of the world and combining them with modern methods of production. Therefore, competition is not on wage costs alone.

That is a special problem in the case of Bangladesh. It is right that we should be concerned about Bangladesh, which is one of the half dozen poorest countries in the world, but now is having a certain amount of success in some categories of textile imports to this country. I do not believe that Bangladesh can be included in the same category as Hong Kong. They are poles apart. Also, a problem may be posed for the authorities in Bangladesh as to the terms and conditions upon which multinational companies are allowed to operate in Bangladesh.

There is therefore a case for a development dialogue with the lesser and least-developed countries, with a view to achieving trade agreements with them which safeguard their interests to a greater extent than would a simple automatic renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement, granted especially that the MFA is an unbrella agreement which allows for a series of bilateral agreements and deals within it.

The harmony of interest case through liberalisation is a fantasy. Free trade is not automatically fair trade. Nor do equal conditions for competition mean competition between equals. Unqualified liberalisation would mean that the weaker, less developed countries helped the stronger as production platforms, while stronger, newly industrialising countries help themselves to final markets in the developed countries. That is why we need not only a renewal but also a reform of the MFA to help the lesser and the least developed countries.

9.10 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): I join in the cautious welcome for today's statement by my right hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that we can press him to firm up over the coming weeks and months. I also declare an interest—32 years of interest in the industry in my constituency and area of Nottingham.

As never before we must speak for employment and jobs in the United Kingdom in general. We must speak up for employment in the broad sweep of our own textile industry. I do not mind being parochial. I would be more than happy to speak for employment in the east midlands, which is so heavily dependent on textiles.

I know that the original perception was that the MFA should not be a permanent mechanism. Like so many ideals we have to say that perhaps it seemed a good idea at the time but much has changed and we must address ourselves to this matter against a level of unemployment that did not exist at that time. It would be madness not to recognise that. Our people would not forgive us if we did not. They would be justified in not forgiving, and we must take the matter on board.

There is a common misconception of the industry—a misconception light years away from truth and reality. The industry is not a single one but is many; it is spinning, weaving, knitting, dyeing and finishing, printing, narrow fabrics, lace — all industries in their own right, long before the public perception of the industry, garment manufacture, even begins.

There are legions of secondary industries that do not readily spring to mind as being connected with textiles, but they exist and they depend on it. They may be inter-related. Without a garment trade there would be no need for the fabric trade, unless some well-meaning theorist —the House has many on both sides—imagines that the whole structure could somehow sustain itself and survive solely on exports. If people believe that, they will believe anything.

I am well aware that it sometimes suits a garment manufacturer to buy fabric from abroad in order to meet the demands of an ever-changing market. By so doing he is at least retaining the main labour-intensive part of the cycle. It is because I believe in flexibility of choice within the cycle of the manufacturing process retained in the United Kingdom that I feel so strongly about the retention of the MFA.

In emphasising the manufacturing side of the equation, it would be wrong to ignore the role to be played, for good or ill, by the retail trade. The retailer cannot be blamed for seeking to buy in the best market. If that advantage is passed on to the customer, I acknowledge the benefits, certainly in the lower prices. But what is the long term cost in employment or in ultimate price?

The recognition of responsibility to British-made goods and what that means for jobs and spending power cannot be greater exemplified than by our largest retailer, Marks and Spencer, without which it is no exaggeration to say there would be no textile industry in Britain. But for it and other retailers who operate policies of varying degrees of loyalty to their suppliers there is a mutual need to preserve a manufacturing base. It is no rare thing to budget for shared purchasing between imported and home-based products for the protection of lines of supply, or just to have a home-based supplier to turn if, as they say, the sun shines, and economics be damned, the cash registers will tinkle away like mad.

On the manufacturing side of this industry the giant names in the trade are well known. In coming to the House I gave up an executive role within our own parent group, Readson of Manchester. That group, with units all over the United Kingdom, employed approximately 3,500 people in 1979. It now employs just over 3,000 people. Thus there has been a drop of 14 per cent. as compared with the industry average of 26 per cent.

Notwithstanding the climate, the group proudly claims a turnover of £85 million, and last year put £1·75 million into new equipment. I say to the Minister that that investment must not be put at risk. Investment in computer design and fabric utilisation—which sadly had to be imported—amounted to a mere £100,000 and went to assist a group of three units employing 450 people. A simple matter such as the installation of mechanical cutting equipment for a team of 150 people meant an investment of £65,000.

I have given those two simple examples not merely to bang the drum for my own group but to try to illustrate that we have not sat on our bottoms, cried our eyes out or demanded handouts or massive protection from the Government. We have responded to the stiff breeze that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has rightly caused to blow through British industry. We say to my right hon. Friend the Minister today, on our own behalf and on behalf of the rest of our industry, that we have done our bit. We are still doing our bit, and the Government must now play their part in the renegotiation of a good MFA agreement. This vital industry has been slimmed down to such a point that we cannot allow it to be slimmed down further. In a climate of full and flexible employment there might—I say "might"—be a case for less protection. In the present climate, our greatest duty is to our own. We must have this agreement and we must reserve to ourselves the right to do what is in the best interests of our people in the circumstances, and as the future unfolds.

9.16 pm

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I begin by giving credit to both workers and management in an industry that has experienced major upheavals in recent years, and that has as a result surfaced leaner, more highly productive and much more competitive.

I intend to concentrate briefly on the fallacy that the MFA has raised prices on the United Kingdom market by restricting access to low-cost imports with the result that retail clothing costs are higher—some wrongly claim by as much as 20 per cent.—than they would be if the MFA no longer existed. It is also claimed by some that the MFA has restricted choice in the United Kingdom market.

But it is essential to consider the situation from the consumer's point of view in any reasonable discussion of the future of the MFA. Contrary to the false claims of those who suggest that the United Kingdom textile market is over-protected, the evidence shows that textile and clothing prices in the United Kingdom have been subjected to an effective restraint through a combination of competitive pressure and the effects of the general recession.

Between January 1974 and December 1984 the retail prices of all goods rose, on average, by 267 per cent. For clothing, textiles and footwear, the corresponding increase was only 118 per cent. In no other group of products or services have prices risen less quickly than in textile and clothing. Such reductions in real prices have been brought about despite the rising charges for raw material and fuel that have been experienced by industry as a whole.

There have been staggering job losses in the industry with wholesale factory closures dealing further blows to the north and north-west regions of the country, which between them account for 39 per cent. of all textile employment, with the east midlands, partly represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo), accounting for a further 20 per cent. But the north and north-west desperately need renewal of this orderly marketing agreement if they are not to be left reeling under a still greater burden of unemployment and economic hardship.

But the industrial recession has not just cost jobs in the textile industry; the suppression of price increases has had a similar effect on the earnings of those employed in that sector of our economy. Such workers must look with envy at the massive pay rises, superlative redundancy payments and cast-iron guarantees of life-long employment that have recently been given to workers in the nationalised sector. I refer, of course, to the coal industry. The earnings of those employed in the textile industry have fallen in real terms, and in relation to the earnings of groups of other workers. Clearly the MFA has not led to inflationary wage settlements. The opposite is the case.

In the context of falling prices, reductions in real wage levels, increases in per capita productivity and better marketing techniques, we must ask whether the removal of the MFA would reduce prices much further. It is difficult to believe the accusation that the consumer's choice of textile products is restricted in the United Kingdom. No evidence of market scarcity in any United Kingdom product category has been produced. Indeed, the British market is renowned for its wide range of choice and the flexibility with which it adapts to changing fashions and demands.

In addition, it is claimed that families are disadvantaged by the MFA because they spend a higher percentage of their income on clothing and because supply countries prefer to fill their quotas with adults' clothes rather than children's clothes, for which they receive less revenue. Figures produced by the Department of Employment in the family expenditure survey suggest that low-income families spend less on clothing than other households and tend to spend less of their income on MFA products than better-off families.

It is said that adult clothing is exported in preference to children's wear. The evidence is not compelling. Prices for children's clothing have risen slightly faster than the prices for all clothing and footwear, although they have risen much slower than prices overall. It is unfair to suggest that the increases are a result of the MFA.

The MFA has not limited choice for the consumer. It has not restricted quality or the volume of supply. It has not artificially raised prices, and it has not adversely affected poor income groups.

For the British consumer, for the British textile and clothing industries and for our economy, renewal of the MFA is essential. I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and his commitment to the renewal of the MFA. I urge him to nail his colours firmly to the mast in the forthcoming renegotiations.

9.22 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) said, the number of hon. Members who have taken part in the debate and the depth of concern which has been demonstrated illustrates strikingly hon. Members' recognition of the industry's importance.

A number of pertinent statistics have been repeated several times. I make no apology for referring to them again. The industry employs 500,000 people. Employees often live in regions which are disadvantaged and belong to social groups which have problems finding employment. The industry provides 9 per cent. of all employment in manufacturing. The industry's foreign exchange earnings were £2·7 billion last year—almost as large as the highly regarded earnings by the financial sector. As my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) said, the industry's sales of £10·891 billion last year are worth more than a third of the earnings of the aerospace industry and its value added is more than that of the motor vehicle industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and others said that the textile industry has suffered substantially in recent years with the rest of manufacturing industry. It has suffered from a range of Government inspired factors such as low demand, high interest rates and, most damaging, an over-valued exchange rate. As a consequence the balance of trade in textiles has deteriorated sharply. The deficit last year of £2·2 billion was 35 per cent. worse than in the previous year. Output has fallen, employment has halved in 10 years, and import penetration has increased substantially and was up 8 per cent. in 1984 over the previous year. There are those who say—this has been suggested in muted tones during the debate—that the past has been sold and that there is no future for Britain as a manufacturing nation in general and in textiles in particular. The Opposition firmly reject that view, and I am glad that we have the support of so many Conservative Members. We believe that textiles are an important part of our manufacturing base. We shall depend on that base and the textile industry for our national wealth once North sea oil is depleted.

We do not believe that textiles are a sunset industry. Indeed, the industry has done a great deal to improve its own productivity and has invested substantial sums to that end. The industry has remarkably good labour relations and it can hardly be said to overpay its work force. As the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) said, the real wage of the male worker in the textile industry has fallen by 4·7 per cent. since 1979. That provides an excellent test of the current theory that if we were only to reduce real wages employment would miraculously appear. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) said——

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East) rose——

Mr. Gould: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, as my time is limited. My hon. Friend observed that the textile industry and textile workers especially have tested the theory to destruction.

The textile industry has not languished behind a protective barrier growing rich and lazy. We need now the clearest possible commitment to the industry's future. As well as the Minister's welcome statement this afternoon, we need resolute action. We need a Government who will fight as hard for the interests of our textile industry as every other Government will fight for the interests of their textile industries. This is no time for unilateral trade disarmament, on which we sometimes hear worrying observations. This is no time for a free trade theology. That must not be allowed to override hard, practical considerations. We need the most robust attitude from the Minister. We need an industry that is protected and consequently strengthened, and nothing else will do.

The argument about the MFA is sometimes presented as a clear choice between the arrangement or something approaching free trade. Many of those who have contributed to the debate have said that that is a fallacy. That is not the choice. If we were to withdraw from the arrangement, or if it were to disappear altogether, we would not arrive miraculously at free trade conditions. The United States would remain strongly protectionist and the state trading nations would not play the free trade game. What I describe as the predatory trading nations would press home what is in some instances an unfair market advantage. If we were to weaken the MFA or bring it to an end, the result would be the very antithesis of free trade. If that were to happen, we should enter a jungle. The issue is not confined to the arrangement or free trade.

We have a choice of chaos or regulation, and the Opposition will opt for regulation—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about article 19 of the GATT?"] My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) dealt with that issue extremely effectively earlier in the day. That remains a major threat to the very trade that presumably Conservative Members are interested in maintaining.

Even if free trade were an option, it is doubtful whether some of those who advance the free trade argument would take it up. It is argued that, if only we were to get rid of the protective barrier, British industry would become more efficient and would match competition more easily. It can be said with some confidence that that view is to be rejected. It has been tested because we have some experience of an industry which has been opened up to competition. We know the consequences of that in the textiles industry because it has been opened up to that competition. We have no protection against the textiles industries of the EEC. The consequence has been that EEC imports have risen by 70 per cent. in the last few years. As has happened in many other industries, that has meant substantial losses of production, output and employment.

The record shows that, faced with such powerful competition in the real world rather than in the comfortable theoretical world, British industry does not become more efficient. That is an awkward fact, but it is true. Instead, large chunks of it simply go out of business because they cannot match the competition. That is what would happen if the MFA were abandoned or weakened, and we do not want that to happen to an even greater extent than it has already happened.

This is hardly a matter of controversy, because so much is frankly admitted by Professor Silberston. It is extraordinary that the Government should have been so tactically inept as to publish the report now and make absolutely inevitable the opportunity for their opponents across the negotiating table to quote happily from it whenever the Minister seeks to defend British interests.

It is important to understand what the Silberston report says. The professor does not dispute that there will be job losses, although he is in some doubt about the number. The Liberal party also accepts that point, judging by the speech of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) made a valiant effort to claw back that position. However, as I understand that he does not take the Whip, we must assume that the position stated by the hon. Member for Yeovil is that of the Liberal party. We shall study that with some interest.

Silberston says that there will be some job losses but that in some miraculous way they will be transmuted into job gains elsewhere. It is an improbable deal that he offers to the textile industry—in return for immediate, direct and certain losses of jobs, output and investment, there may be some highly theoretical possibility of a diffuse gain somewhere or other in the economy at some unspecified time in the future. That is hardly a deal to commend itself to a textile worker in Bradford or Huddersfield.

It takes leave to doubt the Silberston report and its conclusions. The methodology employed is extremely unconvincing and has rightly attracted censure from many objective commentators. Indeed, even Professor Silberston was prudent and cautious and he wrapped his conclusions round with a whole range of caveats and qualifications. He said that he had considerable reservations about his conclusions.

The report substantially understates the jobs losses that may flow from the abolition of the MFA because it takes an unduly pessimistic view of the job losses that would occur in the industry even with the MFA. I do not believe that the future of the industry is as bleak as the professor maintains. Certainly, when the Labour party returns to power it will create a climate that is much more favourable to manufacturing industry, and the textile industry will be part of that increased prosperity. Therefore, there is no ground for such pessimism.

As many hon. Members have said, the professor overstates the fall in prices that might flow from the ending of the MFA. The scope for a fall in prices is extremely limited. The industry produces a range of commodities whose prices have shown the smallest increase of any item in the RPI during the past 10 years. During the decade from 1974, whereas prices generally rose by 267 per cent., textiles, clothing and footwear prices rose by just 118 per cent.

There is no margin for further price cuts. If the imported price fell because of the ending of the MFA—which is doubtful — all that would happen is that margins would rise. The effect would be so small as to be meaningless, and the notion that it might have a macro economic effect on the economy is ludicrous. Even if it were to have such an effect, the stimulation to the economy would be more than offset by increased unemployment and reduced demand in the short term.

Professor Silberston substantially misunderstands what would happen to the exchange rate in such circumstances. The Cambridge econometrics group derived most of its favourable consequences of what was proposed from its view of what would happen to the exchange rate. However, the exchange rate will not be so sensitive to a worsening of the balance of payments because of the removal of the MFA as to fall substantially and thereby increase our competitiveness, so that we suddenly start selling exports all over the world. The exchange rate does not operate like that, as we have all seen in recent years. It does not reflect such matters in the market place; it reflects monetary practice, interest rates, capital flows and so on.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: No. I am sorry, but I do not have time.

It is significant that the industry—both employers and trade unions — is united in condemning the Silberston report and in supporting the case for a new and effective MFA. We accept that argument and strongly support that case. We need a new MFA. What matters is not that, but what shape the new MFA will take. We need an MFA that operates better, not necessarily because it is more restrictive, but because it serves the interests of this country more efficiently.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) pointed out, an effective MFA would not only serve our interests. It would be the best means of guaranteeing the interests of less developed countries. Countries without the guaranteed access that an MFA provides would not be able to compete with dominant suppliers. The less-developed countries would find that, without that access, their industries would be destroyed.

Therefore, we are looking for a new MFA that guarantees that access and provides more generous quotas for countries that need access to our markets. We also need a social clause to protect workers in those countries against exploitation and low wages, so that as their industries develop, on the basis of that guaranteed access, the workers, and not foreign providers of capital, will derive the benefit.

We recognise that countries such as Hong Kong and Singapore have opened their markets to produce from around the world, including this country. It would be right to try not to discriminate against those newly industrialising countries.

There is some justice in the Hong Kong claim that the effect of restrictions has simply been to make room in our market for more EEC imports. That is indisputable, but the problem is that the rise in EEC imports is a consequence not of the MFA, but of our inability to take measures to deal with that flood of imports.

In textiles, as in other areas, a Labour Government will have to grapple with that problem when we return to office.

This is not the time to look at the detail of the negotiations, but I ask the Minister to note carefully the fact that we want a longer term for MFA 4 than I believe he is contemplating. A renewed MFA that expired when the GATT talks came to an end would not be good enough. We want an MFA in which import quotas are fixed at 1985 levels. If that were the case, we could do away with the anti-surge mechanism. We need a more effective mechanism to replace the basket extractor mechanism. We also need at home more resources devoted to dealing with fraud and quota evasion.

We do not expect the Government to reveal fully their negotiating position. But we want a clear and strong statement. We are worried by what appears to be a lack of firmness and conviction in what the Minister said. In our view, he showed too great a readiness to make concessions in advance of the negotiations. We shall watch very closely what he does in these negotiations because we believe that, after all the damage that his Government have wreaked upon the industry, any failure of conviction or determination in pursuing these negotiations would be a further and quite unnecessary blow.

We want a stronger statement. We want strong action. I hope that the Minister of State will take the opportunity to dispel the remaining doubts about the Government's firmness of purpose and make clear their determination, in which they will have the Opposition's full support, to maintain this vitally important British industry.

9.41 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): This has been an extremely lively debate in which there has been a certain amount of disagreement but not necessarily along party lines. We have had some notable constituency speeches, and some notable speeches from hon. Members who have represented the consumer interest, with no specific industrial interest in their constituencies. We heard a splendid speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) reminded us of the slogan, "By Lancashire's thread hangs Britain's bread", which was the answer to the single hon. Member who sought to imply that the problems of the textile industry were only of very recent origin.

There has been a certain amount of tilting at windmills in the debate. As soon as my right hon. Friend said that there was to be another MFA, I fear that some of the speeches prepared by Opposition Members did not quite have the perorations intended.

My right hon. Friend made it clear that we wanted another MFA, albeit a more liberal one, and that we wanted the longer term future of the MFA to be examined in the context of the GATT negotiations.

I agree with the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and with my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield about the importance of the textile industry. I shall not go over all the statistics repeated again and again about exports and the proportion of manufacturing employment. This is a huge manufacturing industry and an extremely important one. No Government could be indifferent to its enormous employment. The Government do not regard it as a sunset industry. It employs so many people that it has to compete. By using modern technology, concentrating on good design and perhaps moving up market, I am sure that there are many areas of the industry where we can be fully competitive without protection. That has been said to me again and again by industrialists. There are areas where they are competitive in world terms.

Such disagreement as there has been has not been about whether there should be a multi-fibre arrangement. It has rather been about the tightness of a future MFA. My right hon. Friend made his view clear that we would like a more liberal one. We cannot accept that it should be longer than four years. Four years has been the life of MFAs in the past.

A number of hon. Members contrasted the theory of free trade with the practice in the real world. I emphasise what was said by my right hon. Friend and underlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton (Mr. Fox). Only if we get concessions in the GATT negotiations will we go further with liberalisation. We have a great deal to gain by getting concessions from other countries, but we shall not offer them in advance. We are using them as a bargaining counter.

I agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton about distinguishing between unfair and unwelcome competition. Not all competition from low-cost countries is unfair. Industrialisation is a rough business, and it is by exporting to us that the poorer countries will make themselves richer and improve themselves.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) was one of the few Members who mentioned what might have been thought to be an extremely important question—that of China. China is a huge potential supplier overhanging the market and is a subject of enormous worry, but I can at least give the assurance that China, a member of the MFA although not of GATT, will continue to be treated as a state trading country. Therefore, regardless of what happens in the MFA negotiations—or GATT, while she is not a member—China will continue to be subject to special negotiations and arrangements such as those applied to state trading countries.

My right hon. Friend said that we favoured some liberalisation of quotas. An important question is whether different sectors of the industry merit different treatment under the quota arrangements. The industry has said that each sector contains a range of products of enormous variety and that the different sectors are interdependent. As my right hon. Friend said, we take the view that some quotas should be dispensed with and others substantially relaxed. We intend to concentrate liberalisation on those areas where the cost to the economy as a whole of protection is greatest, but we shall be consulting the industry and hon. Members about the details.

It has already been made clear to us that quotas on textiles can damage the prospects of our clothing industry. One example that came to my attention recently was that of a leading United Kingdom garment manufacturer which had to close one of its factories after quotas were imposed on imported yarns which it used substantially. A dyeing and finishing plant shed jobs because import quotas meant that it was unable to obtain sufficient quantities of undyed fabrics. Examples of that sort demonstrate that restraints on textiles can hurt our clothing industry. In many instances our clothing, weaving, dyeing and finishing industries are less competitive than they could be, and are operating below their potential because of the restrictions on textile imports.

Several hon. Members mentioned the practices of the United States of America. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) referred to the high tariff on woollen goods, which we regard as quite unsatisfactory. One cannot, in making comparisons, do so product by product or industry by industry. The United States in general is a relatively low tariff country but, like every country, it has some areas of anomalously high tariffs. We have said publicly that it is our intention on the GATT round to seek a reduction in the anomalously high tariffs.

A crucial factor in the renegotiation of the MFA will be the attitude of the United States. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) and others that if the United States is restrictive there is a danger of a diversion of goods from there into this country. We have to take account of that in the negotiations. In discussing what sort of quantitative restrictions and what sort of quotas there might be, we have to take account of what the attitude of the United States is likely to be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield made an interesting point about the diversion argument—whether the effect of the MFA was to cause diversion and increase imports from the EEC. The hon. Member for Dagenham also pursued that point. I agree with my hon. Friend up to a point, but it is an argument that can be much exaggerated, and probably many of those exports from Europe would have increased anyway because there were other factors tending in that direction. However, there is undoubtedly an area of overlap between some of the MFA countries and some of the European countries. For example, Hong Kong is moving up-market and competing to an increasing extent with European countries. There may have been an element of diversion, but it should not be exaggerated.

I do not agree with those of my hon. Friends who have referred to the consumer lobby in slightly disparaging terms. Of course we must represent constituency interests, but the national interest includes consumer as well as industrial interests. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) said, we must strike a balance between consumer and producer interests. It was necessary that the consumer's voice should be heard in the debate, and I was very pleased that my hon. Friends spoke out for the consumer loud and clear.

On the question of the Silberston report, we were diverted by the two speeches from the Liberal Bench. We are accustomed to hearing the alliance speak with different voices, but on this occasion the ranks of Tuscany themselves were divided.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister should look behind him.

Mr. Lamont: The Liberals really resembled the mugwumps, with the mugs on one side of the fence and the wumps on the other. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) made a brave speech, but it did not seem to slip down like a dozen oysters with his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale.

I listened with interest to some of the comments made about Professor Silberston. Professor Silberston is far from being a doctrinaire free trader. His background is in industrial economics. I listened with interest to what the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said about Professor Silberston, especially as a Labour Government appointed him to the board of the British Steel Corporation. Presumably that Government did not consider him so very wild. We should not lose sight of the fact that Professor Silberston concluded that we needed another MFA. It is not wrong for the Government to ask someone to examine and attempt to quantify the costs of the MFA. If people have confidence in the case for their industry, they should not object to an examination of it and an assessment of the costs.

In one sense, this is history. The Government have made their decision. We have announced that there is to be another MFA. I would not wish to get hooked on any particular statistic from the Silberston report. However, Professor Silberston estimated the cost of protection per job at about £10,000 to £40,000 per annum. He compared that with our ceiling of £10,000, once and for all, in our regional policy. If Opposition Members are right to say that Professor Silberston has underestimated the employment protection effect of the MFA, the cost per job must be far greater than is suggested in the report.

Opposition Members may believe that it is right to pay the price of having an MFA. They may believe that the MFA is worthwhile. However, it is surely right that we should examine it, and attempt to calculate the cost. If there is a cost, it seems likely that there will be an effect on employment. That was one of the central points in the report. However, Professor Silberston recommended that there should be another MFA because of the hardship and the degree of adjustment that the clothing and textile sector had already faced. That has been a major consideration in the Government's decision to have another MFA.

We want to move in a more liberal direction. We recognise that the industry has suffered enormous pains of adjustment in the past few years. We want to examine the MFA in the context of GATT, and, provided that we can win real concessions from other countries, we will try to make it even more liberal. That prize is well worth pursuing. No country has more to gain than us from the further liberalisation of world trade. We hear much about restrictions on trade, but our managing to export about 30 per cent. of gross domestic product, which is probably a higher proportion than that of any other country, shows that we are pretty good at overcoming many of the obstacles.

As the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) said, there are many countries which are no longer among the poorest, such as Korea and Taiwan, which have high tariffs and considerable restrictions, although their economies are becoming strong. As the hon. Gentleman said, gross domestic product per head of population in those countries is close to ours. We ought to use our position in the MFA to get concessions from those countries.

Decisions on the MFA are likely to be of key importance for world trade. If we do not have liberalisation in textiles in the forthcoming negotiations, it is difficult to see how we can achieve any worthwhile results in the round of GATT negotiations. Textiles and clothing account for one quarter of the exports of manufactures from developing countries. We can hardly expect them to make concessions in trade if we start by blocking the goods which are most important to them.

I hope that part of what I have said is the answer to those who have asked why the process of liberalisation starts with textiles. The industry has enjoyed the protection of the MFA for some years.

Mr. Robert Hughes rose——

Mr. Lamont: It was always implicit that that protection should be temporary. The industry has had a lot of time to adjust. Indeed, it has adjusted recently. There has been a fantastic restructuring. Companies such as Illingworth Morris, Vantona Viyella and Courtaulds have done a remarkable job and dramatically improved their profitability so that they are now among the strongest companies in the world.

There has been some argument about the impact of the MFA on developing countries. It is sometimes suggested that, because some of the quotas under the MFA have been under-used, the MFA does not harm developing countries. However, any country will have a spread of quotas, some of which might be used more than 90 per cent. and some of which might be very much under-used. A country such as Bangladesh might well prefer to export a much larger volume of some goods and not have quotas on some other goods in respect of which it is not competitive. In that way the MFA has done some harm to developing countries. We believe that an MFA should help the poorest countries. Whatever the pros and cons of the argument might be, there is no doubt that the developing countries think that it damages them because they continue to press for the ending of the MFA. In Mexico last month, the countries representing them again confirmed their commitment to the full application of the normal rules and principles of GATT to textiles and clothing.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade set out the Government's view of what our initial stance in the negotiations should be. I have already referred to the GATT round, in which context we believe these matters should be considered and tackled. But first we must negotiate MFA 4. We accept that some quotas should go and that others should be increased significantly. The details will receive careful analysis later, but one important factor should be the extent to which industrial users of products subject to quota are inhibited by current quota levels from taking full advantage of their international competitiveness and expanding accordingly. That will help the consumer too.

As for the exporting countries, we want to be especially liberal towards the poorest and those which accept their GATT obligations, but much less so to the better-off developing countries unless and until they recognise their obligations to open up their markets. The Community must arrive at a common view on the MFA and GATT. The matter must then be negotiated with the other signatories. We are only at the beginning of the process. The MFA does not expire until July 1986. The bilateral agreements that the Community have negotiated need to be renegotiated by the end of 1986. We intend to keep the House informed of major developments in the negotiations as they progress. We shall also keep closely in touch with the textile and clothing industries and all other interested parties.

Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd (Morecambe and Lunesdale): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Weights and Measures

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

That the draft Weights and Measures (Liquid Fuel carried by Road Tanker) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 22nd April, be approved.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Question agreed to.

Miss Thi Minh Bui

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I wish to draw the attention of the House to an important and moving human problem because Britain and the Government can help many refugees in Hong Kong and other areas. I shall give some of my time to my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) asked to be associated with the debate, but for good reasons, I am sure, he is unable to attend.

The question relates to the reunification of families of Vietnamese origin in the camps in Hong Kong and other parts of south-east Asia. The case came to my attention because two sisters, Miss Thi Nga Bui and Miss Thi Minh Bui, aged 23 and 19 respectively, live in my constituency. They arrived in the United Kingdom in 1981.

I recognise that no country, and certainly not Britain, which has a relatively small land space, can solve all the refugee problems of the world. However, we have a duty to act where we have particular responsibilities and if we can do something important both for humanity and to persuade other countries to act. I am supported in that view by a recent Select Committee report, from which I shall quote generously.

The two sisters left Vietnam, were picked up by a British freighter and taken to Brunei. From there they came to the United Kingdom. Their father, mother, three brothers and one sister—the children are aged 20, 18, 10 and eight respectively—left Vietnam about a year later and sailed directly to Hong Kong, where they were admitted to a closed camp.

Hon. Members without exception are disturbed by the existence of the closed camps. We recognise the pressures that there were on Hong Kong in 1979 and 1980 when 200,000 refugees left Vietnam. However, none of us can be anything but deeply disturbed by the camps. People in those camps cannot leave them, or go out to work. They rely on money sent to them by relatives and friends overseas and they own little or no property. My hon. Friend visited the camps more recently than I did, and he may wish to add to that.

We hear a great deal about the importance of family life, and we all accept that it is important. It is especially important to Vietnamese families, who are extremely close and rely greatly on each other for support. We should remember that we are a signatory to the Helsinki final act. Although it does not apply throughout the world, the spirit of it is what counts. If our commitment to it is true, we should allow the principles on which we signed it to guide us on family matters.

Until May 1981 families were reunited, but the policy was changed and brought into line with general refugee policy. The Select Committee and others, including myself, contend that that is unjust and unnecessary. It is generally accepted that verbal undertakings were given, although perhaps not by Government officials, that members of families would be reunited.

Mr. Barber, who is the director of the British Refugee Council, said this when he gave evidence to the Select Committee:

"In seeking to fill the quota, I think there is no doubt . . . that from the voluntary agency side . . . efforts were made to say that 'Of course, if close family members join you and come to Hong Kong later when you are already settled in Britain, then Britain will accept them.'"

The Select Committee concluded:

"Secondly, it is clear that many Vietnamese were given assurances in Hong Kong that if they came to Britain family members would be allowed to join them. When the quota of 10,000 was announced, there was some difficulty filling it, because refugees understandably preferred countries with larger Vietnamese communities and better job opportunities, and some Vietnamese may therefore have been persuaded to come to Britain by assurances of family reunion. We accept that no such undertakings were given with Government authority, but at the time when selection was taking place to fill the quota, Britain had wide criteria for family reunion and it would be extraordinary if the selecting teams had not mentioned this."

Lord Ennals, who is the chairman of the British Refugee Council, said this in evidence to the Select Committee:

"There is, of course, as the Committee will know, a continual policy of family reunions from those whose close relatives are still in Vietnam, and some of those who fled and went to Hong Kong now find themselves in the invidious position that had they stayed in Vietnam they might have been able to have been brought to Britain under the 'Orderly Departure' policy; having now arrived and taken all the risk of going by boat, they now find that they cannot be admitted to Britain."

The second important reason why we must reconsider the policy—it was emphasised by the Select Committee—is that if some family members are in Britain, no other country will consider other members of their family, who are trapped in the camps in Hong Kong or elsewhere. The Select Committee states in paragraph 16:

"Thirdly, and most importantly, Vietnamese who have close relatives in Britain will not usually be considered for resettlement by any other country . . . the problem should have been foreseen when the family reunion criteria were narrowed. These people are likely to remain in refugee camps indefinitely unless they are allowed to join their families in Britain."

That powerful point was emphasised and given more power by the hon. Member for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt) who, alas, but probably for good reasons, is not here tonight. When he questioned the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, he said:

"Because it is a fact, is it not, that unless we accept that liability, these people are destined to remain virtually indefinitely in these camps, because in view of their links with those already in the United Kingdom, no other country is going to come anywhere near to accepting responsibility for them? So that they are in a very special compassionate situation, are they not?"

The Minister of State replied:

"I think I would have to say yes to that. I agree with you."

That is a powerful argument for acting in the way that I have suggested. Given that the Minister of State, the Select Committee and a growing number of people inside and outside the House are saying that, we are obliged to take it seriously.

The third reason why it is important to reconsider the policy is that it is essential to bring together these families if they are to cope with the real problems of settling down to life in Britain. Divided families inevitably have greater problems than do united families, who can rely on each other. I have already said how especially important that is to the Vietnamese, although all of us would accept that it is important to everyone, regardless of race, colour or creed.

The inability to reunite the family makes resettlement difficult. I am supported in that by the Select Committee, which said, talking about the stress-related problems that some refugees have experienced:

"The principal cause appears to be the cultural shock of life in the UK after Vietnam; the realisation that return is impossible"

I wish to emphasise the next part—

"the sense of loss, concern and guilt for those left behind; the lack of an established indigenous group here to provide support, and the difficulties of communication."

These are three good reasons why the House needs to reconsider this policy.

Britain must give a lead. Another important argument for that is that there is good reason to believe that Australia and the United States and probably Canada, West Germany and France, would act to help us clear the 11,000 or 12,000 refugees left in the camps in Hong Kong. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, said on behalf of the Department:

"It is our responsibility to take the lead, as the Department in the Government responsible for Hong Kong, and to try to find a solution to it . . . it must be a priority in terms of our responsibilities."

The Select Committee said:

"We are convinced that a new intake of Vietnamese from Hong Kong by Britain is indeed a 'pre-condition' to resolving the problem, and that no substantial progress can otherwise be made in emptying the camps."

I accept that Britain, and Hong Kong in particular, have made gallant efforts to help in the Vietnamese refugee problem, but we are talking about a relatively small number of people, probably only about 500. If we took the lead in their case, other countries would follow our example and help us to resettle these people. That would ease the burden on Hong Kong.

Britain has not been ungenerous, but the closed camps disturb all of us. The Select Committee called for the closure of these camps, and I identify myself strongly with that call. I ask the Minister to allow this family to settle in Britain. Will he reconsider the policy and change it? He could begin by allowing my constituents to have their parents, three brothers and sister come to live with them here.

It is deeply moving to think of people who have managed so well here on their own but who are in contact with their family only by letter. They are trying to send money to their relatives, but they have only a limited amount, as one is a student and the other is working as a waitress. It is extremely difficult for them and they are an example of the Vietnamese families struggling to manage here. We should be doing everything that we can to help.

I support the Select Committee recommendation that family reunion criteria should be relaxed in respect of Vietnamese in camps in countries of temporary asylum. I have said that this is why we should change the policy. The fact that they are in these camps means that they cannot be settled anywhere else if they have relatives in the United Kingdom. I support the Select Committee's call for the closure of the camps and the transfer of the inmates to open camps.

The Minister said that if Britain committed itself to a modest resettlement programme we would have a good chance of a reasonable response and good reason to expect it. We also have the help of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, who would be more than willing to put pressure on other countries if we took this initiative.

I wish to leave time for my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West to speak, and I see that the hon. Member for Ynys Môn is here as well. I urge the Minister of State, Home Office to give this matter full consideration. I should dearly like to tell the two sisters that they can have their family here to resettle with them. The least that I ask is that the Government urgently look at this policy again and consider changing it along the lines recommended by the Select Committee. They could take away the agony that has been going on for years for some people.

10.13 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), and the House will want to express its gratitude to him for the eloquent, lucid and dedicated way in which he presented his case.

Just over a year ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and I had the opportunity to visit these camps in Hong Kong. To get to them, we had to go by helicopter, land on a prison site, go through the prison site, and eventually we found ourselves at our destination. We found there something which reminded me of factory units in my constituency. People had been there for a very long time, in some cases for four or five years. One little boy of seven is probably still there. Although we have endorsed the Hong Kong agreement and will be relinquishing sovereignty in 1997, we still have a responsibility for these refugees.

I am very pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith has provided the House with an opportunity to debate the matter, because I believe that the House wishes to support the reunion of this family. The Minister will wish to be reminded of recommendation 4 of the Select Committee on Home Affairs:

"A considerable degree of ministerial discretion should be retained in the granting of family reunion applications."

In that spirit I appeal to the Minister to respond positively to my hon. Friend. This case calls for consideration, compassion and concern. The Minister is capable of responding in that way. For that reason, I invite him to do so. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the determination with which he has pursued this admirable cause.

10.15 pm

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): The House is indebted to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) for having raised this matter. It is particularly appropriate because the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is visiting south-east Asia and Hong Kong. I speak as chairman of the British committee for Vietnamese refugees and receive very many family reunion applications which I pass on to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office. I pay tribute to him for his hard work in trying to help these refugees, wherever possible. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), who did such sterling work on the Select Committee and in the preparation of its report, is in the Chamber.

I had the privilege of visiting these centres in January of this year. I visited Chi Ma Wan, referred to by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), which is a closed centre. I met a woman who had been there for two years. She was unable to join her husband who is working in an open centre. That is a measure of the tragedy that is posed by this closed centre policy. It splits families in Hong Kong, let alone those who wish to come to this country to join their families. I visited also the Kai Tak and Jubilee centres. Hong Kong is doing the best that it can in the circumstances, but this country needs to make a gesture. It has already done so much to help refugees.

When I went to Hong Kong I found that only 434 people need to be accepted by this country. This means that 112 cases have close family links with people in this country. We appeal to my hon. and learned Friend to show humanity towards these people in the Hong Kong centres, many of whom have no chance of going to any other country. They can be accepted only by this country because they have close relatives living here who may be outside the normal immigration rules criteria. This plea for humanity is one which I know that my hon. and learned Friend and this Government will not reject.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on securing this Adjournment debate. Before I turn to the details of the case of Miss Bui and her relatives I think that I should set it in context by saying a few words about the camps in Hong Kong, how the present situation has arisen and about how British policy towards refugees has evolved in recent years. It is also appropriate for me to say right at the start that we as a country have nothing to be ashamed of in the way in which we have accepted refugees. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Mon (Mr. Best), who said that this country has already done much for refugees. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that we have not been other than generous. It is necessary to bear that in mind right from the start. We have no historic links with Vietnam, yet we have done a great deal to help to resolve this human tragedy.

When the Vietnamese boat people first began arriving in Hong Kong in the 1970s, they were settled in open camps and they were able to move freely within the territory and take employment. That remains the situation in the open camps today. However, because of the continuing large numbers of refugees arriving in Hong Kong and the pressures therefore imposed on a small crowded territory, closed camps had to be introduced in July 1982. They were set up by the Hong Kong authorities as a humane means of discouraging other Vietnamese from coming to Hong Kong and all refugees arriving in Hong Kong since July 1982 have been placed in them.

The result is that at present about half the 11,200 Vietnamese in the camps are in the open and half in the closed camps, and inevitably in the camps are relatives of people who have already found permanent refuge in Western countries, including Britain, separated perhaps from the other members of their family by the very circumstances of their escape from Vietnam.

When the number of Vietnamese refugees entering the United Kingdom was small, we operated a generous family reunion policy. Spouses, unmarried children under 21, parents and unmarried brothers and sisters under 21 were all allowed to come and join the person who had been admitted originally. But the House will remember that in 1979 we agreed to take a quota of 10,000 Vietnamese and by 1981 there were going on for 16,000 in this country.

Furthermore, that number was going to grow pretty quickly because of our obligation to accept boat people rescued by British ships and our willingness to take others direct from Vietnam under the orderly departure programme.

On top of that we had our commitments towards refugees of many other nationalities. It was in those circumstances that in July 1981 we announced new criteria for the admission of relatives of those Vietnamese already accepted for settlement, and those new criteria meant in effect that people could come if they would have qualified to do so as dependants under the immigration rules.

That is the position today. We look carefully at all applications on an individual basis, but, unless there are exceptional circumstances, we apply what might be thought the not unreasonable and not unfair policy of admitting spouses and minor children and parents who can show the degree of dependency required under the immigration rules.

Now I come to the case of Miss Bui. She came here, it seems, in 1981. She is not alone in this country. She lives in a council flat with her sister and a cousin. But in a closed camp in Hong Kong are her parents, her three brothers and a young sister. She has applied twice through the British Refugee Council for those relatives to come here, but clearly they do not qualify under the criteria that I have mentioned.

Miss Bui's three brothers and her sister are certainly not dependants under the immigration rules, and her parents, both of whom are under 65, would also not be admitted if Miss Bui were an ordinary immigrant. They are not wholly or mainly dependent on Miss Bui and her sister, and it is doubtful whether, if they were to arrive in this country, Miss Bui and her sister would be able to support and accommodate them. I need not remind the House of the sensible maintenance and accommodation provisions which for long have been in the immigration rules.

I have every sympathy with Miss Bui's wish to be reunited with her relatives, but, as I have said, the difficulty is that they clearly do not come within the present criteria. However, there have been two developments since I last wrote to the hon. Member for Hammersmith about the case, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman now that as a result my mind is not closed on this case.

The first development to which I am referring is the recent report of the Select Committee of which the hon. Gentleman spoke. I heard him on the radio this morning making the point, which he repeated this evening, that if we were to take, as he put it, a percentage of people from the camps, the United States, Canada, Australia, Germany and France would take significant numbers also. Many of those countries have already taken refugees from Hong Kong and I am sure that the House will be delighted to hear that the Canadian Government have recently decided that this year, as part of their annual refugee programme, they will be taking 500 refugees from Hong Kong in addition to the 600 which they had already agreed to take. That means that this year they will take the same number as they took last year.

But no country has yet declared that a special gesture by this country would persuade them to take extra numbers to clear the camps. That must be borne in mind.

It must be remembered that other countries already have commitments to take Vietnamese refugees from other parts of the world apart from Hong Kong. The obvious example is Thailand.

However, the Select Committee's recommendation is that we should relax the family reunion criteria and that our willingness to do so should be used as a bargaining counter to attract offers of additional resettlement places from other countries, the the aim of reducing drastically te size of the Hong Kong Vietnamese refugee population. The fairly cautious way in which this recommendation is framed is, I think, a recognition that things are not necessarily quite as simple as the hon. Gentleman has said.

But we are now considering the Committee's recommendation very carefully and will be responding in due course. We hope to have the support of the international community in alleviating the plight of the Vietnamese refugees who are in Hong Kong and we shall maintain a continuing dialogue with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other countries with the aim of helping all these victims of an oppressive regime.

Clearly the hon. Gentleman will not be expecting me to respond to the Select Committee tonight, as a detailed response will be given in due course. But he obviously recognises that our response, when it comes, will have a direct bearing on the case of Miss Bui's relatives.

The other development that I should mention is that, before the Select Committee reported, I gave an undertaking to the BRC to review those cases in which applications for relatives in Hong Kong have been refused but where the BRC considers there exist exceptionally compelling compassionate circumstances. The BRC has provided us with details of a number of cases and Miss Bui's case is among them. Again, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a decision tonight, but I can assure him that I shall review the case very sympathetically in the light of the BRC's representations and of what he has said so eloquently tonight. Once again, I am grateful to him for raising this most important matter.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 10 May 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Sexual Offences Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 3

SOLICITING A WOMAN FOR SEXUAL PURPOSES IN A MANNER CAUSING NUISANCE OR FEAR

'A man commits an offence if in a street or public place he solicits women (or the same woman) for sexual purposes in a manner which causes nuisance or fear.'.—[Mr. Soley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.35 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, we may consider the following: new clause 4 — Evidence of nuisance or fear—

'An offence under section (Soliciting a woman for sexual purposes in a manner causing nuisance or fear) shall not be proved unless the person who has been caused nuisance or fear gives evidence of such.'.

New clause 7—Section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956—

'The reference in section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 to a man persistently soliciting or importuning in a public place for immoral purposes shall be taken as applying to men soliciting women as well as men soliciting men.'.

Amendment No. 40, in clause 2, page 2, line 3, at end insert

'in a manner that causes offence or nuisance to others.'.

Amendment No. 41, in clause 2, page 2, line 3, at end insert—

'(1A) The person or persons to whom nuisance or offence has been caused may be required to give evidence of such nuisance or offence.'.

Amendment No. 47, in page 2, line 8, leave out clause 3.

Amendment No. 52, in clause 3, page 2, line 9, after 'purposes', insert

'in a street or public place'.

Amendment No. 58, in clause 3, page 2, line 9, leave out 'her fear' and insert

'a woman of reasonable firmness to fear for her physical well-being'.

Amendment No. 59, in clause 3, page 2, line 9, after 'her', insert 'extreme'.

Amendment No. 60, in clause 3, page 2, line 9, after 'fear', insert 'for her safety'.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I be so bold as to congratulate you on your selection of amendments to this important, complex and socially vital Bill? I notice that the amendments that you have selected so far take us only as far as clause 4. I understand that it is your provisional selection of amendments, and I wonder whether you intend later to select amendments on subsequent clauses.

Mr. Speaker: I selected the amendments yesterday after looking carefully at the Bill and the amendments that had been submitted. I see no reason to change may selection.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was not suggesting that you should change your selection. I was being so bold as to congratulate you on what you had done so far, but as there are many amendments, and as I am not fully aware of how you approach the matter, I wondered whether you sometimes subsequently select amendments to later clauses.

Mr. Speaker: No. I carefully considered the amendments to other clauses, but I was unable to select them, for reasons that the hon. Gentleman will fully understand. I thank him for his congratulations on my selection.

Mr. Soley: We have been over the matters covered by the amendments, but I have made a major effort—to which you, Mr. Speaker, obviously responded — to make the amendments and new clauses different from those that we discussed in Committee. However, some of the principles that we debated then still stand. Our basic aim is to introduce safeguards into the Bill to reduce the dangers of wrongful conviction.

There are areas of agreement in the Bill. It is agreed that women have the right to go anywhere without fear of being harassed or molested. Many people want the Bill to achieve that objective, but the question is whether it will do so. There is also general agreement that there is a specific problem in certain parts of the United Kingdom, primarily one or two inner city areas where kerb crawling has become a major problem for residents and people using the public highway.

The points at issue are whether the Bill is an appropriate way to tackle those problems and whether the dangers in the Bill are greater than may be apparent to some people. I shall examine some of those dangers in discussing the amendments and new clauses that have been tabled by hon. Members on both side of the House.

There have been developments since the Committee stage that add weight to my arguments. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department will know that the 1361 Act was used in a recent case. He said in Committee that he did not like the idea of the rusty old blunderbuss of the 1361 Act being used. However, it was used fairly recently against a preacher who went out with the apparent intention of converting prostitutes. I am always rather worried about such actions. I am never quite sure who ends up converting who. Somerset Maughan's story "Rain" is a good example. The end result can be rather different from what the preacher anticipates in the earlier stages of the activity. Of course, society gets itself into the most appalling mess when it tries to legislate on the sexual behaviour of human beings. Many double standards become involved and we are all prone to adopt them from time to time.

[Mr. Soley]

In the case which I have mentioned, the preacher was bound over. The magistrates said that they accepted that he did not approach the lady concerned, who was a police officer, with any immoral intent. The chairman said:

"The manner in which he approached and talked to the police woman was not only unwise but likely to cause very serious offence if the woman police officer was a resident of the area."

There lies the danger. The preacher accepted that he acted unwisely. The result of his behaviour was his appearance before the court.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's argument and my intervention may help him to develop it. I have been listening to him intently and I wish to make what is perhaps the obvious comment. The 1361 Act is unsatisfactory because of its age and because it deals with breaches of the peace. A breach of the peace does not require strict proof and a finding of guilty or not guilty. A bind over can be applied to anyone regardless of whether the individual has been convicted of an offence.

Whatever the magistrates thought about the preacher's intent — for example, whether it was an act of solicitation or ill-advised activity falling short of that— they were fully entitled under the 1361 Act to bind over. If the preacher had been charged under the Bill, and if the magistrates' state of mind had been as the hon. Gentleman has expressed it, they would have been obliged to aquit him. The Bill, very properly, requires an act of solicitation, and there does not appear to have been one on the basis of the hon. Gentleman's account. The 1361 Act has been used to fill a vacuum because of the absence of appropriate legislation. It does not offer the precision that there will be when there is a proper criminal offence on the statute book. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find my intervention helpful.

Mr. Soley: As I have said on previous occasions, I should be concerned if we decided to continue to use the 1361 Act, or road traffic legislation, to deal with acts for which they were not intended primarily. The difficulty with the Bill as it stands is that it does not require corroborating evidence. Assuming that the reports that appeared in the newspapers about the preacher were accurate, it seems that he asked the woman if she "wanted some fun". He went on to ask how much she charged. I understand that his purpose in doing that was to ensure that she was a prostitute, but he was placing himself in real danger in adopting that approach and he would be in danger under the Bill. That approach amounts to a solicitation, and the preacher could have been found guilty under the Bill.

When we were considering the Bill in Committee, the Law Society submitted to us a set of circumstances in which a member of the society could have been picked up under the Act when he stopped to speak to one of his clients.

I shall complete the trilogy of the preacher, the lawyer and the probation officer. I was a probation officer in the King's Cross area, but I am too dated, having left the probation service in 1979, for what I am about to say to apply to me now. However, for a couple of years after 1979 I could easily have stopped and talked to prostitutes in the King's Cross area and in other areas of London. I knew them because they had been under my supervision on probation orders or because I had met them when they had appeared before the courts. I could have spent time talking to them or have offered them lifts, for example. In a way, that would have been normal behaviour, but it would not have been seen as such. The risk of conviction or of appearing before the courts would have been considerable.

9.45 am

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has tabled an amendment that seeks to prevent press publicity until a person has been found guilty. I have some sympathy with that approach, although it would be difficult to put it into practice for a number of reasons. If a preacher, lawyer or probation officer is brought before the courts, he is likely to attract the attention of the media. Unfortunately, the media give far less attention when such cases are dismissed. What starts with a headline ends up with a statement half an inch in depth that tells the newspaper's readership that the accused was not guilty after all.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): A man can be made the subject of adverse publicity without having committed an offence. He may be found not guilty, but his name will have been besmirched without the protection of a jury trial. Is it not serious that a man can lose his reputation without the Magna Carta right being invoked on his behalf?

Mr. Soley: That is a powerful argument. It applies in the area that we are discussing and in others where sexual behaviour is involved. Sex and violence are especially attractive to the media, especially when an offence is alleged to have been committed. The allegation attracts widespread publicity and if the accused is found not guilty he will not be able to obtain redress. There is no protection for him, or only very little.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will pursue the argument to its logical conclusion. Is he saying that the same anonymity and protection should be given in all other summary offences, and, if not, why not?

Mr. Soley: Perhaps I have misled the hon. and learned Gentleman slightly. The amendment that suggests that that protection should be available is in the name of the hon. Member for Northampton, North and not in mine. I have some sympathy with what he is trying to achieve, but I do not think that the amendment offers the right course. That is why I shall not lend my support to the amendment directly. However, the principle that the hon. Gentleman is trying to get across deserves attention and support.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman has great experience — I do not mean that viciously — in these matters. He has taken us back to the days when he was a probation officer. He will be aware that there has been a lot of press publicity about the chief constable of, I think, Nottinghamshire, who has been employing decoy women police constables. We would all like to see the Bill succeed when it has been properly amended. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman, who no doubt has had a great deal of discussion with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, who is in his place on the Government Front Bench, will tell us whether he has had any assurance from him that, in the circumstances in which the Bill has been enacted, the police will no longer feel it necessary to employ decoys. I can see in the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman was describing that it would be most embarrassing for him, as a probation officer, to go about his duties. He might see someone on the street who he wishes to help, only suddenly to find that it is police woman, who pounces on him and takes him off to the nearest police station.

Mr. Soley: In my old employment I would have known the police officers, too. I might have wanted to help them, too, in certain situations. In taking that line I could have been in trouble as well. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I have not had discussions with the Minister of the sort that he has in mind. However, I am concerned about the use of decoys, and that is an issue on which we shall touch when we discuss a later group of amendments. I believe that the Minister said in Committee—I am sure that he will correct me if I am wrong—that the need for decoys should be considered carefully and that their use should be restricted.

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I may assuage any fears that the House may have if I say that on 13 February I received a letter from an assistant commissioner of the Metropolitan police which made it clear that it is not the force's policy to employ women police officers in plain clothes to detect prostitution offences, and it is not envisaged that they will be so used in the future.

Mr. Soley: I am grateful for that. I ask the hon. Lady to bear in mind, however, that the case of the preacher, where a police officer was deployed in plain clothes——

Mr. Mellor: It was not in London.

Mr. Soley: No; it was in Nottingham, as I understand it. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) received a letter from a lady who said that she had lived in the King's Cross area for over three years. She wrote:

> "I have found kerb crawlers annoying at times, but I have never once been threatened by one after I made it clear that I was not doing business. A great number of men who have approached me, however, have been either asking directions (King's Cross has two mainline stations) or begging for money (King's Cross is also a poor area)."

That lady makes a valid point about the type of areas in which that activity takes place. She deals with the problem in a mature and sophisticated way.

The problem is how to achieve the laudable aim of allowing women to go anywhere in the United Kingdom in the same way that a man can—without fear of being harassed or molested — and how to deal with the problem that afflicts some inner city areas such as that represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox).

I have made the point before, and it is worth making again, that with the Bill we are trying to deal with the question of how prostitutes meet their clients and the consequences of that. Many prostitutes operate in a way which does not cause offence to people because they have a regular clientele or advertise in shops and magazines. The difficulty is that we have taken this problem out of the context of the issue of prostitution. I have made it clear before that in no way can we expect or should we expect prostitution to disappear completely. It has always been around, and it always will be.

We must address outselves to the deeper aspects of the problem. What causes people anxiety is when a number of prostitutes operate from the street and, in particular, when the problem is focused on one area. There is then an associated nuisance. Some people say that the ordinary laws of nuisance should apply. They do, but we cannot always apply them when the nuisance is caused by a number of drivers stopping women. That is a series of individual nuisances rather than the nuisance of, for example, a loud party late at night in one place with one group of people continuing to make a noise.

There is a case for a package which would allow prostitutes to advertise their services more effectively, thus helping them to stay off the streets and to operate together without the risk of being charged with a brothel offence, and to give local authorities byelaw powers to deal with problems that arise in specific areas, for example, Southampton and Tooting. That would be a more effective way of dealing with the problem. It is one reason why I tabled amendment No. 79, which has not been selected. That amendment would have enabled a local authority to make a byelaw. It would not involve the national law.

There would be disadvantages in doing that. Generally we try to legislate nationally. Byelaws imply that there are different problems in different areas. We have seen a dramatic example of that. The Ministry of Defence has recently introduced byelaws in places such as Molesworth. Such action can be taken, and the advantage would be that a local authority could bring——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Member must not discuss an amendment that has not been selected.

Mr. Soley: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall not pursue the point. I was trying to find a way to make the law less national. As I said in Committee, the Bill applies throughout the United Kingdom and yet we are dealing with a few areas which have a major problem. In doing so, we are putting about 50 million people in England and Wales at risk from the law. It was an attempt to try to find——

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise, but I sincerely seek your guidance on this issue. We have 10 amendments before us which are drawn from the first four clauses. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) may have said, had you allowed him to proceed a little further, that had the Bill been framed in such a way that a local initiative could be taken and local byelaws introduced some of the amendments and clauses might not have been as necessary as they are. Given the wide range of the debate and the amendments before us, I seek your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman was trying to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We cannot discuss amendments that have not been selected. It is as plain as that.

Mr. Soley: I do not seek to pursue the matter. I have made the point that I was trying to limit the scope of the Bill because we all recognise that the problem is restricted to some localities. However important the matter is to those areas, we do not wish to make the law too widespread.

There is a question which I wish to put to the Minister again because he did not deal satisfactorily with the point in Committee. I said that the Scottish law, for which I have considerable respect although I do not claim it to be perfect, requires corroboration; English law does not. His answer, if I remember correctly, was that it would be too complicated and take too long to go into Scottish law, and that neither he nor I were experts in it. That may or may not be true. Corroboration is required in Scotland, and we must address ourselves to the question why it does not apply in England and Wales. It is not sufficient to say that the matter is complicated. I have a great deal of respect for the way in which the Scots handle such matters and that point deserves more careful consideration.

It is interesting to note that the Scots do not feel a need for a law of this type. That is not because they do not have a problem. Having lived in Edinburgh and Glasgow, I know that from time to time there has been a problem in some areas.

New clause 1, which I have changed since Committee as a result of discussions in Committee, would give some assurance to the House that if the Act does not work—I know that the Minister and the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) are anxious about whether its intentions will succeed—it would continue in force only on a resolution of each House of Parliament. In other words, it would expire after two years unless given a positive vote again. That two years would, in my judgment and that of my hon. Friends, give us an opportunity to see whether the Bill had worked properly.

In new clause 3 and new clause 4, which are linked, I have used the phrase that a man would commit an offence if "he solicits women . . . for sexual purposes in a manner which causes nuisance or fear."

I have included the requirement that women caused nuisance or fear should give evidence. To use the words "which causes" implies that corroborative evidence would be necessary. It seems unlikely that a court of law would think that nuisance or fear had been caused unless the person was there to say that it had been caused. That is one of the ways of putting safeguards into the Bill, and I recommend it to the House.

Amendment No. 33 proposes that we should leave out clause 2. That was the only way in which I could deal with the difficult problem of persistence, given that we had already dealt with it to some extent in Committee. The Minister is aware—as is the hon. Member for Drake—of the curious double standards. Under clause 1 persistence is not required; one act is enough in its own right. Under clause 2, persistence is required.

To confound the problem, to be a prostitute a person has to be defined as a common prostitute. A common prostitute is a person who has been warned three times by the police before going into court. We had to deal with that rather curious set of double standards which are linked together. Therefore, we had to decide whether to seek to leave out clause 1—which we could not do, having already agreed to it in Committee—or to leave out clause 2. We are seeking to draw the attention of the House to this difficult area.

Amendments Nos. 40 and 41 are linked. In amendment No. 40 we are seeking to insert, at the end of clause 2, the words

"in a manner that causes offence or nuisance to others".

Amendment No. 41 seeks to add the words:

"The person or persons to whom nuisance or offence has been caused may be required to give evidence of such nuisance or offence".

Here we are trying to deal with a difficult problem to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting referred—that in some circumstances people would not be prepared to give evidence because of their fear of the consequences. I have tried to get round that difficult problem by suggesting that the police, if they could not get a witness to come forward, could proceed with a prosecution provided that they felt they had sufficient evidence.

It might be that the person concerned, being either embarrassed or fearful of some consequences, would not have to be called. On the other hand, the normal expectation would be that such a witness would be called. A resident in a house or the chairman or members of the committee of a residents' association could give evidence of either nuisance or fear. If there were threats involved in an area where there was organised prostitution, the police could carry on with the prosecution without the evidence of certain people. The amendments would, I think, meet the anxiety expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, the hon. Member for Drake, and the Minister.

I do not see why we should not have the innovation—if it is an innovation—in our law that a person may be required to give evidence which would enable the court to decide whether, in the circumstances, it would be safe to convict without evidence of corroboration. The police might wish to deploy the argument in court that they could not produce evidence because people were afraid to give it. I recognise that if a woman is not a prostitute and gives evidence against a man who has been kerb-crawling, her own sexual activities might be brought out in court. The Minister and some hon. Members have drawn attention to that problem. An obvious line for the defence would be to question the woman on whether she had slept with men before, with how many men, how frequently, whether she had ever charged for it, and so on. A woman who might be having a perfectly normal sexual life could have it inquired into in court and publicised. The amendments suggest a possible way of dealing with the problem, and I hope that the Minister will consider it.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman's amendments go to the heart of the issue and deal with matters with which many people are concerned—how evidence shall be adduced, and so on. Amendment No. 41 says:

"The person or persons to whom nuisance or offence has been caused may be required to give evidence".

On what basis is the decision to be made? How does the hon. Gentleman feel that a court would react if the decision had been made that such a person should not be required to give evidence? Would there be a rule of thumb that generally in those circumstances the court would not be expected to convict? It is an interesting suggestion, but I do not see how it would work.

Mr. Soley: In the first instance, the police would ask the person whether she was prepared to give evidence. She might be a resident in the area or a woman who happened to be walking down the street. If the woman said yes, there would be no problem. On the other hand, she might say no. I remind the House that the Prosecution of Offences Bill would initiate a procedure for which my party has been calling for several years—the appointment of an independent public prosecutor. That would link with this Bill in an important way.

Where a person does not give evidence, the public prosecutor then has to decide whether there is a case. It will be a matter for the judgment of the public prosecutor. That judgment will presumably be made on the basis of whether the public prosecutor thinks that there is a satisfactory case to be answered in a court of law. The public prosecutor will then say to the police, "If you cannot get your witness to come forward, what will you say when the court questions you about it?" The police will then have to say that the people concerned are fearful because of threats, or for whatever reason. The public prosecutor will then have to decide whether, on that basis, there is a case to answer. If he does not think that there is, obviously he will not prosecute. If he does, he will proceed with the case. It will then be for the court to ask the questions that one assumes the public prosecutor will have asked as to why the police have not been able to bring the witness to court. The court will decide whether an offence has been committed and whether, in the circumstances, it can safely convict in the absence of corroborative evidence. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman.

With the innovation of the independent public prosecutor, there will be a powerful addition to what is proposed in the Bill. I am not a lawyer, I have never claimed to be a lawyer, and I have never wanted to be a lawyer. However, I must not single out lawyers as though they are a minority group. I have made a good many criticisms of the legal profession from time to time. But there is concern among lawyers and others about the Bill as it stands, and I am suggesting, in my own non-legalistic way, a method of dealing with one of the major anxieties. I think that it meets some of the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, the hon. Member for Drake and several other hon. Members on each side of the House. Therefore, I urge the Minister to give it careful consideration.

Mr. Marlow: Does the hon. Gentleman envisage Home Office guidelines on this, and should they be published?

Mr. Soley: I do not have the expert knowledge to answer that, although I should have thought that the new public prosecutor system would make that unnecessary. Some guidelines might be needed in terms of the way in which the police are to operate, but I believe that many of the present problems will be solved by the independent prosecutor system because the police will no longer be both the arresting body and the prosecuting body. The police would be the arresting body, but it would be up to the independent prosecutor to decide whether there should be a prosecution. That takes the police out of the firing line. That is one of the reasons why I have been keen on that change for so long.

Amendment No. 47 relates to the concern that we expressed in Committee about the present drafting of clause 3, which includes the words:

"in a manner likely to cause . . . fear".

That is extremely difficult to define, especially if there is no corroboration. Another person's interpretation of what is likely to cause fear to a third party is debatable. The lady who wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said that she had been approached a number of times but had dealt with the situation in the normal way. A watching police officer might well have concluded that the incident was likely to cause her fear and might have secured a conviction on that basis. The lady in question stated clearly that the incidents did not cause her nuisance or fear, but if she was not called to give evidence a man might be convicted on that basis. If reference is made to nuisance and fear, I believe that nuisance or fear must actually be caused, which requires corroborating evidence, although I repeat that there are anxieties about the sexual activities of witnesses being brought into the case in the way that I have described.

Amendment No. 58 seeks to tighten clause 3 by inserting a reference to

"a woman of reasonable firmness".

I do not claim that those words are legalistically perfect but I believe that other legislation refers to fear or anxiety being caused to "persons" of reasonable firmness. Approaching a woman in the street and saying, "Will you have sex with me?" may cause fear to one woman, but anger, a dismissive comment or even laughter from another. A woman, or indeed a man in a similar situation, with well-developed social skills could deal easily with such an incident but another who is more timid and less able to cope with situations of that kind would be caused fear. I believe that it is dangerous to convict without making some judgment about that.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): When the hon. Gentleman said that other legislation required proof that fear would be caused to persons of reasonable firmness I believe that he was thinking of the law on affray, which requires not just that fear would be likely to be caused but that fear actually was caused. That is more than the hon. Gentleman seeks on this occasion.

Mr. Soley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing that out.

I ask the Minister to consider amendments Nos. 40 and 41 especially as a means of dealing with a number of problems. As I have said, we shall continue to try to achieve the aims that the hon. Member for Drake rightly had in mind in introducing the Bill but we must also continue to express anxiety about the unintended consequences of the Bill as drafted. Subject to the views expressed by the Minister and the House today, we shall wish to vote on the amendment, although I reserve our position on that for the moment.

Miss Fookes: I intervene briefly because it is important that I, as the promoter of the Bill, should make clear at this stage my attitude to the new clauses and amendments in this group because they deal with the heart of the matter. I understand the reservations expressed by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). Indeed, there was a sense of deja vu because we went into all this in great detail in Committee.

10.15 am

I should be doing the House a disservice if I did not state firmly at this stage that in my view clauses 1 to 3 as drafted meet the case as far as is humanly possible, and I am not at all inclined to accept the new clauses or amendments. I greatly fear that if we import the idea of nuisance or fear being required, especially in the case of soliciting in the street or from a vehicle, the whole effect of the Bill will be nullified. That may not be the hon. Gentleman's intention, but I believe that it will be the practical result.

[Miss Fookes]

The Bill will be emasculated and the longed-for relief that so many women and residents seek will be snatched away. I shall explain briefly why I take that view.

To suggest that nuisance or fear must be attributed to the woman who is solicited is to misunderstand the whole nature of the problem. There is certainly evidence that many women are put in fear or feel that they have been subjected to real nuisance, but that is not the end of the problem. Indeed, it is only the beginning of the problem, which is the cumulative effect on an area and its residents of frequent soliciting by kerb crawlers. The cumulative effect constitutes the nuisance. A requirement that nuisance must be caused to a particular woman on a particular occasion makes things far more difficult and leaves aside the cumulative effect about which so much concern has been expressed.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who is a sponsor of the Bill, knows as I do from constituency experience that at many hours of the day and night there is a build-up of cars waltzing slowly round a few streets, rather like a permanent rush hour of men looking for women. Quarrels and arguments break out about price and the sexual acts often take place in the cars quite close to the residential area. Frequently, there are unpleasant traces of all this activity, but I shall not dwell on that aspect now. It is the whole scene and set-up that is so unpleasant and degrading for residents — men as well as women. I believe that the amendments and new clauses will weaken the effect of the Bill by imposing such a narrow requirement for proof in the courts.

Mr. Parris: New clause 3 does not require that nuisance or fear be caused to the woman who is importuned. I agree with my hon. Friend that these activities are offensive, but residents who are offended enough to give evidence that nuisance has been caused to them will be able to satisfy new clause 3, which merely states that fear or nuisance must be caused.

Miss Fookes: I am afraid that my hon. Friend still misses the point. It is not the single act that necessarily causes nuisance or fear to others in the area. It is the effect of one act of soliciting upon another, with the cars going round and round like a merry-go-round at all hours of the night and day. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), who has taken such a close interest in the proceedings in Committee and now, has also taken the trouble to visit some of the areas which face this problem. Perhaps he could tell me how often he has been to such areas and talked to the residents where this is a genuine problem?

Mr. Parris: As I told my hon. Friend in Committee, I live near Bedford hill in Wandsworth, and I have friends there. I have no doubt of the nuisance caused there, or of the need for a new law to curb that nuisance. I have no doubt that the nuisance and offence are of a type on which either women or residents would be prepared to give evidence in court. I therefore have no doubt that a law which requires evidence of a nuisance or offence would be useful to the police and could be used to curb the nuisance in question.

Miss Fookes: If my hon. Friend is so familiar with the areas about which we are talking, I am surprised that he wants to hedge about with further restrictions the main provisions in the Bill.

Because there will be an onus of proof, it will not be easy to make a prosecution stick, and rightly so, even under the new clauses. I do not quarrel with that. If the action is to be a criminal offence, it is right and proper that evidence should be required which secures a conviction beyond all reasonable doubt. However, if we import "nuisance or fear" into the Bill, as suggested in the new clauses and amendments, we shall emasculate the Bill in a way which I find unacceptable, and which will be unacceptable to residents who for years have suffered harassment from kerb crawling, and to women who are approached.

Mr. Marlow: Surely if cumulative activity in an area causes nuisance or fear, an individual action within that cumulative activity would contribute to it and, therefore, nuisance or fear would be caused. As my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) said, the police would be empowered to act under the new clause. I put it to my hon. Friend, as a Conservative and someone who does not want unnecessary laws, that in some areas, regions or docks, the activity may take place without causing nuisance or fear. If neither nuisance nor fear is caused, does she want a law to deal with people going about their business? Does she want to stop that, or is she only anxious about the nuisance or fear that is caused?

Miss Fookes: Obviously, I am anxious about the nuisance or fear caused, but clearly no prosecutions would be brought in cases where the area was deserted. I do not see the point of my hon Friend's intervention.

As I have said what my firm views are, I do not wish to detain the House. However, I repeat that residents and women in the areas affected are looking eagerly to the Bill to obtain much-needed and long-sought redress. I hope that the House will not be tempted to weaken the provisions in the way that is being suggested, although I appreciate and understand the sincerity with which the new clauses and amendments were tabled.

Mr. Mikardo: I wish to address my remarks in support of new clause 4. In doing so, I must make some sharp criticisms of the terms of clause 3 of the Bill, but I assure the House that I am not hostile to the objectives which the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) seeks to achieve. All hon. Members would approve of those objectives.

The hon. Lady vividly described the reactions of large groups of residents to the problem. However, we must ensure that the provisions of the Bill do not do injustice or provide the possibility of injustice being done to individuals. With all respect to the hon. Lady, good causes do not justify bad law. We must get the law right. We must remove ambiguity, and, as far as possible, the necessity for test cases in court to establish what the text means— there are difficulties about that — and the danger of innocent actions being found in law to be culpable. Moreover, we must avoid adding to police powers, which would enable police officers to harass people who do not deserve to be harassed.

All those matters are and remain our responsibility, however much we approve of the objectives of the Bill. The hon. Lady knows what great respect and regard I have for her, but she cannot make the anxiety of many people her case for justifying the wording in a Bill, which is suspect, and some of the Bill is suspect.

Clause 3 of the Bill provides:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear."

That means in a manner likely to cause fear to a particular woman. Not all women, as with men, are alike. What strikes terror into my heart may be ridden with an easy smile by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). What terrifies one woman may be brushed off lightly by another. Some women are less easily frightened than others.

About a week ago I read an account of a lady who won a special coloured belt for achievements in one of the martial arts—kung fu. She said that she could break a man's back in four seconds. It would be much more difficult to cause her fear than a lady of gentler outlook, persuasion and habits. Therefore, a general rule about what is likely to cause women fear cannot be laid down.

If I were soliciting the group of estimable, sophisticated and formidable ladies who are honourable Members for something as innocent as a signature on an early-day motion, the only fear caused would be to me. The wording will not do. How can anybody but the woman know what is likely to cause her fear? How can anybody but that woman say, "I was caused to be afraid."? By what criteria other than her view and testimony can anyone conceivably know that she was afraid?

"likely to cause her fear"

10.30 am

Miss Fookes: As always, the hon. Gentleman expresses his views with clarity, but on this occasion he is mistaken. The Criminal Law Revision Committee, which suggested this legislation, specifically recommended this phrase for reasons opposite to those which he has given. It said:

"We have formulated the offence as one of soliciting in a manner likely to cause fear because a man's liability to criminal sanctions should not depend upon any undue susceptibility to fear on the part of the woman solicited of which he was unaware."

This is a pretty objective test to be applied by the courts.

Mr. Mikardo: I do not believe so. I am grateful to the hon. Lady for reminding me of what the Criminal Law Revision Committee said, but I should say two things. First, I do not treat the recommendations of that august body as tablets of stone. We are free to accept or reject its recommendations. Secondly, the sentence that she quoted does not hold water. The Committee is saying that is a manner likely to cause fear to any woman. That is what the sentence means, and I do not believe that it can be sustained, and I shall take a moment or two to explain why it cannot be sustained.

"a manner likely to cause her fear"

Some women are caused fear unnecessarily; some women are paranoiacs, claustrophobes or agoraphobes. It means that we shall reduce the offence to the lowest common denominator so that it will catch anyone who approaches any woman. If one takes to its logical conclusion the sentence that the hon. Lady quoted, the assumption must be that any soliciting is likely to cause fear to some woman and, therefore, must be assumed to cause fear to this woman. In that case, it would suffice if clause 3 simply said:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes."

I repeat that, if we take that sentence from the Criminal Law Revision Committee to its logical conclusion, any approach to a woman is likely to cause fear to some woman and, therefore, must be assumed to cause fear to that woman.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman said that the Criminal Law Revision Committee is an august and important body, but that he does not accept everything it says as though it was written on tablets of stone. He is right to make that remark. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) made one quotation from that Committee, he will probably know that, in its working paper on offences related to prostitution and allied offences in 1982, it stated:

"Conduct which caused fear might and probably would have features which would allow another criminal offence to be charged."

At that stage of its thought processes, the Committee obviously believed that the way to deal with it was through other criminal offences, not in this way. If it changed its mind on that point, it could change its mind again.

Mr. Mikardo: I did not know that, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to it. But I have much stronger evidence than that for saying that the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee are not tablets of stone, and are not divine wisdom that no one may question and that everyone must follow blindly or slavishly. My evidence is that successive Governments have ignored many recommendations of that Committee. It is no good the hon. Lady saying that we must do this because the Criminal Law Revision Committee said that we should do it.

Mr. Mellor: I take the hon. Gentleman's point that the policy on whether an act should be a criminal offence must be a matter for the House. Although we weigh the advice that we receive from the Criminal Law Revision Committee and from constituents and other groups, it is for the House to judge whether it agrees with it. However, the point being put to the hon. Gentleman is rather different. It is for us to say whether we believe that there is room in the criminal law of England for an offence that makes criminal an approach to a woman which causes her fear. The fact that the Criminal Law Revision Committee agrees with that is only one piece of evidence to weigh in the scales.

The point that my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) is making to the hon. Gentleman—I repeat it to him—is that, as clause 3(1) is framed, a man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear, which creates an objective test whereby the court would be asked to consider all the circumstances and to say, "Would a reasonable man in the position of the defendant know that his approach was likely to cause fear?" It is not based on the subjective response of the woman, who may be an hysteric or a perfectly normal, firm woman. That is a lawyer's advice as to the meaning of the clause. I would not embrace the clause if it did not have that objective test. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, on that point, the learned Lord Justices of Appeal and others in the Criminal Law Revision Committee are entitled to say, "This is the way to create an objective test."?

Mr. Mikardo: I am grateful to the Minister for confirming my opinion of the committee, and that disposes of that part of the argument once and for all. He is saying, as I am, that we must make up our minds on the basis of our analysis of the position.

My answer to the Minister's second question is no, because I do not believe that the clause creates an objective test. With all respect to that group of learned and distinguished gentlemen, there is only one objective test of behaviour likely to cause fear to a specific woman, and that is whether the woman has been caused fear. The only person who can know whether she has been caused fear is the woman herself. How can anyone else know? Let us suppose that the Minister and I are walking along the pavement and we see a chap approaching a woman. How could he or I know whether she was afraid, contemptuous, amused or, as could conceivably happen, although probably not often, whether she was willing?

Despite the views of those learned gentlemen, there can be no objective test of whether conduct is likely to cause fear in a woman, except the fact that it has caused fear, and the only person who can know whether it caused fear is the woman herself.

Mr. Mellor: I can agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point without conceding the rest of his case. The Government are not anxious to put on the statute book an arbitrary offence that depends on a subjective response, and that is why I am taking the hon. Gentleman's argument so seriously. I shall consider what he said carefully so that if, as I hope, the Bill proceeds to the other place, we can satisfy ourselves further that the objectivity we wish to achieve has been achieved.

It is highly unlikely that a charge could be brought under clause 3 without the woman involved giving evidence to the court. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that, unless a witness is sitting next to the woman on the tube train when the incident occurs, it is unlikely that anyone else can give evidence. But if the woman makes a complaint to a police officer, her stating that she has been caused fear will not be conclusive. It will be for the court to determine objectively whether what the individual said was likely to cause fear to a woman in those circumstances. We are not talking about someone travelling home late at night on the tube and saying to a woman, "Nice day, was it not?", and the woman then replying, "Get away from me, you beast; I will call the police." The mere fact that she would claim that she was put in fear would not be a ground for a conviction. The criterion would have to be whether a reasonable woman in those circumstances would have reacted in that way. I hope that that clears up the point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the House that this is Report stage. We are not in Committee and right and hon. Members should wait until they catch my eye to make their speeches. The purpose of interventions should be to clarify matters.

Mr. Mikardo: I take that as an instruction to me not to give way any more. I shall obey your instruction implicitly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I always obey the instructions of the Chair.

From what the Minister has said, it is clear that he and I are moving towards each other and reaching a common point. I believe, with him and the hon. Member for Drake, that we should have a law that prevents men from soliciting women in a way that puts the wind up them and frightens them. There can be no question about that. I know that some women are sensitive, and perhaps mentally not quite well, and so we cannot rely only on the evidence of a woman, although that is a factor to be taken into account.

However, if there is no such evidence, there is no reliable evidence. I am not saying that we must automatically convict when a woman says that she was afraid, but we cannot convict at all unless she says that she was afraid.

As the Minister has been kind enough to give a trailer of his speech and has promised to have a hard look at what I am saying, it would be churlish of me to press the point any further. I take satisfaction from that because I know that he means it sincerely and will look at the matter. I hope that, in the course of his looking at this matter with his colleagues in the Department and the hon. Member for Drake, he will carefully consider whether they should abandon this part of the Bill so that cases depend on more than just corroborative evidence from the potential victim. That is a key matter, and that is why I support new clause 4.

Mr. Spencer: These new clauses and amendments concern the fundamental nature of the framework of the Bill. If they were to be passed, they would destroy the tripartite basis of the recommendations made by the Criminal Law Revision Committee upon which this Bill is based. When it comes to disappointing lawyers on the one hand or disappointing the public on the other, I should much prefer to disappoint the lawyers if I thought that that was in the public interest. If we passed this group of new clauses and amendments, we would cause deep disappointment in certain parts of the country where people are looking to the Bill to solve a pressing social problem.

There will be disappointment in Argyle square near King's Cross. As a former Camden councillor, I was amazed to hear the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who has some knowledge of the problem in Argyle square, suggest that there is anything other than wholehearted support from that area for the provsions of the Bill. When I was on Camden council there were frequent petitions from the residents of that area asking for something to be done. If the Bill goes through in its present form, that request will be answered.

Under the inner area programme, a great deal of public money is being poured into the central area of my constituency. However, that investment can come properly to fruition only when the environment for the residents in that area is properly protected by a Bill such as this.

Mr. Soley: The hon. and learned Gentleman misquoted me. I did not say that there was no support for this measure because there is, and I would go out of my way to say that there is a problem. However, I went out of my way to explain why new clauses 3 and 4 and amendments Nos. 40 and 41 will enable residents in cases such as Argyle square to deal with the matter.

10.45 am

Mr. Spencer: One of the complaints not only from Argyle square in London but from Saxby street in Leicester is that lives are made hell by people going round at 2 o'clock in the morning and preventing us from getting a good night's sleep. If the police have to go round the next morning and say, "We are sorry that your lives were hell all last night. We should now like you to come along to the magistrates court, take a day or so off work, and give evidence in support of this case," people would conclude that the law was being unduly cumbersome and not protecting their interests properly.

I can give the hon. and learned Gentleman another example. He must have had cases in his surgery, as we all have, of residents who are annoyed and whose lives are made the subject of great inconvenience by noise from neighbours. They can go along to the county court or the local authority can act on their behalf in the county court. All that is required is for them to go along and give evidence on oath. However, people are most disconcerted at the prospect of being required to give evidence in court.

Not many people will be rushing forward to give evidence if the new clauses are passed. The Criminal Law Revision Committee based itself on the experience of the law before the sexual Offences Act 1959, when it was necessary to prove some annoyance. It mentioned how difficult it was to get members of the public to give evidence in such cases. Such a difficulty would be just as real today.

Mr. Marlow: This may not be a conclusive point, but my hon. and learned Friend was asking the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) whether people had come to his surgery or advice bureau to complain about noise. It would be interesting to know how many people have come to my hon. and learned Friend's advice bureau to raise the issue of kerb crawling.

Mr. Spencer: People come in person or in a representative capacity. I have leaders of the community, Asian leaders from the central area, where the Asian community of Leicester predominantly lives, people from the mosques and Asian leaders of varying stature coming on behalf of their communities. They tell me that their lives are being ruined by prostitution in the central areas and that their wives and children fear to go out unescorted. I have had the South Highfields residents association imploring me to go to the chief constable and have something done.

Last year, the chief constable set up two special operations as a result of which on one occasion about 20 men were arrested and on a subsequent occasion 14 men were arrested and bound over under the 1361 Act to keep the peace. This is a problem of substantial dimensions in my constituency and there is an abundance of evidence in the Leicester Mercury and the Leicester Muslim that large numbers of people, irrespective of class, creed or colour, living in the central region of Leicester, want something done. They are looking to this Bill, substantially in its present form, to alleviate this discomfort. They would be very disappointed if they thought that anything was being done to impede the Bill's passage to the statute book.

I do not wish to detain the House, but it is necessary to indicate the status of some of the lawyers who sat on the committee. Other than Lord Justice Lawton, who has had wide experience of the criminal law at all levels throughout his long life at the Bar and, more subsequently, on the Bench——

Mr. Parris: My hon. and learned Friend said that his constituents want the Bill to be passed in its present form. It is not my experience that constituents take so close an interest in politics or study the drafting of Bills in minute detail. It is not possible to say that they are so well acquainted with the form of any Bill in Committee or on Report that they are substantially in agreement with that Bill as it stands.

Would it not be fairer to say that my hon. and learned Friend's constituents want something done about kerb crawling? Would it not be fair to acknowledge that many of us want that also, but do not think that the Bill, as drafted, is quite the right way to achieve that? The Bill is capable of improvement.

Mr. Spencer: It would be not this world, but somewhere else, if we found that the Bill was in a wholly perfect state. The question is whether it substantially meets the complaints of our constituents, and I believe that it does. Undue time should not be spent seeking to achieve an entirely unrealistic state of perfection. If we adopted that method of proceeding in the House, I doubt whether any piece of legislation would ever reach the statute book.

If an argument does not commend itself, it does not matter from whose mouth it comes. It does not matter how august is the company of people who put forward that view. However, it is extraordinary how well informed and how substantial was the composition of the committee that made these recommendations. It comprised not only Lord Justice Lawton but Mr. Justice McCullough, who has wide experience on the midlands circuit, two people who either are or have been stipendary magistrates in London, the Director of Public Prosecutions, an extremely well-known solicitor and—and this meets the point about clause 3—Professor Smith of Nottingham. He is the foremost exponent of the criminal law in the academic world of Britain. He habitually lectures to judicial seminars that I and other members of the judiciary have attended. He has the highest status. Like anybody else, of course, he can be wrong. But if there is on the one hand a collection of brilliant legal talent and on the other hand the coruscating intellect of the hon. Member for Hammersmith, to which I give full accord, I am bound to come down in favour of the members of the committee.

Many men underestimate the fear felt by women when faced with solicitation in the street, especially if it happens at night or if they are accompanied by children, as unfortunately sometimes happens. Their fear arises not for their personal safety but for the safety and welfare of the child. That element is encompassed in the clause as drafted, and if it were to be drawn tighter, it would fail to meet the justice of the case.

Mr. Parris: My hon. and learned Friend is patient, and this is the last time that I shall interrupt him. He spoke of the brilliance of the members of the committee and I do not dissent from that. I am sure that each and every one of them is brilliant. However, on page 40 of its interim report, the committee said:

> "Some of us are of the opinion that it would be undesirable for police officers to give evidence about the effect of an accused's conduct on a third party not called as a witness."

Would my hon. and learned Friend care to speculate which of the brilliant members of the committee were of that opinion?

Mr. Spencer: That would not profit us one iota. I fear that my hon. Friend is falling into the trap of engaging the

[Mr. Spencer]

House in seeking to obtain a perfect Bill, when all we are anxious to do—I am sure that he agrees—is to obtain a Bill that meets the justice of the case.

Miss Fookes: Perhaps I could help my hon. and learned Friend. The committee addressed itself to that point and said in the report:

"We would assume that in the case of our third new offence"— that is the one that we are considering—

"the woman would almost always have to be called as a witness."

Mr. Spencer: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for reminding me of that. My somewhat limited experience of the law — only about 25 years — has taught me that usually it is bad to confuse the substantive law with the adjectival law. Unless there are strong and compelling reasons, it is not a good method to say what will amount to proof in any given case. Cases are infinitely various. Therefore, to require corroboration or to say that a particular witness should or must be called, is a mistake in legislation. There are sometimes cases where, notwithstanding the absence of the woman, the facts are overwhelming. Although I accept my hon. Friend's point, in cases under clause 3 it would be desirable and right to call the woman. However, there may be a small residue of cases where that would not be necessary and it would impede the cause of justice for it to be required—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] For the same reason that it applies in every other branch of the law. It is a commonplace in our courts that sometimes the victim, or the person worst affected by the conduct under complaint, is not available or not called. Notwithstanding that, the jury — 12 ordinary members of the public — are totally satisfied that the case has been proved. Therefore, as a general principle it is bad to confuse the substantive and the adjectival law.

Mr. Mikardo: The hon. and learned Gentleman is talking about a jury. There is no provision for trial by jury in the Bill.

Mr. Spencer: I accept that. I make the point merely to demonstrate that a court, however comprised—even if it be of persons not versed in courts or in the law—and notwithstanding the absence of the victim, can still find it consistent with their duties to do justice to reach the conclusion that the offence has been proved.

Therefore, Opposition Members are pursuing a bad point by suggesting that, under clause 3, in every case the law should require the woman to attend. I support the Bill in its present form.

11 am

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): This has been, and I am sure will continue to be, an interesting and at times a fascinating debate. This is the kind of Bill to which many hon. Members feel they have commitment, in that it is their duty to try to help those whom they seek to represent while safeguarding the rights of individuals who could find themselves in difficulty as a result of such legislation.

We have heard from both sides of the House of the problems in many parts of the country. I represent a constituency of which part, sadly, has for many years experienced the most appalling problems, and they remain. I shall not relate the exchanges that I have had with successive Home Office Ministers over the years that I have been a Member of Parliament in trying to help my constituents and, if possible, to rid the area of its problems.

It is no exaggeration to say that over the years I have talked to hundreds of women who have come to my advice service or attended meetings in the constituency. I have had outlined to me their experiences, many of them encountering the difficulty not once or twice but on countless occasions.

In making these comments I am trying to be scrupulously fair. From talking to my female constituents I get the clear impression that they experienced a combination of annoyance and, for a large percentage of them, an element of fear, and it is obvious that the element of fear is more acute during the late evening than it is in day time.

A women walks along a road, a car stops beside her, windows are lowered and comments are made. If that happens during the evening, the startling effects are greater than if it happens in daylight, and there are many instances of fear being occasioned to women in those circumstances.

I accept what my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said, and this is one of the dilemmas that we face. A number of hon. Members know a lady who was once accosted in Bedford hill. She felt annoyed. She also felt that it was a joke that she should have been solicited. But it has to be said that many women in those circumstances feel an element of fear, possibly for only a few seconds, until they realise, "It is some fellow trying to pick me up."

In my constituency, there have been many threats to members of the local community who felt that they were getting nowhere, having been promised repeatedly by the Government of the day that something would be done. They decided, to their credit, that they had to make their presence felt not only against the women coming in to the area to solicit men but against those looking after them, their minders.

There is clear evidence of what has happened in my constituency following protests by local residents about the activities of prostitutes and their minders. There has been violence. There have been attacks on property. I believe that it is my duty to try to help my constituents by way of legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) made a very fair comment about the requirement in amendment No. 41 that a person might be required to give evidence either of nuisance or of offence being caused. We know how our courts work. We have certain standards. People charged with alleged offences should, either themselves or through their representatives, have the opportunity to cross-examine those making the allegations. But again an element of fear is involved. Women fear the kind of attack that may be made upon them in court if they decide to take matters to court because they want action. They fear that they will be subjected to a great deal of humiliation. There are some very tricky lawyers about. It may be that the woman who goes to court is required to give evidence and then to be cross-examined by the defendant's solicitor. She may be asked what she was doing in the area at the time, how she was dressed, whether she is married or living with someone, and so on.

Since the Committee stage I have spoken to several local groups in my area and at meetings attended by both men and women. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) said that normally members of the public did not take much notice of legislation. I can assure him that in my area there has been very keen interest in the Bill, especially during its Committee stage.

Mr. Parris: I did not say that the public did not take much interest in legislation. I said that they did not study minutely the drafting of legislation. Of course the hon. Gentleman is right. He knows better than I do, but I know, too, that his constituents are concerned because many of them have written to me saying, "We hear that you are obstructing this Bill"——

Mr. Mellor: Quite right.

Mr. Parris: I hear my hon. Friend the Minister murmur, "Quite right." Thoughout the Committee stage, he was putting it about that my aim was to wreck or obstruct the Bill. That is quite wrong. My aim is to make the Bill a fairer one so that we catch those who ought to be caught and do not put in danger people who should not be in danger either of arrest or prosecution. As a result of the rumours that the Minister and others have been putting about, I have had a great many letters, some of them abusive, and even threats to put bricks through my windows in Wandsworth, where I too live.

I said in Committee and I have said publicly and privately to the Minister that the nuisance is a grave one and that it is right that we should address ourselves to it. However, the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) misunderstands me when he suggests that I believe that people do not take an interest in legislation. They do, and they have written to me saying, "Please do not obstruct the Bill, because people are persistently soliciting and we want it stopped." I have written back saying, "I agree that people are persistently soliciting, and it is persistent soliciting that I want to make an offence." They have then written to me saying, "We have not actually seen the Bill. In that case, we see what you mean and we agree with you."

Mr. Cox: I note the hon. Gentleman's comments. I hope sincerely that he does not receive any further threats of violence. They do not help anyone who is genuinely trying to come to the aid of the residents of our community who experience this difficulty.

There is a very deep fear of going to court because of the kind of attacks that could be made against women by solicitors. This problem must be looked at. It would be interesting to hear the Minister's views on amendment No. 41.

There are many other amendments to discuss. Therefore, the remainder of my comments will be brief. I hope that we shall reach the end of our discussions today because nothing would be more tragic than for the debate not to be concluded and, if there are to be votes, for those votes not to be taken today. I have witnessed over the years the activities of those who kerb crawl and pick up women in my area and I accept that some people may be looking for a particular address and may stop to ask for information. However, I do not believe that anybody who watched their activities could be in any doubt about what the overwhelming majority of them were doing. They are there for one specific reason.

I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar that we should try to deal with the 99 per cent. who are kerb crawling, but we should also try to safeguard the rights of the innocent 1 per cent. who may be caught up by the legislation. I want action, but all hon. Members who represent constituencies which suffer from this type of problem ought to be realistic enough to accept that people's rights have to be safeguarded.

Although I am aware of your earlier comments, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should welcome an assurance from the Under-Secretary that within one year, or two years at the very most, he will make a statement or there will be a short debate in which discussion can take place about how this Bill, if it becomes law, is working. That would allay the fears of many hon. Members. There ought to be an opportunity to examine how the Bill is working in practice and whether problems are being caused by it. If we then find that it is causing problems, I shall go back to my constituents and say to them that I spoke against colleagues of mine because I felt that I had a duty to do so, but that now that the Bill has been working for this period of time there are aspects of it which I can no longer support. If the Minister were able to give an assurance that there is to be a review, it would be of great help to many hon. Members.

Mr. Parris: The group of amendments that we are discussing ranges broadly over the first three clauses. It includes not just the elements of the offence but, in the case of some amendments, the penalties and the mode of trial. Therefore the debate upon this group of amendments has to be wide-ranging. I should like to go through the amendments one by one because some of them are entirely separable.

Before I do so, I think it is in order to lay my cards on the table, as I tried to do a minute or two ago in an intervention during the speech of the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox). There are certain hon. Members who object to any Bill of this kind and who will wish to prevent it from becoming law. Other hon. Members believe that it should become law in substantially its present form. I believe that a Bill is necessary and that this one comes quite near to meeting our requirements. However, in two respects the drafting goes further than is necessary in order to deal with the nuisance that needs to be dealt with. Therefore I wish to improve the Bill, not to obstruct it. That was my attitude in Committee and that is my attitude today. I wish that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department would accept my word on that.

Mr. Mellor: People are judged by their actions. If the Bill makes progress without too lengthy a contribution from my hon. Friend, we shall know that what he has said is right. However, it should be understood that what I said earlier was in the context of an opening speech which lasted for an hour and three quarters during the first sitting of the Committee. One is not being unduly cynical if one says that that was not entirely consistent with an attitude of friendship towards the Bill. However, I hear what my hon. Friend says. I shall be only too happy to congratulate him at the end of the afternoon on having delivered on his pledge.

Mr. Parris: I shall reply to that point in a minute, but my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) wishes to intervene.

11.15 am

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. As the Minister knows, this is a private Member's Bill and I am sure that he would wish any measure that is to be enacted to be properly and fully debated. If the Government are committed to a measure such as this being placed on the statute book, it is for them to provide whatever time is needed to ensure that the matter is properly debated and the necessary amendments made.

Mr. Parris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for what he has said. May I point out to him, however, that whatever progress the Bill makes will depend partly upon him and upon my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes). If the small, almost drafting, improvements, that could be made to the Bill are accepted, I see no reason why it should not make a great deal of progress. If the amendments are not accepted, that fact will render the Bill substantially unacceptable in its present form. I look to my hon. Friend the Member for Drake and to the Minister for a sympathetic response. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is absolutely right. If the Government are committed to the Bill and believe, as I do, that it addresses a public nuisance which requires legislation, it is for them to legislate in what I would describe as an honest way by means of a Government Bill which is taken through the House in Government time.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Drake upon her part in making sure that something is done about this problem. First, may I reply to some of the points which have been made in the debate on these amendments. The hon. Member for Tooting referred to the long history of complaints with which he has had to deal in his constituency. I wholeheartedly endorse what he said. I know it to be true for two reasons. First, I live very close to his constituency, where I have many friends, and I know the Bedford hill area. The hon. Member does not exaggerate either the scale of the problem or the depth of public resentment about it.

Secondly, I have taken an interest in legislation concerning prostitution ever since I became a Member of Parliament six years ago. I know that the hon. Member for Tooting is always in the Chamber when there is a debate on the subject, and I recall an excellent Adjournment debate of his upon it. He has been doing his best for the six years that I have been a Member of Parliament—and, I am sure, for very much longer—to bring the matter to the attention of the House. Therefore I congratulate him, even though he and I will not agree on every point relating to the drafting of the Bill.

The hon. Member referred to the real annoyance and fear that is caused to women in his constituency. It is indeed a real annoyance, and on occasions really deep fear is experienced. And it is always a nuisance. One of the purposes of many of the amendments is simply to oblige the prosecution to bring evidence of that annoyance or fear.

On the basis of my observations and the many letters that I have received I have no doubt that people would be prepared to come before the courts and give evidence of the annoyance or fear caused not just to themselves as a result of being importuned but to themselves and their families as a result of living in a neighbourhood where such importuning goes on.

The hon. Gentleman said that there would be a problem about bringing women to court as witnesses because they would be afraid or embarrassed, and I acknowledge that, as I tried to do on Second Reading. But we must also acknowledge that that is sometimes advanced as an argument for not bringing a woman to court as a witness in a case of rape. In such a case the annoyance, embarrassment and fear which result from having to come before a court is very real, yet that does not persuade us that it is not right to demand that such a woman should be called as a witness.

Mr. Marlow: I fully accept my hon. Friend's point about how unpleasant, obnoxious and embarrassing it could be for someone to give evidence in those circumstances, but there is the other possibility that, in an area where kerb crawling is an undoubted damnation and nuisance about which something must be done, the residents will obviously take an interest in what is happening locally. It is not beyond imagination that if the Bill is amended in the way that my hon. Friend and I would wish, and enacted, the residents would become involved in the giving of evidence and that would be far more satisfactory than having insufficient evidence.

Mr. Parris: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. If it ever happened that the Bill were enacted with this amendment and the police complained that they were unable to bring charges successfully because residents would not give evidence, I have no doubt that residents associations would be formed to ensure that such evidence was available.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The hon. Gentleman has drawn a comparison with victims of rape and spoken of the difficulties of getting people to appear in court in such circumstances. He drew attention to that on Second Reading, as indeed did I and several other hon. Members. But if that is the case, would logic suggest — the Minister drew the same comparison—that we should cut out the need for victims of rape to appear in court, or would he argue, as I would strongly argue, that court procedures for the victims of rape and many other crimes should be seriously reconsidered? We may not be able to make those perfect but they are now quite monstrous in their approach to such questions.

Mr. Parris: I agree. Many laws create real problems for innocent witnesses and victims of crime. They have real problems in giving evidence. We must look carefully at ways in which we can help and protect them. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North has tabled an amendment, which I hope will be reached later, relating to publicity that is given to such trials before a conviction. No doubt he will go into that in greater detail.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake said that the speeches that she had heard so far gave her a sense of deja vu; that we have discussed all these matters in great detail in Committee. That is true of clause 1, when we discussed things in great detail. My hon. Friend the Minister spoke for at least three quarters of an hour on that, if one includes his many interruptions to my speech. I spoke at even greater length on clause 1. To a lesser extent clause 2 was satisfactorily discussed and dealt with in Committee.

Clause 3 and the remaining clauses were scarcely discussed at all in Committee. I was 20 minutes late for the third sitting of the Committee when we were about to embark on clause 3, and in my absence the Committee went through clause 3 and the remaining clauses with virtually no discussion. Therefore, it would not be right to say that the Bill had been effectively discussed in Committee. Clause 3 has had no attention at all yet and it deserves attention on Report.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake said that to import into the Bill an element of nuisance or fear would emasculate it because the nuisance or fear is cumulative and is caused to residents. I have already said that under many of the amendments that we are discussing there is no problem about calling residents as witnesses. Their witness would be sufficient in the terms in which the amendments are drafted. My hon. Friend spoke about what she called the cumulaative effect of this kind of activity. She has a strong point, but that is always an argument about which I worry when drafting legislation. Where the complaint is that a totality of activity is the nuisance rather than any individual's contribution to it, be it on matters of morality, public nuisance, obstruction or meetings in the street, if that argument is too easily allowed and we are not careful, we shall find ourselves prosecuting people who are not guilty of anything for something to which they may wittingly or unwittingly have contributed. One must be careful about such legislation.

My hon. Friend has a point because it is the cumulative activity that worries many residents. She spoke about people making love—if that is the right expression—in parked cars. That is already an offence. It is probably gross indecency, although I do not know under which section of the 1956 Act. If she were to advance that sort of argument too strongly, she would begin to say that what is unpleasant is not simply a particular couple making love in a particular car but all kinds of amorous activity going on in an area. One would then begin to wonder whether people should be prosecuted for kissing or petting in cars because that would contribute to a general level of activity that would be unwelcome to residents. I make that point because I want to warn the House that the argument about cumulative activity is dangerous. Whereas we cannot ignore it and must not always resist it, we must be alerted to the dangers of taking it too far.

Another example would be obstructing the highway. The point that one of my hon. Friends made about that was right. There is no problem about bringing an accused person to court, not for creating the totality of a cumulative effect but for making a significant contribution to that totality. That is what we should be trying to legislate against in the Bill. There are many other cases in which the contribution made by one particular car to obstructing the highway is not great but that does not make it hard for the police to bring charges successfully on the grounds that that car and others like it were contributing to an overall obstruction.

If cumulative nuisance is the problem with which we are minded to deal — I agree that it is — it is the individual contribution of the accused towards a cumulative nuisance against which we want to legislate. We should make it clear what that contribution has to be in order for a person to be found guilty. It is the purpose of some of the amendments to make that clear

It was said that it was all very well to complain and that if cumulative nuisance was what concerned us we should limit the effect of the legislation to areas where there was a cumulative nuisance. My hon. Friend the Member for Drake was asked why the legislation should apply to isolated areas where such offences were rare. My hon. Friend said that prosecutions would not be brought unless that was a particular problem.

I do not like legislation which leaves it to the police to decide when prosecution should and should not be brought. I accept that all legislation must leave an element of discretion to the police, but the less discretion that we can leave to the police the better. Hon. Members have argued for amendments that would narrow the discretion left to the police in bringing prosecutions, and that is right. If one takes my hon. Friend's logic to its conclusion, the best way to deal with the offence would be to make it an offence to wind down the window of a car and speak to a woman and rely on the good sense of the police not to prosecute except in cases where that was clearly a public nuisance. No one would suggest that that is the way to go. We can hone down the offence more effectively than that.

Miss Fookes: I do not recognise the argument that my hon. Friend is attributing to me, but never mind, I will not waste time on that. We shall soon have an independent prosecution service and if we look to the future rather than the present, surely my hon. Friend agrees that that will deal with some of the issues that are worrying him.

Mr. Parris: I look forward to the establishment of an independent prosecution service and I hope that it will make prosecution fairer and more equitable and that there will be nationally establishable criteria. However, we should not pass broad, catch-all laws and rely on the good sense of a hoped-for national prosection service to ensure that the laws are enforced only when we would want them to be enforced. As far as possible, the law should fit the crime that we wish to prosecute. I am suggesting ways in which that could be done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake quoted the conclusion of the Criminal Law Revision Committee that it envisaged that in cases brought under clause 3 the woman would almost always have to be called as a witness. I do not see why the committee took that view. Clause 3 states:

> "A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear."

Suppose that two police officers on a tube train see a person, who is obviously drunk, lunge and paw at a woman and hear him make indecent proposals to her and, when the train stops at a station, the woman runs off in panic and cannot be traced. If both police officers say that they saw that happen, I do not see why a court would feel that the woman had to be called as a witness. There ought to be an offence of which that man is guilty, whether or not we can find the woman to be a witness.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake expounded at length on the worthiness and legal competence of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. Although men of such brilliance may not think it likely that a case could be proved unless a woman was called as a witness, I disagree, and hon. Members are still entitled to their opinions, however much we may respect the legal competence of the Criminal Law Revision Committee and the Minister.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) and the hon. Member for Tooting expounded at length on the fact that the public want the Bill. I know that, and I want a Bill that deals with the offence. However, I do not believe that the public are acquainted with the details of the Bill and I think that if they were, many would agree with me that we need a Bill to cover the offence, but that this Bill is too broadly drafted and could be effectively honed down without—to use the language of my hon. Friend the Member for Drake—emasculating it.

Mr. Marlow: I dare say that my hon. Friend reads The Guardian from time to time.

Mr. Parris: Never.

Mr. Marlow: May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the editorial in The Guardian on 26 February? It said:

"What women walking down the street want and what the residents of red light districts want is to be free from the annoyance and harassment of prostitution and soliciting."

However, it went on:

"That welcome and belated insight does not mean that any and every measure based on it should be supported. The Bill is a typically narrow law and order way of dealing with the issue of prostitution."

The implication of that editorial is that we certainly want to deal with the problem, but that we want to deal with it in the right way.

Mr. Parris: My hon. Friend is right and The Guardian is right. The Home Office has been less than courageous in tackling the problems of prostitution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am listening carefully and the hon. Gentleman is making almost another Second Reading speech. He must direct his remarks to the amendments before us.

Mr. Parris: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was responding to my hon. Friend for Northampton, North and I should not have been tempted to do so.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South mentioned noise problems and said that people might feel a sense of grievance, but might not wish to air their grievance in court. There are many areas in the ordinary intercourse between human beings where grievances are felt, but where we would not wish to take them to court. I draw from that fact the rough and ready conclusion that that is a reasonable way of distinguishing between the sort of grievance that should come within the scope of the criminal law and the sort that ought not.

If people do not feel sufficiently strongly about noise, for example, to claim in court that it is causing them annoyance, that is an argument for not necessarily prosecuting the person who has caused the noise. I draw the same conclusion, rough and ready though it may be, about soliciting.

This is a disparate group — if that is not a contradiction in terms—of amendments. New clause 4 states:

"an offence . . . shall not be proved unless the person who has been caused nuisance or fear gives evidence of such".

That is the proposition which we have been discussing for the past hour or two. I see problems in the new clause, but I have explained the circumstances in which it would be practicable to call people to give evidence of nuisance or fear and the new clause would improve the Bill.

I do not think that fear is the emotion which we should always demand before prosecuting someone. There may be cases in which the woman will be unwilling to give evidence and there will not be residents who can be called as witnesses, but I have some sympathy with the new clause, because it would improve the Bill and would allow the law to be prosecuted reasonably. However, it would allow people to escape occasionally and allow some offences to go unchecked. Therefore, although the new clause would improve the Bill, there are preferable ways of achieving its objective. New clause 3 says:

"A man commits an offence if in a street or public place he solicits women (or the same woman) for sexual purposes in a manner which causes nuisance or fear."

That is another way of achieving the effects that new clause 4 attempts to achieve.

Mr. Marlow: Not being a lawyer, I am uncertain about what is meant by a man soliciting a woman. We all know what is meant by a woman soliciting a man, but what does my hon. Friend think is meant by references to a man soliciting a woman?

Mr. Parris: There are some problems about that, although they ought to have been dealt with under existing case law, because the offence of solicitation has been part of our criminal law for many years.

It is clear that a man who says to a woman, "How about it, darling?" or wolf whistles and waves pound notes out of a car window is soliciting, but it is less clear whether he is soliciting a woman if he is approached by her and indicates that the approach is not unwelcome and starts speaking to her. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake or the Minister will give us advice on that.

It is clear that the purpose of the Bill is to prosecute men who importune women. I use "importune" in the sense in which it is used on a daily basis, rather than with the meaning that has come to be attached to it under section 32 of the 1956 Act, which is male importuning. The court usage of importune has cheapened the word and in court it means only "solicit". However, in the ordinary sense of our language "importune" means to cause annoyance or, more fully, to persist to the annoyance or embarrassment of another person in solicitation. If we used importune in its real sense in section 32, I should be happy. If we could draft the Bill in a way that made it clear that men who importuned would be guilty of an offence and not those who merely asked or replied to an invitation, the Bill would be greatly improved. The clauses that we are discussing represent a variety of ways of achieving that effect.

I direct myself now to new clause 7. When you think that it is an appropriate moment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that you will permit a Division on the clause. It takes an entirely different approach to the other new clauses and I should like to press it to a Division. The clause states:

"The reference in section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 to a man persistently soliciting or importuning in a public place for immoral purposes shall be taken as applying to men soliciting women as well as men soliciting men.".

My purpose is to extend section 32 of the 1956 Act in the way that I have outlined. I believe that the section so expanded and clarified would render clauses 1 and 2 unnecessary. It would be a satisfactory substitute for the first two clauses.

In previous times it was unclear whether section 32 applied only to male-to-male soliciting or whether it applied also to a man soliciting a woman. There was a famous case called Crook v. Edmondson in which the prosecution argued that the phrase "for immoral purposes" could include a man wishing to attract the services of a prostitute and did not have to be a man soliciting a man.

Unfortunately, the court found that section 32 was intended to cover only male-to-male soliciting. Ever since then section 32 has been used to cover only man-to-man importuning. There is no reason why it should be restricted in that way. I find the decision in Crook v. Edmondson rather eccentric and it seems that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake agrees with me. Indeed, she said so in Committee.

In its interim paper, the Criminal Law Revision Committee considered the possibility of acting in the way that I am proposing in new clause 7. It discussed the option of clarifying section 32 to make it clear that it covers man-to-woman as well as man-to-man solicitations, rather than drafting a new Bill on kerb crawling. The Committee decided that that was not the best approach. It stated that under section 32 there is a need to prove persistence. It felt that in any new legislation there should be no need to prove persistence. I believe that that view was shared by the police.

In clause 2, there is a need to prove persistence and the word "persistently" appears in it. Clause 1 covers solicitation from a motor vehicle and under that clause there is no need to prove persistence. It is the argument about persistence to which I shall turn.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State was quizzed repeatedly in Committee by my hon. Friends and me about why there should have to be persistence proved in soliciting on the pavement and not from a motor vehicle. None of us who felt that the distinction was anomalous has been persuaded by my hon. Friend's answer; indeed, we have not been able to understand it. He appears to take the view that the problem lies in the cumulative nuisance that is involved in soliciting from a motor vehicle and that it does not matter whether 10 men solicit once or five men solicit twice. He argues that in either circumstance the same nuisance will be caused and that we should be able to prosecute 10 men who solicit once as easily as five who solicit twice. He is right, but that argument applies with equal force also to soliciting on the pavement. It applies with equal force also to clause 2. It does not matter whether in an area of London or Leicester, where prostitution is common, five men solicit twice on the pavement or 10 men solicit once. It does not matter particularly whether five prostitutes are extremely persistent or whether 10 are less persistent. The result is the same because the same nuisance is caused. If we are to accept my hon. Friend's logic on clause 1, why should we not accept it on clause 2?

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State advanced another argument which still baffles me. He suggested that there was something innately offensive about soliciting from a motor vehicle. He seemed to imply that soliciting from a pavement was not quite so offensive. I disagree with him. I consider soliciting on a pavement to be more offensive than from a motor car. Why do men solicit from motor vehicles? It can be a slightly less intrusive way of trawling for what they seek to catch than walking along a pavement and importuning women. As it is less intrusive to solicit from a motor vehicle than to do so on the pavement, many men choose the anonymity of motor vehicles from which to solicit. I cannot understand my hon. Friend's logic or that of the Home Office. If pavement soliciting is not yet legal or smiled upon by the Home Office, it is apparently more genteel, less intrusive and less offensive than soliciting from motor vehicles.

As car soliciting is a much more convenient way of picking up prostitutes than soliciting on the pavement, men have turned in increasing numbers to looking for women from their cars rather than suffering the embarrassment of soliciting while walking along the pavement. Therefore, kerb crawling has become a more popular way of picking up prostitutes than walking along the pavement. In one sense, my hon. Friend is right because kerb crawling is more of a nuisance now than pavement soliciting, but that is only because men have chosen to solicit from their cars rather than from on the pavement. The reduced burden of proof under clause 1 and the increased burden under clause 2 could lead to wise men seeking legal advice and deciding in future to look for a woman on foot on the street rather than from their cars. If that happens, the unintended consequence of the Bill would be a reduction in the incidence of kerb crawling and an increase in pavement soliciting. We would return to the earlier days of the century when pavement soliciting was a greater problem than it is now.

Mr. Marlow: Can my hon. Friend see into the mind of our hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and understand why it should be necessary for persistence to be proved when dealing with someone who has been looking for a woman while on foot but not while doing so from a car? I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) is concerned about the innocent suffering miscarriages of justice. Why is it necessary that persistence should be proved? It would be useful to know at this stage what it is that causes our hon. Friend to say that persistence is essential if we are to convict someone who walks on the pavement and solicits women but not if he solicits women from his car. What is the difference?

Mr. Parris: That is the point that I have been trying to make, perhaps inadequately. I do not understand what the difference is. I have tried to recount the explanation of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State but I am baffled by it and perhaps I have not given a fair recounting. It may be that my hon. Friend will be able to explain his argument. I think that he has misunderstood the revision committee's logic. The committee has never suggested that kerb crawling is more of a nuisance than pavement soliciting or that there is something uniquely offensive about soliciting from a car which does not apply to soliciting on the pavement. The committee goes for persistence and is prepared to lay down persistence because the requirement to prove persistence makes it slightly more difficult to make the charges stick and therefore reduces the possibility of mistaken accusation. That is a good reason for importing an element of persistence into section 32 and clauses 1 and 2.

Page 38 of the Criminal Law Revision Committee's interim report considers the possibility of abolishing the element of persistence in section 32 and decides that we should not abolish it because:

> "The requirement that the soliciting should be persistent in our view remains principally to reduce the possibility of mistaken accusation since the offence is not related to prostitutes."

That is why we need persistence in section 32, why the Home Office accepts that we need it in clause 2 and why we need it in clause 1.

[Mr. Parris]

New clause 7 would sweep away clauses 1 and 2 and extend section 32 of the 1956 Act so that it would cover soliciting on the pavements and from motor vehicles. The soliciting will have to be for an immoral purpose. Seeking the services of a prostitute would be found by the courts to be an immoral purpose. It would have to be persistent. Persistent does not mean persistent under English law; it means twice. We should not be laying a heavy burden upon the shoulders of the police or the prosecution. "Twice" has almost always been enough to satisfy courts of the element of persistence. Section 32 would then cover men-to-women soliciting as well as men-to-men and the public nuisances outlined by the hon. Member for Tooting, my hon. Friend the Member for Drake and others. New clause 7 would replace clauses 1 and 2.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): I have listened with the greatest care to the issues that have been raised. There is no one here who would be anything but sad and disappointed if the Bill failed because of lack of time. We agree with most of the Bill's intentions. Many of us admire my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) for giving us the opportunity to discuss a difficult problem. As I understand it, most of us, and many other hon. Members who unfortunately cannot be here, accept that there is a nuisance and that genuine distress is caused to residents in many towns. I am pleased to say that in the rather quiet and more salubrious avenues of Cheltenham, which I have the honour to serve, we do not have those problems. We have other problems, of course.

It would be a disaster if we could not speedily find solutions to some of the fairly thin arguments against the Bill. I understand my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris). In trying to dispose of the nuisance, we cannot push on one side the genuine anxiety about protecting the innocent. However, the House has a responsibility to listen to residents associations and the many other groups of people who are distressed by the behaviour we are discussing and the things that happen in their locality. However, we must take care that in sweeping away that activity it does not go under the table and reappear in another form. We must protect the innocents who could be caught up in an offence. We have seen that happen with importuning, and many people have been ruined.

I cannot believe that my hon. Friend the Minister, with his renowned brilliance, could not leap up with a sensible compromise to deal with the problem and save hon. Members from the disastrous blow of losing a Bill which has much to commend it. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West agree?

Mr. Parris: I agree. If my hon. Friend the Minister will leap up and say that he will insert the word "persistently" into clause 1 or that he is prepared to contemplate doing so, my major anxieties about the Bill will melt away and I shall be able to melt away as well. I should be happy with the Bill were that improvement made. The matter rests on my hon. Friend's shoulders. If he wishes to speed the Bill's progress, he should allow the word "persistently" to be included in clause 1.

I continue as my hon. Friend plainly is not going to interrupt at this stage, although I am willing to be interrupted.

Mr. Mellor: I feel that I cannot refuse that invitation. My hon. Friend is advancing, almost at as great length as he did in Committee, an argument which was shot down in Committee. I may well be able to meet some of the more reasonable points that have been made during the debate if I have the opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend is blatantly holding a pistol to my head and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) and saying that if we include the word "persistently"—flying in the face not just of the Criminal Law Revision Committee's advice and that of the Wolfenden committee that it would make a dead letter of the provision—he will let us have the Bill. What is the point of having a clause which is a dead letter? I should prefer my hon. Friend to take the responsibility for his act of blackmail and for the failure of the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the House that one of the reasons why the amendment was not selected was that it was dealt with exhaustively in Committee. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) must not keep referring to it. He should come to the amendments that have been selected and say why they should be accepted or rejected.

Mr. Parris: I am discussing one of the amendments, Mr. Deputy Speaker—new clause 7. It attempts to import the word "persistently" into the offence that we are trying to proscribe. My hon. Friend the Minister is a man of great competence. I admire and respect his intellect, but occasionally he goes a little too far. That is his failing. He goes slightly over the top, and he has done so again.

I am not trying to blackmail my hon. Friend. I do not wish to blackmail anyone. I do not wish to obstruct the Bill. With my small amendment, the Bill would be good, but without it, it would be bad.

Mr. Mellor: I shall have one more try. It is my hon. Friend's ego that is on trial. The amendments which have been supported by the Opposition go to a different point. They relate to whether the person who is subject to the solicitation should be brought before the court. That is a serious point. When I have the opportunity, I shall deal with it. Hon. Members have also asked whether clause 3 is appropriate, and I want to deal with that. My hon. Friend is ploughing the lonely furrow of "persistently". As you said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it was dealt with exhaustively in Committee. My hon. Friend might as well accept that he is saying that the House should pass the Bill that he wants. We are not prepared to be blackguarded in that way.

Mr. Parris: I shall tell the Minister and the House why he is resisting my new clause so strongly and why he is happier to deal with the new clauses and amendments which have been tabled by Opposition Members.

Their new clauses and amendments are frankly unacceptable. Although their reasons for tabling them are strong, there are strong arguments against them and the Minister is confident that he can dispose of them. The Minister would rather avoid discussion of my new clause because he knows that the importation of the element of persistence into clause 1 is not a wrecking amendment. It is perfectly workable and would commend itself to a great many people, including the Law Society, which wants something of exactly that nature. I hope that the Minister will deal with that point.

Mr. Mellor: At the risk of assisting my hon. Friend in his filibuster, may I remind him that he has already been told that no amendment dealing with the concept of persistence has been selected, for the very good reason that we spent two sittings on it in Committee and my hon. Friend was defeated. Those who supported him in the Division have accepted that defeat and have come back with other more constructive suggestions, and I believe that in due course, given the opportunity, we shall be able to reach accommodation on them. My hon. Friend is using those other amendments in order to speak in support of an amendment that has not been selected because it was disposed of in Committee. He cannot blame me if I do not find that an attractive proposition.

Mr. Parris: I wish that the Minister would read the Amendment Paper and read the legislation. My new clause 7, to which I am now speaking, says:

"The reference in section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 to a man persistently soliciting or importuning in a public place for immoral purposes shall be taken as applying to men soliciting women as well as men soliciting men."

Section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act makes it an offence for a man persistently to solicit or importune in a public place for immoral purposes. Therefore, to adopt new clause 7, to which I am speaking, is to import into the Bill the element of persistence, and I am not going out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend is seeking to widen the ambit of a section in another Act. It might have been a helpful step had it been taken some years ago. However, it has now been overtaken by clauses 1 and 2 of this Bill. It is no good my hon. Friend seeking to assert that an amendment slipped into this Bill to amend another Act of Parliament has the same effect as a primary amendment to a clause of this Bill; it has not. My hon. Friend is trying to change clause 1 of this Bill, and that is not on the Amendment Paper before us. The fact that he wants to use this Bill to amend an Act of Parliament is not to the point.

Mr. Parris: That is not the effect of what I am trying to do. If we widen section 32 in the way that my new clause proposes, and if we vote against clause 1 stand part and against clause 2 stand part, we shall be replacing clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill with a widening of section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act, thus importing the element of persistence into all forms of men soliciting women, from a motor car and from the street. That is my argument, and I remain convinced that it is within order. In order to prevent an unpleasant squabble, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall try to move from my new clause 7 as quickly as I can, but I want first to say something in response to what the Minister has said.

It is less than honest—and, with the respect that I have for the Minister's intellect, I find it hard to believe that he honestly believes it—to say that importing the element of persistence into clause 1 will make the Bill a dead letter. I do not believe that, and I do not believe that the Minister can believe it. Section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act makes it an offence——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is being unfair. He is not to refer to a clause which has not been selected. That is what he has been doing.

Mr. Parris: My new clause 7 has been selected. It refers to section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act and applies it to the offences with which we are now dealing. I believe that it can be so applied, and with benefit. It is already being applied in cases of men soliciting men, and it is not a dead letter. Many cases of men soliciting men are brought successfully. It has not proved impossible for the police to prove persistence; indeed, in many ways it has proved too easy for the police to do that. There is no reason why the same burden of proof should not apply in cases of men soliciting women from a motor vehicle.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend the Minister seems to be getting quite aggressive, hectoring and almost bullying in his attitude to amendments to the Bill. Will my hon. Friend put it to the Minister that the Law Society itself has said that "persistence" should be imported into all aspects of the Bill, including kerb crawling? It is all very well for my hon. Friend the Minister to dismiss us as mere Back Benchers and representatives of people of no account, but he has yet to dismiss the Law Society. What are his opinions on the Law Society's views?

Mr. Parris: I am sure that the Minister will deal with the Law Society's objections to the Bill, as drafted, when he speaks in due course.

I do not care in this House to throw across the Floor examples of distinguished bodies which may or may not support the argument that one is proposing. One mentions them and their evidence and then makes one's own decision on the basis of one's own judgment. That is what I am trying to do.

I turn now to amendment No. 33, on which I do not need to dwell. If the House accepts my new clause 7 it should accept amendment No. 33, because my new clause 7 will effectively replicate for men soliciting women the provisions under clause 2 which amendment No. 33 seeks to delete. Therefore, amendment No. 33 should be taken hand in hand with my new clause 7 and supported for the same reasons as my new clause 7 should be supported.

I turn briefly to amendment No. 40, which has been tabled in the names of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and several other hon. Members. The amendment deals with clause 2 and says:

"at end insert 'in a manner that causes offence or nuisance to others'."

We have dealt with the benefits and with some of the problems of importing into the Bill a requirement that it be proved that the behaviour in question was such as to cause offence or nuisance to others, or such as would be likely to cause offence or nuisance to others. As I have told the House, I think that would improve the Bill, but I do not think that it is so elegant or so fair a way of improving it as my new clause 7. That is why I think that the Minister would rather talk about the other amendments than about my new clause 7. But I shall say one thing on amendment No. 40, which is to be taken hand in hand with the other amendments on nuisance and fear.

If we were to import into the Bill a requirement that nuisance or fear be caused or shown, it would make it harder, if not impossible, for the police to use police women as decoys in entrapping people into an offence such as this and prosecuting them. It would be hard to persuade even the most hardened magistrates that a woman police constable who had specifically behaved in such a manner as to attract the attentions of a motorist could then reasonably complain that she had been caused nuisance or offence by so behaving. Obviously, she would have been doing it in the course of her duty. Nuisance or offence would not be caused, so the importation of such a requirement would curb the police in the use of women police constables as decoys.

In Committee, the Minister said something about decoys but not very much. First, he said that entrapment was unthinkable and that it was wrong to use entrapment measures. I point out to him that the police have used entrapment measures for a long time in the prosecution of the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 and are still using them. Now that he has told the Committee that it must not do so, I hope that he will also tell the police that they must not do so.

The Minister then went to to say that he was not sure that a woman police constable who might be in plain clothes and who might simply be walking up — and possibly down — a street would necessarily be taking part in entrapment in the way that we have defined it in Committee and in the way in which we were criticising it. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will expand on that as it is clear to me that any police officer—woman or man—who walks or dresses in such a way or stands in such a place as to attract the attentions of men or women seeking to solicit or importune is acting as a decoy and entrapping. I hope that my hon. Friend will make it clear that that is not the right way for the police to deal with this type of offence, which can be prosecuted far more effectively and fairly without encouraging people to break the law so that they can then be charged and prosecuted.

Amendment No. 41 seeks to achieve the same purpose as the previous amendments but in a slightly different way. It provides:

"The person or persons to whom nuisance or offence has been caused may be required to give evidence of such nuisance or offence."

Amendment No. 47 seeks to leave out clause 3. The Chair in its wisdom has decided that the merits of clause 3 are to be discussed with this group, although it is a large and slightly different subject. As I know that other hon. Members will wish to speak on this, I shall be as brief as possible.

Clause 3 states:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear."

That is very wide. We can all think of circumstances in which men behaving in that way ought to be prosecuted, but there are some circumstances in which that should not be the case. For a start, it seems strange that the clause does not specify that the offence must take place in a street or public place. That being so, it would seem possible for a woman to bring a prosecution against her husband for soliciting her for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear. The House may regard that as a welcome change in the law. It would also involve concomitant changes in the rape law. The House may believe that those changes should be made, but we should not import through the back door such a wide intrusion into the domestic scene without proper discussion. I should welcome an explanation from my hon. Friend the Minister or from my hon. Friend the promoter as to why the clause is not restricted to streets or public places when it seeks to deal with a public nuisance.

Miss Fookes: Previous legislation has shown that a public place does not include foyers of hotels, cinemas and the like. Although such places at first sight appear to be public places they have been construed in the past not to be so. That is the reason.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) has said that he wishes to be brief. I remind him that he has already been speaking for an hour.

Mr. Parris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

I know that I must take care not to mention section 32 of the 1956 Act, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the circumstances in which it was thought right to prosecute under that legislation were confined to offences in public places, so I cannot see why the same should not apply to my hon. Friend's Bill. I do not know the exact situation with regard to foyers of cinemas, but in general I gather that the legal definition of a public place is wider rather than narrower than the general public would suppose. For instance, I believe that it may include pubs, clubs and other places that one would not generally regard as public places. I believe that it means places to which the public have access. That is just the type of place to which prosecutions for offences of this nature should apply.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is being very tolerant to me today, giving way kindly and gracefully on each occasion. The genesis of this measure came from the Criminal Law Revision Committee. As we heard at an earlier stage in the proceedings on the Bill, that committee took the view that conduct which caused fright would probably have features allowing charges to be brought for another criminal offence. To that extent, therefore, activities of the kind to which the clause relates are already covered. Does my hon. Friend agree that in those circumstances clause 3 is redundant and possibly harmful?

Mr. Parris: Clause 3 attempts to deal with a real public nuisance with which other laws already deal, but I do not believe that the existing law satisfactorily covers all the circumstances in which men may make offensive sexual propositions to women in public. In my view, that is because it is almost impossible to frame a law which would effectively isolate that type of behaviour. In other words, the existing legislation has not protected woman in the way that they would like to be protected because no legislation can do so and I fear that clause 3 may fall foul of the same problems.

I am mindful of the fact that I have spoken for too long so I will say nothing further about clause 3 and I shall not comment on amendments Nos. 58, 59 and 60, which have already been reasonably fully discussed.

My amendment No. 61 would allow a person accused under clause 3 the right to trial by jury if the accused prefers that to a summary trial in a magistrates court. Similar amendments in relation to clauses 1 and 2 have not been selected.

In the context of male-to-male importuning, the Criminal Law Revision Committee considered whether men accused of such offences should be entitled to trial by jury. On page 17 of its 16th report, it concluded:

"There is no doubt, however, that a conviction for homosexual soliciting can have consequences of the utmost seriousness for a man. Most members of the public are likely to take a serious view of the offence. Partly for this reason and partly because the evidence in support of the charge is likely to be given wholly by the police special provision may have to be made to enable an accused person to retain his right to trial by jury."

I agree with the Criminal Law Revision Committee in the context of section 32 offences and I believe that exactly the same arguments apply to offences under clause 3—and, indeed, under clauses 1 and 2.

Which of us, and which of the distinguished members of the Criminal Law Revision Committee, would feel confident that our careers could survive a conviction either under section 32 or under clause 1, 2 or 3 of the Bill? Our careers would be in serious jeopardy. A conviction of that kind would spell, if not certain ruin, at least the danger of ruin for almost all professional people and, indeed, most others. Anyone enjoying a reasonable reputation in his family and neighbourhood who is successfully convicted of an offence under the Bill will find that if his life is not completely wrecked his reputation is all but destroyed.

In that context, the penalties set out in the Bill are not especially severe. We all know that the real penalty for a conviction is not the two months imprisonment or the £100 fine but the newspaper publicity and the public knowledge of the conviction. That is almost as severe a punishment as can be meted out to anyone. For that reason, it is important that in cases of this kind the accused should have the right to trial by jury. If he prefers a quick trial in a magistrates court, he should be able so to elect, but if he believes that he is innocent and wishes a jury to hear the case there is every reason to allow him that right. That is the thinking behind the last of my amendments.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise that the Bill addresses itself to genuine problems. However, many hon. Members believe that action should be taken only if the Bill is amended or if certain concession are made. I shall address myself to that, and especially new clauses 3 and 4.

I do not agree with the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) who believes that the evidence of two policemen who witness an incident on a public transport vehicle should be sufficient, despite the fact that the person approached may have disappeared. Clearly one side of that argument is the anxiety to protect the interests of the individual who is being offended. The other side is that such a provision could be used as a new kind of sus law. Many of my constituents have made representations to me about that. Claims could be made by the police without evidence from another party. The hon. Gentleman stressed that that could damage professional people, but it could also damage non-professional people. Many of my constituents are relieved by the suspension of the sus provisions.

The Bill needs to be amended along the lines of new clauses 3 and 4. It is not even-handed or consistent. It is regrettable to insist that a woman who is solicited in such a way as amounts to a criminal offence under the Bill should have to give evidence in court, whereas the evidence of a police officer alone is sufficient to obtain the conviction for soliciting of a woman who has been labelled, again on police evidence alone, as a common prostitute. If a woman were to have to give evidence to secure a conviction under the Bill, it should be subject to legal, not just guideline, safeguards. The defendant should not have to give her name and address publicly and she should not be asked questions about her sexual history or lifestyle. My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) made those points, and I endorse them.

The change to the Bill should not be called for without at the same time demanding that no woman should be convicted of soliciting for the purposes of prostitution—whilst such an offence continues to exist—without the evidence of the man who was allegedly solicited. The House should address itself to that inconsistency, even at this late stage, and I hope that the Minister will pay attention to it.

I wish to make some summary points about how we should strengthen the Bill if it is to proceed. I propose that "sufficient evidence" is the word of the woman accosted or concerned. Secondly, will the Minister assure the House now—it will help hon. Members to decide how to vote—that a woman should not have to give her name and address in open court for the defendant, representatives, associates or press to hear? That is an extremely important safeguard, and I trust that the Minister will concede that point when he replies. Thirdly, will he assure us that a woman will not be questioned about her sexual history or moral character? Fourthly, if the police fail to prosecute, legal aid should be available——

Mr. Marlow: I accept that that is most unpleasant and distressful. However, does not the hon. Gentleman agree that evidence about a woman's background may have a significant effect on the validity of the evidence? Could not an innocent person be accused and found guilty because of the inadequacy of the evidence and because it has not been examined properly and in context?

Mr. Holland: Women in my constituency who have made representations on the matter regard it as important that questions about sexual history should not be raised. If they were, they would be unwilling to give evidence. Many women are in fear when they walk on the streets, especially in inner city areas. If we are to protect them, there should be a procedure by which they can be identified and their identity known, but not known in open court, as they could then be subject to further harassment following their appearance in court. Many hon. Members know from constituency experience that that occurs. It has certainly occurred on estates in my constituency, and the matter has been brought to my attention by the women involved.

It is important that the annoyances should be interpreted. There is a coincidence in one sense between the subjective and objective criteria in the Bill. It is not the adjectival and substantive point that has been made, but if the person involved is prepared to give the evidence—that is subjective evidence for them and objective evidence in court—it should be given.

I encourage the Minister to pay attention even at this late stage to those points. If he is prepared to concede them, he may get a more favourable response from some Labour Members.

Mr. Mellor: The debate has gone on for nearly three hours and it may be convenient to the Committee if I put the Government's point of view. During the morning I have discussed the developing position with my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), and I have reason to believe that what I say will be said on her behalf as well as mine.

There is a substantial element of common ground and sufficient goodwill among most hon. Members for progress on the Bill to be made. However, I cannot meet certain points because I cannot recommend a Bill which would not achieve its purposes. Those who wish to insist on a measure which will negate the measure's purpose

[Mr. Mellor]

—however much they may claim to the contrary—must take it on their heads if the consequence of their dissatisfaction is the destruction of the Bill. As Emerson once said, the more he protested his honesty, the more we counted the spoons. The more people are determined to pursue an egotistical view of what the Bill should contain, and the more they are determined that everyone should fall in line as the price of allowing the measure to be passed, the more they must take personal responsibility for the fact that the measure is not passed.

Mr. Marlow rose——

12.30 pm

Mr. Mellor: No, I shall not give way at this stage.

There is common ground between Ministers and Opposition Front Bench spokesmen, and I wish to build on that today. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who has spoken with great clarity and sincerity at every stage of the Bill's proceedings, made it clear that two matters are common ground between us. I suspect that he was speaking for his hon. Friends when he said that, especially for the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson), who speaks for the Opposition on women's issues and who recognises, as we do, that many women are following today's proceedings with close interest. The hon. Gentleman said that women have the right to go anywhere without fear of harassment, and that there is a major problem in some parts of the country.

That is an important statement because, as I said to the Committee, when the Wolfenden committee considered the matter in 1957, it believed that the difficulties of changing the law on kerb crawling were such that it was inappropriate to do so because it was not persuaded by the evidence at the time that the problem was substantial enough to justify grappling with the difficulties. However, the committee made some far-reaching and worthwhile recommendations for change in other parts of the criminal law, which most of us present today would have accepted at the time.

The problem has developed since then. We heard an eloquent speech from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) about the problems in his constituency which extend to the constituency of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). I am sorry that I must intervene in the debate before he does, but he knows why that must be so. We also heard from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer), and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) was also in his place ready to speak. All of them spoke about the problems caused by kerb crawling in their constituencies.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee undertook a painstaking review of the present law and its inadequacies, advised by a much more broadly based committee of non-lawyers. I would be the first to agree, as a lawyer, that lawyers do not have the only views on this matter. Therefore, a policy advisory committee was established consisting of distinguished social workers, educationists, psychiatrists and the rest to advise on some policy areas. The Criminal Law Revision Committee said that every group but one recognised that the problem of kerb crawling was sufficiently acute in enough areas to require a change in the law. Therefore, it proposed a change in the law.

However, we all recognise that when we change the criminal law — as the junior Minister responsible for criminal law, I say this openly—there must be a heavy burden of evidence in favour of that change. Every time we add an offence, we add the possibility of unreasonable prosecution and unfair conviction. The only reason for changing the law is that the problem has become so acute that we need an offence, and no other offence is available except the rusty old blunderbuss of the 1361 Act.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend has been jumping up and down all morning. I wish to develop the argument and, when he has heard a little more, I shall be happy to give way to him, in the hope, which I trust will not be in vain, that he is here to try to be reasonable on this issue.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee recommended three distinct offences that are reproduced in my hon. Friend's Bill. The first dealt with kerb crawling, by which we mean the solicitation of women from a motor vehicle, and provided that it is an offence if a man solicits from a motor vehicle a woman for the purposes of prostitution. The committee then addressed the problem of the solicitation of women on foot, because it recognised that, if it did not do so, the kerb crawler would simply go on foot. It recognised the distinction between the problem of solicitation from motor cars and the less acute social problem of solicitation on foot and, therefore, recommended that solicitation on foot should have an element of persistence. It was not accidental that it left the element of persistence out of clause 1, and I shall defend that position in due course in the hope that I can remain within the rules of order. We had an exhaustive debate on it in Committee.

The committee then proposed a third, more serious offence not restricted to a public place. A public place has been defined restrictively in the courts so that it does not include places that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or I as ordinary mortals, might consider to be public. The committee proposed a broader offence, punishable more severely, of a man soliciting a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear.

Let me deal with what might prove to be the easier issues first. It has been no secret — I had this conversation with the hon. Member for Hammersmith at all stages of the Bill—that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake and I are least happy with clause 3. We recognise the problem that must be addressed, and we recognise the reasons why the Criminal Law Revision Committee made the recommendation that it did. The dilemma was brought into sharp focus by several hon. Members who spoke in the debate, especially by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), with whom I had a helpful exchange. The Criminal Law Revision Committee recommended a formulation for the offence, which it believes is objective and does not place an innocent male in danger of encountering an especially troubled female, which would lead to an unreasonable suggestion that she had been put in fear by something that he said.

A number of hon. Members at all stages of the Bill have expressed reservations as to whether the mischief met by clause 3 sufficiently outweighs the doubts about the way that it is drafted and its underlying thinking. They are worried about whether people will be exposed to the threat of being brought before courts when the case for adding this more serious and more widely cast offence has not been properly made out.

Having discussed the matter with my hon. Friend the Member for Drake as a result of the opportunity offorded by the extended speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris)—the speech served a useful purpose on that count at least—I am happy to say that I would be minded to recommend the House to accept amendment No. 47, which deletes clause 3, on the basis that, as a consequence of the discussions that we have had, it would be appropriate for us to say not that we do not think that there is a problem of women being placed in fear and therefore nothing needs to be sorted out, but that we are not satisfied that the way in which that is being done in the Bill is the right way. Time is of the essence now, and rather than fall out over this and lose other parts of the Bill on which there is more widespread agreement, it may be better to lose clause 3.

I hope that this compromise, endorsed by my hon. Friend the Member for Drake, will show that we are prepared to listen to those points on which it is possible to make progress without damaging the fundamental purpose of the Bill.

Mr. Marlow: Any change in the right direction is welcome. Will my hon. Friend, as well as bringing into play the evidence of those august bodies that support his argument, address the argument of the Law Society that, for kerb crawling, persistence is of the essence? Will he comment on the remark made to him by the National Association of Probation Officers which he quoted in a parliamentary answer? It was that the Bill "might lead to allegations of harassment from disadvantaged groups, and to police officers acting as agents provocateurs; that the police already had sufficient powers to deal with this nuisance, but have given little priority to it". — [Official Report, 20 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 495.]

Mr. Mellor: I do not know why my hon. Friend is not prepared to allowed me to make my speech in the usual way and have the faith in me that others have. They know that if major issues have been raised in the debate, I shall deal with them in my own time. I do not know why he seeks to interrupt me and to distort my speech with the answers to questions that he wants rather than allowing me to deal with the matter. I said that I would give way to my hon. Friend if, at the end of my remarks, I had failed to satisfy him.

My hon. Friend spoke of taking a step in the right direction, which is different from the response that I think most others will make, which is that this has swept away most of the impediments that lie in the path of the Bill getting a Third Reading. It is interesting that, from his standpoint and perspective, he should consider this as merely a step in the right direction. I am interested that it appears that the welfare of women is of so little moment to him that he can regard the removal of one third of the Bill as being merely a step in the right direction. Many people, including his constituents, may be interested to know on what basis he has reached that view.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Mellor: I was not intending to provoke my hon. Friend into explaining it now. He will no doubt tell us at a later point.

I hope that I have established the good will of those who are anxious to make progress with the Bill by saying that I am persuaded that clause 3 might usefully be deleted in the absence of the clear consent to the balance that it strikes that I should want to see before we make progress. I shall now address some other difficult points.

Some matters relating to the manner in which prosecutions are likely to be brought and the way in which the police will approach the powers that we shall give them under clauses 1 and 2, if we do so, are worthy of consideration and have been raised in the debate. It is important that there should be clarity about the way in which the police will approach their powers. That is why I welcome the clear evidence from the Metropolitan police that it wishes to give signs that would enable the House to proceed with confidence. I am sure that police committees in other police forces can obtain the same clarity. Indeed, it is the wish of the Home Office that that should be done.

On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West, not only have we told the House that we are against the use of an agent provocateur, but that finds its way into the force orders. The question of what is an agent provocateur is open to debate. I stand by what I said in Committee—that a policewoman dressed in a sexually provocative manner might constitute an agent provocateur, whereas a policewomen walking down the street soberly dressed would not. If a problem in an area causes the public to look to the police for assistance, a woman who is properly and reasonably dressed and not calling attention to herself is exercising the right of any woman. The fact that she is a policewoman does not make her an agent provocateur. The crucial safeguard against police abuse of that power is contained in clause 1.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) made his points with considerable lucidity and in short order. I wish to respond positively to him. I am not being trite in saying that I know that he has heavy responsibilities as a Front Bench spokesman on other matters and was therefore unable to be with us when the matter was first raised. I take seriously any charge that this is a return to the sus laws. I was proud to be a member of the Committee that abolished them. I was opposed to them because of my experience as a lawyer. Therefore, I was glad that one of the first Committees on which I served removed them. Indeed, I campaigned strongly for their abolition. I hope that that gives me a certain credibility in these matters.

The problem with the sus laws was that all that needed to be shown was that someone was behaving suspiciously. Clause 1 goes further than that. The requirement is that a man has solicited a woman for the purposes of prostitution. That act of solicitation requires a clear indication in words. Therefore, that will rarely be open to construction from distant observation. There will hardly be any places where actions would be a substitute for words. It requires clear hearing of the words used. Therefore, that will almost always require that the woman was blatantly a prostitute, got into the car and went off with the man—therefore action is the substitute for words—or it would require the woman to come forward with a complaint about the words used and for that to be established.

There is no scope for the police, on their own, to deal with that matter in the manner in which the critics of the sus laws suggest. I hope that the hon. Member for Vauxhall accepts that that is a careful distinction. I would not recommend clause 1 if I thought that in my sixth year in Parliament I was putting back into law what I was so pleased to take out in my first year.

[Mr. Mellor]

The Metropolitan police orders make it clear — I imagine that other force orders do the same—that when under section 32 of the Sexual Offences Acts a man has been importuned, that man should be approached and asked to give his name and address and to attend court. If the victim refuses to give that assistance, the particulars should be noted in the officer's pocket book and stated in evidence.

If the Bill becomes law, it is crucial that precisely the same arrangements should be instituted for women alleged to be the victims of an offence under clauses 1 and 2. That would provide a number of safeguards, which meets the point made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith. He fairly pointed out that the major reform that is proceeding with all-party consent for the creation of an independent prosecution service is of great relevance to this matter. It will mean that, when the police have charged someone, the papers have to be passed to the independent prosecutor. He will have to look at those force orders and, if it is clear that an individual was solicited and that individual was not a prostitute and therefore had no good reason for saying that she would not come to court, one of the deciding factors about whether the independent prosecutor was prepared to recommend the prosecution would have to be whether he was satisfied with the good faith of the officers as demonstrated in their explanation of why the woman would not come to court.

It would be possible for the woman to be approached again at that stage and asked whether she would give a statement and attend court. It would be open to the independent prosecutor — I stress the word "independent", because we are abolishing the solicitor-client relationship between the police and their solicitors — would be entitled to say that he would not allow the prosecution to go forward and that he was not satisfied with the strength of the evidence because the independent component was missing.

The matter would then have to go before the court, and again the officer would have to note in his pocket book the reason why assistance was refused. That would be brought out in court, and it would be open to the magistrates to decide for themselves whether they thought that a conviction was proper if they were not satisfied with the explanation about why the woman complainant was not present.

I hope that those are sensible safeguards. If within the parameters that I have set out there is a feeling amongst hon. Members that other steps could be taken as part of the discussions between us and the police force about what is found in force orders, that is a matter upon which we are always ready to give constructive advice and assistance. But I am not prepared to recommend any suggestion that it should be compulsory for the woman to give evidence or that a provision should be put into the statute to the effect that using such words as "nuisance or fear" had that effect.

I have said that in most cases it will be obviously right if a woman is an innocent member of the public that she will want to give evidence. But it is the clear advice of successive committees which have studied this matter that the effect of requiring someone alleged to have been annoyed to give evidence would be to enact a dead letter.

I shall not quote the Criminal Law Revision Committee's report because most hon. Members have read it and have their views about how far they are persuaded by it. But given that most hon. Members, especially those antipathetic to this measure, will favourably regard the Wolfenden report, it may be worth reminding the House what that said about this. That committee was discussing not kerb crawling but parallel offences relating to solicitation by prostitutes. However, the argument is robust against that limited change. The Wolfenden report said in paragraph 255:

"The proposition that to require the person alleged to have been annoyed to give evidence would be to enact a dead letter applies to the person annoyed by the loitering of prostitutes no less than to the person annoyed by an act of importuning. It probably applies even more, since it is unlikely that a resident in a neighbourhood where annoyance is caused by the loitering of prostitutes would be prepared to go to the courts day after day to establish the fact that he was annoyed. Indeed it seems to us unreasonable that he should be required to do so."

That is what my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South said.

In paragraph 252, the Wolfenden committee said:

"At the same time, like the Street Offences Committee, we recognise it as an irrefutable fact that in general persons accosted will not attend the courts to give evidence. Consequently, to enact that there should be no conviction unless the person alleged to have been annoyed gave evidence and proved personal annoyance would be to enact a dead letter."

I hope that the House will accept that we are anxious to make progress by accepting amendments where that can properly be done. But there are two amendments that would be fatal to the purposes of the Bill. The first would be to import——

Mr. Parris: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mellor: Let me first finish my sentence, and then I shall give way to my hon. Friend. I have not forgotten that he wishes to intervene and, if it is part of a constructive dialogue, I shall be only too happy to assist him if I can. However, I listened to him for an hour and 10 minutes, admittedly not with a great deal of patience but with a little more than perhaps he is showing, so I hope that he will bear with me.

Showing fear or nuisance is plainly not a matter that a prostitute would be prepared to go to court to support.

The problem in the constituency of the hon. Member for Tooting is the use of the area by prostitutes on the street. Therefore, any nuisance or annoyance would have to be a nuisance or annoyance suffered by the community, which would be difficult to establish for evidential purposes. It is unlikely that an individual will be on the scene. It is more likely that people will know that this is taking place day after day and is causing women not to want to walk in that area. In those circumstances, it is unlikely that anybody will be able to come forward if the woman who is solicited is a prostitute. If, therefore, we imported into clause 1 nuisance, fear or any of these concepts, we should render the clause a dead letter in the constituency of the hon. Member for Tooting and other constituencies.

Furthermore, if a perfectly respectable woman is walking home, there may be perfectly good reasons, as Wolfenden recognised, why she would not want to go to court. Therefore, the safeguard of an independent prosecutor would prevent wrongful convictions based upon improper police evidence. I believe that that is sufficient to satisfy those who want to make progress on kerb crawling and who also want to ensure that there are safeguards to protect those who are potentially innocent.

My other point relates to the element of persistency. Mr. Deputy Speaker has already said that because the element of persistency was so fully gone over during five hours of debate in Committee, the matter is not before us formally. The reason for clauses 1 and 2 is, as the hon. Member for Tooting has made clear on a number of occasions, that the nuisance of kerb crawling is not that of somebody kerb crawling twice. It is the nuisance of many people kerb crawling once, twice or three or four times and making the area seem to be a place where kerb crawling is a predominant night-time activity. To say, therefore, that the element of persistency is needed would not address the problem. It is arbitrary. If the problem in Bedford hill were that of 50 men each night soliciting twice, it would deal with it, but if the problem were that of 100 men each night soliciting once it would not deal with it. In my view, that would be unreal.

Furthermore, if the intention of the Bill is not only to catch the kerb crawler but to send out the message that kerb crawling is now unlawful and is therefore to be deterred, we blur the deterrent if we import the element of persistency because it would lead people to believe that if they kerb-crawled only once and made a hit the first time they would not be breaking the law. The clear deterrent is not then established. My aim in promoting the Bill is not that there should be a great deal more work for the criminal courts. It is that we should send out the message that kerb crawling is now against the law. That in itself might have the impact that we require and would prevent the problem. Now I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West.

Mr. Parris: In answer to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary about persistency, I can only say that the same argument he directs towards kerb crawling under clauses 1 and the reasons why he thinks that persistency should not need to be proved under clause 1 are equally applicable to soliciting women who are walking on the pavement. In parts of Britain, this is a serious nuisance. If my hon. Friend makes it easier to prosecute the motorist rather than the pedestrian, in parts of Britain it will become a much more serious problem. The same argument about 10 women once or five women twice applies to section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, relating to male importuning. Both in that case and in his proposals under clause 2 persistency is required. There is no reason why, if persistency is required in those cases, it should not also be required under clause 1. In answer to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. This is an intervention, but the hon. Gentleman is making another speech.

Mr. Parris rose——

Mr. Mellor: I am not prepared to allow my hon. Friend to filibuster my speech.

Mr. Parris: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I tried to answer earlier a point that was made by my hon. Friend but he asked me to wait until he had finished making his point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am saying to the hon. Gentleman that interventions must be brief, in fairness to other hon. Members who are hoping to make contributions.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for that assistance. I do not want to be rude to my hon. Friend but he appears to be unaware of how provocative his behaviour in relation to the Bill has seemed to others.

Mr. Parris: It is my hon. Friend who is being provocative.

Mr. Mellor: Anyone who feels that should look at the report of the Committee proceedings and see some of the things that were said of my hon. Friend. Several of my hon. Friends accused him in far more robust terms than I did of wishing to talk the Bill out and he knows that.

My hon. Friend will continue to take the view that there is no difference between what happens on foot and in a motor car. The distinction is a narrow one. Perhaps he is asking me to say that the element of persistency should be removed from the offence committed on foot. My hon. Friend shakes his head. He is not asking that. He is asking that the element of persistency should be imported into the offence of solicitation from a motor vehicle.

I can only look to those hon. Members who have that problem in their constituencies and have lived with it year after year. I am thinking particularly of the hon. Member for Tooting. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that, if I were prepared to buy off my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West by importing the element of persistency into clause 1, I would bring peace and quiet to the neighbourhood of Bedford hill? I see that the hon. Gentleman is shaking his head. He thinks that I would not, because he acknowledges that the problem of kerb crawling is the totality of incidents, some of which would involve only one act of soliciting. One act of solicitation multiplied several-fold can construct the nuisance which we are here—if we are here to do anything—to avoid.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mellor: I can hear my hon. Friend. He does not need to shout. Let me finish my point.

I have discussed the matter with my hon. Friend the Member for Drake. She is clearly of the opinion, as I am, that rather than put through a Bill that purported to deal with kerb crawling but did not do so, as a result of accommodating this point of "persistently" and other matters, we would rather not have the Bill at all. It would be a fraud on the public to have clause 1, amended as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West would wish, because it would not do the job and I am not prepared to be a party to such a fraud.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): The Minister made the point a minute or two ago that the Bill's purpose was to spread the message that kerb crawling was not on. I understand that point and the points which have been made about protecting non-prostitute women from being molested and harassed. But will the Minister say something about contact between prostitutes and their clients?

Mr. Mellor: That is a very real point. The hon. Lady knows that the reason we are dealing with the matter in a somewhat piecemeal way is the particular urgency of the problem of kerb crawling. As a result of the hon. Member for Tooting having an Adjournment debate earlier this year, in which he raised, in particularly vivid terms, the problem of Bedford hill, I asked the Criminal Law Revision Committee to speed up its report on kerb crawling. It did so and we are most grateful to it for that. However, the Bill does not dispose of the difficult issues concerning prostitution. They will be difficult to resolve. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will wish to play a part in doing that. My anxiety is that by waiting upon a more whole-scale reform we might not make progress in areas where it may more easily be made.

I appreciate the hon. Lady's point. The prostitute, by being in the street in a provocative way and being kerb-crawled, is almost certainly soliciting. Therefore, we do not make the position any more difficult. However, I accept that the Bill, modest as it is, does not deal with a number of points that are of concern to many hon. Members.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. My hon. Friend obviously feels that if persistence is imported into clause 1 the Bill will be weakened. But how much will it be weakened? If a man in a motor car drives down a street and opens his window not once but twice, there is a degree of persistence about that. The Bill may be weakened, but marginally. Against that, the Law Society says that the Bill as it now stands may bring about the wrongful conviction of innocent men. Would not my hon. Friend rather have a just Bill which is 90 per cent. effective than one which will bring about wrongful conviction?

1 pm

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend did not attend the Second Reading debate and did not seek to serve on the Standing Committee. He seems to have come to the Bill late, and one might reasonably wish that it had been even later. The matter raised by my hon. Friend was dealt with fully in Committee, to the satisfaction of all except my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West. The hon. Member for Hammersmith has moved on to other territory and arrangements have been made that, on balance, will probably satisfy him. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North is leaping on the bandwagon after it has left the station and is halfway to heaven knows where.

The Law Society's report was given proper weight in five hours of debate in Committee. The Law Society has not renewed its representations and, on that basis, one is entitled to assume that it is reasonably satisfied, as well it might be.

We must accept that either we are to do something about the problem and that we have reached as good an arrangement as we are likely to reach—with perhaps more to come if the Bill proceeds to another place—or, if the Bill does not make progress, that we shall not address these important issues, including those in clause 4, which raises the penalties for serious sexual offences to a more realistic level. The only person with whom that proposal does not find favour—for reasons that I find staggering—is my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North. He has tabled an amendment to delete clause 4. Everyone else finds the clause reasonable and rational.

I set out earlier the ways in which we can minimise the prospects of wrongful conviction. I shall enumerate them again, for the benefit of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, who may have missed that section of my speech while he was busy thinking up interventions.

I said that clause 1 states a clear need for words of solicitation, to give precision to the offence, and evidence from the woman concerned will be required to ensure conviction. I set out the police rules which I believe offer safeguards and I mentioned the remit of the independent prosecution service. I also said that magistrates are not a rubber stamp in these proceedings.

I should be more than content for there to be a debate in another place about whether it would be right to allow trial by jury, although I do not believe that that would be appropriate, as we are pitching the penalties well within the range of magistrates courts, with the aim of providing a speedy summary remedy.

Of course we shall all want to know how the Bill has worked in practice. I am more than willing to accede to the request of the hon. Member for Hammersmith that within a period to be determined, whether 12, 18 or 24 months, we should place a report in the Library about how sections 1 and 2 have worked. [Interruption.] I do not know why my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North finds that funny. The hon. Member for Hammersmith does not find it funny. I am agreeing to his request.

We would be prepared to put in the Library a report on the number of arrests that have been made and whether they had led to prosecution. A discrepancy between those numbers would suggest that too many people were being arrested on grounds that were not endorsed by the independent prosecution service. The report could also show the number of prosecutions compared with the number of acquittals, which would show whether the law was being used reasonably or oppressively.

On that basis, and with the undertaking that I shall accept amendment No. 47, I hope that we may make progress.

There is considerable merit in new clause 7, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West. He sees it as an alternative to clauses 1 and 2, but I see the merit as the fact that it reverses the decision in Crook v. Edmonson which gave an unduly narrow definition of importuning under section 32. If that had been done 10 years ago it might have provided a helpful stopgap but it would not have dealt with the menace of kerb crawling. I regard new clause 7 as largely irrelevant to the stage which we have now reached. There is a willingness on both sides of the House to allow clauses 1 and 2 to become law. Having heard a number of concessionary utterances in my reply, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West will not feel that he wants to press new clause 7 to a Division or to pursue his opposition to the Bill.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The argument would not have been as great and as difficult as it is if the Bill had dealt wholly and solely with the problem of kerb crawling and had not tried to deal with the problem of prostitution which is known as the oldest profession. The difficulties that we are debating have arisen because the Bill seeks to deal with prostitution generally.

No Bill will be able to solve the so-called problem of prostitution and no Bill should attempt to do so. We are dealing with nothing less than the freedom of the individual and consenting parties. The right of a person to sell his or her services under the pressure of poverty, unemployment or any other economic circumstances is one of the freedoms of the individual.

The new clause and the amendments have been tabled to protect the innocent and to enable persons to go about their legal and legitimate activities without being caused offence by others. The act of prostitution, which is illicit sex, is not in itself a criminal act.

My constituency includes Brownswood in the Finsbury Park area, which probably has a worse kerb crawling and prostitution problem than any other area in Britain. That has been so for some years. Barriers have been put across many roads so that kerb crawlers cannot crawl, but that has not got rid of prostitution on the streets or stopped soliciting. Kerb crawlers get out of their cars and walk. The more barriers that are erected the more that kerb crawlers are pushed out of the area, but the problem of prostitution continues.

I shall refer to the evidence of the vice unit which has been operating from Stoke Newington police station. I invited the chief superintendent in charge of the unit and one of his fellow officers to attend a debate, which they did. The chief superintendent had prepared a report that drew comparisons based on the 1984 figures. He reported that there had been a 70 per cent. reduction in the number of prostitutes cautioned and a 40 per cent. reduction in the numbers arrested. In 1984, about 120 women were involved in cautions and arrests. Over 400 kerb crawlers were cautioned and 17 were convicted. A number of ponces and controllers of brothels were arrested and convicted and 10 persons were still awaiting trial for conspiring to control prostitution. The reduction in cautions and arrests has been the result of the policy of the police to keep their officers on the roads and to let them be seen—in other words, the policeman on the beat, who is being asked for almost continually. The policy is to deter by way of the presence of police officers rather than spend time in the police station processing offenders.

It is clear that the police are using existing powers to deal with problems. The Law Society says that section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 was used to deal with the problem of threatening behaviour which arises out of soliciting and that the law of common assault has been used and can be used.

My constituents and Hackney borough council have discussed the matter. They want action taken to deal with kerb crawling but they do not want prostitutes to be victimised. The problem of prostitution has been with us for centuries and it will not be solved by this Bill. Prostitutes have put forward their experiences. They say that the police arrest women whenever they please whether the woman is working or not, possibly because police evidence only is required. No jury trial is available for offences of loitering or soliciting, and magistrates rubber-stamp police stories. They believe that the same will happen with kerb crawling in cases involving black and other, working-class, men. It is difficult to obtain legal aid because the offences of loitering and soliciting are not punishable by imprisonment. They believe that the same would apply to kerb crawling. Working-class people would therefore suffer the most.

Some prostitutes are arrested by the police whenever they are seen. They feel that men convicted of kerb crawling will be treated in the same way, and that because most red light areas are working-class, black and other working-class men will be convicted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) has left the Chamber, but in relation to police action against kerb crawlers, Wandsworth council has said:

> "What the police have been doing, with some measure of success, is to identify the driver who persistently cruises around the area by his car number plate and subsequently invite him to attend the local police station to 'discuss his presence in the area'."

That has had an effect upon kerb crawlers.

I am disturbed by a case on 17 May in Bristol which was brought to my attention. A person was entrapped by police action. Two policewomen in plain clothes gave evidence that a man solicited them for sexual purposes. He denied that emphatically. It became a matter of the word of one of the policewomen as to what he said against his. That case is typical of other cases where a policewoman's word is taken against that of a motorist. In that case an innocent motorist was convicted and fined £100.

The National Association of Probation Officers discussed the matter at its conference. Its members have considerable experience of the problem. The conference resolved to resist any legislation seeking to control kerb crawling by the creation of new offences within the criminal law. That resolution was carried by 445 votes to 282. We should take note of it. It shows that there is considerable opposition to action being taken against prostitutes under this so-called kerb crawling Bill.

There is anxiety about kerb crawlers in my constituency, but there is also anxiety about the prosecution and persecution of innocent people. Many black people and ethnic minorities live in and around my constituency. They remember their experiences under the sus law. They are worried. They continually complain to me about the way that they are treated by the police. There will be further aggravations. I can envisage a considerable number of problems coming my way as the police are given new powers to pick up people as a result of what is called kerb crawling.

We cannot rely on the evidence of a policeman or policewoman alone. There must be a victim who is prepared to give evidence. Without that evidence, the risks that would be taken would be far too great. The Bill would cause more problems than it would cure. Unless it is amended, it should be opposed.

1.15 pm

Mr. Marlow: May I say at the outset how sorry I am that my hon. Friend the Minister has accused me of not being concerned for the women of my constituency. I think that that was an ill-advised and somewhat stupid thing to do. I am as concerned for the problems of my constituents, women and men, as no doubt he is for his own constituents.

It was also somewhat remiss of my hon. Friend the Minister, before the debate started, to advise me that if I opposed what he, in his great wisdom, was attempting to do, he would spread my face, large and wide, across the national press. I do not believe that that is the way for a Minister to proceed, and it is totally counter-productive to what he is seeking to do.

I also say to my hon. Friend the Minister that to accuse my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr.

[Mr. Marlow]

Parris) of being an egotist was a mistake. The trouble with the Minister's egotism is that he is so much of an egotist that he does not realise it.

My hon. Friend the Minister is wrong to say that, because one was not on the Committee or one did not attend the Second Reading debate, one should not take an interest in the issue at this stage. He should know the practice of this House. Not everybody is on a Committee and not everybody has the opportunity to be on it. Not everybody gets involved in an issue at every stage, nor is it right that they should do so. The Minister should recognise that.

I am full of admiration for my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) for bringing forward the Bill. It deals with a vital and important social issue, which has to be addressed. Many of us have a great problem in our city areas. No doubt my hon. Friend has in her city. Many of our citizens, women in particular, are affected adversely. They are distressed by what is going on at present. They believe, quite rightly, as I do and as does my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West, that something should be done. I hope and believe that something will be done. However, that does not mean to say that just anything should be done.

My hon. Friend's approach reminds me of the story of the Guards sergeant-major who was taking a cadet instructing a drill squad. The cadet was not very good. As the squad was disappearing across the parade ground towards the field at the edge, and ever more towards the horizon, and the cadet did not know what to do, the sergeant-major turned to the cadet and said, "Say something, boy, if only good-bye." That is the approach, to some extent, of my hon. Friend the Minister—"Let us do something." My approach is to say, "Let us do the right thing." It may take a little more time, but this is a vital fundamental social issue. It is a very complicated social issue. Anything to do with sex is highly complicated, highly emotional and highly technical. Let us not rush something through just because we happen to be here today. We owe it to our people to get it right.

I am sorry if what I am doing and saying does not fit in with the very real, true and proper purposes of my hon. Friend the Member for Drake. She has performed a signal service in bringing the issue at this stage in this place to the attention of the public. I believe that, having done so, it is right and proper that the Government should follow up her initiative and make sure that we have a proper law on the issue. As we can see from the number of amendments on the Amendment Paper, this is not an issue that should be dealt with in a Private Member's Bill. It is too fundamental, too complicated and too important for that. The time available for private Members' Bills is limited, as is the number of Members available to become involved. I hope that Government will take up this issue and produce a proper solution to the problem.

Miss Fookes: My hon. Friend praises me for introducing what he apparently regards as an item for discussion. I put it to him with all the force at my command that the Bill has been introduced with a view to action and I am deeply disappointed at the attitude that he is now taking.

Mr. Marlow: I understand and respect that. My hon. Friend has been deeply involved and has worked very hard with others who wish the measure to go forward as quickly as possible. With the greatest respect, however, this is a complex, deep and important issue and we must get it right. If we get it wrong, innocent people may suffer. [Interruption.] I know that innocent people are suffering already, but other innocent people may suffer.

My hon. Friend the Minister has rightly and properly said that the Government are prepared to accept some amendments and we respect that position, but other amendments are needed to prevent innocent people from suffering. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake, despite all her hard work and the massive support for her measure, would not wish Conservative Members to allow a measure to go forward that would allow innocent people to suffer. I am sure that she will agree that we need the right measure and enough time to get it right.

Miss Fookes: Of course I am concerned that the innocent should not suffer, but my hon. Friend is overplaying that argument to a marked extent and ignoring the feelings of the many residents and women who, day in and day out, are the victims of this kind of practice.

Mr. Marlow: I could not possibly do that, because my constituents are most concerned about this, as no doubt are those of my hon. Friend the Minister. My concern is to get it right and I believe that that is what my constituents expect of me.

Mr. Parris: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is not just a complex issue but a very narrow one? The reform of the law on prostitution is a much wider issue which should have been tackled long ago. We are now awaiting the report and recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. Does my hon. Friend agree that this matter should be tackled in the context of those recommendations?

Mr. Marlow: As in most—indeed, probably all—his arguments on this, my hon. Friend is right again. Governments of all persuasions have always tried to leave these matters on the back shelf. That is one of the tragedies. The Bill deals with an important side issue rather than addressing the real problem. All these aspects should be taken together, but Governments have been reluctant to do so.

Even if the Government do not go forward on the whole issue, there are several more amendments and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister wishes them to be properly debated. If we do not have time to finish the debates today, it is open to the Government to provide further time on a future occasion. If they do not wish to do that, they should take the first opportunity to address themselves to the matter in great detail so that the whole House can be involved in overcoming this aspect of the problem even if the Government do not wish to become involved in the other aspects about which my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West is rightly concerned.

There is one point that has not been answered so far. Many people rightly point out that laws already exist which can and do allow the police to deal with the problem if they find it convenient or necessary to do so. Argyll square was mentioned. I remember reading in the press about a major problem in that area near King's Cross. There was a strong police presence in the area and the problem has been, if not wholly, to some extent overcome. That implies that remedies are available. When my hon.

Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West intervened—I hope that a peace will break out between us now—he said that in a submission to him the National Association of Probation Officers said that the police already had sufficient powers to deal with the nuisance, but that they had given it little priority. When my hon. Friend the Minister speaks again, I should like him to reply to that point because it has not yet been satisfactorily answered.

New clause 3, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), states:

"A man commits an offence if in a street or public place he solicits women (or the same woman) for sexual purposes in a manner which causes nuisance or fear."

I do not wish to split hairs, but I am not sure of the meaning of the words "or the same woman". It may be a slip of the pen, or my understanding of his point may be inadequate. I am not a lawyer, and I should like more information about and greater understanding of part of the new clause.

A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman. At what stage does a man solicit a woman? If a man is driving down a street, a woman beckons to him, he responds, and she engages him in conversation, as a result of which a deal is struck, is he soliciting the woman? How far does the woman have to go for the man not to be soliciting, and how far does the man have to go, irrespective of what the woman is doing, for him to be soliciting the woman? That is an important question. The courts know what is meant by a woman soliciting for prostitution. That has been around for generations, and the courts know how to deal with it. I should be grateful if the hon. Member for Hammersmith would explain how he would define a man soliciting a woman if the woman is standing on the street waiting for him?

Mr. Soley: The amendment sought to achieve corroboration. My argument centred on corroboration to avoid the danger of a wrongful conviction. The words are taken from other parts of the Bill, and do not change the position. I am not a lawyer, but I understand that if a man said to a woman, "Will you give sex for money?", it is an offence. That proposition may be made to one woman or a series of women in the street.

"women (or the same woman)"

Mr. Marlow: I accept that but, in my innocence, I am not wholly sure what the hon. Gentleman means by a man soliciting a woman. What is the act of soliciting by a man when a woman offers him her services for money? Where does that act take place? How is it defined? We do not know.

Mr. Soley: The act becomes a criminal act under existing law when money is offered for the sexual favour. In other words, it is the point at which an offer based on money is made. If the hon. Gentleman walked up to a woman in a street and said, "I like you," that would not be an offence of soliciting. However, if he walked up to her and said, "I would like to go to bed with you and I offer you £10 to do so," he would have committed an offence.

Mr. Marlow: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I am an innocent abroad, and I am unlikely to be involved in the circumstances that he suggested. My innocence will remain until such time as an eminent lawyer like my hon. Friend the Minister informs me what this means.

New clause 4 states:

"An offence under section (Soliciting a woman for sexual purposes in a manner causing nuisance or fear) shall not be proved unless the person who has been caused nuisance or fear gives evidence of such."

That important matter has been extensively discussed today. One of the weaknesses of the Bill, for which I do not blame my hon. Friend the Member for Drake—it is a complicated issue and it was drafted at short notice—is the evidential aspect of how someone may be found guilty of this offence. I hope that the Government will introduce their own Bill, and I hope that that Bill will deal with this aspect.

1.30 pm

Mr. Parris: May I put to my hon. Friend a point that I wished to put to my hon. Friend the Minister, but was not permitted to? My hon. Friend the Minister said that he will issue instructions to the police that, where someone is charged under this section, the woman concerned must be approached and invited to give evidence. I welcome the intention behind that assurance, but would not the practical result be that the police will quickly realise that, if the woman is a prostitute, there is not much point in bringing a charge because a prostitute will not give evidence? If the woman is a respectable and deeply offended innocent passer-by, she may not wish to give evidence. The only cases in which the police will be able to bring charges successfully is where the woman is a police constable—where a WPC is used as a decoy. Will not the practical effect of the Minister's assurance be that the police will be able to prosecute such offences only by using agents provocateurs?

Mr. Marlow: If that were the case, I should be extremely unhappy. My hon. Friend will know that later amendments deal with the corroboration of evidence and what evidence should or should not be accepted in court. When we address those amendments, if my hon. Friend and I are sufficiently persuasive so that the House agrees with us, some of the problems that he mentioned could be overcome in that way.

New clause 7 was moved eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West. Persistence is one of the kernels of the issue. I put it to my hon. Friend the Minister in an intervention that the Law Society believes that, if there is no persistence in kerb crawling, the innocent are likely to suffer, will be taken to court and possibly found guilty. My hon. Friend is a lawyer and a Home Office Minister. I put it to him that, above all, he should not wish innocent people to be put through the courts and found guilty of offences that they did not commit. My hon. Friend said that the Law Society had not reinforced its evidence, but I am not aware that it has retracted the point. If the Law Society, which is made up of eminent solicitors, who are more often involved in such court cases than are barristers, believes that injustice may be done, my hon. Friend should take account of the fact.

Miss Fookes: Although I normally accept the views of the Law Society as being responsible and cogent, I thought that the arguments it put forward to deal with the Bill were extraordinarily weak, and I could not believe that they came from the Law Society.

Mr. Marlow: That is my hon. Friend's view. I am sure that she examined the arguments in great detail——

Miss Fookes: I did.

Mr. Marlow: —and has good reason for putting forward that view.

Mr. Parris: That may be the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Drake, but my hon. Friend the Minister gave the impression that he had persuaded the Committee of that view. That was inaccurate. He later acknowledged that he had not persuaded me, and it is not clear whether he persuaded Opposition Members. I know that he did not persuade my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), also a lawyer, who argued cogently for the insertion of the word "persistently" and was never persuaded that that was an unsound argument.

Mr. Marlow: I read in detail the Committee proceedings, and noted that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), for whom we have the greatest respect—he is one of the brightest of the intake in 1983 and a good lawyer—was not convinced by the case that the Minister was making on this subject, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West has said. It is important to bear that in mind. The Committee was not unanimous and some knowledgeable Members were not of one mind with my hon. Friend the Minister.

Amendment No. 33 suggests that the House might wish to delete in total clause 2. The Bill is about kerb crawling and clause 2 has been introduced to back up provisions against kerb crawling, but as well as doing that it has a radical effect on what would go on outside the motor car. It makes it an offence for a man persistently to solicit women on foot. This is a new departure. We know that it is wrong to sell milk to the general public in certain ways —one has to go through the Milk Marketing Board. We know the various laws about shops, but seldom is the consumer prosecuted for buying the goods.

Clause 2 suggests that the customer, probably for the first time in history outside drug laws, should be prosecuted for being in possession of or consuming the goods. This may be necessary—I do not know because I do not have sufficient expertise on the matter. At this stage I should prefer to see clause 2 deleted, but if my hon. Friend the Minister can give me some assurances on it, I may be prepared to change my view. It may be acceptable to have, as the Government are suggesting for dog licences, an element of devolution, so that local authorities can decide, according to the nature of the problems and the public views in their areas, how best to react. It may be that the way to deal with clause 2 is to allow that to become a byelaw in an area where the problem is so significant that this approach has to be adopted.

Mr. Parris: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Home Office or the Minister were to give us some sign of their thinking as to how the prostitute should seek and meet her clients—in other words in what circumstances she was able to solicit for or find clients within the law—it would be easier for us to agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Drake that the prostitute should not do this on the pavement and to the annoyance of the general public? If only we could tell prostitutes how they should carry on their trade, we would be much more within our rights in stopping them from carrying on their trade in a way that is a nuisance.

Mr. Marlow: As I have said, and as has been said by the National Association of Probation Officers, the police have the powers should they wish to deal with the problem of pavement prostitutes, and that has been shown in certain parts of the country. When I was young and at Sandhurst, I understand that Soho used to be a glorious place for people to go, but along came Sir John Wolfenden and Soho was cleaned up and the pavement rules were tightened up. There were no longer prostitutes standing there, dangling their ankle chains on the pavements.

Secondly, while I agree with my hon. Friend that it would be much better to solve the problems all at once, there has been an enduring reluctance on behalf of Governments to tackle this problem face on and to deal with it in a sensible and satisfactory way. Political risks are involved that should not be underestimated.

Mr. Parris: They should try.

Mr. Marlow: Yes, they should try, but let us concentrate first on the real menace of kerb crawling and get a satisfactory solution to that. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree with me on that.

I should be happy to withdraw my support for amendment No. 33, which provides for the removal of clause 2, if the Minister would give us an assurance that the provision would be reintroduced in a way that would not be mandatory or nationwide but would allow local authorities, should they so wish, to introduce byelaws. Otherwise, it is using a sledgehammer to crack a nut, which is not necessary.

Amendments Nos. 40 and 41 have been cogently argued by the Opposition spokesman. They are intended to ensure that the provisions should apply only where a nuisance is caused. That is a sensible way to approach matters. If someone is not harming, affecting, disturbing or disrupting anyone, the idea that that person should be taken before a court, have his reputation destroyed, be fined and, if the fine is not paid, go to prison, is a little heavy.

I am pleased that the Minister has agreed to accept amendment No. 47, so there is no need for me to say any more about it. My hon. Friend was wise to accept it.

The import of amendment No. 52, which my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West has clearly described, is known to the House. Amendments Nos. 58 to 60 apply to new clause 3. As new clause 3 is no longer, there is no need for me to say anything about them.

Mr. Parris: My hon. Friend has not mentioned amendment No. 61 dealing with penalties and mode of trial. I hope that, even if not under this group of amendments, he will come later to the question of jury trial.

Mr. Marlow: I should let my hon. Friend into a secret — his amendment No. 61, which he addressed so passionately, is grouped in the sixth group of amendments not the first group. Therefore, not only will I have an opportunity to address myself to that amendment when we reach it, but, if my hon. Friend has any second thoughts, he will be able to broaden the knowledge of the House on the matter.

I say again to my hon. Friend the Member for Drake that she is to be heartily congratulated on bringing up in the Bill this social problem and, in many respects, social menace that upsets and distresses so many people. I believe and hope that a measure will be enacted without delay, but I believe that it must be a Government measure.

Ms. Jo Richardson: I had not intended to intervene on this group of amendments, and I shall not detain the House for more than a few minutes. As time is passing, it appears that the amendments to which I had intended to address more lengthy remarks might not be reached. Therefore, I had better speak now.

I do not often find myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who tries to cross swords with me on many occasions. He nods; I am sure that we will continue to cross swords. I am glad that the Minister has said that he is willing to withdraw clause 3, which has caused many hon. Members a number of problems. Also, many people and organisations outside the House have been nervous about the implications of the clause.

We do not yet know whether the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) is willing to accept the removal of clause 3. I shall be interested to hear what she has to say.

1.45 pm

Miss Fookes: I am sorry. I thought that it was made clear by the Minister that he spoke not only for himself but for me in agreeing to the withdrawal of clause 3. For the avoidance of doubt, I repeat it.

Ms. Richardson: I am glad that the hon. Lady has made that clear, because earlier she was vehement in saying that she did not want any disturbance of the words that she had put into the clause, including the word "fear".

Miss Fookes: I was seeking to clarify what I thought the clause meant, which was not what the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that it meant. It was not that I was powerfully in favour of the clause. I thought that its meaning was being misinterpreted, and I was seeking to put that right.

Ms. Richardson: I am grateful for that clarification.

The principal reason why I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton, North is that I am still worried about some aspects of the Bill and still think that some of the drafting gives me and many other people cause for alarm.

I should prefer, as often happens — this is not to knock private Members' legislation, because I have myself been privileged in my parliamentary life to introduce such a Bill—to see the Government themselves introducing legislation. A private Member's Bill is not always the best way to make laws to cover a very complicated subject.

Despite what the Law Commissioners said, and despite the legal minds that have been brought to bear on the subject, we still need to give it considerably more thought before giving the police a lot more power than they have at present—power which they do not need to cope with this problem.

The offensive kerb crawler who is harassing non-prostitute women should be capable of being dealt with under our existing laws. I think that I reflect the views of many women when I say that it is simply that the police do not give the protection of women a particularly high priority. They do not see kerb crawling, in terms of both prostitute and non-prostitute women, as a problem to which they should pay much attention.

Having devised a Bill to give the police extra powers, Parliament will obviously encourage them to arrest people, and it may be that they will arrest people who will be severely disadvantaged by these extra powers in a way that the House does want to see.

I am very much in sympathy with women who reside in districts and who are not themselves prostitutes but are subjected to kerb crawling. Perhaps I may be allowed to recount an incident which, believe it or not, I experienced. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) will no doubt recall the story.

I was going home from the House one night, travelling on the underground rather than, as is my habit, by car. I had left Hammersmith Broadway station and was walking to my flat which is five or six minutes' walk along Hammersmith road. Believe it or not, a kerb crawler came alongside me, and I could see him out of the corner of my eye. The passenger door of the car was half open, and the driver was leaning across the front seat. I do not know what gave me the courage at that hour, well after midnight, but I walked over, held the door open and said, "Yes, what can I do for you?" Slightly startled by my approach, he replied, "I wondered if you would like to go for a drink." I said, "Oh, I see. I am a police woman, and I thought that you intended to ask the way." At that point, he was gone like a flash.

I realise that I was myself breaking the law by impersonating a police woman, and I not know that I should ever have the courage to do the same again. But it brings me to a serious aspect of this matter to which we shall come in later amendments. It is that police women can go round in plain clothes and act as agents provocateurs, in the way that several hon. Members have already described. I do not believe that it is good enough that that should happen. Those who will suffer will not be non-prostitute women but women who are prostitutes.

In considering both this Bill and future legislation, we have a duty to protect the rights of prostitutes. In this Bill we are reducing the possibility of prostitute women meeting their clients in a reasonable way. We shall make it very much more difficult for them to continue to ply their trade. The public may have views about whether that is desirable. I make no comment about that at all; it is a fact of life. We shall make it much more difficult for prostitute women to continue to ply their trade. We may drive them underground, which we may not want to do, where they may well be subjected to more violence than is the case under the present law.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend has made an important point. Both in Committee and on the Floor of the House perhaps the most useful point to have emerged is the need to address the problem of how the prostitute is to meet her client. If we are not careful, the Bill will result in all kinds of unintended consequences which will make matters worse. My hon. Friend is right to make that point. There is also the problem of how to deal with the effect of prostitutes meeting their clients in certain limited geographical areas of the United Kingdom. That is the problem we have been tackling, and it has caused difficulty.

Ms. Richardson: I agree with my hon. Friend. I was not on the Committee, and I apologise to the House for not having attended the debate on the Second Reading of the Bill. However, during the last few weeks I have had one or two other private Members' Bills on my mind. I should have been pleased if there had been a move in the Bill towards the decriminalisation of prostitution. There is too much of a criminal element in something which ought to be looked at in a very much more rational and liberal way.

[Ms. Richardson]

We have to face the fact that the safety of women who are prostitutes is not dealt with in the Bill. It may increase their isolation. It may result in prostitutes being more vulnerable to attacks, blackmail and pimps because they are cut off from regular access to clients with whom they are now able to make contact because their clients are in cars. One needs to consider the problems which they face. Their lives should not be made more difficult. We must also consider making the lives of non-prostitute women easier because, quite rightly, they do not wish to be harassed by kerb crawlers. Women who are prostitutes may well be forced underground in order to evade the police.

Poorer men and black people who are driving cars may also feel increasingly nervous. Already they are, understandably, nervous of the police. They feel that they are subject to harassment if they stop their car for any reason. They may do so not to speak to a woman but to post a letter or to buy a packet of cigarettes. When they open the door to get out of the car, a woman may be passing, and they may be pounced upon by the police if they have these extra powers.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Lady has touched on an important point. We may view the police in slightly different ways, but one thing that I am sure we are both concerned about is the respect in which the public hold the police and vice versa. One of the problems that has arisen over the past couple of generations has been that the necessary involvement of the police in motoring offences has caused rough edges to develop between the public and the police. If this measure were enacted, as is now suggested, it is my real fear, as I think it is probably the hon. Lady's, that there will be further rough edges which will exacerbate problems in the relationship between the public and the police, which is something that I am sure we both wish to avoid.

Ms. Richardson: Absolutely. I am embarrassed at being so much in agreement with the hon. Gentleman. That is something that I am worried about. As the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) pointed out, not all members of the public look at the nitty-gritty of the words, dots and commas of every Bill and Act. We all run the risk of inadvertently breaking the law. I do not know whether, if the Bill were to become law, everybody would be aware of the new offences which suddenly slid on to the statute book which might result in their being penalised when they were doing something innocently. Indeed, it might not be a good thing if they were made nervous by new offences.

The thrust of this group of amendments is that there must be proper corroboration of whatever the police suggest that people are doing before they can suggest it. I hope that even at this late stage the hon. Member for Drake will think again about the Bill and that the Government and all hon. Members will think for longer and much more closely and deeply about what we need to do in order to deal with the problem properly.

I very much want to see women more protected by society and by the authorities in society than they are. But that kind of protection must be a proper protection and it must not be confined to one particular set of women. It must take in the needs of all women in Britain, whatever their profession, wherever they live and whatever we may think of the way in which they live. They have as much right to protection from us and the House as anyone else.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I want to place on record a number of brief comments which may mirror some of the arguments that have already been put forward. I agree with the line that my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) chose to pursue on the defence of women who work as prostitutes. Inevitably, the Bill does affect them because it has chosen to look at prostitution, not simply the problem of kerb crawling, and I regret that. Unfortunately, the Bill has become snared on that issue. Good will exists in the House and the country to tackle effectively the problem of kerb crawling, but because we have complicated matters we have aroused worries and fears on all sides.

I welcome the withdrawal of clause 3. That is an important step forward which I freely acknowledge. I look forward to the Minister making clear what he means by the review process. It is important that we should know precisely what will be contained within that. Clearly, we need to be able to ascertain exactly what will happen when the Bill arrives on the statute book. If the fears that have been mentioned today prove to be justified, appropriate action should be taken.

I am particularly worried about two issues. The first, relating to the problem of persistence, the Minister has dismissed and described as an internal worry within the Conservative party between himself and the hon. Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris). However, the problem of persistence occupies the minds of many more than just his hon. Friends. It occupies the minds of a number of hon. Members, because it touches on points that were raised in Committee, where there was a debate which ended up with a vote, but we were not all satisfied that the right decision was taken.

The crux of the debate is the balance between the rights of my constituents who are oppressed by the unsolicited actions of kerb crawlers and the rights of constituents who are not vocalising their fears because they do not realise that they might be affected if the Bill were passed. It is important that the balance of evidence should be shifted to give protection, particularly — I do not say this aggressively — in a community such as the one that I represent where, for a host of historical and social reasons, people's attitudes towards the police have changed and the relationship between the people and the police has deteriorated.

The force of the arguments put by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) in moving the new clause holds good. I welcome the limited progress that has been made, but I hope that the Minister and the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) recognise the serious worries that will continue to preoccupy many hon. Members, even though we support the concept of action on kerb crawling.

New Clause 8

NO PUBLICITY BEFORE FINDING OF GUILT

'Pending or during any proceedings under this Act it shall be an offence to mention publicly, publicise or broadcast the name or names of anyone accused under its provisions before such time as such person or persons is found guilty.'.—[Mr. Marlow.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Marlow: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Bill, as hon. Members know, is important. One of the main concerns that has been exhibited so far is the potential problem of an innocent person being found guilty. Innocent people can suffer the damage of being found guilty even when they are not guilty. The purpose of the new clause is to prevent that from happening.

The Bill seeks to have fines of up to £400 for most offences. For those arrested, taken to court, prosecuted and then found to be innocent, their punishment would be many times worse than a £400 fine.

We are dealing with the sort of issue that, rightly or wrongly, can damage reputations in a particular way. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister, as a lawyer, will realise that there is not a verdict of guilty in every case that is taken to court, but I put it to him that when a person is arrested, taken to court, and found to be innocent, having had the case publicised in the newspapers, he will be regarded as guilty by many of his peers. There is an expression that there is no smoke without fire, and this is a very fiery issue.

The purpose of my new clause is to ensure that no publicity should be given in any shape or form to any purported offence until the person concerned has been found guilty. Without that provision, great miscarriages of justice could take place. I believe that the Minister would not wish that to happen any more than I would.

What is involved here in the relationship between a man and a woman is not illegal—the Criminal Law Revision Committee said in one of its papers that it is not even an immoral activity — yet somebody arrested by a policeman, prosecuted and taken to court suffers very grievously if the case is given publicity. It is wrong that such publicity should be given in advance of a verdict.

One can imagine some of the people who could be involved and some of the reputations that could be destroyed. It would not do us any good as Members of Parliament should we be picked up and charged with any of the offences dealt with in the Bill. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that when he was a probation officer he used to speak to people on the streets, and that some of them might well have been prosecuted. He might have been picked up inadvertently and wrongly. If publicity had been accorded to him in such circumstances, there would have been great damage to him. It could happen to a Member of Parliament, a lawyer, a judge, an army officer, or anyone from any walk of life.

There is not only the question of a person's professional reputation. There is the damage to the family when publicity is given after someone has been wrongly picked up by the police. It could happen to a husband after 10 years of married bliss. A husband could be going about his business in a proper and dutiful way and as a result of some mistake have his name and the purported offence emblazoned in the press for all the world to see. That would not be very nice for his wife, his marriage, his children, his relations or his friends.

The difficulty, as I have said, is that there is a feeling, deep in most people, that there is no smoke without fire. People have a feeling that if they read something in a newspaper it must be right. If people read about a case in the newspaper and the man is eventually found by the court to be innocent, the original banner headlines will not be repeated; there will simply be a small paragraph somewhere on the inside pages of the newspaper, where no one will read it. But the damage will have been done and the reputation destroyed. The position will then be irredeemable. That is why I hope that the new clause will be acceptable to the House. I remind the House that in rape cases, anonymity is granted in certain circumstances.

In the past, terrible problems could have arisen as a result of publicity. There was a theory at one stage that George V's elder brother, Prince Eddie, was Jack the Ripper. Think what could have happened if a case involving a member of the Royal Family—the next but one in line to the throne—had been emblazoned on the front pages of the press in relation to something that had not happened and of which he was found to be not guilty.

Other aspects of the Bill concern many hon. Members, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) and myself. We are concerned about the evidence that will be needed and how it will be adduced, and what interpretation will be put upon the term "soliciting". There is uncertainty and concern that in some circumstances the police might be over-enthusiastic in their duty. People might be taken to court unnecessarily and then found not guilty.

I give an example from my own experience. I hasten to add that it did not concern the type of activity under discussion today but it concerned the role of the police. I was driving home behind a police car which was going fairly slowly. There is no law or rule against overtaking a police car, so I did so. Almost immediately after that, there was a hiatus further along the road which caused me to brake aggressively, causing the police car behind me to do the same. The police then pulled me into the side of the road, got me out of the car and started abusing me for dangerous driving, and so on. They said that they intended to prosecute me for crossing a double white line. I swear before this House that I did not cross a double white line. That would have been a very stupid thing to do, given that I was overtaking a police car, so I was ultra-careful. But there were two policemen and me. What was I to do? Should I go to court and testify against two policemen? That would not work. Their evidence would be accepted and mine would be rejected.

Precisely the same thing can happen in other areas, including that under discussion today. Over-zealous police, rightly seeking to sort out a local problem, to protect the neighbourhood and to provide a decent environment for the women of the area to live in without being pestered, might indulge in a campaign and wrongly pick someone up. In those circumstances, there is not just the danger of the person being wrongly found guilty but the danger that even if found innocent his reputation will be besmirched beyond redemption. I should like to hear the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on that aspect and I hope that she will accept the new clause.

Miss Fookes: I am not prepared to accept the new clause because it seems to me to run very much against the general way in which we treat those accused of crime, which is that justice should be seen to be done publicly. There is only limited exception to that and I do not think that it is warranted in this case. So my short answer is no, I am not prepared to accept the new clause.

I should add that I have been deeply disappointed, not to say angered, by the general line taken by my hon. Friends the Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) in particular. A very reasonable compromise was offered, I found the Opposition very reasonable in their approach, and I believe that we could have done real business and gone on to put on the statute book a modest measure which would have been of real service to those women and residents who are being affronted and harassed at present.

I am sorry to have to say this, but there has been filibustering by my two hon. Friends. It is clear from the time that we shall not get the Bill through, so let us be blunt. The Bill has been killed off by the actions of two of my hon. Friends. I feel deeply hurt and very, very angry.

Mr. Tom Cox: I share the view expressed by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) about the new clause moved by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), which would run contrary to the way in which we expect our courts to behave. I am appalled at what has happened in the House today. All hon. Members who served on the Committee, and even hon. Members who did not serve on it, are aware that some aspects of the Bill caused anxiety. However, the Minister gave us a firm assurance, in response to my comments and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), that we respect the rights of all citizens who may find their way innocently into areas of prostitution—I have such an area in my constituency—but that we want to see safeguards. It was to the credit of the Minister that he gave an extremely-firm assurance that the matter would be referred back to the House within a reasonable time, and that detailed reports would be made about the legislation's effect on areas where kerb crawling exists about the types of action and numbers of prosecutions initiated by the police. I was more than willing to accept that.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) was actively involved in expressing his opposition. Although we may not accept all his comments, we respect hon. Members who have a record of expressing their views, whether we agree with them or not. I try to give him credit for having consistently expressed his reservations about the Bill since Second Reading.

However, the hon. Member for Northampton, North has done a grave disservice to the House today. We have witnessed a classic example of the destruction of legislation for which for many years many of our constituents have been crying out. I am not the only hon. Member who has received requests for such legislation from his constituents. Many hon. Members representing many parts of the country have received similar requests.

In response to an intervention, the hon. Member for Drake said that, regrettably, no legislation was 100 per cent. perfect, and that we could all make criticisms of it. I was convinced that at long last we had a genuine opportunity to start to tackle the problem. For many years and under successive Governments my constituents have asked me to try to get action taken. We had that opportunity. What is more, the Minister assured us that there would be detailed reports back to the House. I made it clear that if it was found from the reports that there were reason for serious anxiety about how the legislation was being implemented, I would tell my constituents that I could no longer support it. But, unfortunately, we have lost everything because of the actions of the hon. Member for Northampton, North. It is an utter disgrace. Constituents throughout the country look to their Members of Parliament to help them with this problem. We have lost that opportunity.

Mr. Parris rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) giving way?

Mr. Cox: No, Sir. I have concluded my speech.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I wholeheartedly endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) and the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox). It is extremely sad that today, because of the wrecking behaviour of one or two of my hon. Friends, innocent victims of the kerb-crawling nuisance have been denied a remedy for which they have long been looking. It is certainly a sad day for Southampton.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will introduce alternative legislation in the next Session, although he cannot support this Bill further during this Session. There is a desperate need for the problem to be solved by law, and I hope that the Conservative Government will not go easy on their efforts to achieve that objective.

Mr. Parris: There is a need for the problem to be addressed by law, but it should be addressed by the Home Office. The general law on prostitution must be reformed, and we need a Government Bill that deals with all the problems of prostitution at once. We must deal with how the prostitute meets her client, kerb crawling, and the keeping of a disorderly house——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Speke Hall

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.33 pm

Mr. Esmond Bulmer (Wyre Forest): Speke Hall outside Liverpool has been described by Professor Pevsner as one of the four best timber-framed mansions in England, and with its farmland and woodland is an asset to Merseyside. It was accepted by the National Trust, on whose executive committee I serve, in May 1943 with an endowment of £10,000, on condition that Liverpool corporation would take a lease for 99 years, under which it would be responsible for all the repairs and maintenance, taking into account the endowment fund. In 1974, the lease was taken over by Merseyside county council, which has done a first-class job in refurbishing the house. More than £1 million has been spent, but another £300,000 is required to complete the work.

Under the Bill to abolish the metropolitan councils, the Government are proposing that the house will revert to Liverpool city council. This is the nub of the problems that I wish to draw to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister. He is well aware that Liverpool is a great city fallen on hard times. Some 100 years ago, Lord Derby thought it a greater honour to be lord mayor of Liverpool than to be Prime Minister—a somewhat different scene from today, when the Government are having to embark on a whole range of special measures to prevent the city from falling into irreversible decay.

The shadow of this decline has been apparent for some years. As far back as 1947, James Lees-Milne, reporting on a visit to Speke Hall, wrote:

"I drove to Speke where we were met by the Town Clerk, the City Engineer and a member of the finance committee all smelling strongly of drink. I was not at all satisfied that this house was being looked after by the right committee and gathered that the inside of the house was exclusively within the control of the City Engineer."

The problems today are somewhat different, but I am sure that my hon. Friend is as concerned as was Mr. Lees-Milne that the house should be placed in the right hands, particularly given the amount of public money that has been put into it.

Despite what was said in Standing Committee on the Local Government Bill, I cannot believe that my hon. Friend will argue this afternoon that Liverpool city council, which has been described by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment as a total and utter disaster, is the right body to act as custodian for this important house. If he is, will he explain why he believes that Liverpool city council will prove a responsible tenant, what undertakings he has sought or received and what assurances he can offer the National Trust? I shall not be surprised if he can give me none of these, but I shall be delighted if he can.

I have been doing my homework on Liverpool city council, as I am sure he has. It is controlled by the local Labour party, on which the Militant Tendency often prevails. The closed shop and the party line predominate. The story surrounding the destruction of the glasshouses in the botanical gardens at Hartshill, as reported to me by a former city councillor, hardly inspires confidence. Apparently, the gardeners were required to go out on a sympathy strike. Several of them refused to do so and were subjected to the sort of treatment suffered by some of the working miners recently. They were told that they would never work again. Shortly afterwards, the glasshouses were condemned as unsafe and pulled down because there was not the money to repair them.

Plants and buildings can be sensitive to short periods of neglect at critical times. Just suppose that Liverpool city council takes over Speke Hall and all council employees are called out on a sympathy strike or for a day of action. If this has happened on a day when there has been a heavy fall of snow followed by a fast thaw, there will be nobody to clear up the snow on the roof. Who will accept responsibility for the ensuing flood?

My hon. Friend will no doubt be aware that the Liverpool city council has closed St. George's hall through lack of funds. The more I learn of what goes on up there, the more I understand the disbelief in the voice of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) on the Front Bench of the Standing Committee on the Local Government Bill when he said in effect: "So they are giving Speke to Derek Hatton."

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister was asked what extra funds were to be made available to Liverpool city council if it accepted Speke, but he refused to be drawn. I fear that if Liverpool city council is given Speke without extra cash, it will let it run down or will even close it. It is in the highest degree unlikely that it will maintain progress of recent years or complete the programme of refurbishment.

In that situation, the Government have two options. One is to endow the house and return to the National Trust, but that would require about £4 million. The other is to transfer it to the new trustee body that is to take over the Walker art gallery. Either of these courses of action would safeguard Speke Hall without any of the risks of passing the necessary funds to sustain the house through the uncertain intermediary of Liverpool city council.

Ministers have the power to transfer Speke to this new body, and I find it difficult to understand why they have not already said that this is what they intend to do. Liverpool has no museums department, and I imagine that the skilled staff looking after Speke will be transferred to the trustees to be appointed. I believe that Ministers accept that Speke Hall is a house of national importance and akin to a museum in displaying a significant collection of furniture and tapestries. I say again that I do not and cannot believe that Liverpool city council is the proper custodian for Speke. Nor can I believe that my hon. Friend would suggest that.

Ever since this Government came to power, Liverpool has been regarded as a special case for financial and other help. Surely my hon. Friend will not quibble about the price of transferring Speke to the trustee body. Surely common equity requires that when the Government abolish a satisfactory tenant, they have a moral obligation to replace that tenant with an equally satisfactory one.

Under the Bill, the Government hope to save—if they have done their homework correctly—something over £100 million per annum. They are surely in a position to ensure that they act honourably.

My first inkling that something was wrong was when I asked the Secretary of State whether he would list the historic buildings currently financed or administered by the metropolitan county councils or the GLC. He replied:

"The preparation and publication of lists giving this information is the responsibility of the individual local authorities."

It smelt of Sir Humphrey Appleby.

I had to ask myself why, if Ministers had done their homework, they were not prepared to answer such a straightforward question which had to be part of normal contingency planning. I believe that there is a ministerial colleague in another place who is prepared to argue over Speke, "What the Lord giveth, the Lord taketh away." That is a somewhat lordly approach, and not one that I or my hon. Friend would wish to put forward to our constituents when credit has already been claimed for the benefits introduced by the original Act to establish the larger counties and which, in the case of Speke, had so clearly delivered. I understand that my hon. Friend is more sympathetic to the case for Speke than I have indicated. However, I also believe that he is seeking a significant contribution from the National Trust as the price of transferring Speke to the new trustee body.

If the National Trust had to find half the cost of the endowment required, that would represent one quarter of its total income from the current membership of 1,200,000. Half the running costs would be sufficient to finance the wardening of 50 miles of coastline. My hon. Friend will be aware that the National Trust already looks after 450 miles of our best coastline, and the Neptune appeal has just been relaunched to provide funds to safeguard another 450 miles.

I fail to see why the National Trust should be asked to pay a penny towards the transfer of Speke to a suitable tenant. Speke Hall now has a satisfactory tenant, and the Government are proposing that it should have an unsatisfactory tenant. Such conduct is wholly at odds with the Government's record. They have a fine record of helping to preserve buildings of outstanding architectural merit. I am sure that Speke is one that they would wish to see preserved; one where the programme of refurbishment should be carried through. I do not believe that they would wish that house to fall into ruin. I am sure that the original decision of the National Trust to accept it is one that they wish to endorse.

In addition, Merseyside needs all the tourists it can attract. Last year 58,000 people visited Speke, and the surrounding woodland and farmland provide a valuable lung in an increasingly industrial environment. The House is a valuable source of education to a great many schoolchildren who visit it regularly. To call now for the National Trust — a charitable body to which the Government are continually looking to support our heritage in so many ways—for funds to sustain Speke, is entirely wrong.

I wish to raise one other point. The National Trust is empowered by Parliament to hold property inalienably. That requires a quality of judgment, in a world changing as fast as ours, that is given to few. If the Government change the ground rules in a way that was not foreseen and which prejudices the National Trust, it is likely to be more cautious about the properties that it accepts in future.

During the Committee stage of the Forestry Bill in the last Parliament, I pointed out to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker), then Minister for Agriculture, that the trust had accepted some land as of heritage quality because the neighbouring woodland was owned by the Forestry Commission and the integrity of the whole could be guaranteed because the Forestry Commission could be counted upon to act responsibly. If these woods had been sold and replaced by unsightly development, the trust would have felt that the Government had let it down. My right hon. Friend took the point, and there have been no problems.

Today, I hope that my hon. Friend will say that he understands the real fears of the National Trust and that he and his ministerial colleagues will ensure that Speke Hall passes into responsible hands.

2.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): This is not the first time that my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Bulmer) and I have "adjourned" on heritage matters. I have to repeat again my admiration for his knowledgeable understanding of these affairs. The last Adjournment debate that we had was concerned with Calke Abbey, some 18 months ago, and I think that eventually some good news emanated from that debate.

I have listened with considerable interest and concern to many of the matters raised with great sympathy by my hon. Friend. If he considers that I am less than forthcoming in this debate, I hope that he will understand that my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts will study the problems and the case very closely, as will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I in my Department. I know that my right hon. and noble Friend has already studied carefully the problems which Speke Hall might experience after the abolition of the metropolitan county, the current leaseholder.

As far back as February 1984, my right hon. and noble Friend undertook to look at Speke in the context of the future of the museum service on Merseyside. He could give no assurance that Speke could remain a part of that service, since strictly speaking it is a historic house and not a museum. But he recognised, as we have been made aware today, that the management and development of Speke Hall has been expertly handled by the director of the Merseyside museum service and his staff.

I take this opportunity also to pay tribute to the financial backing and the long-term commitment of the Merseyside county council which has enabled this fine Tudor property to be put in excellent heart for future generations to enjoy and profit from.

When we decided to abolish the metropolitan tier of government, we did so primarily because the majority of the functions carried out by it could equally well be, and in most cases could better be, carried on by district or borough councils. Historic houses fall, for the most part, into this category.

We have made a limited number of exceptions: the three London historic house museums, Kenwood, Rangers and Marble Hill, will pass to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission, being houses of significance whose operation as a group has proved both valuable and economical.

Speke Hall, however, has had a long association with its local authorities. As far back as 1944, when the National Trust first accepted the property, a full repairing lease was negotiated with Liverpool city council. Speke has occupied an important place in the heritage of the Merseyside region. It is a reminder of a vigorous rural past; it gives Merseysiders an historical perspective beyond the 18th and 19th centuries so powerfully represented in the history and architecture of Liverpool itself.

[Mr. Neil Macfarlane]

Sadly, I must agree with my hon. Friend that the majority of present Liverpool city councillors appear oblivious to these qualities and to the enhancement they bring to the citizens of Liverpool and the surrounding districts. They seem intent on condemning Merseysiders to a cultural and physical desert, with the excuse that the money is better spent on housing and social services.

I do not deny the critical importance of these as priorities, but we do not live by bread alone. I agree with what the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said when interviewed yesterday on Radio 4. He pointed out that it is even more important for people living in areas of high unemployment, rundown houses and overstretched services to be able to enjoy fine cultural amenities, be they beautiful countryside, good libraries or museums. Speke Hall presents just such amenities.

But we are right to be concerned that they would not be cared for responsibly, given the recent closure by the city council of St. George's Hall and Harthill nurseries. Let us sincerely hope that this disastrous regime does not last beyond May of next year. Liverpool's citizens must by now recognise that they reap no benefits from such a profligate council, with such limited civic pride and vision.

But where does this leave Speke Hall? Neither my right hon. and noble Friend, nor my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wish to see it harmed in any way. I give that assurance to my hon. Friend. It may be correct to transfer it to the residuary body on Merseyside to give time for greater reflection on where best to place responsibility.

Speke Hall and Croxteth, not too far away, undoubtedly belong to the citizens of the region; there are numerous local authorities the length and breadth of England who would competently and gladly run them as a service for their ratepayers.

Mr. Bulmer: If Speke Hall were to be transferred to the residuary body, can my hon. Friend explain how it would be staffed during the period of reflection?

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall deal with that point in a few moments. I do not intend to go into the matter in detail because so much of what we are dealing with at the moment is hypothetical. I am trying to identify some of the alternatives and options which are open to my right hon. and noble Friend and to other Ministers. I am not suggesting a specific way forward. I am merely trying to outline some of the options. There will undoubtedly be wide interest in the subject. In the context, therefore, of the discussions elsewhere it would be helpful to reflect upon the opinions that are expressed. Ratepayers in other parts of England certainly have local authorities that would be glad to run such houses as a service for their ratepayers and, until the present incumbents took over, Liverpool city council would have been, too. Let us reflect for a minute upon their magnificent cultural and municipal record. It is at a low ebb today but I can only hope that it will not be at a low ebb for much longer. The Government will reflect on the point made in today's debate by my hon. Friend. I appreciate the genuine concern and the anxiety expressed by my hon. Friend.

During the period of consultation following publication of the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities", the Minister for the Arts received many representations about the Merseyside museum service. My hon. Friend will recall that initially he proposed central support only for the Walker art gallery, but it became very clear that the majority of the museum and art gallery collections on Merseyside were of such outstanding quality that they merited special treatment. Hence they have been given the unique distinction of being recognised as on a par with the existing national collections whose principal location is in London. The trustee body which will be established by an Order in Council under clause 45 of the Local Government Bill will be responsible for those collections of national importance which Liverpool is so privileged to have in its midst.

My right hon. and noble Friend has not yet been persuaded that Speke Hall has an automatic place as part of those collections. However, the trustees will be given the power to enter into agreements and hold leases, on whatever terms they see fit. So, for example, should the lease of Speke Hall pass to Liverpool city council—I say should the lease pass to Liverpool city council—the trustees could enter into an agreement to care for and maintain the property and its contents. Similarly, if the National Trust itself decided to take back the leasing arrangement, it too could negotiate terms with the trustees. In the event of the residuary body being given the task of deciding the future of Speke, it also will wish to explore such an arrangement with all the interested parties.

This may well be a way forward. I accept that Liverpool city council has no curatorial expertise, and it would make little sense to duplicate this on a small scale when we already have such excellent museum staff on hand. What Liverpool does have is parks and gardens expertise, and it could make a happy marriage to share these separate skills.

Liverpool has established itself with the docks development, with the International Garden Festival and with Croxteth as a major and innovative tourist city, with all the economic benefits that this brings, and will increasingly bring. Let us hope that a more enlightened council will build upon this.

My hon. Friend was good enough to refer to our record on the heritage. We have established, with all-party support, the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission to manage our national monuments more effectively and we have given it many more resources—over £50 million — than have ever previously been devoted to the heritage. It has made an excellent start under the wise chairmanship of Lord Montagu of Beaulieu.

Two months ago the Government awarded a special grant of £25 million to the National Heritage Memorial Fund to secure the future of three stately homes so that these could be opened to the public. I refer to Kedleston Hall in Derbyshire, Weston Park in Shropshire, which houses an important collection of paintings, tapestries and furniture in grounds landscaped by Capability Brown and, finally, Nostell priory near Wakefield, which also happens to belong to the National Trust and which houses one of the finest collections of Chippendale furniture in the world. All these properties will bring public enjoyment to their local communities. They will also attract many tourists and so create employment in our service industries.

So nobody can say that the Government do not care about the country's heritage. And let nobody say that the Government do not stand by to help the National Trust continue its excellent work.

Next I may have to answer a more subtle charge. It is that the Government have allowed their determination to sweep away an unnecessary tier of local government to cause them to neglect some important local heritage interests. That is less than fair. We have demonstrated that we are prepared to make arrangements to ensure that certain specific properties and certain specialist services are quite properly safeguarded after the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

I have referred to the special arrangements that we have announced for the three properties in London. I have also referred to special arrangements which my right hon. and noble Friend has announced for the future of certain museums and galleries in Liverpool.

None of those arrangements have been much helped by any constructive debate from some of the metropolitan district councils. Too many local councillors have concentrated on making speeches or convening conferences designed to scare their local communities with horror stories of what will happen post-abolition. Sadly, not enough constructive thought has ever been invested by those district councillors into how to plan sensibly for their new responsibilities.

Indeed, in some areas — Liverpool city is one — council officers have been instructed by political supervisors not to co-operate with my Department or even to provide it with information. That is one of the main features that lies behind this debate this afternoon. The debate stems not from any argument or dispute between the National Trust and the Government. There is no such argument.

Discussions continue between Lord Gibson and my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts. Neither is there any argument between this Government and the citizens of Liverpool. We want them to continue to enjoy the excellent amenities provided by Speke Hall and by the many other excellent cultural facilities in and around Liverpool. There are a number of ways of managing those services and while, as I have explained, the general presumption is to look to the district councils to take them on, the Government are not deaf to alternative arrangements and will consider closely all the suggestions that have been made this afternoon.

Abolition of Merseyside county council will result in many changes. In the arts and heritage field, many responsibilities which were formerly those of Liverpool city will return to it. The exception will be those collections, built up over the previous century by generous local benefactors and successive city fathers whose importance ranks on a par with existing national collections.

With the best will in the world, Croxteth and Speke are historic houses whose chararter put them outside the immediate responsibilities of the trustees. But I repeat that we shall, bearing in mind the points raised in this worthwhile and interesting debate, continue discussions with the National Trust and other interested parties with a view to safeguarding the future of Speke Hall.

Question put and agreed to.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Nephrops Fishery

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps the Government are taking to ensure that any European Community measures affecting the British nephrops fishery take full account of the wide variations in biological and conservation factors in different parts of the waters around the British Isles.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not know what particular measures the right hon. Member has in mind, but I can assure him that in considering any measures which may be proposed I will take into account all the relevant factors which affect the United Kingdom fishing industry, including those which he has cited.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps the Government are taking, in connection with the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EEC, to safeguard British interests in the nephrops fishery in the Irish sea.

Mr. MacGregor: The agreement reached between the European Community and Spain and Portugal on their fishing rights in the waters of the existing member states specifically excludes their vessels from fishing in the area known as "The Irish Box", which includes the whole of the Irish sea, until the end of 1995.

Total allowable catches (TACs) and quotas will be set for nephrops in areas VI, VII (which includes the Irish sea) and VIII for the first time in 1986 in order to prevent unrestricted fishing on this species by Spanish or other vessels. Spain will receive a small share, roughly corresponding to the amount she is currently allowed to catch under the by-catch provisions of the EC-Spain fisheries agreement. Until the end of 1995 she will of course be able to fish her area VII quota only outside the Irish box. Portuguese vessels will not be allowed to fish for nephrops at all in the waters of the existing member states.

Proposals have yet to be made for the allocation of the nephrops TACs between existing member states. It will be the Government's aim to ensure that the United Kingdom nephrops quote in area VII adequately meets the needs of our fleet in this important and developing fishery.

Food Surpluses (Destruction)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the total sum spent by the European Economic Community on the destruction of food surpluses in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and if he will list the quantities of food items destroyed during this period;

(2) what progress has been made by the Common Market Commission in taking action on the report of the European Economic Communiy audit commission about the fraudulent payment of European Economic Community funds for the destruction of non-existent food surpluses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: In certain circumstances, produce withdrawn from the market under the Community schemes for fish and fruit and vegetables finds no end use and has to be destroyed. The expenditure involved cannot be identified from the Community statistics, which relate to all withdrawals. For fish Community expenditure on withdrawals was 17·5 mecu in 1983 and 14·8 mecu in 1984; the quantity withdrawn in 1983 was 87,216 tonnes. For fruit and vegetables 2·05 million tonnes were withdrawn in the 1983-84 marketing year, involving Community expendure of 446 mecu.

The Court of Auditors has not published any report dealing specifically with allegations of fraud under these schemes. No other Community schemes provide for destruction of food.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Jopling: Yes, on the basis of the information now available. To ensure equality of opportunity as far as possible, we will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out, and the implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service announced on 9 February 1984 is being carefully monitored. My equal opportunities officer has advised all members of my staff of their rights and responsibilities in respect of equal opportunities legislation and departmental codes of practice concerning sexual and racial discrimination.

Wool

Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is able to announce the guaranteed price for wool for the 1985-86 marketing year.

Mr. Jopling: I have been glad to note that the prices of British wool have been much stronger over the last year or so, partly due to the British Wool Marketing Board's successful efforts in developing new markets for British Wool both at home and abroad.

In all the circumstances, I consider that it would be reasonable to make a further increase of 9 pence in the guaranteed price for wool and it will accordingly be set at 129p/kg for the 1985 clip. This will allow producers to benefit significantly from the improved trading position whilst enabling the Board to make further repayments to the Exchequer under the stabilisation arrangements.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Grants

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consideration he has given to the implications for staff and students of the ending of specific educational support grants.

Mr. Dunn: One of the aims of the education support grant programme is to secure a limited redeployment of resources within the education service. It will be for local education authorities to decide whether to continue funding particular activities once grant support has ceased and, if so, in what form, taking into account as appropriate the effects on staff and students of their decisions.

Teacher Training

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated expenditure on in-service teacher training by local authorities in England for 1984-85.

Mr. Dunn: Expenditure by local education authorities in England on in-service training for schoolteachers in 1984-85 is estimated at something approaching £100 million. This figure covers the costs to authorities of realeasing teachers to undertake training and the costs of provision made by them through their advisory services and in teachers' centres.

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department has funded market research from time to time where this is relevant to policy needs. A recent example was a study on knowledge of drug misuse undertaken by Andrew Irving Associates and jointly funded with the Department of Health and Social Security.

Postgraduate Awards

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many nationals of each member state of the European Communities have applied for, and how many have received, awards from public funds for the purposes of postgraduate study in the United Kingdom by virtue of article 7 of Council regulation (EEC) No. 1612/68, by year and award-making body.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information is not available.

Mr. Radice: asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many persons granted asylum in the United Kingdom, with or without refugee status, have received awards from public funds for the purpose of postgraduate study in the United Kingdom, by year and award-making body.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information is not available.

Mr. Radice: asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which of the bodies in the United Kingdom which make awards from public funds to postgraduate students pay no older students' allowance.

Sir Keith Joseph: This allowance is not paid to students under the state studentships scheme administered on my behalf by the British Academy. Nor, I understand, is it paid by the Scottish Education Department nor by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland under their studentship schemes.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which of the bodies in the United Kingdom which make awards from public funds to postgraduate students pay no postgraduate experience allowance.

Sir Keith Joseph: This allowance is not paid by the Department, nor by the Scottish Education Department nor the Department of Education for Northern Ireland.

Teacher Recruitment

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to seek to extend his Department's promotion and recruitment procedures, operating on the basis of merit and without reference to the ethnic origin of candidates, to the recruitment of all teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Appointments to teaching posts in maintained schools and establishments of further education are the responsibility of the local authorities and the institutions concerned. My right hon. Friend has recorded, and maintains, his view that the successful applicant for any post should be the one who in the appointing body's opinion is the most suitable for that post. This does not mean that actual patterns of recruitment cannot be improved. Hence my right hon. Friend's acceptance in his statement to the House on 14 March at column 452, that ways might be sought to increase the proportion of the teacher force recruited from ethnic minority groups.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the ethnic origin of the officer designated by his Department as equal opportunities officer.

Sir Keith Joseph: The ethnic origin of the Department's equal opportunities officer is classified as "white".

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunites in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am satisfied with equality of opportunities within the Department on the basis of information now available. The Department's personnel procedures are kept constantly under review and improvements are made from time to time. In pursuance of this policy, the Department will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out, and the implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service announced on 9 February 1984 is being carefully monitored. The equal opportunities officer gives advice to members of staff and management on an individual basis as and when necessary.

Class Sizes

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the number of classes and of pupils in classes in each local education authority with 30 and under, 31 to 35, 36 to 40 and over 40 pupils per class for primary and secondary schools in 1979, 1981 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Dunn: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Embryos (Research)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the centres currently undertaking research under the auspices of the Medical Research Council on human embryos.

Mr. Peter Brooke: I understand that the Medical Research Council is currently supporting three projects involving early human embryos resulting from in vitro fertilisation. Details are as follows:

Direct support at MRC establishments:
MRC experimental embryology and teratology unit.
MRC reproductive biology unit.

Indirect support through grants to individual researchers:
Department of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, university of Cambridge.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Courts (Review)

Ms. Harman asked the Attorney-General when the report of the review of family courts will be published.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Lady to my answer to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 4 April at column 716.

PRIME MINISTER

Civil Service

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the reply given to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 10 April 1984, Official Report, column 154, if she will compare the amount and percentage by which the Civil Service has been reduced, with manpower changes throughout the United Kingdom in (a) local government, (b) the National Health Service, (c) nationalised industries and (d) all other persons in receipt of payment of any kind including allowances, engaged in the public sector, including those listed in "Public Bodies 1984" for each year since 1979.

The Prime Minister: The available information is as follows:

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what was the estimated total expenditure in 1984-85 and for each year since 1979 for each of (a) local government, (b) the National Health Service, (c) nationalised industries and (d) all other persons in receipt of payment of any kind, including allowances, engaged in the public sector, including those listed in "Public Bodies 1984", separately, and in total, including all pay, allowances, payments of all kinds, national insurance, superannuation, and all costs related to the employment or appointment of staff within them.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

Wages, salaries, etc. of public sector

	1979 £ million	1980 £ million	1981 £ million	1982 £ million	1983 £ million
Local authorities	12,440	15,544	17,888	19,200	21,199

The figures shown above include wages, salaries, employers' contributions to national insurance and superannuation payments.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister how many staff in percentage and absolute terms have been removed from each of the following categories in each year since 1979 as a result of privatisation measures: (a) local government, (b) the National Health Service, (c) nationalised industries and (d) all other persons in receipt of payment of any kind, including allowances, engaged in the public sector, including those listed in "Public Bodies 1984".

The Prime Minister: Data on staff savings from contracting out in local government and the National Health Service are not collected centrally. From 1979 to mid-1984 privatisation of public corporations reduced public sector employment by some 115,000. Details are given on page 94 of the March 1985 issue of Economic Trends. Privatisation of British Telecom plc in November 1984 reduced public sector employment by a further 240,000.

Between 1 April 1979 and 1 April 1984 the reduction in civil service numbers as a result of privatisation (including contracting out) was 17,000.

Benefits and Allowances

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister if she will list all social benefits and allowances operated by central and local government showing the level of income at which payment ceases where applicable.

The Prime Minister: The table shows social security benefits paid by the central Government and housing benefits paid by local authorities.

Rates

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister, if she is satisfied with the operation of the consultation arrangements between industry, commerce and local authorities prior to the fixing of a new rate.

The Prime Minister: This is the first year that statutory consultations have taken place. A small number of local authorities have not co-operated as fully as we would have liked, but I am encouraged by reports of the useful consultations which have been achieved in many areas. We shall be keeping the process under review.

City Action Teams

Mr. John Fraser asked the Prime Minister why city action teams do not include representatives from the Department of Health and Social Security, the Department of Education and Science and the Home Office.

The Prime Minister: The Government decided that the initial priority for the city action teams should be to improve the contribution in the inner city partnership areas of those programmes of the Department of the Environment, the Department of Employment and Manpower Services Commission and the Department of Trade and Industry which directly help to foster enterprise and promote employment. Other Departments' policies and programmes are also important in these areas and they will be consulted as the work of the teams proceeds.

Standing Committee of Chief Scientists

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will instruct the Standing Committee of Chief Scientists to hold proper consultations with the director and staff of the British Geological Survey before formulating its comments on the corporate plan of the Natural Environment Research Council; and whether she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The proper forum for discussion of the internal matters relating to the Natural Environment Research Council including its corporate plan is the council itself and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. Departmental chief scientists are represented on both the NERC and the ABRC.

Civil Service (Secondment)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister when she expects to announce new regulations for the secondment of business men to the Civil Service.

The Prime Minister: As I told the hon. Member on 4 April at col. 713, the Civil Service Commissioners are considering with their legal advisers new procedures to ensure that future appointments on secondment are made in compliance with the Civil Service Order in Council 1982. These procedures will be introduced as soon as it is possible to do so. Until then, it is important that departments are still able to arrange new secondments. All such proposals are being referred to the commissioners and are being considered on an individual basis against the background of the provisions and discretionary powers contained in the Order in Council.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Straw asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report tables showing (a) the purpose, dates, duration and country of all overseas visits made by her since June 1983 and (b) the purpose, dates, duration, and place, including county, of all visits made by her within the United Kingdom, since June 1983.

WALES

Government Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the equivalent for Wales of all tables referring to England that have not been previously published in the Official Report, in the Government's expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428).

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information cannot be provided without disproportionate cost.

Rhymney Valley (Report)

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer, Official Report, column 605, 22 April, whether he will send to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney a copy of the report on Rhymney valley, and make a copy available in the Library.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As the report was not intended for publication only a few copies were printed. However, I have today placed one copy in the Library of the House.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in-so-far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Yes, on the basis of the information now available. To ensure equality of opportunities as far as possible, we will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out, and the implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service announced on 9 February 1984 is being carefully monitored.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Local Government (Grant Applications)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the applications for grant under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 which are currently awaiting decision from his Department, together with the authority which submitted the application, the date it was submitted, and an indication of when his Department's decision is expected.

Mr. Waddington: Applications on which decisions had not been taken on 26 April 1985 are identified in the following table. Applications have frequently to be referred back to the local authorities for further information before decisions can be taken. It is not therefore possible to indicate when a decision can be expected in particular cases.

National Freight Corporation, Sheffield (Fire)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Inspector of Fire Services has investigated the fire-fighting procedures adopted by the South Yorkshire fire service during the fire at the Sheffield warehouse of the National Freight Corporation on 14 to 16 December 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The South Yorkshire fire service has sent a full report on this fire to Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Fire Services which is being studied to see whether there are any general points which should be brought to the attention of other fire authorities. The Fire Service Inspectorate is also co-operating with the investigating team led by the Health and Safety Executive which is examining the causes of the fire and precautions taken against exposure. It is understood that the executive intends to publish the team's report.

Magistrates' Courts (Children and Young Persons) Rules

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to undertake the full review of the Magistrates' Courts (Children and Young Persons) Rules referred to in the Government reply to the Second Report of the Social Services Committee, Session 1983-84, Cmnd. 9298.

Mr. Mellor: The review of the rules will go ahead when the outcome of the review of the substantive child care law which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services put in hand following the committee's report is sufficiently clear. As was indicated in the Government's response to the report, new rules will need to reflect any changes which may be made in the substantive law, and the current review is addressing a number of issues that are relevant to court procedure.

Immigration

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for each year since 1973, how many applications were received for settlement in the United Kingdom, by nationality of applicant; and, for each nationality, what were the reasons for application, the numbers admitted or refused admission and the reasons for refusal of admission, and the average waiting time between application and interview and between interview and admission;

(2) for each year since 1973, how many applications for settlement in the United Kingdom were received from husbands or fiancés of women settled in the United Kingdom; what were the nationalities of the men concerned; and, for each nationality, what were the numbers admitted or refused admission and the reasons for the refusal of admission.

Mr. Waddington: The readily available information is as follows.

Information on applications for entry clearance leading to settlement in the United Kingdom is available only for the Indian sub-continent from 1977 and is given up to 1983 in tables 5 to 9 of the latest annual Command Paper "Control of Immigration Statistics: United Kingdom 1983" (Cmnd 9246). Corresponding information for 1984 is given in tables 8 to 10 of Statistical Bulletin 5/85 "Control of Immigration: Statistics—Fourth Quarter and Year 1984" and in tables 1 and 2 following. The waiting times given are to the first interview; applications are decided at the first interview unless further enquiries need to be made or a refusal is followed by an appeal, in which case the time taken depends on the particular circumstances of the application.

Reasons for refusals of applications are available only for husbands and male fiancés from 1983 and are given in table 3. Information for all countries on the numbers of persons admitted to and granted settlement in the United Kingdom is published annually by nationality and category in the Command paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics" (Tables 1 to 4 of the latest issue), the 1984 issue is due to be published in June.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the review of the instructions for the staff of the immigration and nationality department to be completed; and whether he will publish the results.

Mr. Waddington: We are pressing ahead with the review but my right hon. and learned Friend cannot set a date for its completion. The possibility of publication of some of the instructions will be considered as part of the review.

Victim Support Schemes

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the extent of direct funding by his Department of locally-run victim support schemes and on the appointment of regional liaison officers for the National Association of Victim Support Schemes.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer my hon. Friend to the recent Government reply (Cmnd. 9457) to the report of the Home Affairs Committee on compensation and support for victims of crime (HC 43).

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the total cost of the victim support scheme nationally; and whether his Department collects information on the number of references made each year by local schemes.

Mr. Mellor: We have made no estimate of the total cost of victims support schemes. We rely on the National Association of Victims Support Schemes for information about the number of cases dealt with by local schemes. I understand that the number in 1983 was 65,254 and in 1984 about 100,000.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department of what sex and ethnic origins are the officers designated by his Department as equal opportunities officers.

Mr. Brittan: Both male and white.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Brittan: Yes, on the basis of the information now available. To ensure equality of opportunity as far as possible, my Department will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out, and the implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service, announced on 9 February 1984, is being carefully monitored. The equal opportunities officers have encouraged the provision of advice to staff generally on the Civil Service's policy as an equal opportunity employer, on the scope for part-time working, job-sharing and re-instatement, and on sexual harassment, and to all line managers on their responsibilities for ensuring racial and sexual equality. They are also concerned with guidance to staff involved in recruitment, selection, promotion, career management and training.

Mrs. Anne Francis

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prison, and under what conditions, Mrs. Anne Francis, of Abergavenny, is serving her sentence of one year's imprisonment.

Mr. Mellor: Mrs. Francis is on normal location at Cookham Wood, a closed women's prison in Kent.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the amount of money spent per annum on civil defence in each member country of the European Economic Community, including the United Kingdom; and what information he has as to the respective figures for (a) 10, (b) 20 and (c) 30 years ago.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 11 March at column 28.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has plans to produce a film on planning for peacetime emergencies.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 8 March at column 627.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to make funds available to local authorities for the maintenance of emergency centres.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Not at present: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 8 March at column 627.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the criteria by which grant applications for funds to build or improve emergency centres under the Civil Defence Regulations 1983 are assessed.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 8 March at column 627.

TRANSPORT

Metropolitan Districts (Transport Policies)

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to issue any guidance to passenger transport joint boards in metropolitan county areas, in the event of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils, concerning the interpretation of public passenger transport policies and highway, traffic and land use policies of metropolitan districts in their areas.

Mrs. Chalker: It will be necessary for the new passenger transport authorities to liaise closely with metropolitan district councils in matters relating to highways, traffic and land use policies, and their effect on public transport, but at this stage we see no need for further guidance. If the need arises, guidance can be given.

Welsh Highland Light Railway Company

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many offers of purchase have been made to him in respect of his stock-holdings in the Welsh Highland Light Railway Company.

Mr. David Mitchell: Five offers were made to purchase my right hon. Friend's holdings of debenture stock. It has now been sold to the highest bidder.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the amount collected in tolls on the Severn bridge in the last full financial year for which figures are available; what was the cost of collection; and what percentage this is of the overall amount collected.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows.

Financial year 1983-84

Tolls levied	2,843,710
Cost of collection	607,220
Percentage	21 per cent.

Tolls received have been less than in 1982-83 due to traffic management restrictions on the bridge. For 17 days all east-bound traffic travelled toll free in order that there was no back up on the bridge itself.

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the original total cost of constructing the Severn bridge; and what percentage of the accumulated interest charges remains outstanding.

Mrs. Chalker: £14·4 million, and 72 per cent. at 31 March 1984. The components of the £14·4 million construction cost are detailed in the published account 1966-67.

Singapore International Airlines (Manchester)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his Answer of 19 April, Official Report, column 281, if he will give the reasons why the Manchester services for which Singapore International Airlines has applied do not fall within the terms of the existing air services arrangements; and if he will place a copy of these arrangements in the Library.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Air services between the United Kingdom and Singapore are governed by the air services agreement of 12 January 1971 as amended by exchanges of notes in 1976, 1978 and 1980. The agreement and subsequent exchanges have been published in the treaty series as Cmnd. 4619, 6622, 7431 and 7988. Copies are in the Library.

The agreement as amended provides for SIA as a designated airline of Singapore to be entitled to operate scheduled services from Singapore over certain named intermediate points to London. There is no provision in the agreement for services to Manchester. As I told my hon. Friend on 19 April, however, consultations between the aeronautical authorities will take place early next month to consider the Singaporean request for permission to operate such services.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is the sex and ethnic origin of the officer designated by his Department as equal opportunities officer;.

(2) whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Ridley: I will answer these questions shortly.

Rail Closures (Yorkshire)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will reject the proposed closure of link lines between Halifax and Huddersfield until such time as British Rail has provided a new service from Sheffield to Huddersfield to Bradford.

Mr. Ridley: I am now considering the report which has been submitted by the transport users' consultative committee for Yorkshire and in due course I will decide whether to give consent to the closure having taken into account all the relevant factors.

ENVIRONMENT

Somerset Levels and Moors

Sir Edward du Cann asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the strategy for the Somerset levels and moors, published by Somerset county council, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Waldegrave: I welcome the publication of Somerset county council's recent strategy document for the Somerset levels and moors, which represents the culmination of several years painstaking research and consultation. Somerset county council hopes that it will provide a framework for harmonizing the various interests of agriculture, land drainage, nature conservation, landscape, peat extraction, archeology and recreation and tourism. I wish the council success in its implementation.

Merseyside

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Merseyside.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on Thursday 25 April 1985 at column 549.

Inner City Partnership Areas

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the inner city partnership areas which fall within local authorities which have been subject to rate capping or rate support grant penalties; and if he will give details of the relevant penalty or rate limitation and the year in which it occurred.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is in the table.

	*Holdback Penalty				*Rate Limitation 1985-86
Authority	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	Expenditure level	Rate limit

Rateable Values

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to prevent local authorities increasing the rateable value of properties when these have been improved by the provision of energy-saving measures or appliances.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. Nearly all the common energy saving measures such as loft insulation, double glazing and cavity wall insulation already have little or no effect on rateable values. Moreover, section 21 of the Local Government Act 1974 provides that central heating systems installed after 1 April 1974 and any minor improvements, including energy saving improvements, carried out from that date which would have had the effect of raising the gross value by £30 or less, will not normally result in an increase in the rateable value of a dwelling until the next revaluation.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Broadly speaking, yes. My Department is reviewing its policies and procedures to ensure equality of opportunity on the grounds of both race and sex. It is also participating in the service-wide development of policy and the creation of an adequate data-base on which the success of such policies can be evaluated. The Department's equal opportunities officers play a leading role in such work and promulgate appropriate guidance and instruction. All staff have been advised of the Department's general policy on race and sex equality through office circulars published in November 1984 and March 1985.

Single Women (Accommodation)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many single women between the ages of 16 and 18 years were refused accommodation by councils and housing associations in the last five years for which records are available; and, of these, how many and what percentage were subsequently offered accommodation as a result of becoming single mothers.

Sir George Young: This information is not available.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many and what percentage of people living in council or housing association accommodation in the last five years for which records are available were single mothers between the ages of 16 and 18 years at the time when the accommodation was originally allocated to them.

Sir George Young: This information is not available.

Field Heath Nurseries (Appeal)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the outcome of the appeal by Costain Homes Ltd. and Milton Hardings Ltd. against the decision of the London borough of Hillingdon in respect of Field Heath Nurseries has still not been determined.

Mr. Macfarlane: The proposals raise matters of some complexity requiring careful consideration. Once these are clarified, a decision will be issued.

Ascension Island (Airport)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest cost estimate for the new airport apron, hangars and accommodation for service men at Ascension Island.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 26 March at column 149.

Falkland Islands (Airport)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown of the £119 million spent at Mount Pleasant for new Army facilities.

Sir George Young: As I explained in my answer to the hon. Member of 22 October at column 490 there are two phases to the provision of the Army facilities at Mount Pleasant. The current estimates for phase I and II at September 1984 prices stand at £25 million and £94 million respectively.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what mechanism will be employed to ensure that London boroughs adhere to the Greater London development plan in the transitional period between the proposed abolition of the Greater London council and the commencement of the unitary development plan system.

Mr. Macfarlane: The GLDP will have the full weight of statute behind it until superseded by adopted unitary development plans. Planning applications constituting departures from the GLDP which boroughs propose to allow will be referred to my right hon. Friend for him to decide whether they should be called in for determination.

Crown Court, Reading

Sir Gerard Vaughan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made over discussions on the siting of the new Crown court for Reading; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Officials of the Property Services Agency and the Lord Chancellor's Department had preliminary and without prejudice discussions about this matter with officers of the Berkshire county council on 27 March 1985. Further such discussions are expected to take place shortly.

South-East (Planning Co-ordination)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what discussions he has held with the London Boroughs Association and the London and south-east regional planning conference regarding amendments to the arrangements for strategic planning co-ordination in the south-east;

(2) what discussions he has had with the London Boroughs Association and the London and south-east regional planning conference about amendments to his proposals for a London planning commission.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government met representatives of the London and south-east regional planning conference (known as SERPLAN) on 11 December and my noble Friend, the Minister of State, met representatives of that body on 22 April. My right hon. Friend is arranging to meet the LBA shortly.

Local Government Bill

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply on 7 March, Official Report, column 544, why his Department took until 23 January before replying to the Association of London Borough planning officers' letter of 16 November 1984.

Mr. Macfarlane: The letter from the Association of London Borough Planning Officers dated 16 November followed a discussion between my Department and representatives of the association on 5 October 1984 and it was assumed that the letter was to record the association's views. Following the discussion in Standing Committee G on 17 and 22 January, a further meeting was suggested by my Department to pursue the matter.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply on 7 March, Official Report, column 544, what was the result of his Department's offer to meet the Association of London Borough Planning Officers to discuss the planning proposals in the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Macfarlane: There has been no reply from the association to my Department's letter of 23 January 1985, to which I referred in the answer to the hon. Member on 7 March, but my officials have been in touch with the association to arrange a meeting.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what programme for infrastructure works and reclamation the London Docklands Development Corporation has for land within the London Docklands (East Docklands) Compulsory Purchase Order 1985; how the programme is phased and over what period; which sites are included in each phase; and what is the cost of each phase;

(2) in respect of how much land within the London Docklands (East Docklands) Compulsory Purchase Order 1985 the London Docklands Development Corporation has specific proposals.

Sir George Young: The LDDC published its draft development framework for the royal docks in January 1985. This presents a strategic framework for infrastructure and reclamation works which will provide the context for future development. Public consultation is now in progress. The corporation is discussing a number of individual development initiatives for the docks within this framework and, once their viability has been assessed, details will be provided to the local authorities and other interested parties.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how much land within the London Docklands Development Corporation area, not acquired by the London Docklands Development Corporation, was either newly developed or in the process of development by 31 December 1984.

Sir George Young: This information is not available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) in respect of how much of the land acquired by the London Docklands Development Corporation within the Royal Victoria dock the London Docklands Development Corporation has specific proposals; and what are these specific proposals;

(2) what programme for infrastructure or reclamation works the London Docklands Development Corporation has for land acquired by it within the Royal Victoria dock; how this programme is phased; and what is the cost of each phase.

Sir George Young: The details of the Royal Victoria dock infrastructure programme and its phasing, will be confirmed once the consultation programme on the royal docks development framework is complete. The LDDC's recently published Operational Plan makes the following provision for the royal docks area, which chiefly covers work within the Royal Victoria dock and its immediate area:

	£ million
1985-86	4·0
1986-87	7·2
1987-88	9·4

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much of the land acquired by the London Docklands Development Corporation on which new development had taken place, or had started by 31 December 1984, was subject to works by the London Docklands Development Corporation before development could take place; and at what cost.

Sir George Young: This information is not available in the form requested. However, 77 per cent. of the land disposed by the corporation up to 31 March required infrastructure works before disposal. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answers I gave him on 15 April 1985 at column 122 and 20 February 1985 at column 488 about costs.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total value of contracts and the number of consultants retained by the London Docklands Development Corporation in each year since its creation.

Sir George Young: I will answer this question shortly.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list all the applications under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act which were outstanding on 25 April and the date on which the applications had been received;

(2) if he will list each consent applied for under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act by the Greater London council and each of the metropolitan county councils and give the date the application was made, together, where appropriate, with the date on which consent was granted;

(3) how many staff are employed, and what are their grades, by his Department to process consent applications under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall reply shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received relating to section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Waldegrave: Numerous representations have been received, not all of which were relevant to the determination of particular applications for consent.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about delays in granting consent for applications received under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: All applications are considered carefully and expeditiously on their individual merits.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from prospective purchasers of properties requiring consent under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: Numerous representations have been received. Many involved transactions for which no application for consent had been received from the authority concerned.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is taking to ensure that all consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 are processed within one month of submission.

Mr. Waldegrave: Sufficient to ensure that all applications are considered expeditiously on their individual merits.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 submitted by the Greater London council before 1 February 1984 are still awaiting written consent.

Mr. Waldegrave: Three. In each case the delay is due to the GLC's failure to supply further information requested to enable proper consideration to be given to the application.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act are still being considered by his Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: 1,065.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications for the Greater London council and each of the metropolitan county councils under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act were for a value of less than (a) £100, (b) between £100 and £1,000, (c) between £1,000 and £10,000, (d) between £10,000 and £100,000, (e) between £100,000 and £1 million and (f) over £1 million, respectively.

Mr. Waldegrave: Financial considerations are not always a material factor in determining applications under the Act and such details have not been supplied or sought in every case. The information requested is as follows:

Number of applications by value (£)

Authority	Not specified	Under £100	£100 to £999	£1,000 to £9,999	£10,000 to £99,999	£100,000 to £1 million	Over £1 million

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consent applications under each of section 7, section 8 and section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act have been refused for each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Waldegrave: None, but consent has been withheld in some cases pending receipt of further information or assurances from the applicant authority.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the longest period for which a case submitted under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act remained with his Department before consent was given.

Mr. Waldegrave: 137 days.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many consent applications citing clause 89 of the Local Government Bill have been received from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority;

(2) how many consent applications have been received under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority;

(3) how many consent applications have been received under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority;

(4) how many consent applications have been received under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act from each of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council;

(5) how many consent applications citing clause 90 of the Local Government Bill have been received from each of the metropolitan county councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Waldegrave: Details are set out in the table.

Number of Applications received up to 25 April 1985

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to reach a decision on the application for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act in respect of the women's peace bus;

(2) when he exects to reach a decision on the application for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act in respect of the London lesbian and gay centre;

(3) when he expects to reach a decision on the application for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act in respect of Interights;

(4) when he expects to reach a decision on the application for consent in respect of Spare Rib under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act;

(5) when he expects to reach a decision on the application for consent under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act in respect of Searchlight.

Mr. Waldegrave: As soon as possible.

Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the take-up of import permits for turtle products in each complete year since 1979; and what were the products and their values.

Mr. Waldegrave: For each complete year since 1979 import permits granted for turtle products have been taken up as follows:

Year	Number of permits used
1979	10
1980	5
1981	18
1982	39
1983	11
1984	32

These permits related to various products, including meat, bones, handbags, shells and tortoiseshell items. The statistics kept by my Department do not include the value of these products.

Whale Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the take-up of import permits for whale products in each complete year since 1979, the products imported, and their value.

Mr. Waldegrave: For each complete year since 1979 import permits granted for whale products have been taken up as follows:

Year	Number of permits used
1979	6
1980	15
1981	11
1982	12
1983	5
1984	9

These permits related to various products, including teeth, bone, tusk, blood, blubber, powder, sperm, sperm oil and spermaceti wax. The statistics kept by my Department do not include the value of these products.

Merseyside

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his visit to Merseyside on 22 and 23 April; and what practical and financial assistance to Liverpool will result from it.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin[pursuant to his reply, 25 April 1985, c. 549.]: I visited Merseyside on 22 and 23 April 1985 to review progress on some of the intiatives launched in the area in recent years.

I arrived on the evening of 22 April to attend one of the regular meetings that Halton borough council hold with members of the local business community at the invitation of the leader of the council. I offered to consider urban programme help with premises for a proposed new development agency for the borough. On the morning of 23 April I held a press conference in Liverpool where I made a statement and answered questions about the Liverpool city action team.

I then visited the site of the former Courtaulds factory at Aintree which is now in the hands of private developers who, with the help of derelict land grant, are reclaiming the site for industrial use. I was pleased to learn that jobs with the firms on the industrial estate now nearly equals the jobs lost when Courtaulds closed.

I later visited Cammell Laird (Shipbuilders) Ltd, Birkenhead and met the managing director and the shop stewards' committee. I was also able to see work in progress on the Type 42 destroyer, HMS Edinburgh, which they are constructing in their yard.

After lunch, I toured the Liverpool freeport where I met the freeport manager and representatives of the two companies established within the freeport area. One, a textile firm already employs about forty people most of whom were unemployed before the freeport was established.

The visit enabled me to satisfy myself at first hand that the substantial public funds made available to these projects are being used to best effect.

The matter of Liverpool city council's budget was not discussed during the visit. I have made it quite clear on numerous occasions that I am not prepared to re-open discussions on this year's rate support grant. The responsibility for setting a legal budget rests fairly and squarely with the city council.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Energy if when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the numbers of miners dismissed by the board during the 1984-85 strike.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

Renewable Resources

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the Government's policy on renewable energy resources; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer to the answer given earlier today to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman).

Oil-fired Generating Capacity (Conversion)

17. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board, he proposes to discuss the conversion of oil-fired generating capacity to coal.

Mr. Goodlad: It is for the CEGB to consider whether, in the light of all the relevant factors, it should invest in the conversion of any of its oil-fired stations to coal. I will discuss with the chairman any specific proposals made by the board.

Energy Efficiency Project

18. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress in energy efficiency projects within Government Departments including his own.

Mr. Peter Walker: As a result of my initiatives there is increased pressure on Government Departments to improve energy efficiency in the activities they influence.

Coal Industry (Conciliation and Consultation)

19. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied that the normal processes of conciliation and consultation are being carried out in the coal industry.

Mr. David Hunt: The operation of consultation and conciliation procedures within the coal industry are matters for the National Coal Board.

Colliery Closure Review Procedure

20. Mr. Powell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss implementation of the revised colliery closure review procedure.

Mr. Peter Walker: I understand from the National Coal Board that a sub-committee of the Coal Industry National Consultative Committee, set up to discuss the implementation of a modified colliery review procedure, has now had its first meeting. The committee consists of representatives of the three main coal industry unions—NUM, NACODS and BACM—and the National Coal Board. I hope their discussions will lead to early agreement.

Miners (Working Conditions)

21. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of the National Coal Board since the ending of the miners' strike concerning the working conditions of miners.

Mr. David Hunt: The National Coal Board has made clear that, as work resumes following the strike, safety must be the prime consideration.

Electricity Prices

22. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received about the present mode of fixing electricity prices to the consumer.

Mr. Goodlad: I have received no representations recently on this matter.

Mining Industry Manpower

24. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate his Department has made of the total manpower in the mining industry by the end of 1985.

Mr. Peter Walker: The board is undertaking a thorough review of the damage done by the strike and its options for the future. No estimate is yet possible of the total manpower of the industry by the end of the year.

National Coal Board (Redundancies)

25. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has had discussions with the chairman of the National Coal Board on the number of redundancies likely in the year 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme).

North Sea Oil

26. Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of United Kingdom North sea oil is refined within the United Kingdom; how many jobs there are in United Kingdom refineries; what is the regional breakdown of this figure; and how these figures compare with the figures in May 1979.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). A regional breakdown is not readily available.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the sex and ethnic origin of the officer designated by his Department as equal opportunities officer.

Mr. Peter Walker: The equal opportunities officer designated by my Department is male and is of white European ethnic origin.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes on the basis of the information now available. To ensure equality of opportunities so far as possible, we will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff under the Government's phased programme to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out. The implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service, announced on 9 February 1984, is being carefully monitored. An equal opportunities officer has been designated to co-ordinate non-discrimination policy in my Department and a joint management/trade union committee has been formed to review progress on this issue.

SCOTLAND

Crofter Housing

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now abandon the policy of refusing grant and loan for crofter housing to single men resident with their parents.

Mr. Younger: Each application for housing assistance is considered on its merits but assistance is not generally given if the applicant is already satisfactorily housed within working distances of the croft. Assistance will be given, regardless of marital status, if there is a demonstrated need for the provision of a house to enable the croft to be worked.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if will now increase the amount of grant and loan for crofting houses.

Mr. Younger: No.

Local Authority Spending

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to reach a decision on selective action against certain overspending councils.

Mr. Ancram: I am still examining the budget returns of authorities and hope to reach decisions soon.

Forestry Reserves

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the area covered by afforestation in the United Kingdom in 1950, 1960, 1970 and 1980 and his estimate of expected life of reserves of current rates of extraction.

Mr. John MacKay: The area of woodland in each of these years was as follows:

Year	Area (hectares)
1950	1,525,000
1960	1,700,000
1970	1,880,000
1980	2,180,000

These figures include unproductive woodland.

Woodlands are a renewable resource and, given their effective management, the life of timber reserves should be infinite.

Norway Pout

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if Her Majesty's Government will make it its policy at the European Economic Community Council of Fisheries Ministers, to support the reversion to a 10 per cent. level of the Norway pout by-catch.

Mr. Younger: Yes.

Herons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for licences to kill herons were received in 1983, 1984 and so far in 1985; how many licences were granted; what were the locations; how many birds were allowed to be killed in each case; how many were actually killed; what deterrent advice was given; and what were the reasons for granting and refusing licences.

Mr. John Mackay: The details are as follows:

a. Applications received, 1983: 5, 1984: 6, 1985: 4

b. Licences granted, 1983: 5, 1984: 6, 1985: Nil so far

c. Locations (by admibernistrative region)

1983
Dumfries and Galloway	1
Highland	1
Tayside	2
Fife	1
TOTAL	5
1984:
Dumfries and Galloway	2
Highland	1
Tayside	3
TOTAL	6

d. No limits were placed on the numbers of birds to be killed.

e. Numbers killed under licence:

	Location	Number
1983
	Dumfries and Galloway	16
	Highland	3
	Tayside	13
	Fife	2
	1984:
	Dumfries and Galloway	28
	Highland	2
	Tayside	14
	TOTAL	44

f. The advice of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds was made generally available to all applicants for licences.

g. Licences were issued in 1983 and 1984 to prevent damage to farmed trout stocks. The applications for licences for 1985 are under consideration.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Younger: Yes. The implementation of the programme of action on equal opportunities for women in the Civil Service is being progressed in my Department by a joint management and trade union group and advice is being given to staff as matters are agreed by the group. No new advice on race discrimination has lately been given to staff.

Rates

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the approximate cost of granting relief to proprietor managed businesses in Scotland in order to restrict the increase in their commercial rates bill for 1985-86 to an amount not exceeding (a) 125 per cent., (b) 133⅓ per cent. and (c) 150 per cent. of their corresponding 1984-85 rates bill.

Mr. Ancram: Entries on the valuation roll do not permit identification of properties which might be in use by owner-managed businesses, so the information on which to base the estimates requested is not available.

Morbidity

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in accordance with the Croham directive, he will publish all background papers originating in his Department on the subject of the methodology of the Lenihan investigation into morbidity in the Denny, Bonnybridge and Larbert area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I presume the hon. Member is referring to the Crohan directive on the publication of official papers containing factual and analytical material used as the background to major policy studies. The Lenihan review group was an independent body and its members were free to determine what methodology should be used for conducting their review. No Departmental guidance was given to them on this matter.

Fishermen (Fuel Costs)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will estimate the cost of cutting the present price of marine gas oil charged to fishing vessel owners in order to reduce that cost by 25 pence per gallon;

(2) if he has any information on the weekly fuel bill cost of a fishing vessel of 80 feet in length;

(3) what information he has as to the cost of one gallon of marine fuel oil for fishing vessels in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and the lastest available figures for 1985;

(4) what is the amount of rebate granted to fishing vessels when purchasing marine gas oil; and whether value added tax on the purchase of this commodity is recoverable by the vessel owner.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 736]: I estimate that, for the Scottish fleet, the cost of cutting the price of gas oil by 25 pence per gallon for a year would be between £6 million and £8 million.

The amount of fuel used by individual vessels varies with engine size, fishing method and distance of the grounds from the home post, but a typical 80 foot seiner would use at least 1,000 gallons of gas oil per week at a current cost of about £1,000.

Fuel oil prices vary from port to port and from supplier to supplier. The following are typical prices for gas oil in Peterhead—

April of Year	Pence per gallon (including duty)
1980	65
1981	73
1982	83
1983	83
1984	87
1985	103

These prices would generally attract discounts, the levels of which have fluctuated over the years. I understand that currently a discount of about 8 pence per gallon is common.

Full relief from excise duty (normally 3½ pence per gallon) is allowed on marine gas oil used on board British registered fishing boats. This fuel is normally zero-rated for value added tax purposes.

EMPLOYMENT

Equal Opportunities

33. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what methods are used by the Manpower Services Commission in its pursuit of an equal opportunities policy and in encouraging the participation of all eligible youngsters in mode A schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The commission encourages all young people, irrespective of sex, race, or disability, to consider the full range of opportunities available under the youth training scheme. It is the responsibility of the referral agencies, such as careers offices, to identify the training programme which will be of greatest benefit to the young person concerned, and the commission provides guidance to this end. The commission also pursues its equal opportunity policy through a variety of methods including publicity material, regular monitoring of trainee participation, and the identification of particular groups of young people who have special needs.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment of what sex and ethnic origins are the officers designated by his Department as equal opportunities officers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Of the 24 officers currently designated as equal opportunity officers in the Department of Employment group, five are female. Their ethnic origin is not at present recorded.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department of Employment group's policy is that there must be no unfair discrimination against staff on grounds of sex or race, and this has been made clear to all staff. Implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service is underway and arrangements are in hand to monitor the various aspects. In common with other Departments we will be conducting surveys of the ethnic origin of all staff to enable equality of opportunity for ethnic minorities to be monitored. The equal opportunity officers throughout the Department of Employment group give constructive day to day advice to staff and managers on the implementation of the whole range of equal opportunity policies.

MSC Training (Merseyside)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many full-time Manpower Services Commission training places are available at each training centre on Merseyside.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Youth Training

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his reply of 2 April, Official Report, columns 534-536, if he will publish the sources of the information given in table 2 (Destination of youth opportunity programme and youth training scheme trainees); if he well list as a percentage of the total number of people who have been on youth training schemes or youth opportunity programmes for each of the last five years the numbers of people who found work on completion of training schemes; if he will provide information on a regional basis about post youth training scheme employment rates; if the statistics of post youth training scheme employment are based on the response of ex-trainees; what steps he takes to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the information provided; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Wages

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom, the USA, Japan and Germany the percentage increase in wages in industry as a percentage of the increase in unit costs since March 1983 before and after conversion to the pound sterling at the relevant rates of exchange.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The available information for manufacturing industries is given in the following table. Fully comparable international data on earnings and unit wage costs (wages and salaries per unit of output) are not available, and so comparisons should be treated with caution.

Earnings and Unit Wage Costs

Noise

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the EC noise directive document is to be finalised.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This will depend upon the progress made in discussions between officials of the member states, which are continuing, and upon consideration of the outcome of the those discussions by the Council of Labour and Social Affairs Ministers in June.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what co-ordination is undertaken to ensure that information relating to those (a) entitled to and (b) actually claiming unemployment benefit, validates comparisons on unemployment and employment statistics within the European Economic Community and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment figures for EC or OECD member states obtained directly from administrative sources are not generally comparable, although they can be useful for comparing the latest trends. The labour force survey, a sample survey of households which is conducted at least every two years in EC countries, provides a consistent basis for comparison of unemployed people seeking work in those countries. The OECD use various sources, usually household survey information supplemented by the latest figures from administrative sources, to estimate standardised unemployment rates for major OECD countries, according to guidelines of the International Labour Organisation.

Earnings

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the real increase in earnings in the private sector in each of the past three years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Estimates of the percentage increase in real average gross earnings of full-time employees in the private sector are shown in the table.

Changes in real average gross weekly earnings of full-time adult employees in the private sector who worked a full week

April	Percentage
1981-82	*+1·3
1982-83	*+4·5
1983-84	†+4·3

* Estimates are based on earnings for men aged 21 and over and women aged 18 and over.
† Estimates are based on earnings for men and women on adult rates.
These estimates are derived from the new earnings survey figures delated to constant prices using the retail price index.

Industrial Accidents

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many workers sustained serious burns in the United Kingdom during 1984 as a result of industrial accidents;

(2) how many workers in the United Kingdom died from burns in 1984 following industrial accidents.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information for 1984 is not yet available.

In 1983, 647 major injuries and 25 fatalities associated with burns suffered by employees and the self-employed at work in Great Britain were reported to the Health and Safety Executive and Railway Inspectorate under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980.

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Employment what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My Department makes use of market research infrequently where it is felt to be an appropriate way of obtaining information for the Department's needs.

Trade Unions (Ballots)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to extend the requirement for secret ballots to be held in the case of the election of general secretaries of trade unions so that it applies whether or not they have voting rights in union executive committees.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 concerning union elections come into force on 1 October 1985. It would be premature to consider amending legislation which is not yet in force.

Machine Tools

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the total number of people employed in the machine tool manufacturing industry in each quarter in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: In September 1981, the earliest date for which analyses by Activity Heading of the 1980 standard industrial classification are available, there were an estimated 40,500 employees in employment in Great Britain in the metal-working machine tools industry (activity heading 3221). In December 1984, the latest available date, the corresponding figure was 30,000. Figures for each quarter between these dates were published in table 1.4 of the Historical Supplement to the April 1985 issue of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown by region of the numbers of people employed in the machine tool manufacturing industry.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available figures for the industry in question are from the September 1981 census of employment and are as follows.

Employees in employment: by region: September 1981: metal-working machine tools (activity heading 3221 of the standing industrial classification 1980)

	Thousands
South East	9·5
East Anglia	0·8
South West	2·3
West Midlands	11·8
East Midlands	4·8
Yorkshire and Humberside	5·4
North West	2·7
North	1·4
Wales	0·5
Scotland	1·4

Results of the 1981 census of employment, giving regional estimates of employees in each industry, were published in a supplement to the December 1984 issue of Employment Gazette. Estimates from the following (September 1984) census of employment are scheduled to become available in the latter part of this year.

Community Programme

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if there have been any recent changes in the eligibility criteria for placement in the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. The last change was announced by my right hon. Friend on 30 July, at columns 121-122, and took effect on 1 October.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of unemployed young people of eligible age for youth training schemes, mode A, in the years from September 1983 to March 1984 and from April 1984 to February 1985 were of (a) West Indian and (b) Asian origin respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available in the form requested. According to the 1983 labour force survey, in the second quarter of 1983 some 3 per cent. of unemployed people seeking work aged 16 and 17 years were of West Indian or Asian origin. The sample size of the survey is not sufficient to provide reliable figures for these two groups separately.

ACAS

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to receive the annual report of the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Tom King: I have received the ACAS report for 1984, which will be laid before both Houses of Parliament tomorrow, Tuesday 30 April. The report is also to be published tomorrow and copies will then be available from the Vote Office.

Michelin Company (Stoke)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he will take to ensure that those employees of the Michelin company in Stoke-on-Trent who are to be made redundant will receive their entitlements to benefit without delay.

Mr. Alan Clark: Special arrangements have been made for redundant employees at the Michelin company. An appointment system has been arranged for attendance at unemployment benefit offices and, although claims must be assessed on an individual basis, payment will be made as promptly as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Abortion

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the findings of the Women's National Commission working group's report on "Women and the Health Service" regarding the availability of National Health Service abortion services; and what action he proposes to take as a consequence of the report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have noted the Commissions findings. It is for health authorities to decide the level and scope of their provision for abortion, in the light of local needs and circumstances. We are discussing with them how delays in abortion operations might be reduced.

Benefits

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of local authorities which make use of the 10 per cent. local discretion in respect of the housing benefit scheme.

Mr. Whitney: Information from authorities' initial subsidy claims for 1985-86 indicates that for the 467 authorities out of 489 who have made their claims, 199 intend to run local schemes in 1985-86.

NHS (Racial Discrimination)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in how many cases of racial discrimination concerned with National Health Service appointments damages have been awarded; what is the total now thus awarded; what guidance is given on appointments to health authorities at regional and district level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold centrally the information requested. On the guidance issued to health authorities I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 2 April to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) at column 581.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Heating Additions

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many estates have been proposed to his Department as qualifying for estate rate heating additions; how many have so far been approved; and what is the estimated number of claimants involved in each case.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Over 650 submissions concerning estate rate heating additions have so far been received at the Department's headquarters. Each may cover all or part of one or several estates. 469 certificates have so far been issued designating estate heating systems as disproportionately expensive to run: again, each certificate may cover heating systems in all or part of one of several estates. Information is not available on the total number of claimants living in estates for which submissions have been received. The latest available estimate for the numbers of claimants entitled to estate rate heating additions (as at March 1984) is of the order of 50,000.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many regional and district health authorities have responded to the Department of Health and Social Security circular on drug abuse issued in June 1984; and if he will publish a summary of these responses.

Mr. John Patten: All 14 regional health authorities and two special health authorities have submitted reports to the Department as required by the circular. The reports by regional health authorities contain information obtained from their districts. We propose to publish information derived from these reports shortly.

Medical Negligence (Compensation and Litigation)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total cost of (a) litigation and (b) compensation paid out by health authorities in cases involving alleged medical negligence for the last three years; and in how many such cases the health authorities won their case.

Mr. John Patten: We do not hold this information centrally.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he proposes any changes to the Government's policy on cervical cancer screening.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Screening for cervical cancer can save the lives of many women. The Government recognise the importance of an efficient screening programme as a vital preventive health measure. We are satisfied with the present advice on age and frequency of screening and we intend to continue to improve its effective implementation.

The biggest single problem is that the service is still not reaching sufficient numbers of older women. Many women who are no longer sexually active may believe they are no longer at risk. The vast majority of deaths, many avoidable, take place among these older women. All women of whatever age, who have at any time been sexually active should seek cervical smear tests at regular intervals.

All district health authorities (DHAs) should already have systems for recalling women patients for tests at five-yearly intervals. These systems do not, however, contact women who have never been tested at all. We now wish to see greater use of computers to contact women who have never been screened. The Government have financed the development of standard computer software and the hardware needed to operate this system is not costly. We are therefore telling all DHAs to arrange with their corresponding family practitioner committees (FPCs) to implement such a system on their behalf. Already over one-third of FPCs are using computers for call or recall, or have firm plans to do so. We are now saying that all should do so. We shall want to know the date by which each authority proposes to implement full computerised call and recall.

In addition, we want other available methods of reaching women most at risk to be used more extensively. Older women make considerable use of the primary care and hospital services. Their visits to doctors for any purpose provide opportunities for them to be offered a test. We shall be discussing with the profession and health authorities how GPs and hospitals should take advantage of these visits so that women who have not had a test during the past 5 years can be offered one. In this way, a steady increase in the number of women reached will be achieved.

We also intend to improve the effectiveness of laboratory facilities for processing smears. We must ensure that in the longer term the right number of suitably trained and qualified staff such as histopathologists become available. In the shorter term, improvements may be possible if priority can be given to smears from women most at risk. We shall be discussing with the professions involved and with health authorities how we can best achieve these objectives.

Finally, health authorities must ensure that there is effective follow-up of abnormal results. We believe that the possibility of error leading to tragic events can be considerably reduced by a simple administrative reform. We therefore want all authorities to move to a system where all women are notified that their test has been done and told who to contact for the result. We shall be discussing the details of this with the professions and authorities concerned.

The recent adverse publicity has obscured the fact that many health authorities and individual doctors are, by implementing our policy, providing a good service to women of all ages and preventing unnecessary deaths. We want all authorities to match the best. In addition to the measures outlined above, we are therefore telling all authorities to review again the effectiveness of their programme and to inform us of the outcome. We will insist that any authority which is not adequately protecting women in its area takes immediate steps to do so.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends that community health councils should continue in existence to the end of the present Parliament.

Mr. John Patten: Yes.

Single Payments

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest figure for the number of single payments made for (a) beds, (b) cookers, (c) furniture and (d) heating appliances; and what is the average value of each payment.

Mr. Whitney: Information on the number and average amount of single payments made for specific items is not available. Information from the annual statistical inquiry carried out in December 1982, the latest date for which it is available, is that 419,000 single payments were made in respect of essential furniture and household equipment and that the average payment was £74·62. Figures from the annual statistical inquiry relate to single payments made during the 12 months preceding the date of the inquiry to persons still in receipt of supplementary benefit at the time of the inquiry and do not, therefore, record all the single payments made during the year.

NHS (Waiting Lists)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost of the current survey into National Health Service waiting lists.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, as a result of the survey of National Health Service waiting lists, any patient's status on the waiting list is being changed by any staff other than qualified consultants.

Mr. John Patten: Authorities were asked to decide on the most effective way of carrying out the review according to local arrangements for maintaining waiting lists. They were expected to consult clinicians in both hospitals and general practice.

NHS (Regional Strategies)

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what power he has to intervene in negotiations between district health authorities and their regions in the implementation of agreed regional strategies.

Mr. John Patten: The Secretary of State has wide powers of direction under the National Health Service Act 1977. However, we expect all health authorities to act reasonably and responsibly in implementing strategic plans within the resources available in line with normal management practice.

Child Care

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the responses received to the discussion papers prepared by the child care law working party.

Mr. John Patten: The discussion papers were issued by the working party. The responses will be sent to them. We will consider what material to make available publicly when the working party's report has been submitted to us.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the terms of reference of the working party review of child care law have been extended beyond codification of the present laws.

Mr. John Patten: The terms of reference of the working party on child care law are as follows:

"In the light of the Report of the Social Services Committee on Children in Care and of evidence given to the Committee and other relevant material to make proposals and set out options for codification and amendment of child care law."

Dental Anaesthesia

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action his Department is taking to implement the report of the inter-faculty committee of the Royal College of Surgeons on training in dental anaesthesia.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The principal recommendation of the report from the inter-faculty committee of the Royal College of Surgeons on "Postgraduate Education and Training in Dental Anaesthesia, Analgesia and Sedation" is for the establishment of additional senior house officer training posts in dental anaesthesia. I am pleased to announce that we will be making funds available for the initial creation of a number of such posts. We shall be discussing the number and location of the posts with the Royal College of Surgeons and subsequently with regional health authorities.

Dental Charges

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was collected in 1984-85 in National Health Service dental charges for crowns, for dentures and for other treatment, listed separately, for England; and how much is expected to be collected under the same headings in 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 498]: Precise figures for the breakdown of the yield from charges into the three categories requested are not readily available but the estimated yield from charges in England in the financial year 1984-85 and the projected yield for 1985-86 (assuming their application to all chargeable courses of treatment completed in the year) for certain groups of dental treatments is as follows:

	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million
Crowns, inlays, pinlays	39·56	46·41
Dentures, bridges	37·84	41·99
Routine treatment	94·6	132·6

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Beds (Fire Resistant Materials)

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to ensure that all beds sold in the United Kingdom are manufactured from fire-resistant materials as used for hospital and prison beds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: No, but the report by the United States Consumer Product Safety Commission mentioned in the Daily Star on 19 April is being carefully studied, and I shall be consulting British bedding manufacturers on the possibility of increasing the fire resistance of beds and mattresses. Inevitably it will be many years before more fire resistant beds in the shops can be expected to lead to fewer deaths and injuries in bed fires in people's homes.

It is not practicable to produce a completely fire proof bed. Smoking is the biggest single cause of bed fires, and until people follow the simple rule that one must never smoke in bed there will be tragic deaths from this cause.

Prison mattresses can be made to achieve a high degree of fire resistance, but they are less comfortable than most people would like. Similarly, it is doubtful whether many people would be willing to adopt the restricted choice of materials for blankets, sheets and similar items which some hospitals have introduced in conjunction with treatment of mattresses in order to give the whole bed a certain degree of fire resistance.

Nevertheless there is scope for improvement and I shall keep the House informed.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support he is giving to the British aerospace industry in foreign sales campaigns.

Mr. Butcher: A range of export related services are provided by the British Overseas Trade Board and the Export Credits Guarantee Department which are available to all private sector companies, including those in the aerospace sector. These services are extensively used by the industry in pursuing export opportunities for its products both within and outside the European Community.

EC (Japanese Investment)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his reply of 4 April, Official Report, column 752, why he was unable to provide information on the percentage of Japanese direct investment in the European Economic Community which came to the United Kingdom in 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The figures given in the reply were drawn from overseas publications, namely the United States survey of current business and the Japanese Balance of Payments Monthly. These were the latest figures available to my Department.

Footwear Imports

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on tariff negotiations with Spain and Portugal with reference to footwear products.

Mr. Channon: Portugal is a member of EFTA and so trade in most manufactured goods, including footwear, is duty free in both directions, and will remain so after Portugal joins the Community on 1 January 1986. Spain, however, imposes high import duties on EC manufactures (up to 20·8 per cent. on footwear) in contrast to the much lower EC duties on Spanish manufactures (4·8 per cent. on footwear). It has been agreed in the accession negotiations that import duties on industrial products (including footwear) traded in both directions will be eliminated over a seven year period following Spanish entry, with over half the cuts coming in the first three years. In addition, Spain has to introduce VAT by 1 January 1986, and this will eliminate as from accession existing Spanish tax discrimination against imports. The settlement will as a result open up the Spanish market to United Kingdom exporters, whereas the phased reduction of already low EC duties against Spain should have relatively little impact on Spanish penetration of the United Kingdom market.

COCOM (Export Control Order)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, in respect of the export control order he proposes to make to implement the new COCOM agreement, he will make it his policy (a) to provide for blanket exemptions for software exports wherever possible, and (b) to allow at least six weeks after publication for discussion and consultation with the industries affected.

Mr. Channon: Under the provisions of the new Export of Goods (Control) Order, all exports of embargoed software to the proscribed countries will be controlled according to the COCOM agreement. These controls will also apply to a few other destinations so as to minimise the risk of onward diversion to the proscribed countries. However, most software on the COCOM embargo list will be freely exportable to other countries under the provisions of an open general export licence which will be granted when the new order comes into operation: there will be no need for traders to obtain any individual licence for export of such software to such countries.

Only a few categories of embargoed software will require individual licensing for all destinations, for example, software specially written for computers manufactured in the proscribed areas, software for the design of very large scale integrated circuits and software with sensitive military purposes. Full details will be available when the new Export of Goods (Control) Order is published in mid-June.

Given the size and complexity of the new Order my right hon. Friend intends to allow a period of six weeks between publication and entry into force.

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Department commissions market research from time to time on a range of issues, including both industrial and export marketing topics. The export marketing research scheme, which assists exporters in undertaking market research, is a service provided by the Department through the British Overseas Trade Board.

ASEAN (Trade Development)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to improve trade with the countries in membership of the Association of South East Asian Nations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

EC (Regional Development Programmes)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has a copy of the European Economic Community document the "Regional Development Programmes of the Second Generation for the Period 1981 to 1985" dated June 1984; and if he will publish in the Official Report table 1 in the document which gives the percentage of the populations of European Economic Community countries living in assisted areas.

Mr. Trippier: I can confirm that the Department of Trade and Industry has a copy of this document. The table to which the right hon. Member has referred is, however, misleading as it shows the position in 1983 and this is well out of date. With regard to the United Kingdom, for example, it shows that EC 'regional aids' are available for 30 per cent. of th population, whereas the current figure is 44·7 per cent.; and there have also been changes in the composition of the assisted areas of other member states.

EC (Assisted Areas)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of European Economic Community grants to areas designated as assisted areas in Great Britain in 1984-85; and what was the value per head of the working population.

Mr. Trippier: European regional development fund grants allocated in 1984-85 to aided areas in Great Britain totalled over £425 million. The value per head of the working population in those areas was approximately £47.

Grants from the European social fund and the European agricultual guidance and guarantee fund are the responsibilities of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Employment and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food respectively.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it was the British Government or the Europan Economic Community which first suggested the figure of 35 per cent. for the maximum percentage of the British population to live in assisted areas.

Mr. Trippier: The percentage of the working population covered by assisted areas was only one aspect of various matters considered with the European Commission during the review of regional policy.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will request the European Economic Community to agree that designated assisted areas should cover more than 35 per cent. of the working population of the United Kingdom

Mr. Trippier: The recent review of the Great Britain assisted areas took account of areas' relative needs for current and future employment opportunities. We have no plans for a further review of those areas.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many hours were spent in negotiation with the European Economic Community about the maximum proportion of the British working population to live in areas designated as assisted areas.

Mr. Trippier: There was no fixed target for the proportion of the working population included within the assisted areas. It would not be practicable to separate this aspect from the various matters considered with the European Commission, many of which would themselves have a bearing on the assisted areas coverage as finally decided.

Stoke-on-Trent (Assisted Area Status)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated cost of designating the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area as an assisted area in total and per capita.

Mr. Trippier: It is not practicable to provide reliable estimates of this kind for individual travel-to-work areas.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now reconsider the application of Stoke-on-Trent for designation of the travel-to-work area as an assisted area.

Mr. Trippier: Decisions on the new assisted areas map were on the basis not only of the current need for further employment opportunities but also of areas' relative vulnerability to future job losses and their relative abilities to respond to an upturn in the economy. The new map is therefore expected to remain valid for some time, though I will naturally keep the situation under review.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will hold further discussions with representatives of Stoke-on-Trent regarding their application for the travel-to-work area to be designated.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has no plans to hold further discussions with the representatives of Stoke-on-Trent regarding their application for the travel-to-work area to be designated as an assisted area.

Machine Tools

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the net balance of trade value in machine tools between the United Kingdom and the following in each of the last three years for which figures are available; other member countries of the European Economic Community, Japan, the United States of America, all Commonwealth countries, and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Channon The information is as follows.

UK Crude Trade Balance in Metal Working Machine-Tools
Value £m

	1982	1983	1984 (provisional)
European Community	−65	−56	−80
Japan	−28	−29	−45
USA	+11	+11	+31
Commonwealth	+57	+34	+39
Soviet Union	+5	+11	+12

Source: Data corresponding to SITC/R2 Group 736, less sub-group 736·8 (part) in the UK Overseas Trade Statistics.
Note: Crude balance is calculated as UK exports (fob) less UK imports (cif).

English Tourist-Board

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will revoke the present regulation requiring hoteliers given an English tourist board grant to improve facilities having to pay up to 6 per cent. of the actual grant to an architect or surveyor to certify that work has actually been carried out.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The board is currently considering ways in which its payment procedures can be modified to reduce the documentation required for smaller grant claims where this is compatible with the board's responsibilities for the proper administration of public funds.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the sex and ethnic origin of the officer designated by his Department as equal opportunities officer.

Mr. Butcher: The Department's equal opportunities officer is male and white.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Butcher: Yes, on the basis of the information now available. To ensure equality of opportunities as far as possible, we will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out, and the implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service announced on 9 February 1984 is being carefully monitored.

British Telecom (Shares)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the number of persons who bought shares in British Telecom who have now sold them.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) why some British Telecommunications shares applied for by British Telecommunications employees and pensioners were not allotted;

(2) whether employees and pensioners were given undertakings prior to the sale of British Telecommunications shares that they would be allocated all the shares for which they applied.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 25 April 1985, c. 523]: The Government gave no undertaking that British Telecom employees and pensioners would be allocated all the shares for which they applied. The priority offer made to employees and pensioners was subject to the terms and conditions of the overall offer which included the normal discretion for the issuers to scale down any application. We decided that it would be inappropriate to allocate more than 20,000 shares to individual employees and pensioners against a background where members of the public were restricted to a maximum of 800 shares each.

Companies Act (Offences)

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will provide statistics for the number of (a) prosecutions and (b) convictions on an annual basis for each category of offence under the Companies Act, specifying the nature of each category.

Mr. Fletcher: Statistics of prosecutions and convictions are published each year in the annual report on the Companies Acts 1948-83, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the reasons for not keeping statistics on the import of raw ivory.

Mr. Channon: In order to be separately identified in the overseas trade statistics, the volume or value of trade in a commodity must be of sufficient size to warrant the cost of collection and publication of the information. This has not been the case with raw ivory.

THE ARTS

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts, pursuant to his reply of 23 January 1984, Official Report, column 419, if he is now in a position to make a statement on the future funding of the Riverside studios, in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what reports he has received from Her Majesty's ambassadors in Tunis or Algiers about the public statement on 7 April by the Revolutionary Council of Al-Fatah, as broadcast at 17.02 hours GMT on Voice of Palestine, Algiers, which called for an increase in violence against Israel and absolute rejection of any participation in an American peace initiative; and if he will assess the effect this policy statement will have on implementation of the Venice declaration, as endorsed by Her Majesty's Government;

(2) whether, during the Minister of State's recent visit to middle eastern states, he discussed with his hosts the statement by Yasir Arafat in Baghdad on 3 January, as broadcast in Voice of Palestine at 16.15 hours GMT, that emphasis must be placed on increasing armed struggle by all available means, and also by Khalid Al-Wazir on the same occasion that armed struggle would remain the first strategy of Palestinian action; and whether his hosts indicated any steps that they could take to achieve acceptance by Mr. Arafat and his supporters of resolution 242.

Mr. Luce: We have noted statements by some Palestinian spokesmen in favour of armed struggle, but also wide Palestinian support for the Jordanian-Palestinian agreement of 11 February, with its commitment to peaceful negotiations. In our view, all parties to the Arab-Israel dispute should make constructive moves towards negotiations at which the voice of the Palestinians would be heard.

Philippines

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current relations with the Philippines.

Mr. Luce: We enjoy good relations with the Philippines. The United Kingdom is, for example, the third largest investor in that country and British visible exports are currently worth £92 million a year. The United Kingdom is the fifth largest market for exports from the Philippines.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Integration Policy

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with Signor Spinelli concerning the draft treaty on European Economic Community integration and the response he gave to Sigor Spinelli on behalf of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend met a delegation from the European Parliament, including Signor Spinelli. He made clear that the best chance of making progress towards greater European unity lay in practical reforms which could be implemented without delay within the framework of the existing treaties.

Western European Union

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the meeting of Foreign and Defence Ministers of the Western European Union planned to take place in Bonn on 22 and 23 April was held on these dates; and if he will make a statement on the current policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the objectives and role of that organisation.

Mr. Luce: Yes; the Bonn Ministerial meeting took place as planed. Copies of the communique are in the Library. We regard the Western European Union as a valuable forum for joint political debate between Foreign and Defence Ministers of member countries on defence and security matters of importance to Europe. We aim through WEU to strengthen European security co-operation, and the European contribution to the alliance.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs of what sex and ethnic origins are the officers designated by his Department as equal opportunities officers.

Mr. Renton: My equal opportunities officers are male and white. Their appointments were agreed with the respective trade union sides.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Renton: Yes. Although we are continuing to look for further improvements. To this end we shall be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out and shall continue carefully to monitor the implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service announced on 9 February 1985.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Strip Searches

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what were the total numbers of strip searches of women prisoners in Northern Ireland in each of the months of February and March;

(2) how many female inmates were subjected to strip searches during each of the months of February and March; and how many times each prisoner was searched.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the replies given to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 19 March at column 434-36 and 19 April 1985 at column 282.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the practice of strip searching in Northern Ireland prisons in the first three months of 1985.

Mr. Scott: Strip searches are a necessary part of the maintenance of prison security. The procedures used in Northern Ireland are the same as those which have been used for many years in comparable prisons in Great Britain and elsewhere. The need for and frequency of searches are kept under close review and I am satisfied that the level in the first three months of 1985 was the necessary minimum.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many female prisoners were in Northern Ireland prisons in each of the months February and March;

(2) how many female remand prisoners were held in Northern Ireland prisons in each of the months of February and March; how many of these prisoners were subjected to strip searching in each month; and how many times each female remand prisoner was strip-searched.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

	Remand	Sentenced	Total Female Population
February 1985	12	27	39
March 1985	12	31	43

The figures include those detained in the young offender's centre, in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh.

During February 1985, nine remand prisoners were strip-searched; six were searched twice and three were searched once. During March 1985, five remand prisoners were strip-searched; four were searched twice and one was searched once.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Hurd: The suppression of terrorism and public disorder in Northern Ireland remains one of the Government's principal objectives. We have made substantial progress in recent years in deterring violence and bringing criminals to justice. The overall level of violence in 1984 was less than in any year since 1970. In pursuit of this policy, the Government have provided for significant increases in the strength and resources of the Royal Ulster constablulary, the size of the regular force and its full time reserve increasing from approximately 7,300 in 1970 to 10,600 today.

The Northern Ireland Assembly established by the Northern Ireland Act 1982 and elected in October of that year has enabled the people of Northern Ireland through their elected representatives carefully to monitor the work of Northern Ireland Departments. It continues to provide a framework for the constitutional parties to divide arrangements for return of devolved powers which would command widespread acceptance throughout the community. The Government have also taken steps to minimise the scope for electoral malpractise, especially personation, in elections.

The Government continue to pursue a dialogue with the Republic of Ireland within the framework set out in the communique issued after the meeting in November between the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach.

The aim of the Government's economic strategy has been to encourage output and employment in a realistic and cost effective way. Invesment incentives remain among the best in Western Europe; since its inception in 1982 the Industrial Development Board has promoted 11,748 new jobs, and since 1979 the local enterprise development unit has trebled its support to small firms, promoting a record 4,000 jobs in 1984.

Although the economic climate remains difficult, restructuring continues and welcome developments include new contracts for Shorts and Harland and Wolff. A freeport has been established at Aldegrove airport, and enterprise zones have been created in Belfast and Londonderry as part of the continuing regeneration of those cities; special measures have been agreed by the European Community for urban renewal in Belfast. Significat improvements have been made in the housing stock, with 43,500 new houses started since 1979, nearly 200,000 grants paid for improvements and repairs, and 26,000 Housing Executives homes sold to tenants. A youth training programme was introduced a year ahead of the rest of the United Kindgom and is now providing training for some 11,000 young people.

Historic Buildings

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many properties have been listed by the Historic Buildings Department in each of the past six years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The number of buildings listed in each of the last 6 years is as follows:

Year	Buildings
1984-85	174
1983-84	168
1982-83	199
1981-82	936
1980-81	839
1079-80	768

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the owners of properties which are proposed to be listed by the Historic buildings Department are informed of the department's proposal.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. Owners are informed at the conclusion of the listing process.

United States Government

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he next plans to meet representatives of the United States Government to discuss matters relating to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: I meet representatives of the United States Government from time to time and I next expect to meet the US ambassador to this country in June.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the European monetary system currencies, the dollar, the yen and the European currency unit the highest and lowest rates of exchange against the pound sterling in the current year and in 1983, and 1984, respectively, together with the current rate.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Monthly highs and lows for the pound sterling can be derived from tables 13.1 and 13.3 in the March edition of the CSO publication Financial Statistics. Recent sterling exchanges rates are as follows:

Rates against sterling	March 1985 (monthly averages)	24 April 1985 (closing rates)
Deutschemark	3·7013	3·8198
French franc	11·31	11·66
Italian lira	2336·0	2437·2
Netherlands guilder	4·1836	4·3190
Danish krone	13·23	13·67
Belgian franc	74·39	76·95
Irish punt	1·1877	1·2192
US dollar	1·1226	1·2235
Japenese yen	289·75	307·28
European Currency Unit	1·6596	1·7094

Investigation of highs and lows using daily data could not be undertaken except at excessive cost.

Home Improvement (Tax Relief)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total estimated amount of tax relief granted in respect of loans for the improvement of a person's main residence for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 16 April 1985, c. 155]: It is not possible to provide precise figures, but it is estimated that between 5 and 10 per cent. of the total cost of mortgage interest relief is currently in respect of further loans for the improvement of a person's main residence.

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

Mr. Craigen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will produce a table showing the annual total amount of mortgage interest tax relief for (a) Great Britain, (b) Scotland, (c) England and (d) Wales from 1982-83 to 1984-85 and also the average mortgage tax relief per mortgagor in: (i) Great Britain, (ii) Scotland, (iii) England and (iv) Wales for the same period.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 19 April 1985, c. 298]: The latest estimates are given in the table. Figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are provisional.

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

	Total cost	Per Mortgagor receiving tax relief
	£ million	£
1982-83
Great Britain	2,120	350
Scotland	140	380
England	1,900	350
Wales	80	290
Northern Ireland	30	310
United Kingdom	2,150	350
1983-84*
Great Britain	2,715	400
Scotland	160	430
England	2,460	400
Wales	95	330
Northern Ireland	35	350
United Kingdom	2,750	400
1984-85*
Great Britain	3,455	500
Scotland	200	550
England	3,130	500
Wales	125	425
Northern Ireland	45	440
United Kingdom	3,500	500

* Includes the cost of relief in respect of mortgages previously under the option mortgage scheme.

Mr. Craigen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the total annual cost of mortgage interest tax relief paid to mortgagors who are taxed above the standard rate for each financial year from 1982-83 to 1984-85 in Scotland.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 19 April 1985, c. 298]: The latest estimates are as follows, together with the costs of relief given in excess of the basic rate.

Mortgage interest tax relief in Scotland

	Relief for higher rate taxpayers £ million	Relief in excess of the basic rate £ million
1982-83	25	12
1983-84	25	12
1984-85	30	15

Working Wives

Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many working wives opt for separate income tax assessment; and what proportion this is of those eligible to do so.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 25 April 1985, c. 529]: About 170,000 married couples are expected to elect for separate taxation of wife's earnings in 1985-86. Although this is only about 1½ per cent. of the total of taxpaying married couples, in 1985-86 an election can only be beneficial if the couple's income is over £25,360 (with the wife's earnings at least £6,956). About 20,000, less than one fifth of 1 per cent. of married couples, elect for separate assessment, but this does not affect the total tax liability of the couple.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has received a copy of the report commissioned by the Bank of England from Price, Waterhouse, into the dealings of Johnson Matthey Bankers prior to its collapse.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend is aware of the Price, Waterhouse investigation and that an interim report has been made. He has asked that the committee which has been established to review banking supervisory arrangements in the light of the collapse of JMB should take full account of the results of the investigation.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the enquiries by the Bank of England into Johnson Matthey Bankers have revealed unsecured lending.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes. Unsecured lending is not in itself imprudent and is not uncommon.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the funds paid by the Bank of England in connection with the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers are shown in the Government's public spending figures.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. The resources involved are those of the Bank of England's banking department which, in line with national accounts practice, is regarded as being in the monetary sector for accounting purposes.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the banking supervision department of the Bank of England first learnt that Johnson Matthey Bankers was insolvent.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I understand that the Bank of England first learned of the seriousness of the difficulties which threatened JMB's insolvency shortly before the rescue operation was mounted.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action the Bank of England took prior to the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers in pursuance of its duty to supervise the banking system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he was informed, prior to the takeover of Johnson Matthey Bankers by the Bank of England on 1 October 1984, that the bank intended to take such a course.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As my right hon. Friend said in his statement to the House on 17 December, he was notified shortly before the rescue was announced of the action the Governor intended to take.

Banking Supervision

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects his review of the arrangements for banking supervision to be complete.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 25 April at column 974.

DEFENCE

Royal Ordnance Factories

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning progress with privatisation of the royal ordnance factories.

Mr. Butler: It remains the Government's policy to achieve privatisation of Royal Ordnance plc as soon as commercially practicable. However, no decision has yet been taken on the precise method or timing of the injection of private capital, although our preferred option remains to float the company as a whole.

Single Sourced Defence Contracts

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Defence, if he will break down the figures for single sourced defence contracts given in the answer to the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) of 31 October 1984, Official Report, column 1123, to indicate how many of the contracts concerned were let on a cost-plus basis and how many on a semi-incentive basis; what was the total value of the contracts concerned in each case; and whether he now has equivalent figures for 1984-85.

Mr. Butler: The information requested is set out in the table, which for completeness includes contracts placed as a result of effective competition. Contracts placed non-competitively and which are subject to positive incentives to keep costs to a minimum, are shown at lines 2, 3 and 4. Contracts subject to pricing on the basis of cost plus percentage free profit are shown at line 5, and represent a declining proportion of the total. Equivalent figures are not yet available for 1984-85.

Numbers and values of headquarters contracts and amendments

Type of contract/amendment	1981-82		1982-83		1983-84
	Number	Value £ million	Number	Value £ million	Number	Value £ million
1. Contracts priced by Competition	9,059	1,065	9,402	1,439	9,504	1,890
2. Contracts priced otherwise by reference to market forces (See note below)	36,462	639	55,326	1,065	53,051	1,403
3. Contracts priced on estimates at outset or as soon as possible thereafter	11,382	1,839	11,409	3,049	10,239	3,145

AST 403

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the reasons for the delay in funding AST 403 since its publication in 1979, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: AST 403 (first revise) was cancelled last year. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be meeting his fellow Defence Ministers in Rome next month to review the results of a feasibility study by industry of the viability of a collaborative programme for a European figher aircraft programme, and to consider the way ahead.

Management Consultants

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the contracts, with the subject of assignment, awarded to management consultancy firms by his Department in 1984, with the name of the consultants concerned.

Mr. Butler: The Ministry of Defence awarded 19 contracts to management consultancy firms during 1984. The list is as follows:

Name of Firm and Assignment

Theta Analysis & Systems Ltd.

Ships (Adoption)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the total number of programmes in existence for the adoption of a Royal Navy ship by a town or local authority.

Mr. Lee: There is a fleet programme to encourage the affiliation of every commissioned vessel in the Royal Navy with a community or district.

Non-British Citizens

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-British citizens are employed in the services or in his Department.

Mr. Lee: This information is not held centrally, and could only be provided at disproportionate cost and effort.

Contracts

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has concerning the number and total value of defence contracts which are allocated largely on the basis of the hourly rate of contractors.

Mr. Butler: This information could not be provided without disproportionate time and effort.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are taken by his Department to verify the number of hours spent by contractors on work allocated solely or largely on the basis of the hourly rate of the contractor or contractors.

Mr. Butler: Verification of the hours spent is normally undertaken by the appropriate Ministry technical authority in conjunction with the relevant contracts branch.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on the allocation of defence contracts to suppliers based solely, or largely, upon the hourly rate of the contractor or contractors.

Mr. Butler: The practice of pricing on an all-up hourly rate covering both labour and other expenses is not a practice applied extensively in MoD contracting. It is normally adopted only for contracts covering primarily the provision of manpower effort. Many of these contracts are of relatively low value. The work could, for example, involve research, minor development work, repairs and servicing, and ADP effort. Hourly rates are usually agreed in advance, where possible, following competitive tendering.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for giving such advice.

Mr. Butler: Yes, on the basis of the information now available. The implementation of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service, announced on 9 February 1984, is being carefully monitored within my Department. As part of the process of ensuring equality of opportunity, as far as possible, we will be conducting ethnic surveys of all staff (under the Government's phased programme) to enable ethnic monitoring to be carried out.

The Departmental equal opportunities officer has issued a number of instructions to all staff. They have set the Civil Service policy on equal opportunities for men and women, guidance on the procedures to be followed in cases of sexual harassment, the responsibilities of equal opportunities officers and the Civil Service race relations policy statement. In addition, the equal opportunities officer has circulated the report on race relations policies and procedures in the Civil Service to our civilian personnel management authorities drawing attention to the need to ensure that Departmental practice follows the recommendations of the report.

Falkland Islands (Airlink)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much the new direct airlink to the Falklands will save public funds.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 22 April at column 386.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 30 April 1985

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"MI5's Official Secrets"

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Attorney-General whether he has received the report of the investigation into the allegations of criminal offences that were made in the television film, "MI5's Official Secrets"; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The investigation by the Metropolitan police, about which I informed the House when answering questions on 18 March, has now been completed and its results have been reported to me by the Director of Public Prosecutions. None of the persons who made, or were said by others to have made, allegations of criminal conduct has been prepared to substantiate those allegations by coming forward with evidence which would justify the institution of proceedings. With my authority, the Director of Public Prosecutions will therefore take no further action in this matter.

Juvenile Courts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General what has been the outcome of discussions with the Magistrates Association, the Justices Clerks Society and others on less formal arrangements for juvenile court proceedings, referred to in the Government's reply to the second report of the Social Services Committee, Session 1983-84, Cmnd. 9298.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

These discussions have not yet taken place, and may be affected by the consideration which the review of child care law is giving to the style of care proceedings. But the Department will be in touch with the bodies concerned in due course.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Herons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications to kill herons were made in each year since 1983 and to date n 1985; how many were issued; how many herons were permitted to be killed; how many were actually killed; from whom the licences were received; for what reasons they were applied for and granted; what was the location of each killing ground; what deterrent measures had first been tried; and whether the advice of the Nature Conservancy Council was obtained.

Mrs. Fenner: Details of applications for and licences issued by my Department in 1983, 1984 and 1985 to kill or take herons are set out in the table.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 Licences issued by MAFF in England to kill or take herons

	1983	1984	1985
Number of applications	6	4	2
Number of licences issued	2	1	—
Number of herons permitted to be killed	10	6	—
Number of herons actually killed	2	4	—

(a) Applications were received from fish farms, put-and-take fisheries, and an aquatic nurseryman.

(b) The reasons for applications and licences were to prevent serious damage to fisheries.

(c) The locations of licences were

1983: (i) Padworth, Berkshire
(ii) Littleton, Somerton, Somerset

1984: Padworth, Berkshire

(d) Deterrent measures included shooting to scare, erection of barriers, screens, cages and nets.

(e) NCC was consulted in all cases where licences were issued.

Fruit and Vegetables

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the past five years the basic and buying-in prices for certain fruit and vegetables under the common organisation of the market for fruit and vegetables, the cost to the EEC budget and the quantities removed from the market for distillation, destruction or otherwise.

Farm Holdings (Payments)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated amount received under the appropriate headings of parts I, II, IV and V of table 28 of the annual review White Paper (Cmnd. 9423) in the case of farm holdings with more than 100 dairy cows, 50 beef cows, 1,000 pigs and 1,000 sheep.

Mr. MacGregor: Information is not available in the form requested.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will bring up to date the information given in the reply of 26 February, Official Report, columns 91-93, concerning prices and levies; and what further changes he envisages as a result of more recent movements in the exchange rate.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is set out in the tables. The "world prices" shown in table 1 are generally the lowest offer prices at the Community frontier underlying the Commission's calculation of the variable import levies. I remind the hon. Member that these are the lowest prices recorded and it is highly likely that on average higher prices would have to be paid if larger quantities were to be purchased on world markets. The "world prices" shown do not necessarily relate to the same quality or presentation of product for which United Kingdom market prices are set out in table 2.

The levies and notional world prices shown reflect the £-ecu exchange rate used to calculate monetary compensatory amounts (MCA) for the week commencing 22 April. Any subsequent movement in this exchange rate would, other things being equal, have a direct effect on the notional world price shown and, for products to which the MCA system applies, cause a broadly equal but opposite change in the levy applicable in the United Kingdom. The effect of the MCA system is to insulate United Kingdom market prices from movements in the market exchange rate of the pound.

TABLE 1
Levy Applicable in the United Kingdom and Notional "World" Price on 24 April 1985 for the Main Traded Agricultural Commodities*

	Levy† Applicable in United Kingdom (£/tonne)	Notional "world" price (£/tonne)

Pigmeat	249	930
Sheepmeat	• —	1,739
Poultrymeat	138	722
Eggs	151	626

Note:
* "world" prices have been calculated by subtracting the levy applicable on 24 April from the threshold/guide price. The beef price is also adjusted for duty. In the case of pigmeat, poultrymeat and eggs, the "world" price has been taken as the sluicegate price, less supplementary levy where appropriate. The resulting estimate has been converted from ECU/t at the appropriate market rate of exchange £0·606046 = 1ECU;
† the rates of levy vary for different tariff headings. The rates quoted are beef and veal—carcase; pigmeat—carcase; poultrymeat—70 per cent. chickens; rice—wholly milled long grain; virgin olive oil (1,507 Ala) eggs in shell including supplementary levy. Levies are shown after deduction of the monetary compensatory amount where applicable;
‡ in practice the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are normally covered by the Lomé convention and enter the Community levy-free;
‖ a special lower rate of levy is applicable to imports of butter from New Zealand;
¶ most imports of beef from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced levy rates;
• imports of lamb under voluntary restraint arrangements with principal suppliers and related agreements are subject to a reduced charge of 10 per cent. ad valorem. Any imports outside these arrangements are subject to levies which cannot exceed the 20 per cent. tariff bound in the GATT.

Farmed Deer

Mr. Cartwright asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to respond to the recommendations in the report of the Farm Animal Welfare Council on the welfare of farmed deer.

Mrs. Fenner: We shall respond with our proposals once full consideration has been given to the results of our current consultations with interested parties.

Captive Bolt Pistols

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will improve the accuracy of captive bolt pistols by requiring cattle stunning boxes to contain head restraining devices.

Mrs. Fenner: A requirement for all cattle stunning boxes to contain head restraining devices is one of the recommendations made by the Farm Animal Welfare Council in its report on the welfare of livestock (red meat animals) at the time of slaughter. The Government are considering the council's recommendations.

Green Top Milk

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he has any plans to phase out or further reduce the production levels of green top milk;

(2) why licences for the production and sale of green top milk have been reduced in duration.

Mr. MacGregor: Regulations amending the Milk (Special Designation) Regulations 1977 were laid down before Parliament on 9 April. Their purpose is to prohibit the sale of untreated milk through shops, schools, hotels and other catering establishments in England and Wales with effect from 1 November 1985. This policy was announced by my predecessor in 1980, but could not be implemented until now because of the 5 year validity of untreated milk licences.

I have no plans at present to introduce further restrictions, but policy on untreated milk will be kept under review taking account of public health considerations, of the need to preserve consumer choice and of the interests of producers. It is clearly desirable that if changes are considered necessary on health grounds they should be introduced rather more quickly than was possible in 1980: on the other hand, I recognise that producers and distributors need to be able to plan ahead. The fact that untreated milk licences to be issued from 1 November 1985 will be valid for three years rather than for five is intended to strike a reasonable balance between these two considerations.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent estimate he has made of the implications for agricultural employment of the introduction of milk production quotas.

Mr. MacGregor: In so far as can be ascertained, the direct effects of the introduction of milk quotas on agricultural employment have been small.

Pigmeat Storage

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether a European Community scheme of aids to encourage the private storage of pigmeat will be introduced in the current year.

Mr. MacGregor: I am glad to say that the management committee has decided to introduce such a scheme as from 6 May. The scheme will give traders the option of receiving assistance for storing pigmeat at a time when this may be preferred to putting the rest onto the market.

British traders have made greater use of these aids in recent years and I hope they will again take full advantage of this year's scheme.

WALES

Private Cars and Telephones

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of Welsh people have (a) a private car and (b) a telephone; and what were the relevant figures for (i) 1961, (ii) 1971 and (iii) 1980.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information on the number of persons in households with access to one or more cars or vans has been collected in the Censuses of Population held in 1966 (10 per cent. sample), 1971 and 1981. In 1966 the figure was 52 per cent. rising to 60 per cent. and 70 per cent. in 1971 and 1981 respectively. No comparable information is available for 1961. Information on the availability of telephones is not collected at a personal level, but in 1983 it is estimated that 74 per cent. of households in Wales had a telephone in their accommodation. This estimate is based on information collected from time to time in the General Household Survey and the comparable figures for 1980 and 1972 were 67 per cent. and 24 per cent. respectively.

Road Schemes

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many road schemes in Wales in each year since 1979 have been designed on behalf of his Department by local authorities' highways departments, acting as agents.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: For all such schemes, irrespective of cost, the information is as follows:

	Number
1979	58
1980	50
1981	102
1982	69
1983	38
1984	70

Consultants

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales in how many instances since 1979 he has appointed outside consultants to undertake work within his Department; and if he will specify which consultants, their remuneration and in respect of which sections of his Department their work was commissioned.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information relating to the appointment, by my Department, of outside consultants prior to the financial year 1984-85 is not readily available and to provide it would involve disproportionate costs.

In the financial year 1984-85, outside consultants were appointed by my Department in four instances to undertake specialised one-off tasks. The following are details of the consultants concerned, their remuneration and the sections of the Department in respect of which the work was commissioned.

Consultant	Remuneration £	Section of Department
Spencer Stuart Management Consultants	13,800	CADW
PA Consulting Services Ltd.	18,059	Health Group
Deloitte Haskins and Sells	24,940	Industry Department
Price Waterhouse Associates	36,855	Transport and Highways Division

In addition, firms of consulting engineers are engaged on various trunk road schemes.

A470 (Improvements)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to monitor future road improvements on the A470 between Blaenau Ffestiniog and Betws-y-Coed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: As already announced, consultants are to be appointed to examine the road between Blaenau Ffestiniog and Betws-y-Coed with a view to developing a suitable policy governing any future road improvements on this stretch of the A470.

Chest Specialists

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many chest specialists or consultants there were per head of population in (a) Wales and (b) England in (i) 1971, (ii) 1979 and (iii) 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested for Wales is as follows:

	Number of consultants in thoracic medicine	Rate per million population
1971	14·9	5·5
1979	18·1	6·5
1984	6·1	2·2

Details for England are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Community Radio

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received in support of community radio stations in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Since the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 23 January, at columns 417-8, we have received about a dozen letters on community radio in Scotland, together with a number of telephone inquiries. Most of the approaches have been from persons wishing to set up community radio stations. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to make a statement before long on how we propose to take forward the development of community radio.

Police (Dismissals)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were dismissed for misconduct during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of police officers in England and Wales required to resign or dismissed for offences under the police discipline code, and not reinstated on appeal, are as follows:

	Required to resign	Dismissed	Required to resign or dismissed for criminal conduct†*
1980	41	14	73
1981	30	32	63
1982	62	19	58
1983	49	31	61
1984	38	20	57

* The records provided by forces (other than the Metropolitan police) do not differentiate between the punishments for this offence.

† These figures may include some officers required to resign or dismissed for other disciplinary offences as well as criminal conduct.

Electoral Reform

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the additional number of people who will be enfranchised to vote at the next general election in accordance with the provisions of the Representation of the People Bill's proposals for holidaymakers; and when he expects to lay the relevant statutory instrument.

Mr. Mellor: The number will depend on when the election is called, but the Government's White Paper on the "Representation of the People Acts" (Cmnd. 9140, paragraph 3.7) pointed out that well over a million people may be away on holiday on any particular day of May or June. It is our intention to bring the new arrangements for holidaymakers and others to vote by post or proxy into operation by February 1987.

Benzodiazepine Drugs

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the response of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs regarding the scheduling of benzodiazepine drugs under the United Nations convention on psychotropic substances 1971.

Mr. Mellor: We are awaiting a recommendation from the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs on the scheduling of benzodiazepines under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. Its recommendations on this matter will be made known in due course.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what organisations have been consulted by his Department regarding the possible rescheduling of benzodiazepine drugs under the United Nations convention on psychotropic substances 1971.

Mr. Mellor: We have to date consulted the following trade and professional organisations on the changes which we think are necessary to the misuse of drugs legislation to enable us to comply with the requirements of the United Nations Convention on Psychotropic Substances 1971:

Deportation

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide a table indicating the total number of people served with notice of intention to deport during 1984 and 1983 by nationality and category.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1985, c. 26]: The details are as follows:

PRIME MINISTER

Far East (Visit)

Q26. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister what reactions she has received from British industry and commerce to her visit to the far east; and what prospects for improved export performances to the countries visited she now expects.

The Prime Minister: Reaction to my visit has been very positive. United Kingdom companies active in these markets have reported an improvement in the general climate for doing business. I am confident that there is now a much greater awareness—at the highest level—of the capabilities of British industry. The success of my visit has made a significant contribution towards the improvement of bilateral relations, which will undoubtedly benefit our companies.

Q66. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister why her press secretary, Mr. Bernard Ingham, accompanied her on her recent official visit to the far east; and in how many previous such visits he has taken part.

The Prime Minister: To advise me on, and handle, my relations with the media and to brief journalists as required by the duties of his office. He has accompanied me on all bar one of my visits overseas since he took up his post on 1 November 1979.

Nuclear Weapons

Q40. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement on the latest information given to her by the United States administration regarding the progress of the negotiations with the Soviet Union regarding nuclear weapons in Geneva.

The Prime Minister: The three chief American negotiators at the Geneva talks led by Mr. Kampelman, briefed the North Atlantic Council on 24 April on the state of negotiations at the end of the first round which adjourned the previous day. Close consultations continue to take place in NATO bodies and elsewhere including the Bonn summit on 2 to 4 May.

British Council

Q84. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister on what criteria the decision was taken to reduce the level of provision for the British Council's overseas activities.

The Prime Minister: The council's overall provision has not been reduced. On the contrary, it will be receiving nearly £6 million more in 1985-86 than the sum originally established for that year. Within this total, however, the British Council has been asked to absorb in 1985-86 about £1·1 million of its risen costs as a contribution towards the overall need to keep the Government's spending within the resources available. The decision on where these savings should fall was for the British Council's board.

Security Services

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister how Ministers in her Administration with responsibilities for satisfying themselves that the security services operate entirely within the letter and spirit of their directive discharge their duties in this respect; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the full explanation of the arrangements for ministerial oversight of the work of the security service which my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, gave the House on 4 April at columns 1380-84.

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have been satisfied that the security forces have operated entirely within the letter and spirit of their directive at all times since May 1979; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said on Second Reading of the Interception of Communications Bill on 12 March at columns 152-56, about the propriety with which the security service carries out its tasks under its directive.

Departmental Salaries

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister how many persons employed in any capacity by the Department of Health and Social Security are paid £30,000 per annum or more.

The Prime Minister: On 1 April 1985 there were 59 employees of the Department of Health and Social Security being paid £30,000 per annum or more.

Social Services Departments (Salaries)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what information she has as to the number of persons employed in any capacity by social services departments of local authorities who are paid £30,000 per annum or more.

The Prime Minister: Information is not collected centrally on the pay of individual local authority employees.

VE Day

Mr. Bendall asked the Prime Minister whether Wednesday 8 May will be designated as a public holiday in commemoration of the 40th anniversary of Victory in Europe day.

The Prime Minister: No.

Engagements

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 30 April.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 30 April.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 30 April.

Mr. Duffy asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 30 April.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 30 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others including one with the Prime Minister of Canada. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen, and will be giving a dinner for the Prime Minister of Canada.

Fontainebleau Summit

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the progress being made in implementing the decisions of the Fontainebleau summit.

The Prime Minister: Agreement was reached last December on conclusions on budgetary discipline. The Council reached agreement in March on the text of the new own resources decision including provision for the United Kingdom's abatement. The terms of Spanish and Portuguese entry into the Community have been agreed. Follow-up work is in hand on the reports of the two ad hoc Committees set up at Fontainebleau.

Australian Royal Commission

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply of 17 April, Official Report, column 173, if she will explain the nature of the documents withheld from the Australian Royal commission on grounds of (a) international relations and (b) personal sensitivity; and how many documents were withheld in each case.

The Prime Minister: The Australian Royal commission is well aware that a very small amount of material involving the interests of third countries has been withheld where disclosure would damage the United Kingdom's international relations. Other material has been provided to the Royal Commission after consultation with the countries concerned.

Considerations of personal sensitivity apply mainly to medical or radiation dose information, which in the United Kingdom may not be published without the consent of the individual concerned. By deleting names in many cases it has been possible to supply relevant information without infringing personal sensitivity. The number of documents relevant to the terms of reference of the Australian Royal Commission withheld on these grounds is small, compared with the several thousand already supplied.

The Australian authorities are well aware of the position; Senator Evans, Australian Minister for Resources and Energy, in answer to a question in the Australian Senate on 19 April, stated that it was his understanding that the United Kingdom Government had been co-operating with the Royal Commission and that there was no belief in the Commission that it had now been denied access to documents of significance for its inquiry and its conclusions. Senator Evans went on to say that he had no reason to believe that there was any degree of concern at all in the Commission about the level of co-operation by the United Kingdom Government.

Nuclear Trigger Devices (Testing)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list the occasions on which nuclear trigger devices have been tested in the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: No tests of neutron initiators for nuclear weapons, sometimes referred to as "triggers" of a nature described in my reply of 2 April, at column 524, have been conducted in the United Kingdom.

School Leavers

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Prime Minister what proportion of young people left school at (a) 16 years and (b) 18 years in (i) Wales, (ii) England and (iii) Scotland in 1984.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

*School leavers in the academic year 1983-84
Leavers as a percentage of the numbers in the age group†

Leavers aged‡	Wales percentage	England percentage	Scotland percentage
16	66	67	43
18	16	17	22

* Provisional data for England and Wales.
†School leavers expressed as a percentage of the population in the age group.
‡Ages at 31 August 1984 for England and Wales; 31 December 1984 for Scotland.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister when she hopes to be able to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Linlithgow, dated 29 March, on out of area arrangements for the supply of equipment to the United Kingdom from the United States of America under North Atlantic Treaty Organisation arrangements.

The Prime Minister: Soon.

Rates (Review)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Prime Minister if she will extend the scope of the review of rates to include water rates.

The Prime Minister: The scope for extending metering instead of rateable value as a means of charging households for water supplies is currently being considered by a joint study involving the Department of the Environment and the water industry. In responding to the study's recommendations, the Government will also take account of any relevant proposals which may emerge from the review of local government finance.

ENVIRONMENT

"The Glory of the Garden"

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will disregard for calculation of rate support grant penalties those sums offered by local authorities as challenge funding in respect of regional arts developments which are sponsored by the Arts Council of Great Britain in accordance with the policy set out in "The Glory of the Garden".

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend will consider any such representations which he receives.

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he takes to examine the planning implications of developments for which authority is sought by private Bill; and if he will make a statement on the specific steps taken in the case of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government do not normally get directly involved in private Bills unless national policies are prejudiced. My Department is at present considering the provisions of the Bill and will decide in due course whether to submit a report to Parliament.

Rates

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the amount of rateable revenue recovered by local authorities in England and Wales from (a) vacant retail premises, (b) vacant offices and (c) vacant garage/showroom premises for each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is not available centrally.

Housing Starts (London)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate for each London borough and the Greater London council, how many housing starts are planned for 1985.

Sir George Young: My Department has made no such estimates.

Crisis Management

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to the answer of 1 April, Official Report, column 435, if he will state the envisaged scenarios within which his Department has taken part in the corporate exercise of testing crisis management measures other than Wintex-Cimex in the past two years.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. Details of the scenarios of these exercises are classified.

Local Authorities (Overtime)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the total amount paid out by local authorities in overtime for the last 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is not collected centrally.

Leicestershire (Financial Aid)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail all financial aid given to (a) the county of Leicestershire and (b) the city of Leicester since 1979, including the inner area programme and all other schemes; and if he will break the figures down by year.

Mr. Macfarlane: The readily available information is given in the table. The figures for inner area programme, slum clearance and improvement grants are not on the same basis as the overall figures for specific grants of which they form part. They are taken from central records of payments or entitlements, whereas the latter are from the authorities' outturn returns.

Notes:

* The rate support grant system changed in 1981-82. Figures for earlier year are not on a comparable basis. The figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 include the needs, resources and domestic elements. Thereafter they include block grant and domestic rate relief grant.

† Figures up to 1981-82 are final entitlements. Those for 1982-83 and 1983-84 are entitlements based on outturn after holdback, and for 1984-85 entitlements based on budgets after holdback. The figures for 1985-86 are before holdback and based on budget for Leicestershire and on expenditure limit for Leicester city.

‡ Figures up to 1983-84 are final entitlements. Those for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are latest estimates.

‖ The figures up to 1984-85 cover all transport, while that for 1985-86 is for roads capital only.

¶ The figures are from the authorities' outturn returns and are not available for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

● The figures are from central records of payments and are not available for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

■ The figures for 1979-80 to 1982-83 are from the authorities' final audited claims. Those for 1983-84 to 1985-86 are provisional.

* The figures up to 1983-84 are from outturn returns and for 1984-85 and 1985-86 from budget returns.

The figures cover payments of subsidies for rent and rate rebates and rent allowances by DOE from 1979-80 to 1982-83 (part) and by DHSS from 1982-83 (part) to 1985-86. Those for 1979-80 to 1983-84 are based on final audited claims, while those for 1984-85 are from mid-year and initial claims respectively.

Council House Sales

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the total number of dwellings sold by Leicester city council in 1984, and for each of the past four years; if he will give the total figure for England for each of the same years; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Following are the numbers of dwelling sales, right to buy and voluntary, reported by Leicester city council in each calendar year from 1980 and the corresponding estimates for all English local authorities.

	Leicester	England
1980	76	79,600
1981	224	94,200
1982	1,469	186,700
1983	1,455	134,900
1984	492	99,400

I am pleased that more than 3,700 homes have been bought in this way and I look forward to many more such purchases as tenants continue to exercise the rights conferred on them by Parliament.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to privatise pubicly owned housing in inner city areas.

Mr. Gow: No, but we are encouraging local authorities to adopt a more imaginative range of solutions to the problems of their run-down estates, including disposal to private trusts or developers, and initiatives for the better management of local authority estates, such as the Priority Estates project. My right hon. Friend announced on 26 February 1985, at column 99, that he was setting up the urban housing renewal unit within the Department for this purpose. The unit will be launched shortly.

Closer partnership between the public and private sectors is in the best interests of those who live in the public sector.

Falkland Islands (Airport)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is (a) the original and (b) the current estimate for the cost of (i) the runway at Mount Pleasant airport, (ii) the army facilities at Mount Pleasant airport and (iii) other costs of the airfield excluding the runway.

Sir George Young: The original cost of the airport works announced in June 1983 was £215 million. The current estimate is £276 million. The increase mainly arises from the provision of additional joint service facilities in the interests of overall economy, and from price changes due to inflation.

The current estimate for the army works remains at £119 million. This figure reflects savings achieved by reducing the accommodation requirements, offset by price changes due to inflation.

It is not the practice to disclose rates for particular components of the contracts.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which items in the original estimate for the cost of the Mount Pleasant airport were priced in non-sterling currencies; and what revision in the cost of the airport has occurred due to falls in the value of the pound sterling.

Sir George Young: None. The only element in the contracts directly sensitive to exchange rate fluctuations is the cost of fuel oil for ships which amounts in total to some £9 million. There have been no increases in the total estimated costs of the airport directly attributable to falls in the value of the pound sterling.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list each local authority in England indicating the amount of rate support grant per head for 1985-86;

(2) if he will list each local authority in England according to the percentage of the national rate support grant that was allocated to it for each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

SCOTLAND

Toll Charges

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the decision not to charge tolls on the planned new Dornoch bridge represents a change of the Government's policy relating to estuarial crossings.

Mr. Ancram: No. It is not Government policy to toll estuarial crossings where to do so would frustrate the objectives of providing the crossing. The Dornoch bridge will form part of the improved A9. To charge tolls could discourage traffic using the bridge in preference to the existing route round the Firth.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether arrangements will now be made to abolish toll charges at all estuarial crossings in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: No.

Herons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of herons; and whether their number is declining.

Mr. Ancram: The Nature Conservancy Council's most recent survey of the heron population in 1979 established that there were 1,500 pairs in Scotland. There is no evidence that their number is declining, but I understand that this year the British Trust for Ornithology is to conduct a national survey of the heronries of Britain and Northern Ireland.

Rates

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report in respect of (a) each local authority area in Scotland and (b) the average for Scotland as a whole, the percentage increase in average rates bills for 1985-86 over 1984-85 for (i) domestic, (ii) industrial, (iii) commercial, (iv) miscellaneous, (v) public utility and (vi) all subjects.

Mr. Ancram: I am obtaining this information and hope to publish it in the Official Report shortly.

Police (Misconduct)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many police officers in Scotland were dismissed for misconduct during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: In these years , nine police officers were dismissed and 29 were required to resign as an alternative to dismissal, having been found guilty of disciplinary offences as set out in schedule 1 to the Police (Discipline) (Scotland) Regulations 1967. These figures include seven officers who were later reinstated on appeal to the Secretary of State. The figures for each year are as follows:

	Dismissed	Required to resign as an alternative to dismissal
1980	2	4
1981	—	9
1982	4	2
1983	3	10
1984	—	4

Job Creation (Greenock)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what level of funding is devoted by the Manpower Services Commission to the Greenock travel-to-work area.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 19 April 1985, c. 248]: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. However, it is estimated that over £24 million was spent by the Manpower Services Commission in 1984-85 in the Renfrew, Dumbarton, Argyll and Bute area, exclusive of administration costs, but including the operating costs at the jobcentres in the area.

ENERGY

Lead in Petrol

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the level of investment required in the United Kingdom refining industry between now and 1989 to meet the requirements to produce unleaded petrol; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The United Kingdom refining industry will probably need to invest somewhat over £200 million to move from petrol containing 0·15 grams per litre to unleaded petrol. The investment will be spread over many years. It is not possible to apportion this expenditure between that which has already been incurred, that which will be incurred between now and 1989 and that which will be incurred thereafter.

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the total energy penalty in terms of barrels of crude oil which will be paid by the United Kingdom following the decision to introduce unleaded petrol.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The decision to introduce unleaded petrol may eventually increase crude oil consumption in the United Kingdom by perhaps 12,000 barrels a day when conversion from leaded petrol is completed.

Brown Book

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will publish his next report on oil and gas development in the United Kingdom, the Brown Book.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have today published the latest edition of the Brown Book, and arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House and the Vote Office Stores. The report gives a detailed account of oil and gas development in 1984.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

SWOPS Project

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from Mr. Durber of Hawker Siddeley plc in the matter of the SWOPS project.

Mr. Butcher: Representations have been received from Mr. Durber, the details of which are commercially confidential.

United States Telecommunications Companies

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many United States telecommunications companies are operating in the United Kingdom and in what sectors of the market.

Mr. Butcher: My Department does not keep records in the form requested.

Video Cassette Recorders

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total annual value of video cassette recorders sold in the United Kingdom over the last five years.

Mr. Butcher: The available information is as follows:

Estimated sales in United Kingdom of video recorders 1980-84

	£ million
1980	96
1981	275
1982	523
1983	534
1984	375

Source: Business Monitors PQ 365.2 & PQ 3454.

Notes:

1980-83: Estimate = imports less exports; United Kingdom production thought to be negligible for 1980-82 and is omitted for 1983 owing to the risk of disclosing information about individual enterprises.

1984: Estimate = United Kingdom production plus imports less exports.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who were the major manufacturers of video cassette recorders sold in the United Kingdom; and what were their shares of the United Kingdom market for each year since 1978.

Mr. Butcher: This information is not available on overseas producers of VCRs. The United Kingdom producers of these machines are J2T; Sanyo, Mitsubishi; Toshiba and Sharp. Hitachi plan to begin production in the United Kingdom later this year.

United States (High Technology Exports)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding the British company, Systime United Kingdom, which has been fined by the United States Government for breaches of the United States export regulations on high technology products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: My Department has had approaches from a number of sources about Systime's difficulties over United States export controls and has discussed the situation with the company. My officials and representatives of the company remain in touch.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to invoke the Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980 against the United States Government in cases of extra-territorial application of its export regulations for high technology products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend would be prepared to take this course where he is satisfied that it is the most effective way of safeguarding legitimate United Kingdom interests. It is however a weapon of last resort since it puts firms under directly conflicting requirements of law.

Origin Marking

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received the judgment of the European Court of Justice on the origin marking order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The European Court of Justice has now delivered its judgment that the Origin Marking Order (the Trade Descriptions (Origin Marking) (Miscellaneous Goods) Order 1981) is in breach of Article 30 of the EEC Treaty, in so far as it relates to goods imported from elsewhere in the Community. The Government will be carefully considering the judgment and its implications for the future of the Order, and will consult bodies representative of those affected as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

Helicopters

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport what measures are being taken to ensure that tests on the behaviour of helicopters when ditching in the sea (a) are based on experiments on actual aircraft rather than models in tanks and (b) take account of nautical factors and advice available from experienced maritime sources.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority, which is the responsible body, informs me that it always considers carefully the validity of tank model testing of the behaviour of a helicopter after ditching, when assessing whether that helicopter complies with British civil airworthiness requirements. The authority bases its specific nautical conditions on the internationally agreed code of the World Meteorological Organisation, and also takes account of advice from any other appropriate source.

Road Accidents

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list staffing levels for those involved in research into ways of reducing the incidence and severity of road accidents at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory in each of the past 12 years.

Mrs. Chalker: The numbers of staff at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory directly engaged in research into ways of reducing the incidence and severity of road accidents over the past 12 years were as follows:

As at 1 January	In post
1974	121
1975	104
1976	106
1977	97
1978	82
1979	78
1980	69
1981	62
1982	58
1983	55
1984	68
1985	66

Okehampton Bypass

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the annual extra cost per year in delaying the building of the Okehampton bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: The extra cost per year to users of the road is expected to be about £1·7 million per year at 1984 price levels.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the difference in cost between the southern and northern route of the Okehampton bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: The northern route put forward by petitioners and considered recently by the joint committee would cost about £5·25 million more than the Department's southern route at 1984 prices.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many acres of agricultural land would be used if the northern route was used for the Okehampton bypass as compared with the southern route.

Mrs. Chalker: About 18 acres more agricultural land would be required to construct the northern route as put forward by the petitioners.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many homes and quarries would be affected if the northern route for the Okehampton bypass were used as compared with the southern route.

Mrs. Chalker: No homes would be demolished but one quarry employing about 10 workers would be closed if the petitioners northern route were used, compared with one home, and two unoccupied cottages, to be demolished but no quarries closed on the Department's southern route.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to assist motorists and commercial transport-users while there is delay in building the Okehampton bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: A diversion to allow holiday traffic to avoid Okehampton at peak summer weekends has been in operation for several years, and we will be examining whether its use should be extended. Recent improvements to the A38 trunk road and further work both about to start and in preparation for the A30 and the A38 should assist east-west traffic movements through Devon.

Consultants

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all of the consultants employed in connection with the Transport Bill and Buses White Paper, the nature of projects for which they were employed and the cost to his Department.

Mr. Ridley: I shall reply to this question shortly.

Motor Cyclists

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will take action to ensure that motor cyclists are more visible to other road users by encouraging them to use their headlights in the day time;

(2) what estimate he has of the percentage and number of accidents involving motor cycles which are primarily due to the motor cyclist involved not being sufficiently visible to other road users.

Mr. Ridley: In 1983 there were 51,545 accidents involving motor cycles. Research by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory suggests that failure by another vehicle driver to see the motor cycle constituted a major factor in approximately a third of these accidents.

TRRL has continued to study the problem of motorcyclist conspicuity. The effectiveness of the available daytime conspicuity aids seems to vary according to such factors as ambient lighting levels and the presence and mix of the traffic. But overall, fluorescent clothing, headlamps and daytime running lamps all appear to perform equally well. So the Department has strongly encouraged motor cyclists to make themselves as conspicuous as possible by these means.

I am currently studying the recommendation by the Transport Committee that the use of headlamps or running lamps during daylight should be required by law.

Pilots (Redundancy Pay)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department plans to make any contribution towards the redundancy pay for pilots; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government propose that any scheme to compensate surplus pilots should be financed from within the shipping industry. It is the shipping industry which will benefit directly from the cost savings which will arise from a more cost-effective pilotage system and the Government see no reason why the taxpayer at large should foot the bill.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Revenue Yield

Mr. Alexander asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue was derived in 1984 from (a) road fund licences, net of the costs of collection, (b) excise duty on petrol and Derv and (c) value added tax on petrol and Derv.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information is as follows:

(a) £2,065 million;
(b) £4,660 million (petrol), £1,160 million (Derv);
(c) £930 million (this is an estimate covering all road fuel; no separate estimate is available for Derv, although this amount is likely to be small).

Personal Taxation

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the number of people taken out of tax in the year 1985-86 (a) if the single person's age allowance is raised to £2,920 and (b) if the married man's age allowance is raised to £4,650;

(2) if he will estimate the number of people taken out of tax in the year 1984-85 (a) if the single person's age allowance is raised from £2,360 to £2,655 and (b) if the married man's age allowance is raised from £3,755 to £4,240.

Mr. Moore: Estimate are as follows:

	Increase in age allowance		Reduction in number of aged taxpayers
	From £	To £ 1984-85
Single	2,360	2,655	180,000
Married	3,755	4,240	190,000
1985-86
Single	2,490	2,920	230,000
Married	3,955	4,650	260,000

Married couples are counted as one.

Covenants

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, with a view to reducing the amount of paperwork involved and the work load of Inland Revenue staff, he will take steps to simplify the processes involved in the convenant procedure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Excise Duties

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the present periods permitted for the deferred payment of excise duties on wines and spirits in Belgium, Denmark, France, Luxembourg, West Germany and the United Kingdom; and if he will explain any differences.

Mr. Hayhoe: The rules and procedures governing the payment of duty in EEC countries are complex. The following table sets out what Customs and Excise understands to be the average periods of duty deferment applying to wines and spirits.

	Wine	Spirits
Belgium	2 to 6 months according to type	4 months
Luxembourg	2 to 6 months according to type	2 to 6 months
Denmark	65 days	45 days
France	2 months	2 months
West Germany	Still wines are not taxed. Aromatic and liqueur wines 3 months. Sparkling wine 40 days.	3 months
United Kingdom	1 month	1 month

The granting of deferment and the determination of its length are matters for national Governments to decide.

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in his review of duty deferment, he will take account of the recommendations of the Food and Drink Manufacturing Economic Development Committee's report, "Scotch Whisky in the '80s"; and when he expects to complete this review.

Mr. Hayhoe: Customs and Excise is currently reviewing the arrangements for duty deferment. It hopes to complete the review by the end of 1985. It is, however, a review of administration, and the recommendations of the NEDC report are outside its scope. These recommendations were carefully considered by my right hon. Friend in his review of taxation before his last Budget, and it was decided to make no alteration to the periods of duty deferment allowed for alcoholic drinks.

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated cost of increasing the duty deferment period for wines and spirits by two weeks, four weeks and six weeks, respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: There would be a once-for-all loss of revenue in the financial year in which the change was introduced. This would be about £185 million for an additional period of deferment of either two or four weeks, because one month's payments will be deferred to the following financial year; and about £370 million for an additional six weeks, because two months' payments would be deferred to the following financial year. There would also be associated borrowing costs.

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the estimated receipts in 1984-85 and 1985-86 from duties on spirits, beer, wine, made-wine, cider and perry, respectively; and if he will explain any differences.

Mr. Hayhoe: The estimates are as follows:

	1984-85 £ million*	1985-86† £ million
Spirits	1,240	1,460
Beer	1,825	1,960
Wine	595	700
Made-wine	50	70
Cider and perry	45	60
Total	3,755	4,250

* Latest estimates.
† Forecast.

Estimates of increased receipts in 1985-86 result from the increased rates of duty announced in the Budget and forecasts of growth in the economy.

Clearance Procedure

Mr. Trotter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the light of the decision in Furniss v. Dawson, he will introduce legislation to provide a clearance procedure whereby the taxpayer may apply in advance to the Inland Revenue for a definitive statement as to the tax treatment it would apply to a proposed transaction or series of transactions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to his previous question on 27 February 1985 at column 211.

Airports (Duty-free Shops)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received advocating opening a duty-free shop at Teesside airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Representations have been received on two occasions, the most recent in 1983. Facilities were refused because the number of outward bound international passengers was below the required level.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will allow the operation of a duty-free shop at Teesside airport.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. The required level of departing international passengers has not yet been achieved.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his criteria for the operation of duty-free shops at airports.

Mr. Hayhoe: The qualification required for the establishment of a duty-free shop at an airport is 100,000 passengers departing annually for destinations abroad.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which airports in the United Kingdom operate duty-free shops.

Mr. Hayhoe: Duty-free shops have been established at Aberdeen, Belfast, Birmingham, Bristol, Cardiff, East Midlands, Edinburgh, Gatwick, Glasgow, Heathrow, Manchester, Newcastle, Prestwick, Southampton and Stansted airports.

Finance Bill

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if notes on those clauses and schedules of the Finance Bill to be taken in Committee of the whole House will be made available to hon. Members.

Mr. Peter Rees: Yes. The appropriate notes on clauses and their related schedules were placed in the Vote Office earlier today.

Review Board for Government Contracts

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the report on the first annual review by the Review Board for Government Contracts.

Mr. Peter Rees: The review board in its report on the fourth general review proposed that the triennial reviews of the target profit rate should be supplemented by limited annual reviews so that changes in the rate of return elsewhere in the economy and in other economic circumstances can be reflected more quickly in the profit rate. The review board submitted the first of these interim reviews to the Treasury in the middle of March. The two principal matters dealt with in the report are the target rate of profit for Government non-competitive contracts, and a study of the capital employed in these contracts.

The review board recommended the target rate of profit be increased from the present 11 per cent. to 13 per cent. on capital employed in semi-CCA terms, with an assumed average CP/CE ratio of 2·35 to 1.

On the question of capital employed, the board found that although there was not sufficient data to support the view that Government profit formula work generally required less capital than the contractors' other work, there were some significant divergencies in individual cases arising almost entirely from a small number of large and exceptional projects, both defence and non-defence. The board recommended that these divergencies should be addressed by negotiating more relevant units for the calculation of CP/CE ratios rather than by adjusting the target rate of return in the profit formula. Meanwhile, a transitional adjustment should be made to the average CP/CE ratio to avoid distortion by the exceptional projects referred to. Hence the observed ratio of 2·24 to 1 should be increased to 2·35 to 1.

After careful consideration, and consultation with the negotiating committee of the CBI representing contractors, the Government accept in principle the board's main recommendation as to the treatment of the divergencies in capital employed and are examining with the contractors the practicalities. Meanwhile, however, it is essential that the overstatements of capital employed identified by the board should be fully reflected in the profit formula. This can only be done at present by a full adjustment of the target rate of profit affecting both the cost-based element and the capital-based element. Accordingly, the Government have decided to set the target rate of profit at 12 per cent. on capital employed on a semi-CCA basis, accompanied by the observed average of CP/CE ratio of 2·24 to 1. These new arrangements will be implemented with effect from 1 May 1985.

Copies of the review board report have been placed in the Library.

THE ARTS

Museums and Galleries (Grants)

Mr. Buchan asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will now publish in the Official Report the allocation between the various national museums and galleries of the £28·7 million maintenance and repair grant announced on 17 December 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: The provision of £28·7 million for building and maintenance work at the national museums and galleries in 1985-86 is met from the arts and libraries public expenditure programme. Responsibility for administering and carrying out the work rests with the Property Services Agency, on whose Vote the expenditure is shown.

The planned programme for 1985-86 comprises:

	£ million
Expenditure on works already in progress	10
Expenditure on works planned for start in 1985-86	6·3
Expenditure on "bulk maintenance", fuel etc., PSA administration costs	12·4

The estimated expenditure in 1985-86 for building work borne on the PSA Vote for each of the national museums and galleries is as follows. The figures are an approximate indication of the expected levels of expenditure rather than a firm allocation of funds. They assume that both building works in hand and those planned to start in 1985-86 progress as originally envisaged. They include an element for "bulk maintenance" (minor maintenance work) but exclude spending on schemes shared between two or more museums, other current expenditure on heating, lighting, services and so on and PSA administration:

	£ million
British Museum	2·8
Imperial War Museum	1·3
National Gallery	2·6
National Maritime Museum	1·9
National Portrait Gallery	0·7
Tate Gallery	1·8
Wallace Collection	0·1
Victoria and Albert Museum	5·8
Science Museum	2·8
Total	19·8

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Suspension of Pupils

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by authority the information he has as to the number of pupils who have been suspended from school, the average length of suspension and the maximum length of suspension for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn: Detailed statistics of pupils suspended from school are not collected centrally. Such information as the Department receives on suspensions in particular schools or in individual authorities is presented in a variety of forms and not on a basis whereby consistent comparisons can be made.

Academic Attainment

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what studies have been made to compare the academic success of people from socio-economic groupings C and D post the reorganisation of secondary schools by comparison with that prior to re-organisation; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what studies have been made of success in industry and commerce by people coming from the socio-economic groupings C and D (a) since the secondary school reorganisation along comprehensive lines and (b) in the era of grammar schools, secondary modern and technical schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am not aware of any studies which specifically address these questions, although reports of studies by the National Children's Bureau and the National Council for Educational Standards have included reference to the relationships between social class, selectivity and examinations results.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research his Department is undertaking into the reasons for the nature of the correlations between the social class of parents and the educational attainment of their children.

Sir Keith Joseph: There have been a number of studies demonstrating a strong statistical relationship between examination results and home background factors. There is also evidence of varying levels of attainment amongst children from similar home backgrounds. I announced last November, at columns 698-99, that I was willing to consider research proposals designed to explore those factors within the responsibility of the education service which affect educational attainment. It would be necessary to take into account significant factors such as social class which are external to the education service. The Department is currently considering proposals made in response to my statement.

Private Sector

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps his Department has taken in the past year in transferring responsibilities for education from the public to the private sector.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government recognise the important role played by the independent schools in enriching and increasing the diversity of the schools system. This was recently confirmed in chapter 12 of the White Paper "Better Scools" (Cmnd. 9469). The Department continues to support the assisted places scheme, whose purpose is to increase parental choice.

The Department and others have been working with the Department of the Environment on proposals for the contracting out of local authority services, including school meals, cleaning of buildings and ground maintenance. A consultative document has been issued and it is intended to introduce legislation in the next Session which will require local authorities to put these services out to tender.

Further Education

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is now able to publish the percentage of 16 and 17-years-olds who remained in full-time education in schools or further education colleges in September 1984 for England and for each local education authority area; and how this compares with each of the previous five years.

Sir Keith Joseph: The proportions of the population aged 16 and 17 years remaining in full-time education in schools and colleges in England for the academic years 1979-80 to 1984-85 are as follows:

	Percentage of population aged 16 or 17 in full-time education
	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85 (provisional)
Aged 16	42	43	48	50	47	48
Aged 17	27	28	30	32	32	31

Comparable information for each local authority for the 1984-85 academic year will not be available until early autumn. As soon as these data become available they will be placed in the Library together with comparable figures for the earlier years.

Royal College of Art

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will withhold funding from the Royal College of Art pending an inquiry into its proposals to close down the environmental media studies course.

Mr. Brooke: No.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many other institutions offer a course comparable to the environmental media studies course at the Royal College of Art leading to an MA degree; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that there are no comparable courses in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has had any communications with the Royal College of Art over the proposed closure of the environmental media studies course.

Mr. Brooke: I met representatives of the Royal College of Art, including the rector, very shortly after the college had formally decided to undertake a major restructuring of its faculties, part of which involved the closure of the department of environmental media. They explained to me the reasons for the restructuring.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had from students from the Royal College of Art over the proposed closure of the environmental media studies course.

Mr. Brooke: We have received four letters in all: three from hon. Members writing on behalf of their constituents who are students at the college, and one signed by a number of the students themselves.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will seek an assurance from the rector of the Royal College of Art, Mr. Jocelyn Stevens, that the number and quality of the fine art courses and the number of students taking fine art courses will be maintained or enhanced when the existing professors of painting and sculpture retire.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend does not determine the provision of courses at the Royal College of Art. However, he has appointed a visiting committee to advise him on questions relating to the development of the college and their financial implications. The next report of the committee will be submitted in the summer and is expected to comment on the college's plans for its various departments. In advance of the committee's advice, it would be inappropriate for me to express a view about the future balance of work within the college.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will withhold funds from the Royal College of Art pending an inquiry into whether Mr. Jocelyn Stevens is conducting the college (a) in accordance with its articles of government and (b) in accordance with appropriate academic standards.

Mr. Brooke: No. The Royal College of Art is a self-governing institution within the terms of its Royal Charter.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will withhold funding from the Royal College of Art pending an inquiry into complaints about the conduct of the rector, Mr. Jocelyn Stevens.

Mr. Brooke: No.

Deaf and Blind School Leavers

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many deaf and blind school leavers there were in each of the past two years; and what facilities were available for their further education.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information about school leavers is not available. Where further education is appropriate, local education authorities may provide for young people with visual and hearing handicaps in thier own colleges; alternatively they may support their attendance at an independent institution offering specialist residential provision for these groups, often involving attendance at mainstream courses run by nearby local education authority colleges.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

United Kingdom-Iran (Diplomatic Representation)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the outcome of the continuing discussions regarding United Kingdom diplomatic representation in Tehran and Iranian representation in London; and why Iran is still permitted to maintain an embassy in London while the United Kingdom is represented through the Royal Swedish embassy in Tehran.

Mr. Renton: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) gave him on 19 July 1984, at column 315. The discussions on the respective representation of the United Kingdom and Iran in London and Tehran continue, but there are no plans at present to modify the level of Iranian diplomatic representation in London.

Foreign Diplomats

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will name the country of origin of any middle eastern dipomats who have been required to leave the United Kingdom or whom the police have arrested but not charged because of diplomatic immunity, for alleged serious criminal offences during the current year; and whether the heads of mission of the states in question were requested to insist upon acceptable standards of diplomatic behaviour from their staff in future.

Mr. Renton: The answer to the first part of the question is no. It would be inappropriate to name the country of origin or regional group of the alleged offenders, since their guilt has not been established in court.

All heads of mission were made aware last year that we would in future expect and apply more stringent standards in respect of behaviour by the staffs of diplomatic missions. Specific guidance on this has now been issued to all diplomatic missions, as indicated in paragraph 68 of the Government report on "Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges" published on 23 April.

Iranian Embassy

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Iranian embassy sought any permission to display controversial political banners similar to the incident in the summer of 1983; and whether it has been made clear by his Department that no such banners will be acceptable to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Luce: No such permission has been sought from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

The Iranian embassy is aware that the display of controversial political banners on its building is unacceptable to us.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is available to him regarding the countries which are currently fishing off the Falklands; and what is the value of the fish caught.

Mr. Renton: Vessels entering the Falkland Islands protection zone are observed by Her Majesty's forces in the course of their routine patrolling and it is possible to identify those involved in fishing. Some information is also available to us from other sources, such as commercial enterprises and conservation bodies. It is not possible to put an accurate value on the catch, even if its precise size were known, because of fluctuating demand and price.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the total and employed population, respectively, of the Falkland Islands at the latest available date, distinguishing in each case between permanent and temporary residents and workers.

Mr. Renton: I am consulting the Civil Commissioner and will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth affairs if he will give the total amount of money spent by Her Majesty's Government on jobs, services and investment in the Falkland Islands over the past year.

Mr. Renton: It is not possible to give a disaggregated figure for expenditure by Her Majesty's Government on jobs, services and investment in the Falkland Islands in the financial year ending 31 March 1985. But it is estimated that a total sum of £6·5 million was spent on rehabilitation and development. In addition, £143 million was spent by the Property Services Agency on defence works services.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Council of Ministers

Mr. Needham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mr. Rifkind: The usual written forecast was deposited in the House earlier today (30 April). At present, nine meetings of the Council of Ministers are planned for May.

The Agriculture Council is expected to meet on 2—5 May to continue discussion of the Commission's price proposals for 1985. Further meetings are scheduled for 13—15 May and, possibly, 20—21 May.

The Internal Market Council is due to meet on 7 May to discuss the draft directives on the co-ordination of laws relating to self employed commercial agents; the rights of establishment of architects; the mutual recognition of qualifications and rights of establishment of pharmacists; and the easing of controls and formalities applicable to nationals of the member states when crossing intra-Community borders. There will be further discussion of the European standards initiative, especially in relation to technological harmonisation and standards. The Council will also consider the draft regulation to establish a European Economic interest grouping and the draft regulation laying down certain measures for the standardisation and simplification of the statistics of trade between member states. The Economic and Finance Council will meet on 13 May to discuss the implementation of budget discipline for the 1986 budgetary procedures; and a progress report on the proposed directive concerning the harmonisation of laws, regulations and administrative provisions in connection with Unit trusts. The Council may also consider proposals for harmonisation of the structure of duties on alcoholic drinks; and a compromise proposal for tax reliefs for travellers, for small private consignments and for fuel in tanks of commercial vehicles.

A Consumer Affairs Council is expected to meet on 14 May. It is likely to discuss product liability; proposals for a Community information system on accidents involving consumer products, for a directive on consumer credit, and for a directive on consumer protection in connection with doorstep selling; and proposed amendments to directives on consumer protection in respect of unit price marking.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 20—21May. The agenda may include the Community's policy towards its Mediterranean partners after enlargement in the light of the Council's declaration of 30 March 1985; and the Commission's negotiating mandate for an EC—Central America co-operation agreement.

The Transport Council is due to meet on 23 May to discuss strategy for achieving a common transport policy; proposals on drivers hours and proposed transport infra-structure support.

The Co-operation and Development Council is expected to meet on 23 May to discuss the Community's response to the famine in Africa, including the long-term prevention of famine; a study on the cost effectiveness of Community food aid; and development projects to prevent specific problems, such as desertification. The Council may also consider the role of women in development; and preparations for the June ministerial meeting between the Community and the African Caribbean and Pacific states.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Herons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of herons; and if the number is declining.

Mr. Chris Patten: Approximately 1,300 at the time of the last census in 1977. Counts at a small number of heronries since then indicate that the number has increased.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made on the plan to increase the size of the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our aim is to complete the planned expansion of the community programme to 230,000 filled places by the end of May 1986. The Manpower Services Commission has been asked for its views on the best means to distribute available places and will be making a considered response as soon as possible. In the meantime, I have agreed with the Manpower Services Commission that it should seek to achieve by the end of December 1985 the following level of places:

Region	Target for December 1985
London	13,500
South East	15,700
South West	11,170
Midlands	32,640
Wales	12,610
North West	30,200
Scotland	24,880
Northern	18,000
Yorkshire and Humberside	21,300
	180,000

Trade Unions (Membership)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the proportion of the working population in membership of a trade union (a) in the public sector and (b) in the private sector.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Trade unions do not report the industrial classification of their membership to my Department. The available information, including a broad industrial breakdown, was given on pages 28-30 of the January 1985 issue of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment, what is the current level of unemployment in absolute terms and as a percentage of those available for work.

Mr. Alan Clark: At 14 March 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,267,592, representing an unemployment rate of 13·5 per cent.

Travel-to-Work Areas

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment what studies his Department has carried out with regard to the travel-to-work areas into the possibility of a causal link between unemployment and length of journey to work.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department has carried out no studies into the relationship between the length of journeys to work in a travel-to-work area and the area's unemployment rate.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) in drawing up the travel-to-work areas, what consideration was given to the correlation between type of employment or location of residence and the level of unemployment in particular socio-economic groups;

(2) how the direction of the hypothetical travel patterns of the unemployed in travel-to-work areas were determined by his Department;

(3) in drawing up the travel-to-work areas, what consideration was given to the posibility that if jobs became available at a distance those currently employed would, in apparent contrast to others in their socio-economic groups, travel to them.

Mr. Alan Clark: As is explained in the supplement published with the September 1984 edition of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library, the review of travel-to-work areas was based on analysis of the travel-to-work patterns observed in the 1981 Census of Population. The hypothetical travel patterns for the unemployed, which were incorporated into the analysis, were arrived at by assuming that the unemployed residents of a particular ward would have the same travel patterns as employed people of the same socio-economic group living in the same ward. Apart from this no account was taken of correlation between type of employment of location of residence and the level of unemployment in particular socio-economic groups, or of the possible effect on journey patterns (of the currently employed or unemployed) of new jobs possibly becoming available at any particular location.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment with regard to the travel-to-work areas, what is his Department's definition of socio-economic group.

Mr. Alan Clark: The socio-economic groups are defined in appendix B2 of the Classification of Occupations 1980, a copy of which is in the Library. The review of travel-to-work areas used 18 groups including the subdivision of group 5 defined in the classification.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment, with regard to travel-to-work areas, what was the value of the calculations of the measure commuting links formula for (a) Silloth ward and the wards 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 13 of Carlisle proto travel-to-work area, (b) Silloth ward and the Aspatria-Ellen wards of Allerdale proto travel-to-work area, (c) Silloth ward and the Castle-Dalton-Netherhall-Northside-St. Michael's-Stainburn-Westfield wards of Allerdale proto travel-to-work area, (d) Waver Ward and the Wampool-Wigton wards of Allerdale proto travel-to-work area, (e) Waver ward and the Aspatria-Ellen wards of Allerdale proto travel-to-work and (f) Waver ward and the Castle-Dalton-Netherhall-Northside-St. Michael's-Stainburn-Westfield ward of Allerdale proto travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: The commuting links requested are as follows:

Silloth ward and:—
- (a) Wards 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 13 of Carlisle district: 0·00702
- (b) Aspatria and Ellen wards: 0·00009
- (c) Castle, Dalton, Netherhall, Northside, St. Michael's Stainburn and Westfield wards: 0·00010

Waver ward and:—
- (d) Wampool and Wigton wards: 0·00014
- (e) Aspatria and Ellen wards: 0·00006
- (f) Castle, Dalton, Netherhall, St. Michael's Stainburn and Westfield wards: 0·0

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment what studies his Department has conducted with regard to travel-to-work areas, into the possibility of a causal link between length of journey to work and socio-economic groups.

Mr. Alan Clark: Table 4 of the workplace and transport-to-work volume of the 1981 Census of Population, a copy of which is in the Library, shows that members of certain socio-economic groups tend to travel further to work than members of other groups. The Manpower Services Commission has commissioned the centre for urban and regional development studies at Newcastle university to investigate the travel-to-work patterns of specific subgroups of the population, including some particular socio-economic groups.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment, in preparing the travel-to-work areas, in what ways the availability of public transport was considered.

Mr. Alan Clark: The review of travel-to-work areas was based on analysis of the travel-to-work patterns observed in the 1981 Census of Population; these patterns reflect, amongst other things, the availability and use of public transport for journeys to work.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment to what factors he attributes the low percentage of young people of Asian and West Indian origin in Manpower Services Commission mode A schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: A number of different factors have been identified in research undertaken by the University of Bristol's school of advanced urban studies and by the Commission for Racial Equality which may account for a relatively low percentage of Asian and West Indian young people entering mode A of the youth training scheme. In order to ensure that its policy of equal opportunities is fully implemented the Manpower Services Commission has drawn upon the recommendations of the University of Bristol and the Commission for Racial Equality.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his reply of 2 April, Official Report, columns 534-36, if he will publish the sources of the information given in table 2 (Destination of youth opportunity programme and youth training scheme trainees); if he will list as a percentage of the total number of people who have been on youth training schemes or youth opportunity programmes for each of the last five years the numbers of people who found work on completion of training schemes; if he will provide information on a regional basis about post youth training scheme employment rates; if the statistics of post youth training scheme employment are based on the response of ex-trainees; what steps he takes to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the information provided; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985, c. 43-44]: Information on the proportion of trainees finding employment following their youth opportunity programme or youth training scheme was given in table 2 of my earlier reply of 2 April at columns 534-36. The quarterly figures relating to the youth opportunities programme are derived from postal follow-up surveys of trainees, conducted 12 months after they joined the programme. Information on the youth training scheme comes from a regular monthly postal follow-up survey. A questionnaire is sent to 15 per cent. of ex-trainees some three months after they leave the scheme. The current survey has been carefully developed by the Manpower Services Commission through pilot work and is producing a consistent response rate of around 65 per cent. I am confident that the survey is providing the most reliable picture of what is happening to young people in the country as a whole after they leave the youth training scheme. However, I do accept that there will be marked regional variations. Information on a regional basis will be available by the end of May.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of persons in work who have net incomes per week of less than (a) £70, (b) £100, (c) £120, (d) £150, (e) £200, and (f) over £200; and if he will state in each case what percentage of the total work force these numbers represent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest information on the distribution of the net incomes of employed persons relates to the family expenditure survey for 1982. The table shows the cumulative percentages of those in full time employment with net incomes (gross personal income less tax and national income) below various amounts, and the cumulative percentages of the working population that these numbers represent:

70	25	15
100	56	33
120	73	43

Net incomes below £*	Percentage of persons	Proportion of the working population†
150	87	52
200	96	57
200 and over*	4	2

* Gross income attributable to the person, both from employment or from other sources, net of national insurance and tax. This will differ from household income to the extent that full-time employees within the household are counted as separate persons, income from part-time employment is not covered and some household income, for example, child benefit may be attributed to a household member not in full-time employment.

† The proportion of persons in the survey who were full-time or part-time employees, self-employed, temporarily absent from work or out of a job. In 1982 the composition of the working population from the family expenditure survey was:

	Per cent.
Full-time employees	59
Part-time employees	20
Self employed	7
Employees temporarily absent	2
Out of a job	12
	100

Source: Family Expenditure Survey 1982.

Later information on the distribution of gross income from employment is available from table 1 of New Earnings Survey 1984, a copy of which is in the Library.

Wages Councils

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received on the future of the wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations on the future of the wages councils systems.

Newspaper Industry (Disputes)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the number of days lost through industrial action in 1984 and to date in 1985 in the newspaper industry; and how these figures compare with each of the past five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is as follows:

Working days lost in the newspaper industry

	Numbers
1979	640,000
1980	128,000
1981	13,000
1982	15,000
1983	30,000
1984	*27,000
†1985	*21,000

* Provisional estimate.
† January to March.

Mr. Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail in the Official Report all stoppages as a result of industrial disputes, and the national papers concerned, as notified to his Department during 1984 and to date in 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following stoppages as a result of industrial disputes involving national newspapers have been recorded.

Industrial Air Pollution Inspectors

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many industrial air pollution inspectors, formerly alkali inspectors, were in post in each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures are:

Number of industrial air pollution (formerly alkali) inspectors in post at 1 January

	Number
1979	46
1980	48
1981	47
1982	46

Training Programmes (Statistics)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of (a) able-bodied and (b) disabled people completing training opportunities programmes gained employment within three months of completing their course in 1983-84.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The results of the follow-up surveys of those who completed occupational courses under the training opportunities scheme in 1983-84 indicate that about 60 per cent. of ex-trainees were in employment three months after the end of the course. I regret that separate figures for able-bodied and disabled ex-trainees are not available.

Wages Inspectorate

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish, by region and sub-region, the latest breakdown of Wages Inspectorate staff, showing separately those who are outdoor inspectors, on an establishment and in post basis, and if he will also publish comparable figures for April 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 782-84]: I regret that two errors appeared when my previous reply was printed in the Official Report.

In the table at column 784, headed "Wages Inspectorate Staff", the figure for Midlands (W) under the heading

"January 1985 staff in post" should have been printed at 6½ and not 7½. The figure for Northern, under the heading "September 1979—Staff-in-post", should be 6 and not 6½.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish estimates for 1984 on (a) establishments covered by wages councils, (b) numbers of inspections and underpayments, (c) numbers of workers covered, together with figures on underpayment and arrears assessed and (d) a regional breakdown of wages council inquiries, in the same format as that used in the reply given on 4 June 1984, Official Report, columns 103-4, together with a breakdown of arrears assessed and arrears actually paid by wages council and region; and whether he will also indicate the number and regional location of cases of unerpayment where the employer was prosecuted, and where civil proceedings were taken to recover arrears of wages.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 784-90]: I regret that a number of errors appeared when my previous reply was printed in the Official Report.

At column 786, in the second table, the figure for retail bespoke tailoring, under the heading Scotland (East), should be 20 and not blank. The figure for licensed residential establishment and licensed restaurant, under the same heading, should be 2,434 and not 2,515. The figure for unlicensed place of refreshment, again under the same heading, should be 782 and not 282.

At column 788, in the third table, the figure for London East, under the heading establishments visited, should

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Leaflet)

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the arrangements for distribution of the recent leaflet on the National Health Service based on the annual report on the Health Service in England and published by his Department; and how individuals and organisations may obtain copies.

Mr. John Patten: Local distribution of copies of the leaflet within the Health Service was arranged by health authorities. Individuals and organisations may obtain copies free of charge from:

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many additional people are receiving supplementary benefit as a result of the real increase in scale rates since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information requested by the hon. Member could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Solvent Abuse

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has commissioned any special studies into the nature of solvent abuse and the treatment and rehabilitation of those mis-using solvents.

Mr. John Patten: We are funding three studies into solvent misuse. One project being carried out under the direction of Professor R. H. Anderson of the department of clinical epidemiology and social medicine, St. George's hospital medical school, is investigating the effects of various teenage activities, including solvent misuse, on their health and educational performance. We are also funding a data-collecting exercise to ascertain the numbers and causes of deaths from solvent misuse in the United Kingdom. Another small-scale exercise is being carried out by Ms. B. Levey at the Brighton drug dependency unit. Its purpose is to locate and describe the local population of substance misusers and to estimate the prevalence of misuse.

Community Care

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to publish a White Paper in response to the Second Report of the Social Services Committee, Session 1984-85, on community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are still considering our response. The aim is to publish the response in May.

Charter for Children in Hospital

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he is making to the "Charter for Children in Hospital" produced by the National Association for the Welfare of Children in Hospital, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We welcome this charter which reflects very well the principles underlying longstanding policies on the care of children in hospital. We recognise the considerable efforts the National Association for the Welfare Children in Hospital has put into agreeing the terms of the charter with the different professional groups concerned. We believe the charter will assist parents and staff to keep the best interests of children foremost in their minds.

Domestic Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people died from burns as a result of home accidents in the United Kingdom during 1984.

Mr. John Patten: Information for the United Kingdom is not available in the exact form requested. However, the provisional number of deaths from accidents in the home caused by fire and flames (ICD(9) E890-E899), by explosive material (ICD(9)E923) and by hot substance or object, caustic or corrosive material and steam (ICD(9)E924) in the United Kingdom during 1984 is 850.

Family Holiday Association (Exhibition)

Mr. Peter Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the Family Holiday Association to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Newton: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 7 to 10 May 1985.

Family Income Supplement

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of people in the county of Cheshire who are in receipt of family income supplement whilst in full-time employment in the Civil Service; and what Departments they are at present employed in.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information is not available. Family income supplement claims are dealt with by one centre at Blackpool; no information is maintained about claims from particular local areas and civil servants are included for statistical purposes in a broad occupational group which includes clerical and office workers, administrators, social, professional and technical workers.

Deaf Blind People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people identified as being deaf and blind have additional disabilities; and if he will list the resources and special facilities provided to meet their needs;

(2) how many deaf and blind children there are of school age.

Mr. Newton: Information is not centrally available in the form requested. However, the Department's publication "Registered Blind and Partially Sighted Persons at 31 March 1982 (England)" contains information by age band, on people registered blind with additional handicap, including hearing impairments. A copy is in the Library.

The provision of services for disabled people is primarily a responsibility of health and local authorities. The Department does not routinely collect specific information about resources and facilities provided for particular client groups such as those who are deaf-blind.

The work of voluntary organisations with deaf-blind people is of particular importance, and last year the Department gave grants totalling £35,754 towards voluntary activities in this field.

Mental Handicap Registers

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many and which health authorities have instituted, or are planning, mental handicap registers; and what guidelines are provided for their design, scope and function.

Mr. John Patten: The Department does not collect information on the number of mental handicap registers. However, the replies to a letter sent to authorities in 1983 as part of an Economic and Social Research Council funded survey of registers showed that 54 health authorities (and 44 social services departments) in England and Wales had registers and a further 96 health authorities (and 45 social services departments) were involved in planning them.* The Department has not issued guidelines on the design, scope or function of registers and has taken the view that these are matters for local decision. On its visits to individual authorities the National Development Team for Mentally Handicapped People encourages the establishment and proper maintenance of registers and, if appropriate, includes advice on these matters in its reports to authorities. We are considering the recommendation in the recently published report of the Social Services Committee on community care with special reference to adult mentally ill and mentally handicapped people that local and health authorities should be encouraged by the Department to develop together appropriate registers of mentally disabled people.

* Report of a National Survey of Registers of Mentally Handicapped People, by J. E. Cubbon and N. A. Malin, published April 1985 and available from Sheffield City Polytechnic.

Child Benefit

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many updated child benefit books in Dundee, East and West areas have still to be issued by the child benefit centre following the recent industrial action.

Mr. Whitney: There is no record of the geographical distribution of beneficiaries awaiting replacement child benefit order books. The issue of replacement books is rapidly returning to normal after the recent industrial action.

Life Expectancy

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current average life expectancy at birth for women and men in (a) Mid Glamorgan, (b) Wales and (c) England.

Mr. John Patten: The most recent available estimates of the expectation of life for England and Wales separately are based on mortality data for 1977 and are as follows:

Expectation of Life at Birth

	Males	Females
England	70·0	76·0
Wales	69·0	74·9

Separate figures for Mid Glamorgan are not available. More recent estimates for England and Wales separately are due to be calculated later this year.

Mortality Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people on average have died (a) before the age of 60 years and (b) at 60 years and above of chest-related illnesses in: (i) England and (ii) Wales, in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Pattern: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Drug Testing

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to issue the revised guidance from the Royal College of Physicians and the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industries relating to the testing of drugs on healthy volunteers; how often the working group on this matter has met; from whom it sought evidence; and what was the representation of each body on the working group.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Royal College of Physicians set up a working party on medical research on healthy volunteers in 1984. I am informed by the college that it hopes to publish the working party's report as guidance to the profession in the autumn. I understand that the working party has meet nine times so far and has taken written evidence from many sources as well as oral evidence from professors of clinical pharmacology and toxicology and from representatives of the pharmaceutical industry; clinical research units; the Trades Union Congress; the Faculty of Occupational Medicine; the National Union of Students; the Health and Safety Executive; and our Department's medicines division. The working party is chaired by Sir Raymond Hoffenberg, President of the Royal College of Physicians. It consists of members and fellows of the Royal College, including a representative of the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industry; a lawyer; the Chairman of the Patients' Association; and an observer representing the Medical Research Council. When the revised professional guidance is available, we shall consider carefully, in the light of advice from the Medicines Commission on it, what our attitude should be.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to the number of deaths or serious side-effects that have occurred in each of the last five years amongst healthy volunteers taking part in the testing of drugs by the pharmaceutical industry;

(2) what information he has as to the number of healthy volunteers in each of the last five years who have taken part in the testing of new drugs by the pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent his Department's guidelines on drug testing require pharmaceutical companies to test drugs on animals before tests using healthy human volunteers are conducted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our Department's guidelines on drug testing apply only to medicines for patients and not to tests on healthy human volunteers.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek powers to require drug companies testing new drugs on healthy volunteers to report adverse reactions to his Department; and if he will take steps to ensure that these reactions and those suffered by patients taking part in clinical trials are included in the register of adverse reactions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have nothing to add to my replies to the right hon. Member on 12 June and 26 June 1984 at columns 416 and 462.

Heart Disease

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people die of heart disease in (a) Wales and (b) England per 1,000 population.

Mr. John Patten: The information is shown in the table.

Crude mortality rate per 1,000 population all ages for heart disease (ICD (9th rev.) 393-429) for (a) Wales (b) England, males and females 1984

	Rate
	Males	Females
Wales	4·56	3·64
England	4·08	3·40

Health Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the ratio of (a) hospital beds and (b) qualified nurses per head of population in (i) Wales and (ii) England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1983, the latest year for which information is available, there were on average 7·3 beds available daily in National Health Service hospitals per thousand population in England and 8 in Wales. On 30 September 1983 there were 4·77 qualified nursing and midwifery staff (excluding agency staff) whole-time equivalent per thousand population in England and 5·35 in Wales.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Oakes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the cost of computerising the cervical cancer smear test scheme for the whole of the United Kingdom;

(2) how many and which area health authorities have proposed to install computerised cervical cancer smear test scheme; and how many and in which areas such schemes have been approved.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 15 April 1985, c. 89]: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State are responsible for cervical cancer screening in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

In England, district health authorities are responsible for cervical cancer screening programmes. These can be carried out in a number of ways, with or without a computer, and we hold central records only of the number of family practitioner committees using computers for cervical cytology recall or call as an agency arrangement for district health authorities. The following 37 FPCs—corresponding in area to 79 district health authorities—are known to be using computers for this purpose now or to have firm plans to do so. Other district health authorities may be using computers based at laboratories for recall schemes.

The cost of installing computers and record conversion to operate cervical cytology recall and call in all remaining FPCs in England would be around £4 million. This figure does not include operational costs, including the costs of taking cervical smears, examining them and follow-up action. I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 29 April for the action we are asking district health authorities to take on cervical screening.

Social Workers

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what consultations he is having with local authorities and the Central Counil for Education and Training in Social Work concerning proposals to revise the system of training and assessment of approved social workers as defined by the Mental Health Act 1983;

(2) if he will undertake to provide additional funds for any extra training or assessment costs falling upon local authorities or the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work arising from the revised system of training approved social workers which takes account of problems resulting from the current industrial action;

(3) what is his estimate of the expenditure incurred by local authorities in training approved social workers under the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 April 1985 c. 162]: While we are not currently consulting on proposals to revise the training and assessment of approved social workers (ASWs), we are keeping in close touch with the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW) and the local authority associations on the recommendations made in the joint working party's report last year. We hope that the integrated training and assessment system recommended in that report will be implemented successfully.

We do not collect information centrally on which to base an estimate of local authorities' expenditure on the training of ASWs. This training is part of authorities' normal programmes which have always been adjusted to cover detailed changes in services. The 1983 Act did not represent new duties for LAs, and authorities that were meeting properly their responsibilities under the previous legislation need not have incurred any significant increase in their costs. Any net additional expenditure would in any case have been covered by the provision in the 1983-84 rate support grant settlement to reflect new initiatives and pressures on the personal social services.

We have already increased the CCETSW budget in recent years because of the additional work load created by the ASW provisions. The increase allowed for spending of up to £200,000 in 1983-84, and £300,000 in each of 1984-85 and 1985-86. We shall continue to make any necessary additional financial support available to the council during the introduction of the new training arrangements.

Health and Personal Social Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for England" was not published in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1983 or 1984 and if there are any plans to publish it in 1985 or subsequent years.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 25 April 1985 c. 557]: The 1978 edition of "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for England" was published in 1980. Subsequently, the publication was put on an ad hoc, rather than annual, basis and a volume was published in 1982. The possibility of further publications in this series is under consideration. The formal volumes of statistics produced by the Department have recently been complemented by the introduction of "Statistical Bulletins," four of which have been published to date. These allow a particular topic area to be covered in greater depth than is practicable in a volume of statistics such as "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics".

DEFENCE

Falkland Islands

14. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate available to him for the cost of the Falklands operations to be met by his Department for 1985-86 and 1986-87, respectively.

Mr. Stanley: Our latest estimate of costs is in line with the provision of £552 million and £450 million respectively, which was announced in "The Government's Expenditure Plans for 1985-86 to 1987-88" — (Cmnd. 9428).

27. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long the Falklands airport took to build; at what cost to his Department's budget; what will be its principal military functions; and if he will make a statement.

42. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the most recent increase in the cost to his Department of Mount Pleasant airfield.

Mr. Stanley: Construction of the Mount Pleasant airport and associated facilities began on 31 December 1983, six months after the instruction to proceed was given to the contractors. The main runway has now been completed and we will start to make limited use of it in May. The remaining airport facilities will be ready for use by about February 1986. The further construction work at Mount Pleasant, which consists largely of facilities for the Army, should be complete in early 1987.

I am advised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment that the latest cost for the airport is £276 million and that for the facilities for the Army at Mount Pleasant is £119 million.

The principal military functions of the airport will be to provide a base from which air defence and reconnaissance aircraft can operate as well as wide-bodied transport aircraft required for the rotation of the garrison, and, in emergency, for rapid reinforcement.

Greenham Common

16. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints he has received about American military personnel handcuffing British citizens at Greenham common.

Mr. Stanley: I am not aware of any such formal complaints having been received by my Department.

19. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the amenities provided for British forces guarding the base at Greenham Common.

Mr. Stanley: The conditions and amenities for the personnel at RAF Greenham Common are generally satisfactory. Personnel permanently stationed there are accommodated in quarters of the normal standard and have access to many of the US amenities on the base, including sports and recreational facilities. Those on short-term postings are housed in temporary accommodation of a reasonable standard. They have a range of amenities available to them as well as access to certain of the US facilities such as the gymnasium.

Indonesia

17. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on Government policy regarding arms sales to Indonesia.

Mr. Lee: It has always been, and will remain, the Government's policy to exercise strict control over the sale of arms. Each potential sale is considered on its merits on a case by case basis. Any proposals to sell defence equipment to Indonesia, as with any other country, are subject to detailed examination before an export licence is granted.

Cruise Missiles

20. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the security of cruise missile convoys when on exercise.

Mr. Stanley: Yes, but security precautions always remain under review.

30. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the security of ground-launched cruise missile bases.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) earlier today.

43. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on liaison between his Department and the police in relation to military exercises involving cruise missile convoys.

Mr. Stanley: There is a close and regular liaison between my Department and the police on such matters.

Strategic Defence Initiative

21. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the implications of the strategic defence initiative for the deterrence theory on Her Majesty's Government's policy of deterrence.

24. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence what implications the strategic defence initiative has for the Government's reliance on the theory of deterrence.

Mr. Heseltine: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear in the statement issued after her meeting with President Reagan on 22 December 1984, the overall aim of the strategic defence initiative is to enhance deterrence, the maintenance of which is central to the security of NATO.

26. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be able to announce whether the United Kingdom intends to devote resources to research on a strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Mon (Mr. Best) on 5 March 1985.

29. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in considering his response to the invitation by the United States Government of participation by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries in the research programme for the strategic defence initiative, he will propose examination of the percentage of missiles destroyed which would be satisfactory.

Mr. Heseltine: This is a question for consideration in the longer term. The United States initiative relates to participation in a research programme only.

33. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what implications the strategic defence initiative has for the Trident programme.

44. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the strategic defence initiative will affect the Trident programme.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes).

35. Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's present policy on the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Heseltine: The Government's policy on the United States strategic defence initiative was set out in the statement issued by the Prime Minister following her meeting with President Reagan on 22 December 1984.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with other European Governments about participating in the United States strategic defence initiative research programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The Government are now considering a response to the invitation from the United States Secretary of Defence to indicate areas of research within the SDI programme in which the United Kingdom would be interested in participating. We are naturally in close touch with all our allies on all aspects of this important subject. Most recently, the subject was discussed at the WEU ministerial meeting in Bonn. A copy of the communiqué from that meeting is in the Library of House.

Nuclear Warheads

22. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average safe shelf life of British nuclear warheads.

Mr. Butler: British nuclear warheads are designed to be safe and serviceable. Their planned withdrawal from service for inspection and periodic maintenance ensures that this aim is met.

Privatisation

23. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current estimated savings by his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Mr. Butler: No private capital has been introduced during the year into any organisation which is the responsibility of my Department. However, the royal ordnance factories were established as a public limited company from the beginning of this year and privatisation is planned to take place in due course; the options for the royal dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth are still under consideration, as was announced in the House on 17 April.

Advertising and Recruiting Costs

25. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are, and if he is satisfied with, the proportions of the costs of his Department relating to tri-service and individual service advertising and recruiting.

Mr. Lee: Recruiting costs, including advertising, are financed on a single service basis. However expenditure on service recruiting for the financial year 1983-84 totalled £44·6 million at outturn prices. Advertising and publicity costs made up some £9 million of this total, or about 20 per cent. of the recruiting budget. Estimated total expenditure on recruiting for financial year 1984-85 at outturn prices is £48·5 million, of which about £12·6 million was spent on advertising and publicity or 26 per cent. of the recruiting budget.

Tornado Aircraft

28. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about future orders for Tornado.

Mr. Butler: My Department is currently considering the number and timing of any further orders and a decision should be taken in the next few months. There are a number of export prospects and the Government will continue to support the efforts of British Aerospace in pursuing these.

Royal Navy

31. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied that his current replacement and new ordering programme is large enough to ensure that the Royal Navy has a minimum of 50 frigates and destroyers in the front line, as envisaged in the 1984 White Paper (Cmnd. 9227).

Mr. Lee: I can confirm that ordering arrangements for new ships will be related to the Government's aim to maintain a force level of about 50 front line destroyers and frigates in the longer term as stated in Cmnd. 9227.

Ulster Defence Regiment

32. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about discipline and morale in the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Stanley: The same high standards of discipline are set in the Ulster Defence Regiment as in any other regiment of the British Army. The morale of the Ulster Defence Regiment is high.

RAF Upper Heyford (Noise Tests)

34. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make sufficient staff time available to enable the Royal Air Force Institute of Community Medicine to publish as quickly as possible the results of the recent noise tests at RAF Upper Heyford.

Mr. Lee: Yes.

Wessex and Puma Helicopters

36. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will award the contract for the replacement of the Royal Air Force Wessex and Puma helicopters, air staff target 404.

Mr. Butler: As I said in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 26 March 1985 at column 207, the Army's requirement for a light support helicopter is being reviewed, and decisions on AST 404 will remain in abeyance until the review is complete.

Overseas Allowances

37. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement concerning cuts in service allowances for personnel serving overseas;

(2) if he will make a statement concerning cuts in the living allowance for overseas service men.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) earlier today.

Nuclear Weapons

38. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence why information about the numbers of nuclear weapons held by Britain is not published.

Mr. Stanley: Some information about the nuclear capabilities of British defence forces is published. For example, I refer the hon. Member to chapter 4 (paragraphs 402-406) of the 1984 Statement on the Defence Estimates. However, successive Governments have declined, for reasons of security, to give details of numbers of warheads.

Falkland Islands (Air Service Contract)

39. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether British Airways has now been awarded the contract for conveying service personnel to the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot at present add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 17 April at columns 211-12.

Defence Equipment

40. Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy for ensuring better control of stocks of defence equipment held by his Department and of contracts for the supply of new and replacement stocks.

Mr. Lee: My Department has in hand a comprehensive appraisal of the levels and methods by which stockholdings are determined and various improvements, to an already very carefully controlled area, have been recommended. These improvements will involve refinements to costing techniques using through-life costing principles, refinement of ADP systems, increased use of direct supply, further rationalisation and the introduction of executive responsibility budgets.

RAF Molesworth

41. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many people have been arrested by military police for damaging the fence surrounding RAF Molesworth.

Mr. Stanley: Up to midnight on 18/19 April, 106 people had been arrested by the Ministry of Defence police at RAF Molesworth for criminal damage. Of those arrested, 81 have so far been charged; all of these charges are in respect of damage to the perimeter fence.

Arms Manufacturers

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning his recent discussions with arms manufacturers in Europe.

Mr Butler: Apart from his regular and continuing discussions with British industry, my right hon. Friend's only recent discussions with representatives of European defence industries have been with Dassault and on these I have nothing to add to the answer he gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne).

Defence Establishment, Shoeburyness (Contracts)

Mr.Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the implications of putting contracts out to tender at the defence establishment at Shoeburyness following the official visit by the Under-Secretary of State on 28 March.

Mr Lee: We have invited tenders to carry out at the proof and experimental establishment, Shoeburyness, the support functions listed in my answer to my hon. Friend on 15 November 1984 at column 344. The implications of an acceptable response is that these support functions, which are currently carried out by civil service and military personnel, will be undertaken by a contractor from 1 April 1986. By this means we expect to maintain and enhance the efficiency of the establishment and the effectiveness of its support to the defence procurement programme and at the same time release military staff for active duty elsewhere.

Army Regimental Pay and Manning and Record Offices

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has plans to disperse the Army regimental pay and manning and record offices on to two sites.

Mr. Butler: Yes; Government proposals to concentrate these offices on to two sites at Glasgow and Leicester have been the subject of consultation with interested parties for some three months.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason the co-located offices in Imphal barracks, York, have been excluded from consideration as one of the sites for the relocated Army regimental pay and manning and record offices.

Mr. Butler: Imphal barracks, York, was not excluded. It was covered by the PSA survey of sites but was considered to be less suitable than other sites available.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated minimum cost of the required new building at Leicester if the Army regimental pay and manning and record offices are re-located there and at Glasgow.

Mr. Butler: Between £5 million and £6 million.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the sale value of the Leicester site currently used for Army regimental pay and manning and record purposes.

Mr. Butler: About £700,000.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many redundancies would occur from the York Army regimental pay and manning and record offices establishment in York if the proposals in his consultation document were implemented without amendment; if he will categorise them; what cost would be involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: It is not possible at this stage to say what the position would be in regard to redundancies amongst staff at any particular site that might be vacated, including York. There are a number of pre-redundancy measures that my Department would take in an effort to minimise any need for compulsory redundancies.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence what additional sites were considered in York, and what estimates were made of their respective costs, prior to the issue of the consultation document on the Army regimental pay and manning and record offices' relocation.

Mr. Butler: Only Imphal barracks which is an existing MRO/RPO site was considered in York. There are no alternative Ministry of Defence sites available in York that would be suitable.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reconsider York as one of the relocated Army regimental pay and manning and record offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 25 April at column 519.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received advocating the retention of York as one of the relocated sites of the Army regimental pay and manning and record offices; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I have received a delegation led by the hon. Member in addition to a number of letters from interested parties. These are being evaluated and I hope to be able to make an announcement about the Government's plans for the pay, manning and record offices by the end of May or early June.

Imphal Barracks, York

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has decided to use surplus office accommodation within Imphal barracks, York, by an infantry division; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: A final decision has yet to be taken by Ministers on the proposals to relocate the Army manning and record and pay offices. All reasonable and sensible alternative uses for those sites vacated will be considered.

Armed Forces (Pay and Allowances)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the basic pay and allowances of a soldier in the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment holding the rank of major, lieutenant, sergeant or private while stationed in either Northern Ireland, England, West Germany or Gibraltar.

Mr. Lee: The information is given in the following two tables for the ranks of personnel requested. Basic pay is the same wherever soldiers serve. The figures for pay quoted are the maximum and minimum daily rates of pay for male officers and soldiers. The maximum rates for soldiers include the highest level of length of service increment payable. In addition, personnel serving in Northern Ireland receive Northern Ireland pay, which is £2·15 per day for all ranks.

Table 1

	£ per day
	Maximum	Minimum
Major	46·89	39·13
Lieutenant	27·27	24·67
Sergeant	29·35	22·91
Private	21·52	12·87

Most allowances payable to Service personnel vary according to their personal circumstances and are not determined by where they are serving. Local overseas allowance is, however, and the second table shows the daily rate payable for the ranks requested on 29 April 1985. The allowance is paid in pounds sterling and may vary with exchange rates. West Berlin has also been included.

Table 2

	Major	L'tenant	Sergeant	Private
Germany (excluding Berlin)
Single	3·91	2·30	2·27	1·47
Married plus one child	7·44	5·66	5·50	4·21
Germany (including Berlin) from 1 August 1985*
Single	1·95	1·19	0·78	0·56
Married plus one child	6·37	4·89	5·16	4·01

Married plus one child	7·14	5·31	5·07	3·80
Gibraltar
Single	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
Married plus one child	6·47	5·33	4·79	4·21

* Rates to be implemented from 1 August 1985 may change with exchange rate variations.

Lance Weapon

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the development of Lance as a conventional weapon.

Mr. Butler: Lance is an American weapon, which may be used with either a nuclear or a conventional warhead. The United Kingdom has no plans to develop or use the weapon in its conventional role.

Nimrod Aircraft

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the development of the Nimrod aircraft.

Mr. Butler: Development work is continuing. We are still investigating various options for the further work necessary to bring the project to completion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Sittings of the House

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how much time, expressed both as hours and as a percentage of the total time for which the House sat in the Session, was spent in each of the last 10 Sessions on (a) Government business (broken down between Bills, statutory instruments, European Community business and other motions) and (b) private Members' business (broken down between Bills, motions and other business, including half-hour Adjournment debates).

Mr. Biffen: For the four Sessions 1980-81 to 1983-84 inclusive, the information is as follows:

	1980-81		1981-82		1982-83		1983-84

* Other than Consolidated Fund Bills.
† Affirmative motions.
‡ Including half-hour adjournments, holiday adjournments and Consolidated Fund Bills, etc.

Similar information for earlier Sessions is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

My hon. Friend may wish to note the following passage from page 304 of the 20th edition of "Erskine May":

"In a sense all Government time is equally Opposition time, and the Opposition's use of the multifarious opportunities available to it for influencing the way in which the proceedings of the House in Government time are conducted is thus of the first importance in the distribution of the time available for business in any session. No valid purpose is therefore served by the computation, based (as it inevitably would be) on a number of highly artificial assumptions, of a figure showing the total amount of 'Opposition time' in a session.

Similar considerations apply to private Members' time. Although specific time is allotted to private Members in every session (see page 294), and although numerous instances occur in Government time in which the matter under debate is in practice raised by a private Member, private Members also retain the right to intervene at any juncture during the discussion of public business. This right is exercised daily by private Members in all quarters of the House."

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many days the House has sat in each of the past 10 parliamentary sessions.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is as follows:

	Days
1974-75	198
1975-76	191
1976-77	149
1977-78	169

1983-84	213

Divisions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will publish in the Official Report the total number of Divisions in each parliamentary Session since 1955, the average duration of a Division, the longest duration of a Division and also the longest continuous run of Divisions at any one sitting in each Session.

Mr. Biffen: The information on the total number of Divisions in each parliamentary Session since 1955 is as follows. The information requested in the rest of the hon. Gentleman's question is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

	Number
1955-56	298
1956-57	180
1957-58	206

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many (a) oral and (b) written questions appeared on the Order Paper in each of the last 10 Sessions.

Mr. Biffen: The number of questions that appeared on the Order Paper in each of the last 10 Sessions is as follows:

	Oral	Written
1974-75	9,368	27,284
1975-76	9,538	31,922

1983-84	13,386	40,119
*1984-85	8,917	19,451

* Up to and including 26 April.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Lord Privy Seal how many departmental committees of inquiry the Leader of the House and his predecessors have established since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Biffen: As Leader of the House I have no departmental responsibilities.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Enforcement of Judgments Office

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Attorney-General if, in relation to the Enforcement of Judgments Office, Northern Ireland, he will state, for the latest five convenient 12-month periods, the average case load in hand and the average length of time to execution of enforcement.

The Attorney-General: This information is not available and could be obtained only by disproportionate expenditure of resources, but some indication of the workload of the office may be obtained from the figure for new applications received:

	Number
1980	6,643
1981	7,532
1982	7,390
1983	5,018
1984	8,520

Juvenile Courts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General what consideration has been given to encouraging greater specialisation among magistrates in juvenile court work, as referred to in the Government reply to the second report of the Social Services Committee, Session 1983-84, Cmnd. 9298.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor has in mind changes affecting the advisory committee on the training of magistrates, and when these have been made consideration will be given to the question of encouraging greater specialisation in juvenile court work.

Family Courts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General what progress has been made in setting up a conciliation project unit to monitor the costs and effectiveness of conciliation services; and whether Her Majesty's Government are continuing to fund the Bristol family courts' conciliation scheme.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor announced on 8 February that he had selected a team from the University of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to be the conciliation project unit. It will begin work in September.

The Lord Chancellor is continuing to provide funding for the Bristol courts family conciliation service on an interim basis until the unit is in a position to decide whether or not to select that service as one of the schemes it wishes to monitor.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General how many representations he has received, and from what sources, on setting up family courts; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Many such representations have been received from interested individuals and bodies including the Law Society, the Magistrates' Association, the British Association of Social Workers, the Association of County Councils and others. I would also refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 4 April, at column 716.

Medical Negligence

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Attorney-General what information he has as to the amount paid out in legal aid in cases involving alleged medical negligence by health authorities in each of the last three years.

The Attorney-General: Information is not available in the form requested. The statistics kept of legal aid granted in medical negligence cases are not broken down by type of defendant. The gross cost to the legal aid fund of medical negligence cases, including those involving alleged medical negligence by health authorities, was as follows:

1982-83	879,118
1983-84	1,048,506
1984-85	1,450,479

The above figures take no account of sums recovered by way of contributions or the statutory charge or by way of costs recovered from unassisted losing parties.

DEFENCE

British War Widows and Associates

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received from the honorary president and secretary of British War Widows and Associates; what reply he is sending; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has received a letter direct from Mrs Strange, the honorary president and secretary of the British War Widows and Associates, and also through the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) making certain allegations about the way in which the Royal British Legion is administering a recently introduced Government sponsored scheme to help finance visits by war widows to their husbands graves overseas.

The Royal British Legion has been consulted on the allegations made and, on the evidence available, I consider them to be without foundation. No action is therefore proposed as a consequence of Mrs Strange's allegations, and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed forces will be replying to this effect in the near future.

Exercise Lean Look

Mr. Budgen asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Exercise Lean Look is now complete; and if he will announce the results of the study.

Mr. Heseltine: Exercise Lean Look was launched with the aim of identifying 4,000 military manpower savings in the Army's support area, to allow enhancements to the front line. The exercise has been successfully concluded. Details are contained in Defence Open Government Document 85/03, which is published today and which has been placed in the Library.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Educational Maintenance Allowance

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what would be the cost of providing an educational maintenance allowance of £25 per week, 52 weeks per year, to all those aged 16 and 17-year-old in full-time education in England, including those in colleges of further education, and taking into account savings in child benefit and any existing educational maintenance allowances.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 4 December 1984 at c.89 to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott).

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Statistics

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has regarding the level of crime in inner city partnership areas; and how these figures compare with average levels of crime in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The information available relates to those offences recorded by the police. Statistics of notifiable offences recorded by the police, other than those for the Metropolitan police district, are available centrally only by police force area. They are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (Table 2.6 of the volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9349). The four inner city partnership areas outside the Metropolitan police district each form only a part of the police force area in which they are contained. The available information for the relevant police force areas and districts within the Metropolitan police district are given in the following table. The offences were not necessarily committed by or against residents of the area or district.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police per 100,000 population 1984

Police Surgeons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why police surgeons in London are being asked to sign the Official Secrets Act; and if he will call for reports from chief constables outside the metropolis as to their practice in this matter.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that most civilians who are employed by or carry out work for the Metropolitan Police and who have access to official information are already required to sign a declaration certifying that they are aware of the provisions of the Official Secrets Acts. Metropolitan police surgeons have not previously been required to sign a declaration but, since they also have access to official information, a similar requirement is included in the new form of contract which is currently being drawn up by the Metropolitan police.

The Acts' provisions apply whether or not a formal declaration is signed. It is for each chief officer to decide whether persons engaged by them should sign a declaration and my right hon. and learned Friend sees no reason to call for reports about their practice.

Consultants (Contracts)

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the contracts, with the subjct of assignment, awarded to management consultancy firms by his Department in 1984, with the name of the consultants concerned.

Mr. Brittan: The information is as follows:

Arthur Andersen & Co. — To advise on the working procedures, staffing and structure of the Crown Prosecution Service.

Arthur Young, McClelland, Moores & Company — Tasks related to the implementation of a devolved financial control system in the Prison Department.

Atkins Planning—Further development of project management information in the Directorate of Telecommunications.

Atkins Planning—Programming of prison activities.

Coban Design Ltd. — Independent technical assessment of the design of electronic typewriters.

Coopers & Lybrand Associates Ltd. — Review of the commercial relationship between the Prison Service Industries and Farms and Customers.

Coopers & Lybrand Associates Ltd. — Study of an accounting and reporting framework or the Directorate of Telecommunications.

Furniture Industry Research Associates — Research on the design and development of office range furniture.

Innovative Management Development, Maxim Consultants —Management training for the Probation Service.

Institute of Local Government Studies — Resource requirements and value for money in the magistrates' courts.

SGS Inspection Services Ltd — Independent survey on consignment of toy typewriters.

Marriage Act 1949

Mr. Concannon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to amend section 1 of, and schedule 1 to, the Marriage Act 1949, so as to allow in-laws to marry.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and leaned Friend has no plans to do so.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the prison population of England and Wales on 26 April.

Mr. Mellor: The figure was 45,899.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Poultry

Mr. Skeet asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what he esimates to have been the amount of state funds allocated to poultry research and development in each of the past four years.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested is as follows:

	£ million
1980-81	6·6
1981-82	7·5
1982-83	8·5
1983-84	8·4

Farmgate Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the principal common agricultural policy products produced in the United Kingdom the price payable at the farmgate in 1984; how this compares to the average price in real terms in the years 1967-68 to 1970-71; and if he will state the quantities produced.

Mr. MacGregor: The figures requested are as follows:

	1984 Prov.	1967-68 to 1970-71	Units
*Average farmgate price real terms
Wheat	86·2	88·5	£/tonne

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department monitors developments in the agriculture, fisheries and food sectors and assesses the prospects for the main agricultural commodities. It makes use of published studies and, when the need arises, commissions market research.

Dairy Farmers

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the number of bankruptcies amongst dairy farmers in Cheshire which have occurred since the introduction of milk quotas; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that this information is not available.

Slaughtermen

Miss Fookes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider improving the training of slaughtermen prior to granting them licences.

Mrs. Fenner: This matter is the subject of recommendations by the Farm Animal Welfare Council in its report on the welfare of livestock (red meat animals) at the time of slaughter. The Government are considering the council's recommendations.

Animal Welfare

Miss Fookes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will designate an official within his Department with special responsibility for animal welfare.

Mrs. Fenner: At the Ministry's headquarters there is an administrative division which deals solely with animal welfare policy issues on farms, at markets and in transit. This division and the administrative division responsible for welfare at slaughter work closely with senior officers of the headquarters staff of the State Veterinary Service. In the field, veterinary officers in the SVS, at divisional and regional levels all contribute extensively on matters of advice and enforcement on the welfare of farm animals on farms, at markets, in transit, and at the point of slaughter. The total manpower devoted to these programmes amounted to some 136 man-years in 1984-85. Additionally, all staff of the Ministry's Agriculture Development and Advisory Service maintain a careful watch on welfare issues during their frequent visits to farms, liaising with SVS colleagues.

Against this background, we see no need to designate a single official with special responsibility for animal welfare.

TRANSPORT

Lay-bys (Litter Bins)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has asked Northumberland county council to remove litter bins from lay-bys on trunk roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Requirements concerning litter bins were included in a code of practice for routine maintenance of motorways and all-purpose trunk roads published earlier this year by my Department for the guidance of local highway authorities, including Northumberland county council, which acts as our agent in the maintenance of motorways and trunk roads. The requirements include the removal of litter bins from those trunk road lay-bys without facilities, and the erection of notices advising road users to take their litter away, except at designated picnic sites and lay-bys with facilities such as toilets, picnic tables and litter bins.

Drivers normally stop at lay-bys without facilities for only a very short time and they and their passengers do not often walk far from the car. Litter bins tend not to be used and they are frequently blown or knocked over. A carefully monitored experiment in which litter bins have been removed at selected lay-bys has shown that the litter problem has not generally been any worse after the removal of the bins. The code of practice does, however, require agent authorities to clean up lay-bys on a regular periodical basis.

The code of practice was published after extensive consultations with the local authority associations and discussions with the County Surveyors' Society. It is designed to achieve consistency of routine maintenance standards for the Department's roads and to obtain the best value for the money spent.

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: My Department uses market research to collect information needed for policy development purposes and also to assess the effectiveness of publicity campaigns.

Okehampton Bypass

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the extra cost per mile for commercial transport-users if the northern route for the Okehampton bypass is used as opposed to the southern route.

Mrs. Chalker: Costs per mile for transport operators would be broadly similar on the two routes. The petitioners' route is more than a mile longer than the Department's.

LRT (Fares Cards)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many 14 and 15-year-olds have obtained a reduced rate fares card so far from London Regional Transport; what proportion of 14 and 15-year-olds in London this represents; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: LRT estimates that some 260,000 child rate photocards were issued through London post offices between August 1984, when they were first made available, and 1 April 1985. This total excludes photocards issued through local education authorities, for which figures are not available.

The number of 14 and 15-year-olds resident in Greater London at the present time is estimated at about 180,000. The issue of child rate photocards is not restricted to London residents.

Airedale Route

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a summary of the submissions made during the recent consultation exercise relating to the A650 Airedale route between Bingley and Shipley.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes. I will make available a summary of the representations received including the number of people who expressed a preference for a particular route. I will write to my hon. Friend about this.

Driving Licence

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what date it is intended to introduce the new European driving licence into Great Britain.

Mr. Ridley: In accordance with EC directive 80/1263, driving licences with commencement dates from 1 January 1986 onwards will be in Community format.

Light Dues

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to increase light dues.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am still considering this matter. I expect to make an announcement shortly.

Singapore Airlines (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that the application by Singapore Airlines to begin flights into Manchester from July will be handled as expeditiously as possible by his Department; and when he expects to announce a decision on the application.

Mr. Ridley: As required under Article 12 of the "UK/Singapore Air Services Agreement" (Cmnd. 4619) the application by Singapore Airlines for services to Manchester is the subject of consultations between the two aeronautical authorities. The request from the Singapore Government for consultations was received on March 18 1985 and was acted upon immediately. An announcement will be made as soon as these consultations are complete.

PRIME MINISTER

British War Widows and Associates

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received from the honorary president and secretary of British War Widows and Associates; what reply she is sending; and if she will publish the correspondence in the Official Report.

The Prime Minister: I have received one letter from the honorary president and secretary of British War Widows and Associates, Mrs. Iris Strange, dated 16 April. My office has sent a reply to Mrs. Strange. The reply reflects the Government's good record over the years, highlighting the significant improvements to war widows age allowances from last November. There are approximately 67,000 war widows of whom 53,000 have benefited from this improvement. It is not my practice to publish correspondence sent to me by members of the public.

Regional Industrial Policy

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will estimate the number of man weeks of employment created by the Government's regional industrial policy in each region of the United Kingdom in the last 12 months;

(2) what has been the total cost of the Government's regional industrial incentives in each region of the United Kingdom over the last 12 months;

(3) what is the latest estimate of the cost per job created under the Government's regional industrial policy over the past 12 months in each region of the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: I will reply to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

THE ARTS

Works of Art (Export Licences)

Mr. Evennett asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether it is intended that the criteria for granting export licences for works of art will be changed in the near future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The criteria of national importance for judging whether such licences should be withheld or granted remain unchanged. However, following the recommendation of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art, a revised open general export licence will be issued on 7 May 1985 by the Department of Trade and Industry, under which the export of most works of art, antiques and collectors' items valued below £16,000 will be permitted without a specific export licence. The present value limit is £8,000.

Documents, manuscripts and archives, now extended to include architectural, engineering and scientific drawings drawn to scale by hand, require separate licences irrespective of value, as does archaeological material. Representations of British historical personages will from 7 May 1985 require a licence if valued from £4,000 up to £16,000 (the present limits are £2,000 and £8,000) although special arrangements exist to facilitate the export of the majority of these. New provisions for photographs, extending the control to cover photographic albums and increasing the figure at which a specific licence is needed to £400 (at present £200) will come into effect when a revised Export of Goods (Control) Order is published shortly.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts, pursuant to his reply of 23 January 1984, Official Report, column 419, if he is now in a position to make a statement on the future funding of the Riverside Studios, in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985, c. 58]: The hon. Member is aware that my right hon. and noble Friend, the Minister for the Arts, has announced that, of the total of £34 million of additional central arts funding he will make available on 1 April 1986, £16 million will go to the Arts Council for the support of those major performing arts bodies affected by abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. It is for the Arts Council to decide on the distribution of that money and, in London, the Riverside Studios will need to establish its case for a share along with other major companies. Like all arts bodies, Riverside will need to continue to seek other funding, from private sources and local authorities, as well as from their box office returns and economies in day to day operations.

WALES

Agricultural Capital Grants

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met representatives of the National Farmers Union in Wales and the Farmers Union of Wales to discuss the impact of the reduction of agricultural capital grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I met representatives of both farming unions on 18 January and the NFU in March to discuss a number of issues including the changes made to the agriculture capital grant schemes in December last. I am in regular contact with the industry about current issues.

Hard Drugs

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are being taken to curb the trade in hard drugs in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Government have a comprehensive strategy for tackling drug misuse throughout the United Kingdom involving simultaneous action to reduce supplies from abroad, tighten controls on drugs produced and prescribed here, make policing even more effective, strengthen deterrence, improve prevention through publicity and health education measures, and to improve treatment and rehabilitation services for those who misuse drugs. These measures, all of which should help to reduce the trade in drugs, are co-ordinated by the ministerial group on the misuse of drugs on which the Welsh Office is represented. I sent a summary of the Government's strategy to the hon. Member and other hon. Members for constituencies in Wales under cover of my letter of 28 March. They have also been sent extracts from the speech on drug misuse which I made on 8 March and in which I explained the Government's strategy and specific Welsh Office measures, including details of special central funding; of leaflets in English and Welsh language versions to help parents and professionals; and of Welsh health circular (85)27 which sets out the action we are now taking to further the Government's strategy in Wales. Hon. Members will be kept informed of developments.

Teachers' Dispute

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has now received about the teachers' dispute in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: We have received seven letters making representations about the teachers' pay dispute. Responsibility for teachers' pay and conditions lies with the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Rating System

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration is being given by his Department to the reform of the rating system in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: While Ministerial responsibility for rating rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, I am, of course, closely involved in the review of local government finance now taking place. Despite speculative reports in the press it is as yet too soon to comment on progress.

Farm Advisory Service

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received on the proposed reduction in funding for the farm advisory service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Following publication of the 1985 public expenditure White Paper I have received one letter seeking information on the proposed reduction in funding for the farm advisory service (ADAS).

Job Creation

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of jobs likely to be created in Wales as the result of the measures announced in the Budget speech; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Budget proposals will substantially improve the prospect for jobs in Wales, as in the country as a whole. How many jobs are created will depend on the extent to which people take advantage of the opportunities which the Budget offers.

Private Hospital Development

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals for private hospital developments have been notified to or authorised by him under the Health Services Act 1976 as amended by the Health Service Act 1980 since his answer of 28 March 1984, Official Report, column 218.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Since March 1984 I have received the following notification:

Land Authority for Wales, Wrexham 30 Beds.

There have been no requests for authorisation of controlled private hospital works.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Small Businesses

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the value added tax exemption thresholds for small businesses in each of the member countries of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Hayhoe: On the basis of the latest available information the situation is understood to be as follows:

Country	Annual limit £ sterling	Type of limit
Belgium	—	—
Denmark	733	Turnover
France	117	Tax
Germany	5,274	Tax-inclusive turnover
Ireland	*20,504	Turnover
	†9,842
Italy	—	—
Luxembourg	2,623	Taxable Turnover
Netherlands	537	Tax
United Kingdom	19,500	Taxable Turnover

Exchange rates as at 26 April 1985.
Greece has not yet introduced VAT.
* Where 90 per cent. of total turnover is derived from taxable goods (excluding since 23 May 1984 goods chargeable at normal and reduced rates produced wholly or mainly from zero-rated materials).
† For other traders.

Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total Government expenditure for the years 1962, 1972, 1982, 1983 and 1984 and the percentage of gross domestic product this represents for each of those years; and if he will provide total revenue for each of those years and express the total revenue also as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Peter Rees: Total general Government expenditure and receipts are as follows:

	Total expenditure £ billion (a)	(a) as percentage of GDP	Total receipts £ billion (a)	(b) as percentage of GDP
1962	10·4	36·1	9·8	33·9
1972	26·4	41·2	24·0	37·4
1982	128·7	46·5	119·3	43·1
1983	138·6	46·1	127·1	42·3
1984	145·4	45·7	135·4	42·5

Figures of total general Government expenditure and receipts are published in table 56 of Economic Trends and table 153 of the Annual Supplement to Economic Trends. Estimates of GDP at market prices are published in table 6 of Economic Trends and in table 8 of the Annual Supplement.

It should be noted that the question has been answered using general Government expenditure and receipts as defined in the national accounts. The former differs from the definition of public expenditure in Cmnd. 9428 and the latter is a wider definition than simply tax revenue.

Truck Manufacturers (Taxation)

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has concerning the total taxation revenue generated by firms manufacturing trucks in the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Secretaries of State for Economic Affairs, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to appendices B and C of "Royal Commissions and Departmental Committees in Britain — a Case-Study in Institutional Adaptiveness and Public Participation in Government" by T J Cartwright, a copy of which is held by the House Library. These appendices list major post-war Royal Commissions and Departmental Committees between 1945 and 1974, the reports of which were published as command papers. I regret that a separate listing for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Departments, to include any such Committees the reports of which were not published as command papers and to extend the list beyond 1974, could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

EMPLOYMENT

Travel-to-Work Areas

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment if there has been any review of the criteria for establishing travel-to-work areas or of the extent of particular areas since July 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The criteria for establishing travel-to-work areas have not been amended since the revised travel-to-work area boundaries were determined in July 1984. One minor change has been made to the boundary between the Swansea and Llanelli areas; this resulted from a revision to the "1981 Census of Population" data.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the answer of 23 February 1984, Official Report, column 611, if he will give the numbers of self-employed persons in the United Kingdom for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, and show what these and the figures contained in the earlier answer represent as a percentage of the total work force.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is given in the table:

Self employed persons in the UK

June	Thousand	Per cent. of working population
*1960	1,766	7·2
1970	2,014	7·9
1979	1,903	7·2
1981	2,118	7·9
1982	2,170	8·1
1983	2,221	8·4
1984	2,494	9·2

* As the method of estimation has changed the figures for 1960 are not strictly comparable with those for later years.

Average National Wage (Housing and Construction)

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average national wage in the housing construction industry at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest available information relates to April 1984. Tables 54, 55 and 57 of the "New Earnings Survey 1984" part C give information on earnings of full-time male and female employees working a full week in the construction industry. A copy of this report is in the Library.

Woolwich Centre

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps are planned to improve the accessibility of the Woolwich jobcentre to disabled people; what is the estimated cost; and when work is planned to start.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Property Services Agency on behalf of the Manpower Services Commission is currently examining whether or not suitable access for wheelchair users can be provided at the Woolwich jobcentre. The agency has been asked to report its findings by the end of May. In general, where disabled people have difficulty in obtaining access to a jobcentre, the Manpower Services Commission will make alternative arrangements to provide whatever advice and information is required.

North-West Region

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been employed in heavy goods vehicle manufacture in the north-west region in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's employment estimates are analysed according to the 1980 standard industrial classification which does not separately distinguish the manufacture of heavy goods vehicles.

MSC Training (Merseyside)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many full-time Manpower Services Commission training places are available at each training centre on Merseyside.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985 c. 43]: The table provides information on the number of full-time training places currently available under the training opportunities scheme on Merseyside.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Enterprise Companies

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the number of local enterprise companies established by local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Local authorities normally establish and fund enterprise boards using their discretionary powers. There is no statutory requirement to notify my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State of their action and my Department does not therefore maintain a comprehensive record of the number of such boards in existence.

Of the 144 established local enterprise agencies in England listed by Business in the Community in September 1984, 118 had one or more local authorities listed among their sponsors.

Planning Applications

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to establish an expedited procedure to consider matters such as colour and type of facing material, window detail, open space and landscape requirements which have no direct bearing on planning applications.

Mr. Macfarlane: No, but if my hon. Friend has any suggestions I shall be glad to consider them.

Asbestos

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to advise all owners of old factories, offices and similar sites that asbestos should be checked for before demolition is authorised, under section 4 of the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980.

Mr. Waldegrave: The responsibility for enforcing health and safety legislation in relation to demolition work lies with the Health and Safety Executive and the local environmental health authorities. The HSE has issued several guidance notes on health and safety in demolition work, and these contain specific advice on the need to establish whether or not asbestos is present, and its extent both before and during demolition.

The Department's booklet entitled "Asbestos materials in Buildings" includes reference to the Control of Pollution (Special Wastes) Regulations, which are enforced by the local waste disposal authorities. Specific advice on the operation of each of these regulations is contained in my Department's circular 4/81, and detailed guidance is given out in "Waste Management Paper No. 23" to enable producers to establish whether particular wastes arising are subject to the regulations.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to ensure that sections 5 and 6 of the Control of Pollution (Special Wastes) Regulations 1980 are carried out.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is for local authorities, as waste disposal authorities, to ensure compliance with these regulations. The Department has issued circular 4/81 giving guidance on their implementation, and the Department's Hazardous Waste Inspectorate looks into the operation of these controls when visiting local authorities and individual disposal sites.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many prosecutions have been instigated for failure to comply with the Control of Pollution (Special Wastes) Regulations 1980; and how many were successful.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information of prosecutions for failure to comply with these regulations is available only for 1982 and 1983, when seven of the eight prosecutions were successful.

National Heritage Memorial Fund

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the £15 million reduction in the new town non-voted cash limit DOE/NTI for 1984-85 used to fund the increase in the National Heritage Memorial Fund for 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Cash block DOE/NTI is the net provision for capital expenditure by all new town corporations in England after allowing for their capital receipts. Capital receipts in 1984-85 were greater than expected when the cash limit was set. It was therefore possible to reduce the net cash limit without affecting in any way the provision for gross expenditure.

Holiday Play Schemes

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to which holiday play schemes have closed due to the refusal of applications for funds from the traditional urban programme.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not available. Some holiday projects which have been successful for a number of years may continue with local authority funding, as urban programme circular 25 suggests.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about cuts in traditional urban programme funding for holiday play schemes.

Mr. Macfarlane: About 60 representations have been received from local authorities, voluntary organisations, and Members of Parliament.

Housing (Investment)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will express the total investment in housing by public bodies in the United Kingdom as a percentage of total national capital investment.

Sir George Young: Public investment in housing in the United Kingdom in 1984 represented 5·1 per cent. of total gross domestic fixed capital formation.

Hazardous Waste Inspectorate

Dr. Cunningham asked the Sectetary of State for the Environment when he expects the first report of the Hazardous Waste Inspectorate to be published.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Early in June.

Sports Council

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future chairmanship of the Sports Council.

Mr. Macfarlane: The chairman is Mr Dick Jeeps. If there are to be any changes, they will be announced in the normal way.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each local authority in England indicating the amount of rate support grant per head for 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply 30 April 1985, c.89]: The information requested is in the table. The population figures used in the calculation are OPCS mid-1984 estimates. Rate support grant comprises block grant and domestic rate relief grant. The block grant component of the figures is local authorities' entitlements, after initial percentage close-ending but before holdback, in most cases on the basis of budgets received from authorities. For those few authorities from which a budget was not received in time for the calculation, the Secretary of State has estimated that:

—for rate limited authorities, their expenditure will be in line with the expenditure level determined by the Secretary of State on 24 July 1984;
—for the remaining authorities, their expenditure will be in line with the guidance figure notified to them on 11 December 1984.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Herons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for licences to kill herons there were in 1983, 1984 and so far this year; how many were granted; how many herons were allowed to be killed in each case; how many were actually killed; what were the reasons for granting or refusing licences; what was the location of the applicant; what was the reason for the application; how many site visits were made; what deterrent measures were taken; and what organisations he consulted before deciding on the applications.

Mr. Chris Patten: To date no such applications have been received.

Civil Servants (Consultation)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provision is being made to facilitate consultation between civil servants from the Irish Republic and their opposite numbers in Stormont.

Mr. Hurd: The Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council was set up in 1981 to encourage contacts between the two Governments at ministerial and official level.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has had to his statement of 14 March, Official Report, column 497 about the possible reciprocal lifting of commercial and financial restrictions by Argentina.

Mr. Renton: The Argentine Government have not replied to the message to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred on 14 March at column 499.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the letter of 28 March to the hon. Member for Linlithgow from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) about references in Lord Blake's recent publication concerning Cabinet policy toward the prosecution of the Falklands war.

Mr. Renton: Yes. The full text of the letter is as follows:

"Thank you for your letter of 20 March in which you follow up your intervention in the adjournment debate on 14 March.

Thank you also for enclosing the text setting out the allegation which came to Lord Blake as 'private information'. The Government's position regarding these allegations is that, without accepting that they have any validity, they are not prepared to give details of the operational advice submitted to Ministers. This, I assure you, is in accordance with normal practice.

On Argentine re-armament, there really is nothing I can usefully add to the reply I gave in my winding-up speech (Columns 528-529).

This leaves the Argentines of Scottish and Welsh extraction living in Patagonia. We are well aware that many people of British descent have freely chosen to settle in Argentina and have prospered and been content to live under the political, economic and social system of that country. But the people of the Falkland Islands have clearly expressed the wish to live on British soil in the Falkland Islands, and have no wish to become subject to Argentina. Their wishes merit respect by a country which has so recently recovered its own democratic freedom."

Argentina

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why it is Her Majesty's Government's policy to conduct exchanges with Argentina through Swiss and Brazilian intermediaries.

Mr. Renton: It is standard practice for Governments who have no diplomatic relations to conduct their exchanges through their respective protecting powers.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government have not taken up the suggestion of the Secretary General of the United Nations that there should be a dialogue between the United Kingdom and Argentina through the United Nations to develop confidence-building measures.

Mr. Renton: The protecting powers are at present the most appropriate channel for our communications with the Argentine Government.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the 29-30 April Foreign Affairs Council.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our permanent representative to the European Communities represented the United Kingdom at the Foreign Affairs Council held in Luxembourg on 29-30 April. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) was our representative when Ministers of the Ten met in political co-operation on 29 April, immediately prior to the Council.

Consultations were held with a delegation from the European Parliament about the new own resources decision. The text will be formally adopted by the Council as soon as practicable.

The Council discussed the negotiating mandates for the second EC-Yugoslavia financial protocol and the second EC-Malta financial protocol. Both will be considered further at the next Council.

The Council discussed arrangements for signature of the accession treaty for Spain and Portugal.

The Council adopted a declaration concerning EC beef and veal exports to Canada for 1985. The Commission reported on recent contacts with the United States on the implementation of the carbon steel and pipes and tubes export restraint arrangements.

After the Council, a representative of the Angolan Government signed the third Lomé convention. This, together with the signature by Mozambique last December, brings the whole of independent black Africa within the ambit of the convention.

At the political co-operation meeting, Ministers of the Ten had useful exchanges of views on a number of international affairs topics. Statements were issued on the middle east, Sudan, the forthcoming Ottawa meeting on human rights, UNESCO and southern Africa. Copies of these have been placed in the Library of the House.

SCOTLAND

Afforestation (Caithness and Sutherland)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which of the afforestation schemes in Caithness and Sutherland approved under the forestry grant scheme and noted in his reply of 5 February, Official Report, columns 499-500, were subject to consultation with the Nature Conservancy Council.

Twenty of the bodies indicated, subject to some provisos, broad support for the committee's recommendations about research; seven were opposed to the recommendations; and the remaining 18 either expressed varying degrees of concern without indicating a firm view on these issues or did not comment.

Private Hospital Developments

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals for private hospital developments have been notified to or authorised by him under the Health Services Act 1976 as amended by the Health Service Act 1980 since his answer of 28 March 1984, Official Report, column 218.

Mr. John MacKay: None.

Voluntary Bodies (Grants)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the voluntary bodies to which the Scottish Home and Health Department gave grants under section 16B of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 during 1984-85 and the amount of the grant given in each case.

Mr. Younger: This information is as follows:

	Grant paid 1984-85 £
Scottish Catholic Marriage Advisory Council	99
Scottish Council on Alcoholism	69,300
Family Planning Association	12,500
Community Service Volunteers	12,150

Scottish Epilepsy Association	4,775
National Association for the Childless	2,350
Special Equipment and Aids for Living	2,000
Total	£298,907

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Credits Guarantee Department

3. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current operations of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Channon: The Export Credits Guarantee Department continues to make its facilities available to support UK exports on the same basis as hitherto. I am awaiting the report of the team currently reviewing the Department's organisation and management which I announced on 21 November in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon).

Citizens Advice Bureaux

16. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future funding of citizens advice bureaux.

Mr. Butcher: The Government will continue to fund the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and the Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. Funding of individual bureaux will remain primarily a matter for local authorities.

School Mini-companies

17. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to see at first hand the work which is being done in school mini-companies to encourage a wider understanding of industry and commerce among schoolchildren.

Mr. Trippier: During Local Enterprise Week in May I will be visiting two schools: one in Tottenham, the other in Newcastle — both of which are running mini-enterprises.

Portugal and Spain

18. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has had with Portugal and Spain regarding the future of their textile exports to the United Kingdom following the accession by these two countries to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: The arrangements for the Community's post-enlargement trade in textiles with Spain and Portugal were settled in the context of the Spanish and Portuguese accession negotiations.

Exports to the Community of 10 categories of Spanish textiles and 16 categories of Portuguese textiles will be subject to restraint for up to four years after accession.

British Leyland

19. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will meet the chairman of BL to discuss further public investment in the company.

Mr. Tebbit: The chairman has not requested such a meeting.

43. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects BL's corporate plan to be published.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A review of BL performance in 1984 and the BL 1985 corporate plan will be placed in the Library when the Government's decisions on it are announced.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what has been the level of Government loans and investment in the truck divisions of British Leyland in each of the last five years;

(2) what has been the total level of Government grants and loans to British Leyland in each of the years since the acquisition by Her Majesty's Government of a majority shareholding.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is as follows:

Total Government Assistance for BL

Financial Year	Amount (£ million)	Description
1975-76	46	Purchase of shares from shareholders
1975-76	200	Equity
1976-77	100	Loans (converted to equity in 1980)
1977-78	50	Loans (converted to equity in 1980)
1977-78	275	Short term loans (repaid 1978-79)
1978-79	−275	Repayment of short term loans
1978-79	450	Equity
1978-79	12	Equity for NEB stake in Wholesale Vehicle Finance Ltd.
1979-80	150	Equity
1980-81	300	Equity
1981-82	520	Equity
1982-83	370	Equity
1983-84	90	Equity
1984-85	NIL

The overwhelming bulk of this money was paid as or later converted to equity in BL. It is not possible to distinguish how the funding was allocated to particular operating companies within BL.

Recycling and Reclamation (Ministerial Responsibility)

20. Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a further statement on the responsibilities of his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State as Minister with co-ordinating responsibilities for recycling and reclamation.

Mr. Trippier: I will have a particular responsibility for identifying any inconsistencies or omissions in Government policy towards recycling and reclamation, but I will not have decision making powers in areas which are properly the responsibility of other Ministers.

Small Firms Local Enterprise Week

21. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement about his latest plans for the forthcoming Small Firms Local Enterprise Week.

Mr. Trippier: The period from 15 to 24 May has been designated Local Enterprise Week. Local events throughout the country will highlight the importance of small businesses in the community and the range of facilities and organisations available to assist and advise them. A particular theme of the week will be importance of education and training. I shall be promoting the week with a national press conference and an extensive programme of local visits.

China

22. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what resources are being allocated by the United Kingdom Government's export agencies in 1985-86 in order to promote British exports to China.

Mr. Channon: Exports to China are supported by my Department, the Export Credits Guarantee Department, diplomatic posts and other agencies such as the Sino British Trade Council. It is not possible to forecast expenditure, much of which is responsive to exporters' demands.

Ethnic Minorities

23. Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support is given to individuals from ethnic minorities who wish to set up in business.

Mr. Trippier: The same as to those from ethnic majorities.

Amble

24. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many officials of his Department have visited Amble in pursuit of their official duties since he announced his decision to withdraw development status from the area.

Mr. Trippier: None since the issues were thoroughly considered before the announcement and have not materially changed since.

Confectionery Industry

25. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much Government financial aid has been granted to companies in the confectionery industry during the past five years.

Mr. Butcher: Selective assistance for companies in the cocoa, chocolate and sugar confectionery industry amounted to £2¼ million over the last five years.

Financial Services

26. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made in implementing the recommendations of his White Paper on financial services.

Mr. Tebbit: The House debated the White Paper on 24 April and gave a general welcome to its proposals. I am considering the comments received on the White Paper and work on preparing legislation is going ahead. Sir Kenneth Berrill and Mr. Mark Weinberg have been appointed to take charge of the preparations for setting up the proposed two new regulatory boards.

Post Office

27. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, when he next meets the chairman of the Post Office, he will discuss its industrial relations.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend discusses all relevant matters during his meetings with the chairman.

Efficiency and Productivity (International Comparisons)

28. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with Britain's position in the international efficiency and productivity leagues.

Mr. Butcher: Since 1980 United Kingdom output per man hour in manufacturing has increased more rapidly than that of most major industrial countries. Up to the third quarter of 1984 growth was significantly greater only in the Netherlands and Japan. But there is scope for further improvement, and our policies are designed to provide the climate in which that can be achieved.

Companies (Financial Difficulties)

29. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what actions his Department is taking to assist with the rehabilitation of companies in financial difficulties.

Mr. Trippier: I believe that the primary responsibility for the rehabilitation of a company in financial difficulties lies with its board of directors. But I am anxious to see that satisfactory procedures exist to enable the affairs of a company facing a financial crisis to be placed in the hands of an independent expert who will be able to pursue a programme for the rescue or re-organisation of the company's business. This is why the Government have incorporated in the Insolvency Bill, the company administration procedure which it was recommended should be established by the review committee on insolvency law and practice.

European Internal Market

30. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support he intends to give the European Commission's 1985 programme to consolidate the European internal market; and, in particular, how he intends to implement the decision on a single administrative document.

Mr. Channon: The Government will press vigorously in the Council of Ministers for early adoption of all those proposals in the Commission's 1985 programme which make a positive contribution to liberalising trade in the internal market and improving the climate for business in the Community. The detailed implementation of the single administrative document is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Matthew Brown plc

31. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has yet received the reports of the Director General of Fair Trading on the proposed takeover of Matthew Brown plc by Scottish and Newcastle Breweries.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend announced on 24 April that he had decided in accordance with the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading, to refer the proposed acquisition to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the bid by Scottish and Newcastle Breweries plc for Matthew Brown plc.

Mr. Tebbit: I announced on 24 April that I had decided, in accordance with the recommendations of the Director General of Fair Trading, to refer the proposed acquisition to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

COCOM

32. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he now expects to bring into operation the Export of Goods (Control) Order enacting the COCOM agreement of 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend expects to make a new Export of Goods (Control) Order shortly; and to publish it on or about 12 June. It will enter into force six weeks after publication. It has not proved possible to publish the order earlier because of certain technical difficulties in its preparation.

Business Improvement Services

33. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have been assisted under the business improvement services so far; and how much money has been disbursed.

Mr. Trippier: At 31 March 1985 my Department had received 1,218 applications for grants totalling £12·8 million; had made 462 offers totalling £2·48 million; and had made 15 payments worth £0·03 million under business improvement services to small firms in eligible steel, shipbuilding and textile areas in England. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales had received 183 applications worth £1·44 million, and had made four offers worth £1,815 in respect of business improvement services for steel areas in Wales. No grant payments have yet been made in Wales.

35. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much expenditure under the business improvement services has been committed to date; how much has been spent in each eligible area; and how much expenditure he anticipates in the financial year 1985-86.

Mr. Trippier: Information on business improvement services in England for the period 26 November 1984 to 31 March 1985 is as follows:—

Area	Value of Grants Committed (£)	Value of Grants Paid (£)
England:
North East Region	357,393	Nil
North West Region	560,295	1,500
Yorkshire and Humberside Region	1,337,783	24,849
East Midland Region	211,695	5,124
	2,467,166	31,473

My Department's estimated expenditure in England on business improvement services for 1985-86 is £8·65 million.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has estimated that £2·1 million will be spent in 1985-86 on business improvement services in Wales. No grant payments have yet been made in Wales.

Steel Industry

34. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for changes in the structure of the British steel industry during the next two years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: At present I have no definite plans although, as the House knows, I am considering proposals for a jointly owned company put forward by the British Steel Corporation and GKN.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

36. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the latest position regarding the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Channon: The European Commission will need to express a view on behalf of member states at the meeting of the GATT textiles committee in July as to whether the multi-fibre arrangement should be extended, modified or discontinued. The Government are still considering carefully what our policy should be.

"Burdens on Business"

37. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to implement the proposals contained in his Department's report, "Burdens on Business."

Mr. Trippier: We are already implementing some of the proposals—in the areas of VAT, wages councils, employment protection; in others, further work and consultation will be necessary before firm decisions are taken. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio is co-ordinating the Government's drive to reduce regulatory burdens as a whole and to ensure that the impetus of the scrutiny is maintained.

Exports (Value)

38. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the increase in the value of exports over the past year.

Mr. Channon: In the 12 months ending March 1985, exports increased by £11·1 billion, compared with the previous 12 months.

United States of America

39. Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of current prospects for trade between the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

Mr. Channon: There are excellent prospects for a further substantial increase in our manufactured exports to the United States in 1985.

Japan

40. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on current trade with Japan.

Mr. Channon: United Kingdom exports to Japan rose by 16 per cent. in 1984 to reach nearly £1 billion but the trade deficit also increased to nearly £3 billion.

British Telecom (Contracts)

41. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to promote the interests of British manufacturers in winning contracts with British Telecom.

Mr. Butcher: I wish to see British manufacturers win contracts wherever they arise.

Information Technology Industry

42. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department is taking to deal with the problem of skill shortages in the information technology industry.

Mr. Butcher: The information technology skill shortages committee, which I chair, was set up last year to look into this problem and hopes to issue its final report shortly. This will summarise progress made so far and make further recommendations for action. An important result of the committee's work has been the establishment by industry of the Information Technology Skills Agency, under the aegis of the CBI Education Foundation, to interpret industry's needs to the higher education system and to co-ordinate industrial support. In addition, the Department of Trade and Industry is contributing £12·5 million to the £43 million which the Government have allocated for the provision of additional higher education placed in engineering and technology over the next three years.

Inward Investment

44. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures his Department is taking to attract inward investment into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: The Invest in Britain bureau within my Department, in collaboration with all the main British public sector inward investment bodies and the private sector, is mounting a major promotional campaign—Britain Means Business—over the coming year. The camaign will be incremental to the bureau's normal promotional activities, and will aim to consolidate and improve upon the United Kingdom's standing as the preferred location in Europe for direct investment.

Sanitary Ware

45. Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of imports of sanitary ware from Belgium in 1984.

Mr. Channon: United Kingdom imports of sanitary ware from Belgium-Luxembourg reached a provisional total of £2·9 million (cif) in 1984.

Source: Data corresponding to SITC/R2, Sub-groups 697·5, 812·2 and 893·2 of the UK Overseas Trade Statistics.

Low Pay (Northern Region)

47. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his response to the recent publication produced by the Low Pay Unit and the northern region of the General Municipal Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union on the subject of low pay in the northern region, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Trippier: I have not received a copy of the report to which the hon. Member refers; but have subsequently seen the report. I note that its recommendations are addressed to trade unions and local authorities. The hon. Member cannot expect me to agree with much of the report's content and in particular the comments on Government policies.

British Insurance Companies (West Germany)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make representations to the West German Government to persuade them to remove their restrictions upon the freedom of British insurance companies to trade in the Federal Republic contrary to the spirit of the second directive on non-life insurance.

Mr. Fletcher: We take every opportunity to press for progress towards a free Community market for non-life insurance services business and I went to Bonn in February specifically for discussions on this point with the Ministry of Finance. We are also intervening in support of the Commission of the European Communities in a case which it is bringing against Germany in the European Court of Justice about certain provisions of German insurance law which the Commission considers contravene the freedom of services provisions of the EEC treaty.

Technological Innovation

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to help British manufacturing industry and, in particular, smaller firms to understand the benefits and problems of technological innovation including adoption of micro electronics.

Mr. Butcher: Following last year's successful series of seminars on innovation in industry, the Department has again joined forces with Barclays Bank, PA Technology and Michael Shortland Associates to provide an updated programme for 1985; this will begin on 1 May in London and will continue at 23 other regional cities during the year.

The seminars will be especially valuable to smaller firms and financial organisations who provide funds and offer advice for innovative projects. They will cover financial and managerial issues relevant in both new and traditional industries, and will draw on examples of successful innovation including incorporation of microelectronics in products and manufacturing processes.

Citizens Band Radio

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he now expects to reply to the letter of 14 January from the hon. Member for Woolwich about television interference in Maryon Road, London SE7, caused by citizens band radio.

Mr. Butcher: Immediately.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints about citizens band radio in the London area are currently being investigated by his Department's radio investigation service.

Mr. Butcher: Complaints about television and radio reception rarely specify the source of the problem. Since the source of the problem is often identified only after investigation by the radio investigation service it is not possible to say how many complaints currently in hand relate to citizens band radio.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many operational staff are employed by his Department's radio investigation service in the London area; and how many prosecutions have been undertaken for illegal operation of citizens band radio over the past five years.

Mr. Butcher: The London RIS has 23 officers including three clerical staff. Between 1980-84, 6,292 people were prosecuted for illicit use of CB. Of these, 6,216 were convicted of offences under the Wireless Telegraphy Acts 1949 and 1967.

Broadcasting (Interference)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the average length of time taken to deal with a complaint of interference to broadcast reception in the London area; and what steps are being taken to improve it.

Mr. Butcher: The average waiting time for the first visit is three months in north London and six weeks in south London. Subsequent visits may be necessary to resolve a case. The Department is currently reviewing the activities of the radio investigation service and the information available to the public on dealing with broadcast reception problems, with a view to making the most effective use of the available resources.

Regional Industrial Policy

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends meeting representatives of the Association of District Councils to discuss regional industrial policy.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Local Government is seeing representatives from the Association of District Councils on 13 May to discuss their document "The Urban Dimension in the 80's", and I will be attending that meeting. The discussion is expected to focus primarily on specific urban policy issues, but it is likely that matters of wider concern embracing regional industrial policy will also be raised.

Vehicle Exports

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning the total value of exports of trucks in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Butcher: The information is as follows:

United Kingdom exports

	£ million (fob)
1980	300
1981	247
1982	216
1983	155
*1984	147

Source: SITC/R2 Sub-groups 782.1 (part) and 784.1 (part).
Note: *1984 figures are provisional.

British Tourist Authority

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what matters were discussed at his meeting with the chairman of the British Tourist Authority on 15 April.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Progress on the tourism review initiatives and potential opportunities to encourage the UK tourist industry.

National Metrological Co-ordinating Unit

Mr. Brinton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish the annual report of the national metrological co-ordinating unit as required by section 9(1) of the Weights and Measures Act 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The report covering the period 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1984 has been published today. I have arranged for copies of the report, which includes the audited statement of accounts, to be placed in the Library.

Mixed Credits

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the elimination of mixed credits.

Mr. Channon: Our policy is to seek agreement within OECD to tighten effective multilateral restrictions over the use of mixed credits and equivalent measures, and to their eventual phasing out.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Rates and Rent (Rebates and Allowances)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households were in receipt of rate rebates and rent rebates and allowances in the London borough of Waltham Forest in each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated number of households receiving rent rebates, rent allowances and rate rebates in the London borough of Waltham Forest in the years requested is as follows:

Year	Rent rebates	Rent allowances	Rate rebates
1978-79	3,100	2,400	Not available
1979-80	3,000	2,200	12,900
1980-81	3,100	2,200	13,800
1981-82	3,400	2,200	16,800
1982-83*	8,200	2,300	22,500
1983-84	9,400	5,600	27,600
1984-85	13,200	7,200	30,400

* Includes from November 1982 for some and from April 1983 for all cases assistance with rent and rates formerly met through supplementary benefit.

Benefits

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish the rates of weekly payment and time limit set for each of the Scottish offices of his Department under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) (Miscellaneous Provisions) Regulations 1985; how many claimants aged under 26 years will be affected; and what is his estimate of the annual savings in Scotland which will accrue from these changes;

(2) what rates of weekly payment and duration of stay have been authorised for Dundee under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) (Miscellaneous Provisions) Regulations 1985; how many claimants aged under 26 years will be affected in each of the Dundee, East and West offices: and what is his estimate of yearly savings.

Mr. Whitney: Details of the maximum amounts of supplementary benefit allowed for ordinary board and lodging and the periods for payment as a boarder for certain unemployed clamants aged 25 and under are set out in annex B of the Government's response to the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee (Cmnd. 9467), a copy of which is in the Library. Separate figures on the numbers of affected claimants and the estimated savings in Dundee and Scotland are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of people in the borough of Southwark claiming supplementary benefit in January; and what was the corresponding figure for each of the preceding six years.

Mr. Whitney: The Borough of Southwark is covered by nine of the department's offices and their boundaries are not conterminous. The total number of persons claiming supplementary benefit from those offices in February (the nearest date to the month requested for which figures are available) of each year since 1979 was:

Year	Number
1979	47,637
1980	46,583
1981	53,711
1982	67,903
1983	76,883
1984	81,896
1985*	90,403

* The figure for February 1985 is provisional.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will identify or estimate the number of recipients of supplementary benefit in the south west of Wales and the south west region, in February of each year since 1983.

Mr. Whitney: The number of persons in receipt of supplementary benefit in the south-west of Wales and the south western region in February of each year since 1983 was:

	South West Wales	South Western Region
1983	64,933	309,719
1984	67,613	315,589
*1985	73,250	336,381

* The figure for February 1985 is provisional.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average payment of social security benefits to unemployed claimants in each region of Great Britain.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Glaucoma

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he or his departmental officials have participated in National Glaucoma Action Week; what consultations he has had with the International Glaucoma Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 3 April at column 640.

Renal Failure

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the percentage of renal failure patients who were treated by dialysis in each of the regional health authorities in England in the last year for which statistics are available.

Mr. John Patten: According to information supplied by the European Dialysis and Transplant Association, the percentage of renal patients receiving treatment by dialysis at 31 December 1982, the latest year for which reliable statistics are available, was as follows:

Percentage of renal patients receiving

Region	Haemodialysis	Peritoneal Dialysis	Total
Northern	35·3	22·4	57·7
Yorkshire	50·1	17·2	67·3
Trent	54·5	16·7	71·2
East Anglian	39·6	1·9	41·5
North West Thames	43·7	8·1	51·8
North East Thames	40·1	17·8	57·9
South East Thames	36·3	8·7	45·0
South West Thames	32·5	30·2	62·7
Wessex	40·8	8·3	49·1
Oxford	34·5	14·1	48·6
South Western	49·9	14·2	64·1
West Midlands	41·1	12·4	53·5
Mersey	41·5	11·6	53·1
North Western	41·2	15·3	56·5

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recommendations he is making to health authorities in the north of England regarding follow up procedures after smear testing for cervical cancer has been carried out.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 29 April to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) at columns 49-50.

In Vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by region the expected waiting time for women requiring in vitro fertilisation treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally.

Health Authorities (Statistics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each district health authority the name of the chairman and the total annual payments made to each of them in that capacity in the last year for which figures are avilable.

Mr. John Patten: Information on payments made to individual chairmen is not held centrally. Details of the honoraria and expenses which may be claimed are given in my reply of 23 October 1984 to the hon. Member for Brent South at column 569. The current rates payable are set out in PM(84)19, copies of which have been placed in the Library. The names of the current district health authority chairmen are as follows:

Health Authorities (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he advised health authorities that contracts for ancillary services should not be determined without prior consultation with his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 25 March 1985. We simply wish to ensure that authorities are acting reasonably, making efforts to secure better standards and taking decisions solely in the interests of the service and patients. We are particularly anxious to continue to ensure that no contract is determined simply as a result of political pressure or industrial action.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will name, for each tendering exercise of which his Department is aware and which was completed since the last named in his answer of 28 January, Official Report, column 55, the health authority and the hospital concerned and the successful tenderer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are aware of the following additional cases:

Ambulance Service

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with South-West Thames regional health authority's provision of an ambulance service in Greater London.

Mr. John Patten: We are more than satisfied; the London ambulance service provides an excellent service to the population of the Greater London area. I am sure that the chairman of the South-West Thames regional health authority, which manages the London ambulance service on behalf of the three other Thames regions, would be pleased to provide the hon. Member with further information.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 65, if he will give for each year since 1975 the number of ambulance service journeys carrying non-National Health Service patients and the total mileage involved.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is as follows:

Ambulance Services. Non-NHS Patients. England

Thousands

	*Number of patient journeys	Mileage
1975	712	4,328
1976	489	3,221
1977	368	2,540
1978	280	2,076
1979†	206	1,808
1980	223	1,830
1981	165	1,504
1982	149	1,271
1983	141	1,157

* A 'patient journey' is the carriage of one patient in one direction.
† 1979 data cover a period of industrial dispute early in 1979.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the total amount of supplementary benefit paid for mortgage interest in each of the past 10 years;

(2) what is the total number of claimants whose mortgage interest was paid under supplementary benefit in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The estimated amount of money added in the assessment of mortgage interest and ground rent, together with the number of claimants for each year from 1974 to 1982, which are the latest figures available, is as follows:

Year	Claimants	Amount added in Assessment £ million
1974	84,000	11
1975	98,000	20
1976	123,000	27
1977	124,000	33
1978	105,000	26
1979	98,000	31
1980	134,000	71
1981	196,000	124
1982	235,000	170

NHS Hospitals (Medical Cover)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of National Health Service hospitals with operating theatres do not provide 24-hour cover by medical practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Patients are admitted into hospitals to the care of medical practitioners. We would expect a responsible medical practitioner to be available, whether on site or on call, at all times.

Health Authorities (Private Patient Income)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any regional health authority has taken into account districts' budgeted income from private patients and other charges in its resource allocations for any year since 1979; and whether his Department has issued any guidance on this subject.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have issued no general guidance to regional health authorities on the treatment of income to districts in determining resource allocations, and we do not collect full and detailed information about Regions' practice in this respect. Our recent guidance on income from blood handling charges does, however, ask for such income to be used to help increase plasma production, and regions will need to take this into account when distributing resources to districts.

Pay Beds

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether all National Health Service hospitals which have wards or wings specifically set aside for private inpatients use the beds therein for non-paying National Health Service patients when they are not fully occupied by private patients.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We expect health authorities to make good use of all the beds that they have. There is a statutory requirement that the use of accommodation and services for private patients will not to a significant extent operate to the disadvantage of National Health Service patients and one of the six principles on private practice which we agreed with the medical profession states that single rooms should not be held vacant for potential private use longer than the usual time between National Health Service patient admissions.

Nurses (Training)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for the latest year for which the figures are available the number of nurses who have completed a training course for the state registered qualification in (a) the Royal Masonic hospital, (b) Cheadle Royal hospital, (c) St. Andrew's hospital, Northampton and (d) any other private hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The former qualification for the state register has, from 1 July 1983, been defined as that for first level nursing. First level nurses are on various parts of the register including general nursing, nursing of people suffering from mental illness and nursing of people suffering from mental handicap.

I understand from the English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting, which keeps such information, that the numbers of nurses who completed a training course for the first level nursing qualification for the year ended 31 March 1985 were as follows:—

	Number
a. the Royal Masonic hospital*	‡60
b. Cheadle Royal hospital	‖15
c. St. Andrew's hospital Northampton†	‖25
d. any other private hospital	NIL

* The Royal Masonic hospital nurse training school is combined with the NHS nurse training school at Queen Mary's hospital, Roehampton and for each nurse the training course involves both sectors.
† The training at St. Andrew's hospital, Northampton is in conjunction with the NHS Northampton hospital school of nursing.
‡ (General).
‖ (Mental Illness).

Private Patients (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a note setting out the formulae and figures used to calculate the 1985-86 charges to private resident patients under section 65 of the National Health Service Act 1977.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. The note is being placed in the Library today.

Consultants

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will institute a survey to determine the number of hours a week devoted to (a) National Health Service work and (b) private practice by consultants, broken down by specialty, by region and by type of contract, whether whole-time, maximum part-time or part-time, honorary.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A survey as suggested by the hon. Member would not be of operational value to the National Health Service and we have no plans to commission one.

Board and Lodging Allowance

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants under 26 years of age in (a) Sunderland, North, (b) the borough of Sunderland and (c) Tyne and Wear currently draw board and lodging allowance.

Mr. Whitney: Separate figures for the Tyne and Wear area are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Patients (North-Western Region)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has concerning the total numbers of inpatients dealt with in hospitals in the north-western region in each of the years since 1975;

(2) what information he has concerning the total number of outpatients seen at hospitals in the north-west region in each of the years since 1975.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the table. Day case attendances are included to complete the picture.

National Health Service hospitals in North Western Regional Health Authority

1983	585,667	99,994	768,578	3,492,227

Medical Services (North-Western Region)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has concerning the numbers of (a) general practitioners, (b) hospital doctors and (c) consultants operating in the north-western region in each of the years since 1978;

(2) if he will give a breakdown by region of the total numbers of medical personnel employed in the north-western region in each of the years since 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The numbers of general practitioners, hospital doctors and consultants operating in the north-western region, and the total numbers of medical personnel employed in this region at 30 September in each year since 1978 are given in the table. It is not possible to provide a sensible breakdown in more detail for medical personnel as a large proportion are employed by the regional health authority itself, although they work in the district. Many doctors also work in more than one district within the region. We do not collect centrally information on the allocation of time worked between districts for staff whose contract is with the RHA.

Year	*General Medical Practitioners	All Hospital Doctors†	Consultants	Total Medical Personnel‡
1978	1,877	2,833	1,008	3,380
1979	1,915	2,926	1,034	3,477
1980	1,981	2,985	1,050	3,562
1981	2,047	3,097	1,085	3,699
1982	2,056	3,183	1,126	3,780
1983	2,118	3,247	1,163	3,868
1984	2,139	3,246	1,180	3,853

Note: The figures are for numbers of staff (not whole time equivalents) and excluded locums, hospital practitioners and part-time medical officers (clinical assistants).

* General practitioners include all principals, assistants and trainees, and relate to 1 October.

† Hospital doctors include consultants.

‡ Total medical personnel include hospital and community health doctors, but exclude general practitioners, who are not directly employed by North Western Region.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social services what information he has concerning the number of midwives and health visitors employed in the north-western region in each of the years since 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The figures requested are as follows:

North-Western Region

*Whole-time equivalent

Staff in post at 30 September	Midwives†	Health visitors‡‖
1978	1,510	880
1979	1,550	920
1980	1,710	890
1981	1,680	910
1982	1,700	920
1983	1,850	1,050

* All figures are rounded to the nearest 10.

† Includes all state certified hospital and community midwives. Excludes agency staff.

‡ Includes health visitors in both the community and school health services, health visitor field work teachers, TB visitors with HV certificates, dual/triple posts and bank health visitors. Excludes HV students.

‖ Due to changes in methods of data collection in 1980, wte staffing figures for health visitors from 1980 onwards are not directly comparable with those for previous years.

In addition, in September 1983, information on bank nursing staff was collected via separate manual returns, whereas they had previously been included with other staff on magnetic tape returns. A minor break in continuity will therefore exist between figures for 1982 and 1983.

Figures for September 1984 are not yet available at this level of detail.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the numbers of dentists in the north-western region offering National Health Service facilities in each of the years since 1975.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The numbers of dentists in the hospital, community dental and general dental services in the north-western region at 30 September in each year since 1975 are given in the table.

Year	Total	Hospital Staff	CDS Staff	General Dental Practitioners
1975	1,055	88	191	776
1976	1,122	87	210	825
1977	1,169	101	212	856
1978	1,210	102	222	886
1979	1,230	107	217	906
1980	1,239	109	200	930
1981	1,247	104	197	946
1982	1,311	108	200	1,003
1983	1,329	107	190	1,032
1984	1,373	104	191	1,087

Note: The figures are for numbers of staff (not whole-time equivalents) and exclude locums, hospital practitioners, and part-time dental officers (clinical assistants).

Abortion

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all those organisations which receive Government funding for counselling work on abortion and state the total amount awarded to each organisation in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We make no grants to any organisations whose main role is counselling and providing help for women with unintended pregnancies. We understand that some health authorities provide financial help to such organisations, but we do not know the amounts involved.

Family Planning

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all those organisations which receive Government funding for educational work on family planning matters and state the total amount awarded to each organisation in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We provide grants for educational work on family planning matters to the following organisations:

Family Planning Association

£138,000 per annum for three years commencing 1 January 1984.

Brook Advisory Centres

£35,000 per annum for three years commencing 1 April 1984.

Catholic Marriage Advisory Council

£34,000 per annum for two years commencing 1 April 1984.

We also support, through the Health Education Council, the family planning information service which produces literature on family planning education. Some health authorities may provide funds for such work, but we do not know the amounts involved.

War Widows' Pensions

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the Government's total expenditure on war widows' pensions in the financial year 1984-85; how the figure compares with that for each of the previous four years; and what was the percentage change in spending in real terms year by year.

Mr. Whitney: The total expenditure on war widows' pensions in 1984-85 was £184 million. The corresponding figures and percentage change for previous years are as follows:

Year	Actual expenditure £ million	Expenditure at 1984 prices £ million	Percentage change in real terms
1980-81	146	192	−2·5
1981-82	166	195	+1·6
1982-83	174	191	−2
1983-84	177	186	−2·6
1984-85	184	184	−1

Whilst there has been a reduction of 4 per cent. in expenditure since 1980-81, there has been a decline in the war widow pensioner population of 10 per cent. in the same period.

Drug Testing

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to regulate the use of human volunteers in tests of new drugs and to provide for compensation to be paid to such volunteers or to their dependants in cases where severe damage or death is caused; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my replies to him on 16 April at columns 126-27.

Housing Benefit

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide his latest estimates for the total numbers of standard housing benefit recipients, differentiating as far as possible between those below and above pensionable age; and if he will estimate how many in each group are also liable for income tax.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 20 December 1984, c. 307]: I regret the delay in providing a full reply, which was caused by unforeseen computer programming difficulties.

We estimate that about 4 million households received standard housing benefit — that is, housing benefit payable to people not receiving supplementary benefit— in September 1983, the latest date for which information is available. Of these, about 2·7 million were pensioner households. In about 50 per cent. of the pensioner households, and in about 70 per cent. of the remaining households, the householder or his partner had a weekly income greater than the weekly equivalent of the appropriate personal income tax allowance.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"The Wild Girl"

Sir Peter Mills asked the Attorney-General if he will prosecute Methuen, the publishers of "The Wild Girl", for blasphemy.

The Attorney-General: This is the first occasion on which the publication has been drawn to my attention. I shall consider the matter and write to the hon. Member.

ENVIRONMENT

Gleneagles Agreement

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions he has had about the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Macfarlane: None.

Grant-related Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the options he had before him for changes in grant-related expenditures for 1985-86; and what are his reasons for accepting or rejecting those options as the case may be.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: This information is contained in a note prepared by my Department entitled "1985/86 Rate Support Grant Settlement: Proposals for changes in the method of determining grant-related expenditure assessments". This note is based on a paper recently discussed in the grants working group of the Consultation Council on Local Government Finance. I have today placed copies of the note in the Library.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Ministers of Housing and Local Government, Ministers of Town and Country Planning, Ministers of Works, Ministers of Public Building and Works and Ministers of Land and Natural Resources, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information requested cannot be made available except at disproportionate cost.

Right to Buy (Business Tenants)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to grant to business tenants of local authorities the right to buy their premises; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No, the Government have no proposals to extend the right to buy to commercial lettings.

Itinerants

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his replies of 24 April, Official Report, column 467, what plans he has to reduce the gap between the number of places for itinerants on local authorities' pitches and authorised private pitches on the one hand and the number of gipsy caravans in England on the other.

Mr. Macfarlane: The prime responsibility for providing sites for gipsies is placed directly upon county councils and London borough councils. Exchequer capital grants are available for providing and equipping local authorities sites. The statistics show that steady progress is being maintained in the provision of new and expanded sites and in the reduction of unauthorised camping. My Department is in constant touch with local authorities about site provision.

Development Control Policy Note 13

Sir Reginald Eyre asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to issue a revised version of development control policy note 13, taking account of major changes in retailing in the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Development control policy note 13 on large new stores, issued in 1977, gives general guidance to those concerned in the operation of planning control. I am considering whether a revision is needed in the light of views which I have received from the local authority associations and retailing interests.

Rent Acts (Review)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his current review of the Rent Acts will be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on 13 March, at column 144.

Royal Docks (Development)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans there are to develop a water sports leisure and recreation centre in the royal docks area; and if the development there of a STOLport would inhibit such plans.

Sir George Young: LDDC's draft development framework for the royal docks area contains a range of proposals for recreational facilities which will make extensive use of the wide expanses of water in the royals. An operational STOLport would restrict the sports that could be undertaken on water immediately surrounding the airport. The corporation anticipates, however, that the size of the water area available in the royals will mean that the STOLport will be entirely compatible with plans for a wide range of water-based activities.

Asbestos

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what steps he is taking to ensure that when factories, offices and so on under his control are sold, the future owners are made aware of any asbestos in their construction;

(2) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that factories, offices and so on under his control are checked by the relevant authorities to ascertain whether asbestos is present in the construction.

Sir George Young: All new leased buildings are surveyed before acquisition and attention is drawn in the survey reports to the presence of any asbestos based materials and appropriate recommendations made. Existing buildings have already been inspected to detect the presence of sprayed asbestos insulation and asbestos lagging and registers have been set up for such buildings giving the location of these materials together with all other asbestos based material known to be present. The condition of sprayed asbestos insulation and asbestos lagging is inspected by PSA inspectors at intervals not exceeding one year and other asbestos based materials at intervals not exceeding two years. In addition all premises are open to inspection at any time by factory inspectors under the control of the Health and Safety Executive.

With regard to the disposal of buildings under my control, it is a requirement that PSA estate surveyors advise prospective purchasers of the presence of asbestos which is known to be a significant health hazard.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what alternative arrangements for the disposal of asbestos from Faslane he is considering in the light of the decision by Monklands district council to withdraw its approval of facilities for dumping at Glenboig.

Sir George Young: So far as I am aware the Glenboig tip has been properly licensed by the Monklands district council to accept asbestos waste; and remains licensed.

Organochlorines

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what restrictions exist on the use of organochlorines in houses and in house construction in European Community countries.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Pollution Control (Regulations)

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet received the report of the joint review committee on the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have now received the report of the joint review committee on the control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980. The committee has produced a very thorough report which will be of great assistance to the Government in considering future policy for the disposal of hazardous waste. Before considering what action may be necessary I intend to study the report carefully and seek the views of others interested in this area, particularly on those issues where alternative options are put forward in addition to agreed recommendations.

The report is being published today and I am pleased to say that it is printed on recycled paper. A copy has been placed in the Library. I would like to take the opportunity to thank members of the committee for the time and effort it has given to its production.

PRIME MINISTER

International Fund for Agricultural Development

Q20. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Prime Minister what proposals she will be making to the Bonn summit for the replenishment of the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The Government share the general hope that agreement will be reached on the replenishment of the international fund for agricultural development at the next donors meeting, on 16-17 May. My right hon. Friend will have this in mind in any discussion of the subject in Bonn.

Trades Union Congress

Q30. Mr. Bidwell asked the Prime Minister when she next plans to meet representatives of the Trades Union Congress.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Rating System

Q62. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister when she expects to be in a position to publish Her Majesty's Government's proposals to reform the rating system; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

When the Government have formulated proposals for reforming local government finance as a result of the studies now in progress they will be published for consultation. It is too early to say when this might be; but it is hoped it might be possible later this year.

Bearsden

Q72. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to Bearsden.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Land Drainage

Q111. Mr. Rowe asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-operation between the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of future policy concerning land drainage and its effect on the environment.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

The two Departments work closely together, and consult before there is any grant aid to a land drainage or flood protection scheme to which there are unresolved environmental objections. The joint guidelines to water authorities and internal drainage boards are being reviewed: and both Departments will be considering responses to the recent consultation document on the "Financing and Administration of Land Drainage, Flood Protection and Coast Protection in England and Wales".

EC (Policy Integration)

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to withold the approval of Her Majesty's Government from any step towards EC political integration; and if she will undertake to seek the opinion of Parliament beforehand if any such proposals are placed on the agenda of any EC Council or Heads of Government meeting.

The Prime Minister: The Government will consider any proposals on their merits and will seek the opinion of Parliament in accordance with the well-established procedures.

Superphénix Reactor

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister, if she has discussed with the French Government their intentions about the possible use for military purposes of plutonium produced by the Superphénix reactor.

The Prime Minister: I refer to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw) to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 3 April 1984 at columns 435-36. We have made known our requirement for assurances of peaceful use of United Kingdom equipment and material supplied to France for the purpose of the collaboration.

Engagements

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 2 May.

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 2 May.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 2 May.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 2 May.

Mr. Duffy asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 2 May.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 2 May.

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend this Morning presided at a Meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. My right hon. Friend is now in Bonn for the economic summit.

Government Priorities

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement outlining the priorities of her Government for the remainder of the current Parliament.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 26 February at columns 132-33.

Security Services (Vetting Procedures)

Mr. Dickens asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the efficacy of the current vetting procedures for members of the security services, with particular regard to their sexual proclivities.

The Prime Minister: Following the recommendations in the report of the Security Commission on the case of Geoffrey Arthur Prime, positive vetting standards and procedures within the intelligence and security agencies are being strengthened to make them as effective as possible within the limits of what is acceptable in a free and democratic society.

Regional Industrial Policy

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will estimate the number of man-weeks of employment created by the Government's regional industrial policy in each region of the United Kingdom in the last 12 months.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 1 May 1985, c. 138]: The available evidence suggests that by 1981 there were of the order of half a million more jobs in the United Kingdom assisted areas than there would have been if regional industrial policy had not operated throughout the period since 1960. No comparable figure is available to indicate how many jobs were lost in non-assisted areas as a consequence of the policy during the period. No regional breakdown of this figure is available and there are no more comparable up-to-date estimates of regional industrial policy's cumulative impact on employment in the assisted areas.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Prime Minister what has been the total cost of the Government's regional industrial incentives in each region of the United Kingdom over the last 12 months.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 1 May 1985, c. 138]: The cost of regional industrial incentives in each region of the United Kingdom in the year to 31 March 1985 is provisionally estimated as follows:

Region	£ million*
Northern	122·2
North West	100·5
Yorkshire and Humberside	42·1
East Midlands	10·2
South West	13·2
Scotland	181·1
Wales	140·7
Northern Ireland	†134·9
United Kingdom	‡744·9

* The items included in the table are Regional Development Grants and Regional Selective Financial Assistance under the Industrial Development Act 1982, and assistance on land and factories in the assisted areas by the English Industrial Estates Corporation and the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies. The figures provided are based on provisional estimates of expenditure, and exclude the administrative costs of operating departments which are, of course, substantial.

† Northern Ireland has a different range of incentives but the figure shown has been restricted to items similar to the main forms of regional incentives available in Great Britain.

‡ All figures are gross and include payments to national industries.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Prime Minister what is the latest estimate of the cost per job created under the Government's regional industrial policy over the past 12 months in each region of the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 1 May 1985, c. 138]: An estimate would need to take account of the expenditure undertaken by Government in support of specific projects, and of the private sector expenditure involved; and would need to take account not only of new jobs, but also jobs safeguarded or the extent of lost jobs through reorganisation within firms, and of the way in which such jobs are sustained. All of this needs to be considered against the expectation of employment in the absence of a policy.

No such estimates are therefore available.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Welsh Plant Breeding Station, Aberystwyth

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, giving his approval under paragraph 9 of the revised charter of the Agricultural and Food Research Council, for the salary of the director of the Welsh Plant Breeding Station, Aberystwyth, he will make it a condition that tenure of the post is expected to be for at least seven years and may not be terminated earlier except for retirement or any exceptional reason.

Mr. Brooke: The Agricultural and Food Research Council is an autonomous body under Royal Charter. Whilst general arrangements for the pay and conditions of service of the council's employees are subject to the approval of my right hon. Friend and the Treasury under the terms of that charter, the details of individual cases are matters for the council to determine. It is not the practice of my right hon. Friend to intervene.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive from the EEC since 1979 relevant to his Department; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Brooke: No directives relevant to this Department have been agreed since 1979.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what complaints and representations he has received about the current membership pattern of the Burnham committee; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 297-98]: I have now decided to review the composition of the teachers' panel of the Burnham Primary and Secondary Committee and have written to all constituent bodies accordingly.

EMPLOYMENT

Wage Statistics

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average remuneration per day worked for (a) a teacher, (b) a police officer, (c) a nurse, (d) a social worker, (e) a non-manual worker and (f) a manual worker for the average of each category at the latest date for which figures are available in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on the average remuneration per day worked is not available. Estimates of average weekly earnings giving details of occupation for full-time employees for April 1984 are published in table X3 of the "New Earnings Survey 1984", part B. A copy of the report is available in the Library.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those trades unions which have refused to allow the opportunity for young people on the youth training scheme to work alongside their members.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am glad to say that the vast majority of trade unions support the youth training scheme and are co-operating in its operation. A small number—such as the Union of Communication Workers, the National Graphical Association, the Society of Graphical and Allied Trades, the Society of Civil and Public Servants and the Civil and Public Servants Association—have either refused to accept the scheme or sought to impose conditions on their support. This has meant that some young people have been deprived of the full rage of training opportunities.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive relevant to his Department from the EEC since 1979; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

WALES

Government Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the equivalent tables for Wales of Table 3:10:2 and Table 3:10:3 in the Government's expenditure White paper (Cmnd. 9428).

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information for Wales, directly comparable with that presented for England in table 3:10:2 of The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88, is not readily available. The following estimates, however, may be compared.

Examination attainments of school leavers, 1982-83

	Wales	England
GCE 'A' Levels
Percentage of school leavers achieving:
1 or more passes	16·5	17·1
3 or more passes	8·6	9·6
GCE 'O' Level and CSE
Percentage of school leavers achieving:
1 or more graded passes*	82·1	90·4
5 or more higher grades†	26·9	26·2

* 'O' level grades A to E or CSE grades 1 to 5.
† 'O' level grades A to C or CSE grade 1.

Figures for Wales comparable with table 3:10:3 in The Government's Expenditure plans 1985-86 to 1987-88, are as follows:

Maintained schools: pupil and teacher numbers (Wales)

(thousands except as indicated)

	1979-80	1980-81	Actual 1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	Projected 1985-86	1986-87	1987-88
Total school population (including special schools)	545·0	532·0	519·1	507·1	499·0	489·5	480·5	473·7	466·3
Pupil numbers:
Under fives	44·6	43·7	43·5	45·9	49·4	49·5	48·4	48·4	48·8
All other primary	254·9	243·9	233·8	221·0	213·7	210·2	210·3	211·4	213·6
Secondary, under school leaving age	220·4	218·0	213·8	212·6	209·3	203·9	196·0	188·7	178·6
Secondary, over school leaving age	20·4	21·6	23·4	23·0	22·2	21·6	21·6	21·1	21·3
Total (excluding special schools)	540·3	527·3	514·5	502·5	494·6	485·2	476·3	469·6	462·3
School participation rates (per cent.):
Under fives	67·1	67·4	66·7	66·9	68·4	69·0	68·8	68·6	68·9
Secondary, over school leaving age	22·4	23·0	24·6	24·5	24·3	24·2	24·4	24·1	24·6
Teachers (numbers employed, full-time equivalents)	29·5	29·0	28·2	27·9	28·1	27·5	26·8	26·1	25·4
Pupil-teacher ratios overall	18·1	18·0	18·0	17·7	17·3	17·4	17·4	17·6	17·7
Special schools:
Pupils	4·7	4·8	4·6	4·6	4·5	4·3	4·2	4·1	4·0
Teachers	0·7	0·7	0·8	0·8	0·7	0·7	0·7	0·6	0·6

Notes:

1. Pupils numbers are as at January in the relevant academic year.
2. The under fives and special school pupil numbers include those attending part-time. Such children are counted as only 0·5 for the purpose of calculating pupil-teacher ratios.
3. Participation rates for under fives express the number of children under five in nursery and primary schools, part-time or full-time, as a percentage of three and four year olds in the population.
4. The over school leaving age participation rate expresses the number of secondary pupils over school leaving age as a percentage of the 16 and 17 year old population.
5. The numbers of teachers given include all teaching staff, whether in school or not (e.g. because they are on courses of in-service training) and count part-time employees according to their full-time equivalence. Pupil teacher ratios derived from this total, as shown in the table, are not a measure of pupil-teacher ratios in schools.

Skillcentres

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the implications of the closure of the west Gwent and Llanelli skillcentres for employment prospects in those areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The plans of the Skillcentre Training Agency and training division of the Manpower Services Commission provide for a sizeable increase in training both in quantity and in terms of its relevance to local labour market needs. Future Skillcentre operations will be an integral part of the overall training provision and there will be no closures in Wales until alternative training arrangements are available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Gas and Electric Cookers

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to take steps to prescribe a maximum outside temperature for gas and electric cookers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: As I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on 8 March, at column 638, my intention is to introduce regulations under the Consumer Safety Act 1978 establishing new maximum permissible temperatures for the fronts and sides of domestic gas and electric cookers below hot level. Discussions with industry, consumer and medical interests are continuing within the framework of the British Standards Institution. A number of technical questions are still outstanding, but progress is being made. I am now revising my original timetable, extending the six months period by one month, and I hope to have regulations ready in draft form in June.

Lead-free Petrol

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made towards the production in the United Kingdom of cars which run on lead-free petrol only; when it is anticipated that such cars will be in full-scale production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The lead in petrol directive 85/210/EEC requires that lead-free fuel be generally available throughout the Community by 1 October 1989. The precise phasing-in arrangements for new cars have not yet been decided. The Commission proposed that all new type approvals from October 1989 and all new registrations from October 1991, should be capable of running on unleaded petrol. The Government consider that it would be sensible for the vehicle directive to enable member states to require all new cars with petrol engines registered from 1 October 1989 to be capable of running on unleaded petrol. In their forward planning the vehicles industry is already taking into account these proposals.

Thames Shiprepair Services Ltd. (Correspondence)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when a reply will be sent to Thames Shiprepair Services Ltd.'s letters of 15 October and 15 January last to his Department about job and ship repair opportunities in Kent.

Mr. Trippier: I replied to the letter dated 15 October, on 30 October. My Department has no record of having received a letter from this company dated 15 January. If a copy can be provided I shall, of course, be happy to deal with it promptly.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes (Carrick) asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive relevant to his Department from the EEC since 1979; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Channon: A large number of EEC Directives relevant to my Department are agreed each year, covering a wide and varied field. To provide the details requested would involve disproportionate cost. A report of technical harmonisation directives proposed, approved of or adopted under article 100 of the treaty of Rome is, however, published from time to time in British Business magazine, published by my Department, most recently on 16 March 1984 (amended on 29 June 1984). A report on the Community's company law harmonisation programme is also published bi-annually by this Department, most recently in January 1985. Both these reports provide appropriate references to the Official Journal of the European Communities. They are both available from the Library.

ECGD (Open Account Scheme)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration has been given by his Department to the future of comprehensive bank guarantees as operated through the open account scheme of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Channon: The open account scheme operated by the Export Credits Guarantee Department is currently under review because it has been losing money and the demand for it has been falling. No decision on its future will be taken until the results of the review, to which all current users of the facilities and representative bodies have been invited to contribute, have been considered.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many exporting companies take advantage of the open account scheme on claims paid by the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Channon: 457 exporting companies are current users of the open account scheme operated by the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Director General of Fair Trading (Report)

Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to publish the report by the Director General of Fair Trading for the year 1984.

Mr. Tebbit: The eleventh annual report by the Director General of Fair Trading was published on 1 May. It covers the period 1 January 1984 to 31 December 1984. Copies of the report have been laid before Parliament.

British Shipbuilders (Privatisation)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about progress in the privatisation of British Shipbuilders' warship-building yards.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 25 March that he had given his consent to the sale of Yarrow Shipbuilders. He has now also given his consent to the sale of Brooke Marine Ltd. to a management consortium. The sale proceeds are £100,000 plus 1 per cent. of moneys received from customers in respect of both certain specified potential export contracts gained within three years of sale and any other significant contracts obtained by the company within one year of sale. British Shipbuilders has agreed to make a partial contribution towards the cost of a limited number of future redundancies, should these arise within one year of sale. Brooke Marine made a loss of £1·24 million in 1983-84 and is expected to make a loss in the year ended 31 March 1985.

British Telecom (Shares)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the number of persons who bought shares in British Telecom who have now sold them.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 29 April 1985 c. 57]: About 2,150,000 applicants were allotted British Telecom shares under the United Kingdom public offer for sale last November. It is estimated that British Telecom now has about 1·75 million shareholders. This implies that around 400,000 of the original allottees have sold their shares and that 81 per cent. of the allottees have held on to their shares. These figures exclude shares held in trust for 222,000 British Telecom employees under the Government's free and matching share offer.

TRANSPORT

Telephones (M1)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek from each of the operators of service areas on the M1 motorway an explanation for the failure of the public telephones on Thursday 4 and Friday 5 April.

Mr. Ridley: The operators of motorway service areas are responsible for the provision of public telephones. I shall write to the right hon. Member explaining the position more fully.

Road Works (Compensation)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will show payments made by highway authorities under the Land Compensation Act 1973, for (a) sound insulation, (b) the purchase of land outside the boundary of highway works, (c) the compulsory purchase of land and buildings within the boundary of highway works, (d) compensation for home loss and (e) compensation for disturbance, for the following road schemes: (i) M25 M40-Maple Cross, (ii) M25 M40 interchange, (iii) M25 A10-M11, (iv) M25 Chertsey-Wisley, (v) M27 Stoneham-Hedge End, (vi) M27 Chilworth-Stoneham, (vii) M65 Whitebirk-Hyndburn, (viii) A40 Ross on Wye relief road, (ix) A40 Northleach by-pass, (x) A43 Broughton by-pass, (xi) A30 Hayle by-pass and (xii) A243 Leatherhead by-pass, showing in each case also the total cost of the scheme.

Mrs. Chalker: Payments under headings (b)—(e) are not recorded separately and could not be produced except at disproportionate cost. Information available, covering expenditure to date, together with the estimated total cost of each scheme is as follows:—

Payments to 1 April 1985

Scheme	Sound insulation £ thousands	Land acquisition and compensation £ million	Total estimated cost including works £ million
(i) and (ii) M25 M4—Maple Cross including M40 interchange	73·6	1·64	85·33
(iii) M25 A10-M11	88·0	4·32	112·74
(iv) M25 Chertsey-Wisley	54·0	3·18	45·73
(v) and (vi) M27 Chilworth-Hedge End	32·0	2·78	45·05
(vii) M65 Whitebirk-Hyndburn	22·7	1·07	29·41
(viii) A40 Ross on Wye Relief Road	Nil	0·03	1·25
(ix) A40 Northleach Bypass	Nil	0·15	2·64
(x) A43 Broughton Bypass	Nil	0·04	3·14
(xi) A30 Hayle Bypass (Polstrong-St. Erth)	Nil	0·74	18·65
(xii) Leatherhead Bypass (M25)	87·5	0·02	22·60

Driving Tests

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many driving tests booked at the Keighley and Skipton test centres for dates since 1 January have been cancelled or postponed because no examiner was available.

Mrs. Chalker: The numbers are as follows:

	Number	In addition tests cancelled because of bad weather
Keighley	179	157
Skipton	298	139
Total	477	296

The Keighley and Skipton driving test centres are normally manned by three examiners. Owing to the unexpected resignation of one of these, only two men have recently been based at the two centres. A third permanent examiner is expected to be posted there on 1 July. Meantime, the traffic area office is posting in examiners temporarily to help out. A fourth permanent examiner is being recruited as soon as practicable.

Merchant Shipping (Defence Requirements)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the inter-departmental study of the defence requirements for merchant shipping in time of hostilities will be complete; and when he intends to report to the House.

Mr. David Mitchell: Later this month I expect to receive the report of the consultants who have been employed to forecast the future availability of merchant ships for the purposes of this joint review. My Department and the Ministry of Defence will then examine the consultants' findings against future defence needs. That examination must be thorough and will inevitably take some time. It would not be appropriate to make any report until it has been completed.

Road Construction

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he expects all the road schemes in the main programme for 1985 to 1987 of the roads White Paper to be built or under construction by March 1987; and which of the schemes on the reserve list he expects to be completed or started in the same period.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

A42 (Motorway Link)

Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the decision in respect of the route for the Ashby to the M1 section of the A42 motorway link road will be made.

Mrs. Chalker: A decision on the route for the Ashby to the M1 section of the A42 trunk road (Castle Donnington north section) is expected to be made within the next two months.

Singapore (Civil Aviation Policy)

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions his Department has had with the Singapore Government about their civil aviation policy and about the availability of reciprocal landing rights in Singapore to a United Kingdom carrier in return for Singapore Airlines flights to Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: As required under Article 12 of the "United Kingdom/Singapore Air Services Agreement" (Cmnd. 4619) consultations are taking place with the aeronautical authorities of Singapore about services to Manchester. The availability of rights of equivalent value to a United Kingdom carrier will be one of the matters for discussion.

National Bus Company

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied that the National Bus Company's pension funds are sufficient to meet all the claims which may be made now or in the future by employees of the National Bus Company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that there is at present a deficiency in one of the funds which is being met by an additional employers' contribution. I have made it clear that the Government will ensure that on privatisation of the National Bus Company's operations, the pension schemes are adequately funded on the basis of actuarial assessment of the future liabilities they will have to meet under their rules.

British Airways (Privatisation)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the implications of the current claim for compensation by Laker Airways for the saleability of British Airways in the proposed privatisation.

Mr. Ridley: As my hon. Friend explained in a written reply to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on 17 January at column 193 uncertainties arising from legal actions, brought under anti trust law in the USA, related to the failure of Laker Airways, had caused some slippage in the plans for privatising British Airways. The airline defendants are seeking to negotiate a settlement of the litigation against them and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the progress of those negotiations. It remains, however, the Government's intention to privatise British Airways as soon as practicable.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Press Gallery (Costs)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Lord Privy Seal what was the cost of the following Press Gallery facilities: (a) telephones, (b) stationery, (c) lighting and heating, (d) equipment, (e) maintenance, (f) cleaning and (g) subsidies to Press Gallery catering and bar in each of the last five years.

Mr. Biffen: Costs for the following facilities in the Press Gallery over the last five years are:

Telephones

Year	Amount £
1984-85	40,370
1983-84	38,500
1982-83	36,470
1981-82	31,290
1980-81	26,550

These charges do not include calls within the London area which are not metered.

Stationery Estimated

Year	Amount £
1984	4,114
1983	3,895
1982	3,842
1981	3,577
1980	3,194

Costs for lighting and heating, equipment, maintenance and cleaning cannot be identified without disproportionate cost. No subsidies are allocated to catering and bar facilities in the Press Gallery.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cotton

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the guide and minimum prices for cotton under the common agricultural policy in 1973 and each of the past five years, the average world price, the cost of the support to the EEC budget, the tonnage qualifying under the arrangement and the amount of aid per tonne, and production imports and exports of cotton in the EEC.

Mr. Macgregor: The information available for cotton is shown below, the aid scheme was introduced in 1981.

Fibre Flax and Hemp

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the rate per tonne of aid under the common agricultural policy for the production of fibre flax and hemp in 1973 and in each of the past five years, the amount produced with such aid, the cost to the EEC budget, the corresponding world price and the amount imported and exported from the EEC.

Mr. Macgregor: The information available is as follows:

¶ January to September only.

Milk

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the increase in the target price for milk under the common agricultural policy for the current year generally and for each country after green currency and other adjustments; what will be the loss of revenue from the reduction in the co-responsibility levy; what is the forecast reduction in output of milk as a result of the total dairy package; and how this compares with the quota.

Mr. MacGregor: for the 1985-86 milk year, the Commission has proposed an increase of 1·5 per cent. in the target price for milk. The Commission has also proposed changes in green rates. If adopted as proposed the combined effect on the target price expressed in national currencies would be:

	Per cent.
Belgium	+1·5
Denmark	+1·5
Germany	+0·43
France	+2·42
Greece	+4·68
Ireland	+1·5
Italy	+1·5
Luxembourg	+1·5
Netherlands	+0·43
United Kingdom	+1·5

If adopted, the proposed reduction in the coresponsibility levy from 3 per cent. to 2 per cent. of the target price would result, it is estimated in a fall in revenue to the Community of 167 million ecu in 1985.

The Commission estimates that for 1985-86 milk deliveries will be approximately equal to the quotas laid down. This would represent a cutback of about 1 per cent. compared with 1984-85 deliveries.

Wine

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the guide intervention, threshold and other prices for wine in 1973 and each of the past five years, the corresponding market prices, the amount spent by way of price support, the volume of wine removed from the market, the total cost to the EEC of disposing of the surplus and production, imports and exports of wine in the EEC.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested is provided in the following tables.

† Until 1984 the Commodity year ran from December to December; it now runs from September 1 to 31 August;
‡ The "Guide Price" is the equivalent of a target price;
‖ The "Activating Price" is set at 92 per cent. of the Guide Price and triggers some intervention measures;
¶ The "Reference Price" is the Community threshold price for imports.

Livestock Units (Expenditure)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each common agricultural policy product the amount spent in 1984-85 on each hectare or livestock unit in the United Kingdom under the European Economic Community budget in direct subventions, export rebates, and so on.

Mr. MacGregor: Expenditure in 1984-85 on market regulation under the CAP is summarised by principal commodity in table 28 of the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" (Cmnd. 9423). Against total forecast expenditure of £1,424·1 million the Community budget was expected to contribute £1,087·1 million as follows:

	£ million
Cereals	194·4
Beef and veal	*228·4
Pigmeat	−10·1
Sugar	63·1

† Including the premium schemes for the non-marketing of milk and the conversion of dairy herds.
‡ Including annual premium on ewes.

Details of crop areas and livestock numbers are given in table 3 of Cmnd. 9423.

(a) The data in this table vary between the different countries as follows:—
England and Wales: For all years the figures relate to all known agricultural holdings including minor holdings (previously called statistically insignificant holdings).
Scotland: From 1973 the figures relate to all known agricultural holdings with 40 smd or more. (A standard man-day (smd) represents 8 hours' productive work by an adult worker under average conditions.) Prior to June 1977 following the 1976 minor holding census 1,700 holdings were transferred fom the main to the minor category.
Northern Ireland: From 1973 to 1980 the figures relate to all known agricultural holdings with (i) 40 smd or more, or (ii) 4 hectares or more of total area, or (iii) one or more full-time workers, excluding the owner. The figures for 1981 onwards relate to all known holdings with: (i) one European Size Unit (ESU) or more, or (ii) 6 hectares or more of total area, or (iii) one or more full-time workers, excluding the owner. (A European Size Unit equals 1,000 European Units of Account of standard gross margin at average 1972-74 values.) The change between 1980 and 1981 resulted in the net deletion of 7,000 holdings but their exclusion has had an insignificant effect on the cropping and stocking figures.
(b) Cereals for threshing, exluding maize.
(c) Collected separately in Scotland from 1982 and in Northern Ireland from 1984.
(d) Includes small area of soft fruit grown under orchard trees in England and Wales.
(e) Hardy nursery stock, bulbs and flowers.
(f) Most of the difference between total horticultural area and the sum of individual sectors is made up by the glasshouse area.
(g) Includes area of other crops and bare fallow not shown in the table.
(h) Before 1975 collected as:
In England and Wales—"clover, sainfoin and temporary grasses";
In Scotland—"grass under 7 years old";
In Northern Ireland—"grass 1st, 2nd and 3rd year".
(i) Before 1975 collected as:
In England and Wales—"permanent grass";
In Scotland—"grass 7 years old and over";
In Northern Ireland—"grass 4th year or older".
(j) In June 1973 "other land" in Great Britain was collected as woodland and areas under roads, yards, buildings, etc., the use of which was ancillary to farming of the land; in Northern Ireland it included land within agricultural holdings which was under bog, water, roads, buildings, etc., and waste land not used for agriculture. In June 1974 the definition was changed in England and Wales to include all other land forming part of the holding and in Scotland it was extended to include ponds and derelict land. The Northern Ireland definition is unchanged.
(k) Small adjustments made retrospectively following the 1983 census of minor holdings in England.

(a) This table excludes expenditure which may benefit farmers but where the value to them is not shown by the expenditure (e.g. expenditure on animal disease or on research, advice and education). It also excludes most expenditure on agriculture in Northern Ireland, borne on the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. It does, however, include some expenditure which benefits consumers and trade interests rather than producers. The figures for years up to and including 1983-84 represent actual expenditure recorded in the Appropriation Accounts. The figures for 1984-85 are the latest estimates of expenditure.

(b) The figures are made up of several elements and include refunds on intra-Community trade, import and export refunds on third country trade, the beef and sheep variable premium schemes (net of clawback for sheepmeat and charges on beef exported and sold into intervention), aid for private storage and animal feed, certain other marketing and production subsidies and the cost of purchasing commodities into intervention less proceeds from sales. The figures also take account of other receipts treated as negative expenditure, namely monetary compensatory amounts levied on intra-Community trade and the co-responsibility and supplementary levies on milk producers. The figures include the EC butter subsidy and the United Kingdom share of the EC school milk subsidy scheme.

(c) Includes eggs, poultrymeat, fruit and vegetables, hops, herbage seeds, dried fodder, peas and beans, fisheries, flax and aid to beekeepers. Also includes expenditure on products covered by the CAP but not produced to any significant extent in the United Kingdom (olive oil, rice, wine, grapemust and hemp).

(d) Price guarantee arrangements for sheep were superseded by the EC sheepmeat regime on 20 October 1980.

(e) Payments in respect of wool and potatoes relate partly to the clip or crop of the year indicated and partly to the clip or crop in the preceding year or years. The negative figure for wool reflects the stabilisation arrangements with the British Wool Marketing Board whereby advance payments made by the Exchequer are repayable from later surpluses when auction prices are above the guaranteed price.

(f) Includes the Farm and Horticulture Development Schemes.

(g) Farmers in special areas are also eligible for additional assistance under the Agriculture and Horticulture Development Scheme, Northern Ireland Agricultural Development Programme and the Agriculture and Horticulture Grant Schemes. The estimated benefit is shown separately in Section IV on the table.

(h) Includes the Farm and Horticulture Capital Grant Schemes.

(i) Includes grants in respect of investment on loan guarantees, producer organisations, agricultural drainage and milk pasteurisation equipment (for which provision was included in the 1984-85 Supply Estimates) and farm structure loans.

(j) The receipts from the Guidance Section of the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund do not relate to expenditure incurred during the financial year but mainly to expenditure incurred in the calendar year preceding the financial year.

(k) Includes grants for forage groups, integrated development programme for Western Isles, producers in the Scottish Islands and crofting improvements. Provision for this expenditure was included in the 1984-85 Supply Estimates.

Food Labelling

Mr. Beggs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if consultation has taken place with the Dairy Trade Federation regarding proposed changes in food labelling regulations related to cheese products of less than 20 per cent. fat.

Mrs. Fenner: We hope to issue proposals for revised cheese regulations to the Dairy Trade Federation and other interested parties within the next few months.

Milk Producers

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has about the arrangements for lists of milk producers to be held in European Economic Community member states for the application of the supplementary levy; what member states are doing to implement these arrangements; and what measures are available to monitor effective implementation.

Mr. MacGregor: The administrative arrangements for the supplementary levy place much of the responsibility on the purchasers of milk who are required by Commission Regulation 1371/84 to hold at the disposal of authorities in member states records covering the previous three years, showing on a quarterly basis for each producer:

(i) name and address;
(ii) quantities of milk purchased during the quarter concerned and during the corresponding quarters of the reference year adopted by the Member State;
(iii) quarterly quota;
(iv) quantities of milk or milk equivalent purchased during the quarter which are over quota.

Member states are not required to aggregate these records nationally. The Regulation also requires member states to adopt appropriate measures to ensure collection of levy, including inspection measures and to ensure that those concerned are aware of the sanctions for non-compliance.

Dairies purchasing milk would normally have records of their supplying producers and the volume of purchases.

Our inquiries on the situation in other member states indicate that in Belgium there are numerous dairy co-operatives who account for almost all production and have adequate records. In Denmark the milk committee of the Danish Dairy Federation is in a position to prepare a list of producers sending milk to the dairy co-operatives. In France each purchasing dairy maintains records on a daily basis of producers' deliveries and these are liable to periodic inspection by the French intervention agency. In Germany the records held by dairies would be subject to inspection by the Lander authorities. In Ireland lists of producers are generally held by the co-operatives. In Luxembourg the purchasing dairies have good records. In the Netherlands full records are held by the commodity boards for dairying and have already been used for making checks. In Italy a census of all milk producers has been carried out. In Greece administrative arrangements are being introduced but production is in any case well below quota. We have had no reports suggesting that the lack of centrally held records creates difficulties for administration through the purchasers of milk.

The Commission is examining the measures taken by member states to verify that the Community regulations have been respected. It has available powers to penalise member states which fail to implement the arrangements and has already made use of them. Moreover the Commission has said that it will be making use of the provisions available to it which enable their officials to carry out inspections in the Member States. In making their inspections they have the right to examine relevant documents to ensure that administrative and financial arrangements have been correctly carried out.

EC Fisheries Inspectorate

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in connection with the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EEC, there are plans to increase the number of people employed in the European Economic Communities fisheries inspectorate.

Mr. MacGregor: The size of this inspectorate is primarily a matter for the European Commission, whose staff the inspectors are. We have impressed upon the Commission the need to ensure that the strength of the inspectorate is adequate to meet the increased demands that will be placed upon it after Spain and Portugal have joined the Community.

Agricultural Land (Value)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated capital value of agricultural land in the United Kingdom in the latest year for which figures are available compared to 1960 and 1970.

Mrs. Fenner: The estimated capital value of agricultural land in the United Kingdom, (including the value of agricultural buildings, but not dwellings) is shown below for the years 1966, 1970 and 1983. Comparable figures for earlier years are not available. Over the 17 year period the increase in value in real terms, ie deflated by the retail price index, was one-third.

Estimated capital value of agricultural land in the United Kingdom

	£ billion
1966	5·0
1970	5·0
1983	37·0

Source: Derived by Central Statistics Office from the value of agricultural and other land as published in Economic Trends 1980 and Financial Statistics 1985.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Victim Support Schemes

3. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide grants to local victim support schemes for travel, postage and printing expenses.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to provide grants for this purpose. We have a high regard for the work of victim support schemes, but they should be able to look to their local communities to finance their incidental expenses.

Crime Prevention

5. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will increase funding for crime prevention schemes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We attach importance to the provision by the Department of advice and assistance to local authorities, the police and the community generally in promoting crime prevention initiatives. Financial support for innovative schemes designed to prevent or alleviate the effects of crime will continue to be available through the urban programme. Applications from local authorities to fund schemes in this financial year are currently being considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Citizenship Applications

18. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that women whose applications for citizenship have been delayed pending consideration of their husband's immigration status will now have their applications given priority.

Mr. Waddington: Arrangements have been introduced with the object of preserving the place in the queue of a wife's application while her papers are being used in the consideration of her husband's immigration status. If the woman's application comes to the top of the queue when her papers are still elsewhere in the Department some delay is bound to occur while study of the papers is completed and the papers returned but every effort is made to keep this to a minimum.

Asylum

19. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many decisions regarding asylum he made in 1984; and how many outstanding applications there are.

Mr. Waddington: During 1984 decisions were reached on about 1,900 applications for asylum. Provisional figures indicate that there were some 4,390 applications outstanding as at 31st March 1985, excluding those from Vietnamese refugees.

Motorway Speeding

20. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions for motorway speeding there were in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Information for 1984 is not yet available. In 1983 there were 25,300 convictions at magistrates' courts in England and Wales for exceeding the 70 mph speed limit on motorways.

High-crime Areas (Insurance)

21. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will introduce legislation to provide for the funding by his Department of low-cost insurance schemes in high-crime areas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No; but, as indicated in the Government's reply (Cmnd 9457) to the report of the home affairs committee on compensation and support for victims of crime, we are pursuing the possibility of local authorities arranging block insurance to cover household contents.

Miss Hilda Murrell

24. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress which has been reported to him of the investigation by the West Mercia police into the death of Miss Hilda Murrell.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of West Mercia constabulary that this investigation is continuing, as is the review of the case being conducted by Mr. Smith, assistant chief constable of Northumbria.

Air Weapons

25. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he remains satisfied with the operation of the law and regulations relating to air weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The controls on air weapons are already extensive, and were the subject of a national publicity campaign at the end of 1983. We will consider the case for a further advertising campaign when the statistics on air weapon offences committed during 1984 become available later this year.

Civil Defence

26. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to require local authorities to make all details of the civil defence war plans available to persons and interest groups who seek access to them.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The draft consolidated emergency planning guidance to local authorities (a copy is in the Library of the House) asks that with the possible exception of personal details plans should be open documents. How this is achieved is a matter for local authorities.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what organisations he has consulted about the likely number of casualties after a nuclear attack.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government do not make detailed estimates of casualties, which would depend on the strategic intentions of the enemy at the time and other factors which cannot be predicted.

Crime Prevention and Victim Support Schemes

27. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will grant central funding from his Department to crime prevention and victim support schemes currently supported by the Greater London council and metropolitan counties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to provide Home Office funding in direct substitution for grants currently made by the GLC or the metropolitan counties. After these authorities have been abolished, crime prevention and victim support schemes will continue to be eligible for financial support from London boroughs and metropolitan districts, and from central Government via the urban programme and the community programme.

Prison Building Programme

28. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in the prison building programme.

Mr. Mellor: The first of the the new prisons in the programme to be completed received its first inmates in February. Two further new prisons are due for completion later this year, two in 1986 and three in 1987. Eight other new establishments are at various stages of planning and design. In addition we are undertaking a substantial programme of repair, modernisation and redevelopment of the existing prison estate. The building programme remains on course to end overcrowding by the end of this decade.

Channel Islands (Drugs)

29. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Channel Islands authorities regarding the use of the islands by drug traffickers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Discussions have taken place between Home Office officials and representtives of Jersey and Guernsey in the past year on the possibility of moneys from drug activities passing through the islands; a joint meeting is to be held later this month. The possible use of the islands by drug traffickers is a matter for the islands' authorities, but at their request their police forces are inspected regularly by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary who are satisfied that suitable precautions are taken to prevent the illegal importation of drugs. There is also close liaison and co-operation between Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the enforcement agencies in the Islands.

Immigration Rules (Interpretation)

30. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to revise the guidance circulated to immigration officers about how to interpret the requirement that the primary purpose of a marriage should not be immigration.

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. and learned Friend will consider whether any revised guidance is necessary when the terms of the judgment of the High Court in the case of Bhatia are available.

Criminal Justice Act 1982

31. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the operations of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Mr. Mellor: The Act, the main provisions of which came into force in May 1983, strengthened and made more flexible the powers of the courts in dealing with offenders, and introduced a new sentencing structure for young offenders. We are monitoring the use of the new powers closely, and will before long be publishing a statistical bulletin about the sentencing of young offenders since the Act came into force.

Drug Abuse

32. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has received to his latest initiative against drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: If my hon. Friend has in mind the Government's education and information campaign, I refer him to the reply given to a question from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) on 28 March, at column 273.

Chief Constables

33. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors are taken into account when calculating the salaries of chief constables; and whether he is reviewing the salaries paid to senior police officers including chief constables.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In negotiations on increases in the pay of chief police officers, the Police Negotiating Board has been guided by the report of the Edmund-Davies Committee, published in July 1978, which recommended that the pay of police officers above the rank of chief superintendent should be updated annually by reference both to movements in the average earnings index during the previous 12 months and to changes elsewhere in the community. Last year, the board undertook a joint review of the pay of chief police officers, including an element of job evaluation. The findings of the review were taken into account by the board in negotiating increases in the pay of chief police officers with effect from 1 September 1984, which my right hon. and learned Friend recently approved.

Licensing Laws

34. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received advocating changes in the licensing laws.

Mr. Mellor: In addition to questions advocating changes in the licensing law, we have received 10 letters from hon. Members in support of changes in the law and two from members of the public since 1 March this year.

Metropolitan Police

35. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will next meet the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to discuss the reorganisation of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Brittan: I do not have any specific plans at present for a further meeting with the Commissioner to discuss this subject, but I intend to continue to keep in close touch with him as the reorganisation is implemented.

Police (Establishments)

36. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received from police authorities for increased establishments.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In January, my right hon. and learned Friend approved 46 additional posts in response to applications from three police authorities for increases in their police establishment for the financial year 1985-86. He is considering applications from another six police authorities for a total of 80 posts.

Immigration Control

37. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will produce a detailed response to the recommendations in the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration control procedures.

Mr. Waddington: A full analysis of the recommendations of the CRE report is being produced. My right hon. and learned Friend shall consider when it is completed how best to make our conclusions available.

Animal Experiments

38. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pending the publication of his White Paper on animal experiments, he will call for a suspension of the Draize eye irritancy test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. As I explained in my reply to a question from the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 1 April at column 445, there is no non-sentient alternative at present to this necessary test.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek and publish in the Official Report information as to why there was a greater need for experiments on living animals in 1983 in household chemicals experiments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I do not think there is any special reason at present to make specific inquiries about the reasons for the increase in the number of experiments to test household chemicals in 1983. Although the increase in this category is in contrast with the generally downward trend in animal experiments in 1983, it is not out of line with fluctuations in the number of household chemicals tests over the previous six years. If the number of experiments to test household chemicals shows a significant increase in 1984, however, we will consider whether more detailed inquiries are justified.

Drug Traffickers

39. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements there are for the exchange with foreign countries of banking and other financial information on suspected drug traffickers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Disclosure of such information depends on each country's law and practices. There is close contact with other countries in this field and any available information would normally be exchanged via Interpol.

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Prison Service Industries and Farms is the only organisation within the Home Department concerned with manufacturing and sales. It is about the review aspects of its marketing strategy, including market research, with the aid of commercial consultants.

Prisoners (Death Statistics)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the prisoner referred to in the answer of 17 April, Official Report, column 169, as having died of natural causes, kidney failure, died of untreated renal failure or despite treatment.

Mr. Mellor: The prisoner concerned died whilst in a National Health Service hospital where she had been admitted some two months previously. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on the treatment given to an individual patient which is a matter for the consultant concerned.

Prisoners (Families)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the cost to his Department of the scheme to assist prisoners' families with the expense of visiting their relatives in prison; and if he will place a copy of the scheme in the Library.

Mr. Mellor: Final figures for the financial year 1984—85 are not yet available and I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) on 20 December 1984 at column 292. A summary of entitlements under the scheme is provided by the supplementary benefits handbook, a copy of which is in the Library.

Videotape Recordings (Censorship)

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be able to designate the British Board of Film Censors as the classifying authority for videotape recordings.

Mr. Mellor: Under section 4 of the Video Recording Act 1984 my right hon. and learned Friend proposes to designate the principal officers of the board. Now that the vacancy in the chairmanship of the board has been filled by the appointment of the Earl of Harewood, he expects to be able to lay particulars of the proposed designation before Parliament shortly.

Identity Cards

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received advocating the introduction of identity cards for the population.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My hon. Friend wrote to the Home Secretary on February on this subject. The question has also been raised in letters received from other hon. Members and members of the public.

HMS Conqueror (Log Books)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commssioner of Police of the Metropolis about the latest progress of police inquiries into the disappearance of log books from HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that police inquiries are continuing.

European Music Day

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables about the arrangements they are making for the holding of celebrations in public places to mark European Music Day on Saturday 22 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are not aware of any need to do so. As with other public events, chief officers of police will make whatever policing arrangements seem appropriate in local circumstances.

Shop Hours

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to promote legislation on shop hours; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook).

Police Vehicles (Accidents)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many road accidents involving police vehicles on emergency calls have occurred in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many people have (a) been killed or (b) been injured as a result of road accidents involving police vehicles on emergency calls in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Prisons (Education Facilities)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied that education units in Her Majesty's prisons are being used to their maximum capacity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Subject to operational constraints and the resources available, governors do their best to ensure that optimum use is made of the education unit, within the framework of management accountability set out in circular instruction No. 55/1984 to governors, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to take to seek to ensure that inmates of Her Majesty's prisons studying with the Open University are not moved to establishments where such study facilities are not available.

Mr. Mellor: Where possible, arrangements are already made to ensure continuity of study if an inmate has to be transferred. Where other factors require a transfer to an establishment which is not designated for Open University study the move may be timed to coincide with a normal break in studies.

Mr. Alhaji Umaru Dikko

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce his decision on the application for political asylum made by Alhaji Umaru Dikko.

Mr. Waddington: Mr. Dikko's application is still under consideration.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reply he has given to the request by the Government of Nigeria for the extradition of Alhaji Umaru Dikko.

Mr. Mellor: The request is still under consideration.

Immigration Statistics

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of India have been either deported or refused entry clearance into the United Kingdom in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waddington: The information is given in the following table:

Number of persons deported from or refused clearance for entry to the United Kingdom

Number

Year	Indian citizens deported	Persons in India refused entry clearance*
1979	45	2,120
1980	59	1,980
1981	61	1,280
1982	52	1,410
1983	44	1,670
1984	44	1,250

* For entry for immediate settlement or for admission for a limited period as husbands, fiancees, students, visitors etc.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive from the EEC since 1979 which is relevant to his Department; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Mellor: As far as I am aware the only council directives bearing upon matters for which the Home Office has the lead responsibility are the second (COM(81)137) and third (COM(84)348) summer time directives on the starting and finishing dates for summer time. Orders conforming with the provisions of the second directive were approved by Parliament; and will shortly be laid in respect of the third directive.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to seek the opinion of the House before any decision is made by Her Majesty's Government to renew the acceptance by the United Kingdom of article 25 of the European Convention on Human Rights in January 1986.

Mr. Mellor: I am very aware of hon. Members' interest in this matter and I have much in mind the need to keep Parliament informed. I regret that no undertaking can be given at this stage, however, that parliamentary time could be made available for the purpose of a debate on this issue.

Deportation

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by nationality the number of people who have been deported from the United Kingdom in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waddington: The following table gives the information:

Persons deported from the United Kingdom 1979 to 1984

Police Violence

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the present alleged incidence of the use by police of excessive violence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In 1984 the investigation of 3,278 complaints against police officers alleging assault was completed; 112 complaints were substantiated. In the same year 12 police officers were convicted in the criminal courts of offences of violence and four were sentenced to terms of imprisonment.

Detention Centres

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he has had about the sections relating to detention centres in the report from the Association of Directors of Social Services, entitled, "Children Still in Trouble", a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has received a copy of the report and will study it with interest, including the passages on detention centres.

SCOTLAND

Rating and Valuation Service

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the cost of the rating and valuation service in Scotland in each of the past five years.

Mr. Ancram: On the basis of information provided by local authorities for the years 1981-82 to 1985-86 inclusive, current expenditure by regional and islands authorities on lands valuation and the collection of rates is as follows:

	Local authority current expenditure on:
	Lands valuation £000 (cash)	Collection of rates £000 (cash)
1981-82	8,122	11,743
1982-83	8,324	13,389
1983-84	8,593	12,416
1984-85	10,060	14,963
1985-86	10,247	16,139

Notes:

1. All information is taken from expenditure returns provided by local authorities.
2. The figures for 1981-82 to 1983-84 are final or near final outturns; the figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are provisional outturns and budget estimates respectively.
3. The figures for collection of rates for all years include the cost of administering rate rebates.

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why it is impracticable for him to consult the Nature Conservancy Council before issuing licences to kill cormorants.

Mr. John MacKay: As required by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, my right hon. Friend consults the NCC as to the circumstances in which, in the opinion of the council, licences should be granted for shooting cormorants for the purpose of preventing serious damage to fisheries. As I indicated to the hon. Member on 25 April, cormorants are a problem to the valuable salmon and trout fisheries generally in Scottish inland waters. No useful purpose would be served by consulting the NCC about individual applications for licences, which generally related to extensive stretches of open water.

"Smoking—The Scottish Epidemic"

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the document entitled, "Smoking—The Scottish Epidemic", by the Committee on Smoking and Health, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. John MacKay: I am grateful to the Scottish Committee of Action on Smoking and Health for this revision of the "Scottish Epidemic" which it first published in 1983. The document brings out in a unique way the tragic extent of premature death and avoidable illness caused by cigarette smoking in Scotland by quoting the statistics on various local bases.

Smoking (Health Costs)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what he estimates is the annual cost of smoking to the National Health Service; and what steps he has taken to reduce this cost.

Mr. John MacKay: Any estimate of the cost of smoking to the NHS will depend on the assumptions made in its calculation and there is no single correct figure. The figure of "at least" £21·488 million used by the Scottish Committee of Action on Smoking and Health is a reasonable estimate of the inpatient costs attributable to smoking on certain assumptions.

I attach importance to ensuring that no one smokes without being aware of the health hazards involved; and the key to our strategy is the promotion of health education. In addition to negotiation of voluntary agreements with the industry, other Government initiatives have included the issue of guidelines to retailers to prevent the illegal sale of cigarettes to children and the issue of leaflets to schools showing recent research facts about under-age smoking.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now introduce legislation to ban all advertising and promotion of cigarettes and tobacco.

Mr. John MacKay: No. The Government prefer to continue to proceed in this area by way of voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry.

Heart and Lung Diseases

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of people admitted to hospitals in the last year in Scotland suffering from (a) ischaemic heart disease, (d) lung cancer and (c) bronchitis and emphysema.

Mr. John MacKay: Statistics about patients treated in hospital for various disorders relate to the numbers discharged, not to those admitted. Figures are not yet available for 1984.

In 1983 the following numbers of people were discharged from hospital in Scotland after treatment for (a) ischaemic heart disease, (b) lung cancer and (c) bronchitis and emphysema.

Principal diagnosis

	Male	Female	Total
(a) ischaemic heart disease	19,110	11,342	30,452
(b) lung cancer	6,918	2,823	9,741
(c) bronchitis and emphysema	2,266	1,245	3,511

Rates

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of additional civil servants who would be required to implement a system of local income tax to replace the present domestic rating system, and the probable cost against the public expenditure budget in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Chapter 6 of the December 1981 Green Paper "Alternatives to Domestic Rates" (Cmnd. 8449) made some estimates on various assumptions of the costs and manpower required to administer a local income tax. No more recent estimates are available to me, but I have no reason to believe the orders of magnitude will have changed substantially.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received from commercial businesses in Scotland whose rateable value has increased by more than a factor of four; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: I have received quite a number of letters from commercial ratepayers in Scotland whose rate bills have very substantially increased following revaluation, but I cannot say how many of these had their rateable value multiplied by more than four.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider introducing measures to provide for the implementation of selective rates relief for all commercial businesses whose rates for 1984-85 have risen by more than a factor of four due to revaluation in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: There is at present no statutory machinery for giving such relief to commercial ratepayers. Nevertheless, the Government are concerned at the reported outcome of revaluation on a number of such ratepayers, and are currently involved in a ministerial review of the present system of financing local government.

Scottish Tourist Board

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what level of funding he proposes for the Scottish tourist board in 1985-86; and how this figure compares with that for 1984-85.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend intends to seek Parliament's approval for total grant aid to the board of £8·8 million in the current financial year. This compares with original budget estimate provision of £8·5 million in 1984-85.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total amount paid out in grants by the Scottish Tourist Board in 1984-85; and how this figure compares with the total amounts in the three previous financial years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is provided in the table:

	Amount paid out in grants £ million
1981-82	2·1
1982-83	2·1
1983-84	2·9
1984-85	4·3

Traffic Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the daily traffic flow figures recorded for the following roads (a) the M8 from Ratho to Newhouse, (b) the A9 from Perth, (c) the Forth Road Bridge, (d) the A92 at Hillend, (e) the A74, (f) the M9 from Ratho to Falkirk and (g) the M90.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

Route and location	Annual average flow vehicles per 24 hour day	Year counted	Estimate for 1983
(a) M8 Harthill-Newhouse	22,028	1981	23,886
(b) A9 North of Perth	7,977	1981	8,732
(c) Forth Road Bridge	32,880	1984	—
(d) A92 Hillend	12,258	1980	*14,634
(e) A74 Between A73 and A70	15,816	1982	16,427
(f) M9 Philpstoun-Linlithgow	13,205	1980	14,295
(g) M90 Pitreavie-Halbeath	17,665	1982	18,401

* In May 1984, a 7-day average of 16-hour daily counts at Hillend gave the following results: East of village 19,500
West of village 17,000

Note: The 1983 estimates in the table are based on the most recent actual count for the year shown, factored to take account of national traffic growth for the type of road concerned. Exceptional local factors have not been taken into account. The figures are annual averages: actual daily flows may be substantially higher or lower depending on seasonal and other variations.

Forth Road Bridge (Tolls)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set up an inquiry to review the financial arrangements placed upon the joint Forth road bridge board and the uses of the bridge in line with the recommendations of the public local inquiry into Forth road bridge tolls of 1981-82.

Mr. Ancram: No.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the change in the level of use of the Forth road bridge once tolls are raised from 30p to 40p.

Mr. Ancram: This is not expected to be significant.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Immigration Clearance Interviews (Tape Recording)

Mr Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwwealth Affairs if he will now introduce tape-recording of entry clearance interviews.

Mr. Renton: Following my visit to Pakistan and Bangladesh earlier this year, I have concluded that the costs of providing official tape recordings of interviews to proper standards would be disproportionate to the benefits.

I understand that similar considerations apply to the tape recording of interviews carried out in this country following application for entry clearance.

United Nations Integrated Programme for Commodities

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the United Nations integrated programme for commodities; what progress has been made in respect of each commodity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We continue to support the integrated programme for commodities (IPC) adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its fourth session in 1976.

Either in its own right, or as part of the European Community, the United Kingdom is a member of all existing international commodity agreements set up under the IPC. These comprise agreements for tin, coffee, cocoa and rubber which are designed to stabilise prices—the last two are soon to expire and are currently being renegotiated—and two "other measures" agreements, for jute and tropical timber, which are largely concerned with research and development. As a member of the Community, we also belong to agreements covering wheat and olive oil designed to improve market conditions by consultation between producers and consumers. The Community is a member, too, of a purely administrative agreement for sugar. The United Kingdom ratified the common fund for commodities, another element of the IPC, in 1981.

We continue to work to ensure that these commodity agreements operate as effectively as possible, and are participating constructively in international work to establish the scope for new agreements or other arrangements for the IPC commodities on a commodity by commodity basis. We support the conclusion of new agreements where they are feasible, cost-effective and beneficial to both producers and consumers alike.

Tel Aviv (Incident)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received from Her Majesty's ambassador in Tel Aviv regarding the incident described by representatives of the general command of Palestine revolution forces, as broadcast on Voice of Palestine at 1530 hours Greenwich mean time on 22 April, that a ship carrying Palestine guerillas was sent on 20 April to attack targets within the city of Tel Aviv itself; and what observations Her Majesty's ambassadors in Arab countries have made to their host Governments regarding the effect of violence of this kind by Palestine guerillas on the Venice declaration peace process, or that outlined by President Reagan.

Mr Renton: We have noted that responsibility for this incident was claimed by a group which rejects current initiatives to reach a peaceful solution to the Arab-Israel dispute. Our condemnation of violence from whatever quarter is well known. We continue to believe that a solution can be reached only through peaceful negotiations btween the parties directly concerned, at which the voice of the Palestinians would be heard.

Namibia (Fishing Limits)

Mr. Martin Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the European Economic Community recognises a 12-mile nautical fishing limit off the coast of Namibia in South-West Africa.

Mr. Renton: There is no fishing agreement between th Community and Namibia and so the question of recognition by the Community of Namibian fishing limits has not arisen.

Human Rights

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the number of individual applications made against each of the states which have accepted the right of individual petition under article 25 of the European convention on human rights for 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Renton: As the European Commission of Human Rights does not maintain a statistical record, broken down by country, showing the number of applications made against individual member states, no such information is available to me.

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the cost to Her Majesty's Government in the latest 12 months for which figures are available of dealing with individual applications against the United Kingdom lodged with the European Commission of Human Rights including those referred to the court.

Mr. Renton: The information is not available and can be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many cases have been referred to Her Majesty's Government for observations by the European Commission of Human Rights; and what is the subject matter of these cases.

Mr. Renton: Since 1966 a total of 823 cases have been communicated to us by the European Commission of Human Rights.

In every case where the Commission has requested observations, these have been supplied. In some cases the Commission does not make a request and in others additional observations are submitted either at the request of the Commission or where the Government consider it appropriate.

Figures for the numbers of observations submitted over the period are not available.

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many cases arising from individual applications against the United Kingdom are currently known to be under consideration by the European Commission of Human Rights; and if he will briefly list the subject matter of each such case.

Mr. Renton: A member state is not officially notified when an individual application is made against it to the European Commission of Human Rights. Such information becomes available only when the Commission communicates the case to the Government. At the end of 1984 a total of 132 cases against the United Kingdom were before the Commission. The subject matter of these was:

	Number
Prisoners' complaints on conditions	18
Prisoners access to correspondence	4
Prisoners' letters censorship	27
Nationalisation compensation	2
Deportation orders	6
Refused entry to United Kingdom	11
Lease hold reform	2
Mental health detainees	6
Wardship cases	5
Corporal punishment	8
Freedom of expression	2
Unlawful detention	3
Immigrants rule	25
Video piracy	1
Trade union disputes	3
Sex change	3
Injury compensation	1
Criminal injury in Northern Ireland	1
Contempt of court	1
Compulsory purchase order	1
Aircraft noise	1
Legal aid	1
Total	132

Dhaka (Entry Clearance)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he is making in Dhaka to expedite interviews for first-time applications for clearance in the non-priority category.

Mr. Renton: We are arranging for first-time applicants for entry clearance to be placed in a queue that will have priority over those who have previously applied and been refused. This new arrangement will not affect those in the priority queues.

Mr. Godfrey Shiner

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which Mr. Godfrey Shiner was released from detention in Egypt.

Mr. Renton: Mr. Shiner was released from detention conditionally on bail in Egypt on 23 February 1985 following an application by his lawyer to the Egyptian courts. Mr. Shiner was originally detained on 17 November for questioning by Egyptian police in connection with an alleged plot to assassinate a Libyan exile. He was due to leave Egypt on 30 April under a deportation order. His departure has been delayed and we have asked the Egyptian authorities the reason for this delay.

DEFENCE

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current position in international negotiations for the construction of a European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Heseltine: The current position is that evaluation of the reports of the EFA feasibility study has been completed. Meetings at official level are continuing in order to prepare the ground for the EFA Defence Ministers' meeting to which I referred yesterday in response to a question from the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne).

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many parliamentary questions tabled for oral answer he has answered in each Session since 1979-80.

Mr. Heseltine: The figures for parliamentary questions tabled for oral answer which were answered by Ministers in my Department in each Session since May 1979 are as follows:

	Number
1979-80	344
1980-81	302
1981-82	360
1982-83	306
1983-84	365
1984-85 (to date)	326

These figures include questions which, although tabled for oral answer, received a written reply.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many parliamentary questions, written and oral, on naval matters he has answered over the last three parliamentary Sessions.

Mr. Heseltine: I regret that records are not maintained in a form which would enable this information to be provided without disproportionate effort and cost.

Departmental Bills

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Bills have been introduced by his Department since the session 1979-80.

Mr. Stanley: Since and including the Session of Parliament that began in May 1979 the Ministry of Defence has introduced four Bills.

Clyde Submarine Base

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to privatise any of the operations at the Clyde submarine base.

Mr. Lee: No, but current studies in the naval support area could lead to proposals for contracting out certan non-operational tasks at the base.

Pensions

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the approximate net effect on public expenditure of all those retired officers of the rank of colonel and equivalent being given retired pay at the single consolidated rate of £12,152 per annum, less income tax at 30 per cent. on the amount of any overall increase, rather than at the various different rates derived from the different dates of retirement.

Mr. Lee: The current additional cost would be of the order of £4·25 million a year.

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many officers currently in receipt of service pensions retired with the rank of colonel or equivalent during the periods (a) 1 January 1975 to 31 March 1976 and (b) 1 January 1977 to 31 December 1977.

Mr. Lee: Information is not available for the periods in question. However, the numbers of male and female officers of the rank of colonel or equivalent who retired in the periods for which information is available are:

Period	Number of officers
1 April 1974 to 31 March 1975	95
1 April 1975 to 31 March 1976	159
1 April 1976 to 31 March 1977	128
1 April 1977 to 31 March 1978	113

El Salvador

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what military assistance is being provided to the Government of El Salvador; what training facilities for El Salvador military personnel are being provided in the United Kingdom; how many are being trained: and what is the type of training involved.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 11 March at columns 54-55.

Service Bands

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Defence which service bands (a) have been and (b) are to be disbanded or amalgamated; and what changes are taking place in the individual size of the continuing bands.

Mr. Lee: The following service bands have been disbanded since 1981:

Royal Marines
Band of Flag Officer Naval Air Command
Band of Commando Forces Royal Marines

Army
RMA Sandhurst Band Corps
Royal Artillery (Mounted) Staff Band
Royal Engineers (Aldershot) Staff Band
Royal Army Medical Corps Staff Band
5 Infantry battalion bands: 1 each in the Queen's Regiment, The Royal Regiment of Fusiliers, The Light Infantry, The Royal Greenjackets, The Parachute Regiment.
(This completes the Army band reductions announced in 1981.)
The Royal Marine band of the Flag Officer, Third Flotilla will be disbanded on 1 April 1987.

As at April 1985 the following changes in the individual size of remaining bands had taken place:

Royal Marines
The band of Her Majesty's Royal Marine Commandos, formerly the band of Commando Training Centre, Royal Marines has been increased to staff band size from 42 to 66 bandsmen.

Army
The following table shows changes in individual bands since 1981:

No further reductions or amalgamations are planned.

* Colonel of Regiment chose the option of two larger bands rather than three smaller bands.

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the present number of bands and strength of the band service for each of the Royal Marines, Army and Royal Air Force; what is the planned further reduction in bands and men in each case; and what were the figures in each case before the recent reductions in the band services began.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is set out in the following table:

	At December 1981		At April 1985		At April 1987 (completion of band reductions)
	Bands	Band Personnel	Bands	Band Personnel	Bands	Band Personnel

Courts Martial

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what written guidance or advice is given to service personnel who are summoned to appear before a general court martial.

Mr. Lee: Each service had produced a pamphlet which is available to those who are likely to be remanded for trial by court martial. These provide a short guide to the rights, duties and liabilities which the accused may have under the appropriate service Discipline Act. Additional detailed guidance is contained in Queen's Regulations, the Rules of Procedure (Army) and (Air Force) and from the appropriate manual of service law.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence, what facilities are made available to service personnel who are due to appear before a court martial to obtain independent legal advice.

Mr. Lee: A service man is entitled to have a civilian lawyer to defend him at a court martial wherever it is practicable to provide one. The accused is required to be afforded proper opportunity to communicate with the defending officer or counsel to enable him to prepare his defence. Legal aid may in appropriate cases be made available.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what guidance or instructions are given to the presidents of courts martial so as to ensure that the question of ranking does not affect the conduct of the courts martial; and if he will place a copy of guidance, if any, in the Library.

Mr. Lee: The rules of conduct for courts martial are contained in the Naval Courts-Martial (Procedure) Order 1957 (Statutory Instrument No. 1957/2225), the Rules of procedure (Army) (Statutory Instrument No. 1972/316, as amended by SI 1977/92, SI 1981/1220, SI 1982/369, SI 1983/719, and SI 1984/1670), and the Rules of Procedure (Air Force) (Statutory Instrument No. 1972/419 as amended by SI 1977/94, SI 1981/1219, SI 1982/368, SI 1983/718 and SI 1984/1669). These rules require that the opinion of each member of the court martial as to the finding on the charge and on sentencing is to be given orally, in closed court in order of seniority commencing with the most junior in rank. The statutory instruments above are available in the Library.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many courts martial were held in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, listing the number of convictions and acquittals in each year.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

Year	Number of Trials	Convictions (No. of Persons)	Acquittals (No. of Persons)
1982	1,437	1,489	65
1983	1,148	1,213	66
1984	1,114	1,161	76

Note: Number of trials includes dissolved and adjourned cases.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many appeals there were against the decisions of courts martial in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984; and how many were successful, listing them as to appeals against (a) sentence and (b) conviction.

Mr. Lee: My noble Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member when the information has been assembled.

Flying Officer Allan James Malcolm

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what financial payments were made, or are proposed to be made, to Flying Officer Allan James Malcolm following the quashing of his court martial conviction.

Mr. Lee: This officer was awarded appropriate pay and allowances from the date of his leaving the service, following his court martial in 1975, until the date of his reinstatement, when the court martial conviction was quashed in 1979.

Defence Installations (West Midlands)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to visit any defence installations in the west midlands.

Mr. Heseltine: I have no immediate plans to do so.

SP70 Gun

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the SP70 gun will be brought into service.

Mr. Butler: In the early 1990s.

Community Health Council (BAOR)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to introduce a community health council for men serving with the British Army of the Rhine and their dependants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: There are no current plans to introduce a community health council for men serving with the British Army of the Rhine and their dependants. However, overseas SSAFA social workers undertake the major responsibilities of local authority social services in United Kingdom.

Welfare Services (BAOR)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence what provision there is for men serving with the British Army of the Rhine and their dependants to voice opinions on the provision of welfare services to which they have access; and how it compares with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: Men serving in the British Army of the Rhine can make representation about welfare matters through their commanding officers. In the case of their families, welfare committees are established in all major garrisons and stations to consider matters of common interest. These committees, which meet regularly, include representatives of the garrison or station staff, service men or their wives and of local welfare agencies.

Any matters which cannot be resolved locally are referred to the next level of command and ultimately to the Ministry of Defence. The system, both for service men and their families, is identical in the United Kingdom and Germany.

Cervical Smear Tests (BAOR)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what steps he will take to improve the availability of cervical smear tests for wives and daughters of men serving with the British Army of the Rhine;

(2) whether he will make a statement on the availability of cervical smear tests for wives and daughters of men serving with the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Lee: Cervical smear testing is available to all service women and female dependants of service men serving in BAOR as well as to the female dependants of entitled civilians. The availability of these tests is widely publicised and no further steps are considered necessary to improve the availability of cervical smear testing.

Infant Mortality (BAOR)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list the infant mortality rate for families of men serving with the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Lee The infant mortality rates for the last three years for British forces Germany (including RAF Germany) are set out below. The figures include deaths of infants born with congenital diseases.

Year	Infant Mortality Rate per cent.	Neo-Natal Mortality BFG per cent.	Post Neo-Natal Mortality BFG per cent.
1982	13·4	6·4	6·8
1983	10·5	4·6	5·5
1984	11·8	7·0	4·8

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to improve the infant mortality rate amongst families of the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Lee: All those dealing with infants and their families — paediatricians, general practitioners and SSAFA nursing services—are alerted to the problem so as to be able to take preventitive action. All babies leaving hospital are given an "at risk" score, which alerts the primary health care team to the probable degree of risk of infants. The effectiveness of this system can be seen by the falling postneonatal mortality rate.

Peace Demonstrators (Photographs)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what circumstances military police are entitled to photograph peace demonstrators after being arrested; if such photographs can be sent to the person or persons concerned; whether they are destroyed; and who can witness their destruction.

Mr. Lee: It is the usual practise of both the Ministry of Defence police and the Home Department police forces to photograph persons taken into custody and suspected of having committed a criminal offence. These photographs may be needed as evidence if a prosecution takes place but if no proceedings are taken, the photographs are destroyed. It would be administratively impracticable either to return unused photographs automatically or to invite witnesses to their destruction.

Waste Material (Faslane-Glenboig)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the hon. Member for Monklands, West has not yet received the detailed information about the waste material to be transported from Faslane to Glenboig, which was promised to him by officials of his Department at Faslane.

Mr. Stanley As I said to the hon. Member in my reply to him on 25 April, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State at the Department of the Environment will be writing to him.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: My Department commissions studies which gather information on the need for a particular kind of service, on the extent to which existing services are achieving their aims, to assist in the development of policy, on the effectiveness of communications like forms, leaflets and advertisements and on the most effective way to react to a changing situation — for example, the misuse of drugs. Market research is undertaken by outside organisations and educational establishments, but may also be undertaken by departmental staff, for example, to test whether a form is clear.

Benefits

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many recipients of (a) standard housing benefit rent assistance, rent rebates and allowances, (b) standard housing benefit rates assistance giving rate rebates only and excluding those also receiving rent rebates and allowances and (c) mortgage interest tax relief have gross annual incomes in the following bands: (i) up to £4,999, (ii) £5,000 to £5,999, (iii) £6,000 to £6,999, (iv) £7,000 to £7,999, (v) £8,000 to £8,999, (vi) £9,000 to £9,999, (vii) £10,000 to £12,499, (viii) £12,500 to £14,999, (ix) £15,000 to £19,999, (x) £20,000 to £24,999 and (xi) £25,000 and more.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information relating to housing benefit could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information relating to mortgage interest tax relief is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Glaucoma.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue instructions that all eye testing for spectacles should include tests for intraocular pressure to ensure early diagnosis of the onset of glaucomaa.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The use of ophthalmoscopy for the detection of glaucoma is already part of the routine sight test carried out under the General Ophthalmic Service (GOS). There is also a requirement on GOS practitioners to inform the patient's doctor if any abnormality is detected in the course of the sight test. We are satisfied that these arrangements provide the necessary safeguards for patients.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients have been removed from private hospitals to the intensive care unit at Guy's hospital; and if he will list the names of the private hospitals and the dates of transfer in each of the last three years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally. The hon. Member may like to make enquiries of the chairman of the Lewisham and North Southwark health authority.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now allocate additional resources to health authorities in the north of England to pay for smear testing for cancer of the cervix; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have distributed nearly £500 million additional cash to health authorities in England in 1985-86. The Northern regional health authority received an additional £33 million. It is for authorities to determine how this is to be used in accordance with the Government's priorities for service development.

NHS (Hospital Expenditure)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the manner of the reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 19 March, Official Report, columns 452-58, he will provide figures for expenditure by hospital authorities, analysed subjectively, for 1983-84; and if he will also publish comparable figures, at current and 1983-84 prices, and comparable percentages for 1960 and 1970.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: for the analysis of expenditure in 1983-84, I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 21 December 1984 at columns 412-14. We are not able to present these figures in the same format as the 1960-61 and 1970-71 figures given in my reply to him on 19 March because of fundamental changes in the structure and in the accounting and reporting arrangements of the National Health Service over this long period.

State Earnings-Related Pension Scheme

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state, for the latest date for which figures are available the number of (a) persons, (b) men and (c) women in the work force who (i) were contracted in to the state earnings-related pension scheme, (ii) were contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme, (iii) had changed from contracted-in employment to contracted-out employment in the previous year, (iv) had changed from contracted-out employment to contracted-in employment in the previous year and (v) had at some time in their lives been contracted in to the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Whitney: The available information is included in the table.

Great Britain—1981-82

Thousands

	Men and Women	Men	Women
Contracted in	9,458	5,848	3,610
Contracted out	8,855	6,683	2,172
Contracted in and out in same year	947	611	337

The figures cannot be broken down by movement from contracted-in to contracted-out employment and vice versa. Information about the number of people who have ever been contracted-in to the state earnings-related pension scheme is not available.

Pensions

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state separately for men and for women (a) the number and proportion of those reaching retirement age in 1984 who were entitled to an additional pension under the state pension scheme, (b) the average additional pension payable to those retiring in 1984 and entitled to such a pension, (c) the equivalent figures for guaranteed minimum pension and (d) the number and proportion of supplementary pensioners and partners of supplementary pensioners who would have been lifted off supplementary benefit if they had been in receipt of an additional pension equal to the average specified in (b).

Mr. Whitney: The available information is in the table.

Persons reaching retirement age in year to 30 September 1983 (GB)

	Men and Women			Men			Women
	No.	Per cent.	Average Amount £	No.	Per cent.	Average Amount £	No.	Per cent.	Average Amount £
Additional component	213,720	45·1	3·83	161,000	78·8	4·09	52,720	19·6	3.03
GMP	117,820	24·9	4·12	91,360	44·7	4·31	26,460	9·8	3·45

Figures for the number of supplementary pensioners and their partners who would be lifted off supplementary benefit by receipt of the average amount of additional component are not available.

Liverpool Women's Hospital

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the trend in lengths of waiting lists at the Liverpool women's hospital since May 1979.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is given in the table. No information is held centrally on numbers awaiting outpatient appointments. In general, figures on waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. The amount of overstatement cannot readily be estimated, but is thought to exceed 10 per cent. nationally and could be considerably more. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate, and many of those on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission.

Number of persons on inpatient waiting list at 31 December	Women's Hospital, Liverpool
1979*	887
1980	726
1981	520
1982*	651
1983	563

* In general, figures for these years were affected by industrial action in the Health Service.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will define the term hostel under the regulations relating to board and lodging payments for young people.

Mr. Whitney: The term "hostel" is defined in paragraph 7(i) of schedule 1A of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 (SI 1985, No. 613).

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what considerations were taken into account in designating Wisbech a resort for the purpose of the new regulations relating to board and lodging payments for young people.

Mr. Whitney: The board and lodging areas are groups of local social security office areas, which have been drawn up taking account of the Department and Employment travel-to-work areas to reflect as far as possible established accommodation, employment and travelling patterns. Having regard to the board and lodging area as a whole in which Wisbech lies, it was considered that a two-week limit was appropriate for payment as a boarder for certain young people aged 25 and under.

Doctors (Reimbursement)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much he estimates the procedures laid down in circular HC(85)9 for reimbursement of doctors acting as unit general managers or medical representatives will cost in the first full year to which it applies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No unit general managers have yet been appointed and we are not in a position to estimate how many will be doctors or what the cost of employing them will be.

Unit medical representatives will be paid only by those district health authorities who wish to employ them for management duties and we cannot estimate how many DHAs will choose to do so. The remuneration of unit medical representatives is at the discretion of the district health authority up to a maximum of £2,500 per annum and is to be determined individually on the basis of their management commitments, where such commitments are part of the job description.

Pyridoxine

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any evidence concerning a relationship between overdoses of pyridoxine by pregnant women and deformities in babies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not aware of any evidence of a direct causal connection between pyridoxine use and foetal abnormalities.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his estimate of the number of people who take pyridoxine; and how many of them are pregnant women;

(2) if he will list the preparations which contain pyridoxine; and if there has been any appreciable increase in their uses in recent years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There are 281 licensed medicinal products which contain pyridoxine or pyrodoxine hydrochloride. I am sending a list of these to the right hon. Member. I am advised that pyridoxine is also sold as a dietary supplement and not as a medicinal product, but this use is not within the terms of the Medicines Act and we do not know how many such products there are. We do not have information on the number of people using pyridoxine, either in medicinal products or as a dietary supplement.

Nurses (Training)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the Brighton school of nursing intends to cancel the RSCN training course due to start next October; if he will inquire of the district health authority what resources are required to enable the students who have already been offered and have accepted places on the course to complete the course; and if he will make such funds available for this training.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This is a matter for Brighton health authority. The hon. Member may wish to seek this information from the chairman of the authority.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive relevant to his Department from the EEC since 1979; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mildmay Mission Hospital

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether agreement has been reached on the transfer of the Mildway mission hospital Shoreditch, to the hospital's league of friends; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. In May 1984 the principle of leasing the hospital to the league of friends on a concessionary basis was agreed, subject to the fulfilment of a number of conditions relating to use and assurances of adequate financial support. The North-East Thames regional health authority has negotiated with the league of friends on our behalf and we are satisfied that the conditions and assurances sought have been met. We have therefore agreed to lease the hospital to the friends on a long-term basis at a peppercorn rent.

The hospital will be run in accordance with the original Christian objectives for which it was established last century. It will provide a range of services, including nursing home beds, GP beds and day facilities for the elderly. It will, I believe, complement NHS services in Shoreditch in the same way as other voluntary or religious foundations have complemented the work of the National Health Service since its inception. We wish the Mildmay well in its new role.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Death (Statistics)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list, from available health service records and death certificate registrations, how many deaths occurred in Northern Ireland from the following diseases in each of the years between 1970 and 1984: (a) asbestosis, (b) mesothelioma of the pleura, (c) mesothelioma of the peritoneum and (d) respiratory tract cancers with proven asbestos exposure during life.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Year	Asbestosis (a)	Mesothelioma of the Pleura (b)	Mesothelioma of Peritoneum (c)
1970	3	2	3
1971	1	3	4
1972	5	3	6
1973	5	5	4
1974	1	6	10
1975	10	4	4
1976	10	6	4
1977	5	4	8
1978	10	2	7
1979	9	4	2
1980	13	2	2
1981	9	2	1
1982	3	3	4
1983	6	6	2
1984	12	3	2

Information on the number of deaths from respiratory tract cancers with proven asbestos exposure during life is not available.

Benefits

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list how many claims were made and how many were accepted for each year from 1970 to 1984 inclusive for industrial death benefit in respect of (a) asbestosis, (b) mesothelioma of the pleura, (c) mesothelioma of the peritoneum;

(2) how many claims and how many awards were made under the industrial injuries scheme of disablement benefit for the years 1970 to 1984, inclusive, for the following diseases: (a) asbestosis, (b) mesothelioma of the pleura, (c) mesothelioma of the peritoneum.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Elderly Persons (Telephones)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many telephones have been installed for the elderly in each of the last five years for which records are available; and what additional provision is being made for future installation of telephones for the elderly.

Mr. Chris Patten: Specific figures for the number of people over 65 years of age who were assisted with the costs of their telephones have only been available since 1981 and are as follows:

Year	Number
1981	490
1982	491
1983	707

It is for health and social services boards to decide how much they should allocate from within their total budget to be spent on the provision of telephones taking into account the priority accorded to the scheme within the entire provision of services.

Housing Associations

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the housing associations in East Antrim.

Mr. Chris Patten: Two registered associations — McGarel Housing Association Limited and Latharne Housing Association Limited — operate exclusively within the East Antrim parliamentary constituency area.

In addition the following Associations have carried out, or are in the process of carrying out, developments in the area:

Abbeyfield (NI) Development Society Limited
Belfast Improved Houses Limited
Ben Madigan Housing Association Limited
Fold Housing Association
Hearth Association
James Butcher Housing Association (NI) Limited
Nih Housing Association Limited
The Royal British Legion Housing Association (NI) Limited
Students Housing Association Co-op Limited

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the administrative payments made to each housing association in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Chris Patten: Payments of revenue deficit grant under article 139 of the Housing (NI) Order 1981, the calculation of which includes administrative expenditure and contributions towards administrative and other expenses under article 115 of the Housing (NI) Order 1981 are as follows.

Housing association grant under article 137 of the Housing (NI) Order 1981 also includes allowances towards administrative expenditure in connection with approved housing projects but this information is not readily available in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Health Services

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from the Down community about the proposals in the report by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board's joint review team, "Developing Hospital Services"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Some 1,260 individuals and organisations have expressed disagreement with those recommendations relating to the Down district.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement on current hospital provision in the Down district;

(2) if he will make a statement outlining all the options for future hospital provision in the Down district.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Eastern Health and Social Services Board is seeking to establish a pattern of hospital provision which will meet the needs of the people of its area now and in the years ahead and to this end it is considering the development of hospital services throughout its area including the Down district.

It would be inappropriate for me to comment further as this could inhibit the development of other options which may emerge in the course of the consultation that the board is undertaking.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on health service efficiency in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: Government in co-operation with the health and social services boards has been making consistent efforts in recent years to achieve greater efficiency in the use of resources. The boards have implemented efficiency savings over the last two years which have resulted in annual savings of around 0·5 per cent. of recurrent expenditure. These savings have been reinvested by boards in priority service areas.

In addition each board has now appointed a general manager who will be directly responsible for improving management performance. Government, too, will continue to be involved in the process of monitoring and improving efficiency through the use of economic and statistical analysis and through discussions with boards as part of the accountability review system.

The Department will also be assisting boards in a programme of specific efficiency scrutinies of aspects of the health and personal social services.

As a result of these initiatives significant improvements in management performance are being achieved but there is no room for complacency and I will continue to press boards to examine services rigorously to ensure maximum value for money.

White Papers and Government Reports

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list every White Paper and Government report produced in the United Kingdom concerning Northern Ireland since 1969.

Mr. Hurd: There have been several hundred such documents, and the information requested could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

THE ARTS

European Music Day

Mr. Key asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what discussions the Minister for the Arts has had with local authorities about facilitating the celebration of European Music Day on Saturday 22 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Arrangements for European Music Year are in the hands of the European Music Year (UK) Committee, which, operating through the Arts Councils and the regional arts associations, has encouraged local authorities to give every facility for local events on 22 June.

Kelmscott House

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts when the Minister for the Arts expects to announce a decision on the Greater London council's compulsory purchase order on Kelmscott house.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 19 April 1985, c.299]: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts has decided not to confirm the Greater London council's compulsory purchase order on Kelmscott house, Hammersmith.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Customs Officers

40. Mr. Speed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the numbers of customs officers available for the interception and detection of drugs at Heathrow, Gatwick, Dover and Harwich, respectively, at the present time and for the same period in 1984, 1979 and 1974.

Mr. Hayhoe: Customs staff are responsible for carrying out a variety of tasks, including collection of revenue and enforcement of prohibitions and restrictions. These tasks often overlap. It is not therefore possible to list the numbers of staff available for drug detection duties at any particular time.

Petrol (Lead Content)

Mr. Woodcock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the annual net increase in tax revenue at present levels of taxation which will result from increases in consumption arising from the decision to reduce the maximum lead content of petrol from 0·4 grammes per litre to 0·15 grammes per litre, in the fiscal years ending (a) April 1987, (b) April 1988 and (c) April 1989.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am advised that a reduction of the maximum lead content to 0·15 grammes per litre will not result in a change in the present octane ratings and will not therefore lead to an increase in the consumption of petrol. There will therefore be no revenue effects.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive from the EEC since 1979 relevant to his Department; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Agricultural Land

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of revenue forgone in 1984-85, both before and after corporation and income taxes, in consequence of the rating exemptions and reliefs on agricultural land.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 24 April 1985, c. 481]: The available information relates to the total of agricultural land and buildings. For an estimate of the yield of rates on agricultural land and buildings, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 22 March at column 637. I regret that I have no precise information on the extent to which the derating of agricultural land and buildings, by reducing business expenses, raises the taxable profits of farming enterprises and the yield from corporation and income taxes. However, in the case of most farmers the marginal rate of income tax is the basic rate of 30 per cent.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if, pursuant to the answer of the Economic Secretary on 25 April, Official Report, column 974, he will list the lending of Johnson Matthey which was there described as extremely unwise and imprudent lending; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether the inquiries by the Bank of England into Johnson Matthey Bankers have revealed departures from normal prudent banking practice;

(3) whether the review of the arrangements for banking supervision will comment on the justification of the Bank of England's takeover of Johnson Matthey Bankers; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether the review of banking supervision will deal with the monitoring by the Bank of England's Banking Supervision Department of Johnson Matthey prior to its collapse and the steps it took prior to the collapse to identify and seek to correct Johnson Matthey Bankers' difficulties.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I will let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Assets Sales

Mr. Maude asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about his plans for the special sales of assets programme.

Mr. Lawson: It is the Government's policy to sell its minority holdings in privatised companies as and when circumstances permit. As part of this policy, I now intend to offer for sale later this year the whole of the Government's 48·8 per cent. holding in Britoil, apart from those shares needed to pay the small shareholder bonus.

SCOTLAND

Teachers (Dispute)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many schools in Scotland have been affected by the teachers' current withdrawal of labour.

Mr. Allan Stewart: So far this term, 432 secondary schools were affected on 24 April, and 284 primary schools in the week beginning 29 April.

Mingary-Tobermory Ferry

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce his decision on the Mingary-Tobermory ferry.

Mr. Ancram: Today.

Broadleaved Woodland

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 25 April 1985, Official Report, column 532, concerning broadleaved woodland licensed for clearfelling for conversion of the land to agriculture, if he will give the exact location of those woodlands so felled on Cwm Mosydd farm, Gwent.

Mr. John McKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Famine Relief

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many tons of cereal and other foodstuffs approved at the Dublin summit of European Economic Community Ministers were delivered in each of the last eight weeks to the principal ports of Ethiopia and Port Sudan.

Mr. Raison: Information on action by the Community and the individual member states is not available in this detail. Figures for the distribution of food aid in each of the last two months from the amounts committed at the European Council in Dublin were given to my hon. Friend on 22 April, at column 364, by my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal how many parliamentary questions, written and oral, have been tabled to the Secretary of State for Defence over each of the last three Sessions.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
1981-82	1,754
1982-83	1,578
1983-84	2,422

These figures do not include questions originally tabled to Defence and later transferred to another Department and similarly any questions which were tabled and subsequently withdrawn.

European Community

Mr. Deakins asked the Lord Privy Seal in what form he anticipates that the House of Commons will be asked to give its opinion on the new EEC own resources decision, the EEC intergovernmental agreement on the 1985 budget and the accession of Spain and Portugal; and, if in each case, he will undertake to ensure adequate time for debate.

Mr. Biffen: Final decisions on the form of consideration by the House of Commons of these subjects have not yet been taken, but I can assure the hon. Member that adequate time for debate will be given.

PAYMASTER-GENERAL

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Paymaster-General how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Gummer: Neither I nor any of my predecessors since the date specified have commissioned any departmental committee of inquiry.

PRIME MINISTER

Prime Minister of Canada

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada.

The Prime Minister: I was delighted to welcome Mr. Mulroney on his first visit to London as Prime Minister of Canada. As partners in the Commonwealth and NATO we share many common interests. We had most friendly and useful talks on the Bonn summit and other international issues.

Widdicombe Inquiry

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister whether she will publish the evidence given to the Widdicombe inquiry on the conventions governing the use of public funds for central Government publicity.

The Prime Minister: A note on the conventions which successive Governments have applied to their publicity and advertising has been sent to the committee. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police (Marksmen)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner as to why Metropolitan police marksmen have military style uniforms.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Metropolitan police officers who are authorised to carry firearms normally wear standard police clothing or plain clothes when doing so. But when firearms instructors are deployed to the sceme of an incident they wear berets because that is the most suitable headgear if rifles have to be carried. On very rare occasions the firearms instructors may have to be deployed urgently while still wearing their firearms range clothing, which consists of plain nylon overalls clearly marked with police identification numerals.

Women Prisoners (Self-mutilation)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute an urgent inquiry into the reasons for the current incidence of self-mutilation by women prisoners and the means by which it can be reduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to set up such an inquiry. The incidence of self-injury by prisoners and the means by which it can be reduced are kept under constant review.

Television Licences

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to raise the £1.25 allowance on television licences for families which include at least one registered blind person.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will indicate the number of prosecutions and convictions in Greater Manchester county for the last three years for which records are available in respect of offences by people failing to pay for their television licences;

(2) if he will indicate the number of prosecutions and convictions in Merseyside metropolitan county for the last three years for which records are available in respect of offences by people failing to pay for their television licences;

(3) if he will indicate the number of prosecutions and convictions in Tyne and Wear metropolitan county for the last three years for which records are available in respect of offences by people failing to pay for their television licences;

(4) if he will indicate the number of prosecutions and convictions in the West Midlands metropolitan county for the last three years for which records are available in respect of offences by people failing to pay for their television licences;

(5) if he will indicate the number of prosecutions and convictions in the West Yorkshire metropolitan county for the last three years for which records are available in respect of offences by people failing to pay for their television licences;

(6) if he will indicate the number of prosecutions and convictions in the Greater London area for the last three years for which records are available in respect of offences by people failing to pay for their television licences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Prosecutions initiated in these areas and the convictions resulting from them in the last three years were as follows:

	1982		1983		1984
	Prosecutions	Convictions	Prosecutions	Convictions	Prosecutions	Convictions
Greater Manchester	5,147	5,135	5,671	5,666	6,933	6,931
Merseyside	2,617	2,611	3,072	3,058	2,540	2,529
Tyne & Wear	1,465	1,463	1,804	1,799	2,367	2,367
West Midlands	3,456	3,451	5,001	4,992	7,953	7,936
West Yorkshire	3,600	3,595	3,054	3,052	4,266	4,262
Greater London	7,698	7,635	7,635	7,600	8,518	8,466

Television Detector Vans

Mr. Sumber asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many detector vans are used by the Post Office for the purpose of detecting those people who have not paid for their television licences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Twenty-two.

ENERGY

Market Research

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Energy what use is made of market research by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Market research plays an important role in the workings of the Department particularly in respect of information and publicity for energy efficiency office campaigns.

Extensive use is made of research into attitudes and awareness in the domestic market sector and is an integral feature of our work in the industrial and commercial sector.

Fuel Costs

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to the answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 30, he will provide the same information relating to comparative international energy prices on a single unit basis, such as pence per therm, for all the fuels concerned.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested which relates to the third quarter of 1984, is as follows:

	Average revenue from sales of gas to households in pence per therm	Average revenue from sales of electricity to households in pence per therm	Average price of petrol in pence per therm	Average revenue from sales of gas to industry in pence per therm	Average revenue from sales of electricity to industry in pence per therm*†	Average price of heavy fuel oil to industry in pence per therm
France	‡(63·8)	‡(174·08)	136·61	‡(29·7)	‡(78·84)	35·54

United States of America	46·2	¶180·24	74·75	¶30·6	¶117·81	35·38

* It should be borne in mind when interpreting these figures that industrial electricity prices generally vary according to time of year, because of the seasonal element present in most industrial tariffs. Hence a different picture might be obtained for a different time of year, depending on how the seasonal components in the individual country tariffs operated.

† Date from alternative sources produces a different picture. For example, Electricity Council figures, converted to therms, show that as at 1 August 1984 for industrial consumers with an annual maximum demand of 2,500 kw at 40 per cent. load factor, average prices paid were:

	p/therm
France	97·30
Germany	126·02—157·97
Japan	170·27—185·51
United Kingdom	106·09—116·64
United States of America	166·76—311·83

‡ Average for 1983.

‖ As of 1983 original ex-tax prices paid by industry and households are no longer available for France and the figures are based upon OECD estimates.

¶ Prices exclude taxes, which are levied by the states and which vary between 2 and 6 per cent.

Note:

(1) It should be borne in mind that the calorific values of the fuels vary from country to country, United Kingdom conversion factors have been used for all the above.

(2) International comparisons of energy prices are difficult to construct because of incompatibilities in the basic data. They require careful interpretation because of movements in exchange rates and variation in the timing of tariff revisions between countries. The above figures are based on exchange rates prevailing for the year 1983 and the third quarter 1984 as appropriate.

(3) The prices shown above for gas and electricity are based on average revenue per unit consumed. In general this will differ from the price derived for a given level of annual consumption.

(4) It should be noted that thermal efficiency varies according to fuel. The above figures take no account of this variation.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Energy, if, pursuant to the answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 108, he will provide the same information relating to domestic fuel prices on a single unit basis, such as pence per therm, for all the fuels concerned.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested is given in the table:

	May 1979	April 1983	May 1984	January 1985
Average price of gas (including standing charge) to domestic credit meter consumers in Great Britain using 400 therms per annum. Pence per therm	17·9	43·0	44·7	44·7
Average price of electricity (including standing charge) to consumers in England and Wales on the standard domestic tariff using 3,300kwh per annum. Pence per therm	93·52	173·62	176·63	176·63
Average price of standard grade burning oil. Pence per therm	28·42	62·59	53·83	61·22

It should be noted that thermal efficiency varies according to fuel. The figures take no account of this variation.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Energy, if, pursuant to the answer of 18 March, Official Report, column 400, he will provide the same information relating to comparative international energy costs on a single unit basis, such as pence per therm, for all the fuels concerned.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested is given in the table:

Notes:

(i) Except for gas prices in the Netherlands (which relate to an annual consumption of 3,000 cu. metres) the prices shown above for gas and electricity are based on average revenue per unit consumed. In general this will differ from the price derived for a given level of annual consumption.

(ii) It should be borne in mind that the calorific values of the fuels vary from country to country. United Kingdom conversion factors have been used for all the above.

(iii) International comparisons of energy prices are difficult to construct because of incompatibilities in the basic data. They require careful interpretation because of movements in exchange rates and variation in the timing of tariff revisions between countries. The above figures are based on exchange rates prevailing in the second quarters of 1979 and 1984 respectively.

(iv) It should be noted that thermal efficiency varies according to fuel. The above figures take no account of this variation.

EMPLOYMENT

Wages

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage of employers' costs attributable to wages in the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany, respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information is available, on a consistent basis for different countries, only in respect of wages as a proportion of employers' labour costs in production industries and in some services in member states of the European Communities. The latest results relate to 1981 and are shown in tables 201A and 207 of "Labour Costs, Volume 1: Principal Results," published by Eurostat, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will arrange for the monthly unemployment statistics in future to incorporate a breakdown according to (a) the age, (b) the sex, (c) the educational and other qualifications and (d) the previous trade or profession, of each unemployed person; and if he will arrange for such information to be made available on a regional and travel-to-work area basis.

Mr. Alan Clark: The monthly unemployment statistics are already available analysed by sex, for regions and local areas, including travel-to-work areas. More detailed figures by age and duration are also available quarterly, and the full range of analysis will shortly be available for the travel-to-work areas and other areas defined in terms of wards. The records on which the unemployment count is based do not include details of qualifications or previous trades or professions because these are not needed for the purposes of administering benefits, and we have no plans to provide such an extension of the statistics. The labour force survey collects information about the qualifications, previous occupation and previous industry of people who are not working and are looking for work, but the sample size is too small to provide estimates at local level.

NATIONAL FINANCE

"International Financial Statistics Yearbook"

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the other transactions referred to in line 84 ag in the United Kingdom section of the International Financial Statistics Yearbook for 1983; and if he will provide a breakdown on this basis for each year since 1977.

Mr. Ian Stewart' The information is as follows:

International Financial Statistics Yearbook: United Kingdom other transactions (net) (line 84 ag) analysed by component

	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

Total	839	−310	−41	−70	−2,506	−4,919	806	−3,635

These figures include the latest revisions. The component series can be seen in Financial Statistics tables 3.4 and 3.4 (continued). A detailed description of the series is given in the notes on these tables in the Financial Statistics Explanatory Handbook.

Premium Bond Sales

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy concerning the sale of premium bonds abroad.

Mr. Ian Stewart: United Kingdom law permits the purchase of premium bonds by people living abroad. If residents of other countries buy premium bonds, this may not be permitted by local laws. So national savings suggests that people resident abroad should check this. National savings does not accept purchase applications from residents of countries where it is known such laws exist.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total revenue from the sale of premium bonds in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available; and how much of this revenue was generated by sales of premium bonds abroad in each of those years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Sales of premium bonds have been as follows:

Year	£ million
1975	131·61
1976	149·03
1977	149·92
1978	190·62
1979	133·35
1980	160·02
1981	149·96
1982	159·62
1983	192·62
1984	206·70
Total	1,623·45

In the same period repayments totalled £929·71 million so the net amount received was £693·74 million.

Sales to people abroad are not recorded separately, but estimates suggest that they form a very small proportion.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the level of tax reliefs paid each year since 1970 (i) to employees contributing to private pension schemes, (ii) to employers' running private pension schemes, (iii) to pension funds on their investments and (iv) to employees in lump sum reliefs on retirement; and if he will estimate by how much each of these would be increased in each of the next five years if the state earnings related scheme were abolished.

Mr. Moore: Readily available estimates of the direct revenue costs of the reliefs relate to 1984-85 and are as follows:

Relief in respect of:	Direct revenue cost in full year (£ million) 1984-85
Employees' contributions to occupational pension schemes allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes	1,250
Employers' contributions to occupational pension schemes allowed as a charge against profits for corporation tax purposes	*1,600
Investment income of occupational pension funds (assuming relief at the basic rate)	2,500
Lump sum payments to pensioners (assuming relief at the basic rate)	900

* This estimate is particularly tentative.

The effect on tax reliefs of abolition of the state earnings-related pension scheme would depend on the assumptions made about any consequential changes in the numbers of contributions made to pension schemes and in their level.

Commemorative Coins

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government have plans to issue any new commemorative coins.

Mr. Lawson: Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to approve the Master of the Mint's recommendation that a special £2 piece be issued to commemorate the Commonwealth Games in Edinburgh in 1986. There will be a normal version of the coin issued at face value, and collectors' versions, in precious metals and base metals, issued at a premium.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the inquiries by the Bank of England into Johnson Matthey Bankers have revealed departures from normal prudent banking practice.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1985; c. 246]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on 25 April, at column 974. The Governor of the Bank of England has made clear that the difficulties of the bank arose from its commercial lending operations.

ENVIRONMENT

Royal Docks (STOLport)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has evaluated the effect of the development of a STOLport in the royal docks area on the willingness of foreign investors to establish businesses in the area.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Conservation

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he received the request from the Nature Conservancy Council for a section 29 conservation order to be applied on land within Ferry Ford Farm, Staffordshire; and when he expects to sign the order;

(2) when he expects to list as a European Commission birds directive special protection area and Ramsar convention site the following estuaries (a) Morecambe Bay, (b) River Orwell, Suffolk and (c) the Wash.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I shall answer these questions shortly.

London Lesbian and Gay Centre

Mr. Martin Stevens asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce his decision on the grant application made on behalf of the London Lesbian and Gay Centre in Smithfield EC1.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his reply, 26 April 1985, c. 578]: After the most careful consideration, we have decided that consent should be refused to the application by the Greater London council for consent to expenditure of over £100,000 under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 to meet the salary costs in 1985-86 of the centre's staff, who would collectively manage the centre. The formal decision of the Secretary of State has been communicated to the council today.

In reaching this decision, I have not sought to judge whether the centre, which has been provided at considerable public expense, is necessary or justifiable. Neither would I wish to comment on whether the intended users of what is predominantly a social and recreational centre constitute a group of the population who suffer social discrimination. Instead, in considering whether the proposed expenditure would be expedient, the question has to be asked whether it is right for the recurrent annual operating costs of £115,000, together with the full annual salary costs of £119,207, to be met predominantly by ratepayers, in comparison with anticipated but unsubstantiated direct income from users of £90,865. If there is indeed a demand for social and recreational facilities of this kind, I question whether it would not be reasonable to expect the operating costs to be met by the intended users, when there is no evidence that they constitue an economically deprived group of the population. These questions do not appear to have been addressed in any depth by the council.

As at 30 April, 120 applications for specific consent had been received from the GLC and consent had been given to 110. The following proposals are still receiving careful and urgent consideration.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is available to Her Majesty's Government regarding the outcome of meetings between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics officials on the non-proliferation treaty in Helsinki between 15 and 19 April: and if consultations took place with Her Majesty's Government before this meeting.

Mr. Renton: Details of talks between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics are a matter for the Governments concerned.

We ourselves hold regular consultations with the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics about nuclear non-proliferation.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's execution of their obligations and duties as a depository power under the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Renton: As required by article IX(5) of the treaty, we have promptly informed all signatory and acceding states of the date of each signature, the date of deposit of each instrument of ratification or accession, and the date of the treaty's entry into force. As required by article IX(6), we registered the treaty pursuant to article 102 of the United Nations Charter. We have also played a full part in setting up the third non-proliferation treaty review conference to be held in Geneva in September 1985.

Mr. Raoul Wallenberg

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report as much information as is in his possession about Mr. Raoul Wallenberg; when was the last time he made representations to the Government of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics about him; if he has any plans to make representations in the future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have no firm evidence of what happened to Mr. Wallenberg, a Swedish diplomat, after his arrest by Soviet troops in Budapest in 1945. In 1957, Mr. Gromyko, the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, stated that Mr. Wallenberg had died in prison in the Soviet Union in 1947. There have, however, been a number of reports since then from former inmates of Soviet prisons suggesting that Mr. Wallenberg is still alive.

We have raised the case of Raoul Wallenberg with the Soviet authorities on several occasions in the past. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) last did so when he met the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, Mr. Kornienko, in March 1984. While decisions to press for more information from the Soviet Union are in the first instance from the Swedish Government, we remain ready to assist them in efforts to establish with greater certainty what has happened to Mr. Wallenberg.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what indications were given to the United States Commission touring Europe recently regarding British attitudes in the event of the production by the United States of America of new chemical weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.

As a major ally of the United States and in view of the United Kingdom's leading role in the negotiations on a comprehensive chemical weapon ban at Geneva, the British Government were approached for their view by the United States presidential chemical warfare review commission. In their response, the British Government expressed concern about the chemical warfare threat from the Warsaw pact. They also emphasised their view that the Alliance should continue as its first priority to work urgently, in the current negotiations at Geneva, for a total and verifiable ban on all aspects of chemical warfare. They noted that United States moves towards modernisation would underline to the Russians the benefits of reaching early agreement on a total ban. In addition, the British Government underlined the need to uphold NATO's deterrent strategy of flexible response.

Nerve Gas Bombs

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what indications were given to the United States commission touring Europe recently regarding British attitudes towards the storage in the United Kingdom of United States nerve gas bombs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked reply.
None.

DEFENCE

Radio Emissions

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will indicate the purpose, nature and quality of radio emissions from the radar station at Bishopscourt, County Down; and if he will make a statement about their effect on public health.

Mr. Lee: The radar station at Bishopscourt, County Down, forms part of the United Kingdom air defence ground environment (UKADGE) network. The radars are sited in accordance with approved safety criteria and there is no hazard to public health.

RAF Bishopscourt

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement describing the development currently taking place at RAF Bishopscourt.

Mr. Lee: The development currently taking place at RAF Bishopscourt is part of the improved United Kingdom air defence ground environment (IUKADGE) network development. Bishopscourt is one of a number of radar reporting posts in this network. The latest improvements are based on assessments of requirements up to the end of the century.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of the recent excavations and earth removals at RAF Bishopscourt.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the other answers I am giving on this subject. The actual excavation and earth removals referred to form the foundation works to the main reporting post, transmitter and receiver buildings.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of the runway-type approach leading to a large excavation at RAF Bishopscourt.

Mr. Lee: The runway-type approach adjacent to the excavation work at Bishopscourt is one of the station's main runways and has been in existence since 1942. It has no connection with the current IUKADGE development.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the community near Bishopscourt and their local representatives about the developments taking place at the Royal Air Force installations.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will permit a visit to RAF Bishopscourt, including the development site, by local elected representatives.

Mr. Lee: There is no objection in principle to such a visit although security considerations would limit its scope.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide Down district council with an aerial or satellite photograph of RAF Bishopscourt showing the recent development and excavations.

Mr. Lee: No.

Frigates and Destroyers

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in chronological order the frigates and destroyers disposed of since 5 May 1979 including loss by enemy action.

Mr. Lee: Destroyers and frigates are disposed of in a number of ways when no longer needed. They can be sold to foreign navies, sold for scrap or sunk as targets. Ships can also, of course, be lost in action.

Destroyers and frigates finally disposed of since 5 May 1979 are as follows:

	Destroyers	Frigates
1979 (from 5 May)	Caprice Matapan

	Destroyers	Frigates
1980		Ulster
1981	Diamond	Chichester
	Hampshire	Rapid
1982	Coventry	Antelope
	London	Ardent
	Norfolk	Bacchante
	Sheffield	Dundas
		Grenville

1983		Dido
		Hardy
		Lincoln
1984	Antrim	Ghurka
	Devonshire	Tartar
		Zulu
1985 (up to 30 April)		Duncan

A number had already been withdrawn from active service with the Fleet before that date and were being used for other duties before their final disposal.

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in chronological order the frigates and destroyers ordered since 5 May 1979, listing the date of ordering and the date of commissioning where applicable.

Mr Lee: Details of frigates ordered since 5 May 1979 are as follows. No destroyers have been ordered during this period.

Vessel	Date of Order
Broadsword Class Frigate (Type 22)
HMS Brave*	27 August 1981

It is not the practice to give planned acceptance dates.

RAF Trainer Aircraft

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Defence under which circumstances the contract for the replacement trainer aircraft for the Royal Air Force recently awarded to Shorts is revokable.

Mr. Butler: The contract contains various provisions under which it could be determined by the Ministry.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether, subsequent to the receipt of Shorts' bid for the Royal Air Force air basic trainer on 14 March, any member of his Department requested Shorts to make a revised offer:

(2) whether he will state the rank and post held of the member of the Procurement Executive who telephoned British Aerospace on 13 March to inform it of the deadline date for tender for the new basic trainer for the Royal Air Force; to whom he spoke; and if the call was logged by his Department;

(3) why, on 15 March, the controller of aircraft of his Department's Procurement Executive requested a revised bid from British Aerospace for the new basic trainer for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Butler: I shall reply shortly.

Royal Navy

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many ratings and officers left the Royal Navy in each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 by rank.

Mr. Lee: The information which is available only by financial year, not calendar year, is as follows:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84

Able Rate and below	4,364	3,566	2,623	1,619	1,835

Contracts (Tendering)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in the past the Procurement Executive has telephoned tenderers for his Department's contracts on contracts worth more than £100 million giving the deadline date for tendering; whether this is the normal procedure within his Department; and on how many occasions such a telephone call has been confirmed by letter, telex or other written communication.

Mr. Butler: I shall answer shortly.

Defence School of Music

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the costings produced by his Department prior to the decision to site the defence school of music at Deal.

Mr. Lee: No. To do so would prejudice both competitive tendering for the building contract and bidding by contract and bidding by potential buyers.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Asbestos

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many licences have been issued in Northern Ireland by the Health and Safety Agency to contractors since August 1984 in respect of authorised asbestos removal; and how many prosecutions have been commenced and completed for breaches of the asbestos removal regulations in Northern Ireland before and after 1 August 1984.

Dr. Boyson: Under the provisions of the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1984, the Department of Economic Development issues licences to contractors who undertake any work with asbestos insulation or asbestos coating. Since the commencement of these regulations on 1 August 1984, 14 licences have been granted. Three prosecutions are pending in relation to the regulations.

Magilligan Prison

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is considering the closure of Magilligan prison.

Mr. Scott: This is one of a number of options which will need to be considered for when Her Majesty's prison Maghaberry is opened.

HM Prison, Armagh

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, pursuant to his replies of 19 March, Official Report, columns 434-5 and 19 April, Official Report, column 282, to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, he will break down the other reasons for conducting of strip searches upon female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, to distinguish between first admission and final discharge, bail court appearance, indicating which court, attendance at other remand courts, indicating which courts, appeal court hearings, outside hospital visits, pre-release programmes and employment interviews, for the monthly periods before March from the commencement of strip searches at Her Majesty's prison, Armagh.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is available only from 1 June 1984 and is as follows:

Tourist Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the financial contribution of the tourist industry to the Northern Ireland economy in each of the last three years.

Dr. Boyson: The information requested is as follows:

	1981 £ million	1982 £ million	1983 £ million
Staying Visitors	42·3	48·0	72·2
Day Excursionists	17·8	20·0	120·0
Home Holidaymakers	18·5	16·8	33·4
Total	78·6	84·8	225·6

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has to the number of tourists who visited the Province in each of the past six years to the latest available date.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

	Number
1979	728,000
1980	710,000
1981	588,000
1982	712,000
1983	865,000
1984	908,000

(Rounded to the nearest thousand)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to the number of tourists who visited Northern Ireland from (a) the British mainland, (b) Europe, (c) the United States of America and (d) other countries, in each of the past four years.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

	1981	1982	1983	1984
Great Britain	343,000	352,000	377,000	405,000
Europe	191,000	305,000	419,000	441,000
United States of America	20,000	26,000	33,000	27,000
Other	34,000	29,000	36,000	35,000

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is satisfied with the recent performance of the agencies responsible for promoting tourism in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: Yes. I am satisfied that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, district councils and local tourist development groups are working effectively to promote Northern Ireland tourism.

Local Government Elections

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will forthwith use his regulation-making power under section 1.(2)(1F) of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 to resolve the difficulty which has arisen over the use of medical cards at the local government elections on 15 May.

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend has carefully considered this possibility. However, to alter the list of documents specified in paragraph 34(6) of schedule 1 to the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, two instruments are necessary, one to alter the list for parliamentary elections, the other for local elections. The form of the legislation ensures that the same documents must be used for both parliamentary and local elections. Both instruments need to be approved by resolution of each House of Parliament and, in the case of local elections, the instrument needs to be made by Her Majesty in Council. Whilst it might be theoretically possible to put through both instruments and arrange a special meeting of the Privy Council, the time scale is such that it could not be known until the day preceding polling day whether the necessary changes had been made. To follow this course would thus increase uncertainty and confusion.

Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors (Pay)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met representatives of the Royal College of Nursing in Northern Ireland to discuss the findings of the review body on pay for nurses, midwives and health visitors; and if it is his intention that the full recommendations of the review body should be implemented in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Medical Cards

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give a breakdown of the 1·4 million medical cards issued to which his hon. Friend referred on 29 April, Official Report, column 22, to indicate, as far as possible, what groups of people received them, namely, newly born persons changing address or doctor and the number issued to each group in each year since the central services agency was set up.

Mr. Scott: Statistics are not available in the form requested, and no specific records of the number of medical cards issued have been kept since 1981. The figures for 1982, 1983 and 1984 which appear in the table are therefore estimates.

Breakdown of Medical Cards Issued from 1 October 1973 to 31 December 1984

TOTAL	1,384,102	275,230	41,739	1,067,133

* From 1 Octoberber 1973.
† Estimate.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, in each year since the Central Services Agency for Personal Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland was set up, how many medical cards have been issued to (a) new-born children in Northern Ireland, (b) adults living in Northern Ireland as replacement for any and all reasons and (c) persons entering Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer to his earlier question on this subject. Figures for the numbers of replacement cards issued to adults or to persons entering Northern Ireland are not separately recorded.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of local government electors in Northern Ireland who hold a medical card which is acceptable as proof of identity for the local government elections on 15 May; and what percentage of the electorate this represents.

Mr. Scott: This information is not available. The total number of medical cards issued by the Central Services Agency since its inception in 1973 is approximately 1,384,000, but there is no reliable means of correlating this figure with the number of people eligible to vote. The total includes applications from people who have since died, left Northern Ireland or not yet reached voting age. In addition, some applicants may have obtained replacements for cards issued since 1973, either because they have changed their doctor or address, or because they have lost their previous card.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of local government electors in Northern Ireland who hold a medical card which is not acceptable as proof of identity for the local government elections on 15 May; and what percentage of the local government electors this represents.

Mr. Scott: It is not possible to estimate the number of electors who were issued with a medical card by the General Health Services Board, who have not subsequently received a card issued by the Central Services Agency, and who still have their original card in their possession.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of local government electors in Northern Ireland whose only means of proving their identity for the purpose of receiving their ballot paper for the local government elections on 15 May is a medical card which they hold; and, of those persons, how many hold a medical card not issued by the Central Services Agency of the Personal Health and Social Services Department.

Mr. Scott: The Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 provides that the only medical cards which may be accepted by presiding officers in local elections as proof of identity are those issued by the Northern Ireland Central Services Agency for the health and social services. It is not possible to estimate how many electors holding a medical card issued by the agency possess none of the other documents specified under the order.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he was first made aware that a medical card issued by the Northern Ireland General Health Services Board could not be accepted as proof of identity under the provisions of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 and the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985.

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend was informed on 24 April 1985 that some voters in Northern Ireland still held medical cards issued by the Northern Ireland General Health Services Board which was abolished in 1973. As the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland stated on 26 April and as my hon. Friend, the Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) told the House on 29 April, these cards are not specified documents for the purpose of obtaining a ballot paper under the provisions of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 and the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985.

Local Government Electors

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of local government electors in Northern Ireland who hold either a United Kingdom passport or a passport issued by the Republic of Ireland, or both.

Mr. Scott: I do not have any information about the number of holders of Republic of Ireland passports living in Northern Ireland. No separate record is kept of applications for United Kingdom passports from Northern Ireland residents. It is not possible therefore to give a useful estimate of the number of such passport holders on the electoral register for Northern Ireland local elections.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of married women who would need to produce their marriage certificate as proof of identity in order to cast their ballot in the local government elections on 15 May.

Mr. Scott: The inclusion of marriage certificates in the list of specified documents under the provisions of the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 was designed to assist women who have married since the electoral register was last compiled, and who may not possess any other documents under their maiden name. It is not possible to estimate how many women may fall into this category.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of local government electors in Northern Ireland who hold an allowance or pension book, or books, which is acceptable as proof of identity for the purpose of exercising the franchise on 15 May.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Benefits

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list what information is available about the geographical distribution, by regions or otherwise, of the number of recipients of supplementary benefit on long-term scale rates, in each year since 1981.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 17 April at columns 214-15.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his policy on the circumstances in which he waives repayment of overpaid benefit;

(2) why he will not waive repayment in the case of Mr. D. Wilcha about whom the hon. Member for Stretford wrote to him on 12 and 14 February.

Mr. Whitney: The Secretary of State has a statutory right to recover benefit which the independent adjudication authorities decide has been overpaid. It is the Secretary of State's policy to seek recovery in every case in which he has a right to do so unless it would cause undue hardship. Careful consideration is given to factors such as the cause of the overpayment and the person's age, health and financial and domestic circumstances.

Mr. D. Wilcha's case was considered carefully against these criteria. There were no special circumstances to justify a decision not to seek repayment of the benefit overpaid to him. He has already made arrangements to repay by deduction from his current benefit.

Elderly Mentally Infirm

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to establish a precise means of defining those people who may be categorised as the elderly mentally infirm.

Mr. John Patten: In recent years the Department has followed professional practice in abandoning the distinction formerly made between elderly people with mental illness and those suffering from forms of dementia. It is now accepted that a specialised service for the "psychiatry of old age" is required. Guidance on the development of such a service is contained in the Health Advisory Service's report "The Rising Tide," issued in 1983, a copy of which is in the Library. If my hon. Friend has a particular problem in mind, no doubt he will let me know.

Management Consultants

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the contracts, with the subject of assignment, awarded to management consultancy firms by his Department in 1984, with the name of the consultants concerned.

Mr. Fowler: The following is a list of contracts awarded by my Department in 1984, for management-computer-technical consultancy.

NHS (Price Rises)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is available to him about the rise in prices paid by the National Health Service as compared with the general rise in prices since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since 1979, the Health Services Price Index, which measures movements in the prices of goods and services directly bought by health authorities, has risen by nearly 60 per cent., compared to an estimated general rise in prices as measured by the GDP deflator over the same period of 52 per cent.

Invalid Vehicles (Petrol Allowance)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by what percentage the petrol allowance paid to the disabled drivers of his Department's invalid vehicles has fallen in real terms since it was increased to its present value; and to what amount it would be necessary to increase the allowance to restore its value.

Mr. Newton: The value of the petrol tax allowance paid to drivers of the Department's invalid three-wheelers has fallen by 68·5 per cent. in real terms since it was fixed in November 1974. Based on the movement in the retail prices index from November 1974 to March 1985, it would be necessary to increase the allowance to £32 a year to restore its value. It is, however, not linked directly to the index or any other specific factor.

Claimants (Order Books)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what difficulties his Department is aware of where claimants have a single order book for more than one benefit; and what efforts have been made to overcome them.

Mr. Whitney: We are not aware of difficulties where claimants have single order books for more than one benefit. If the right hon. Member cares to let me have details of any such difficulties which claimants have encountered, I will arrange for these to be examined.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if mobility allowance beneficiaries lose any weeks' benefit if they transfer from order book to credit transfer payment.

Mr. Newton: No, but the period between payments is six days longer at the point of changeover. Under both methods of payment mobility allowance is paid at four-weekly intervals. Credit transfer payments are made on the last day (a Tuesday) of each four-week period while order book payments are available on the preceding Wednesday.

Contraception (Minors)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those community health councils from which he has received recent representations concerning the provision of contraceptive drugs and devices to minors without their parents' consent.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In the last six months we have received such representations from South Cumbria and Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton community health councils.

Home Helps

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent advice he has sent to local authorities about the charging of elderly infirm and disabled people who live on supplementary benefit for their home helps.

Mr. John Patten: Circular LAC(84)7 issued to local authorities in March 1984 drew attention to the charging provisions for home help contained in the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983 and the guidelines issued by the Local Authority Association to its members. A copy of the circular is in the Library.

Prescribing

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made in his discussions with the British Medical Association regarding an appeal system relating to the need of a particular patient to be prescribed by a general practitioner a drug no longer available under the National Health Service; by what date he expects the discussions to be concluded; and when a new appeal system will be in place.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have had a number of discussions with representatives of the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association and the Royal College of General Practitioners about the possibility of setting up such an appeal system. In the light of those discussions, I set out the Government's proposals for an appeal mechanism in a letter to the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association on 16 April. I understand that the committee has decided to refer the offer to the annual conference of local medical committees, which is to be held on 12 and 13 June, and that no final response will be made until after that.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the expenditure on the state earnings-related pension scheme in each year since 1978; what has been the number of pensioners benefiting and the average level of additional pension paid in each of these years; and what is the forecast level of expenditure on this scheme, stating the assumptions used (i) for each year till 1998 and (ii) for each year till 2030, in each case indicating the number of pensioner beneficiaries each year, and the average level of earnings-related pension each year.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Health Service

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will set out, for each year since 1960, the level of (i) Exchequer supplement, (ii) national insurance contributions, (iii) National Health Service charges levied and (iv) other revenue sources contributing each year to the total National Health Service budget; and what percentage of total revenue each year came from each of these sources;

(2) what has been the level of National Health Service expenditure each year since 1960; what percentage change each year this represents in real terms as measured by the retail price index; what percentage change each year this represents in terms of National Health Service pay and prices; and what percentage change each year this represents in terms of National Health Service pay and prices, taking into account annual rises in demographic demand and in the costs of medical technology.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Surrogacy

Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has issued to local authorities guidance on their responsibilities in surrogacy cases.

Mr. John Patten: Yes, a circular has been issued today, a copy of which is in the Library.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of people in receipt of attendance allowance at each rate at 31 December 1984; and if he will break down the figures by (a) social security region, (b) the rate per 1,000 population in each region and (c) the rate per 1,000 of population over 65 years of age in each region.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 March 1985, c. 173-4]: The available information is in the following tables. I regret that information is not available to provide a regional breakdown of attendance allowance recipients over 65 expressed as a rate per thousand of the population over 65.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC (Cereal Stocks)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of EEC cereal stocks was sent overseas as (a) food aid, (b) emergency supplies and (c) subsidised sales in the latest 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: During this period exports, including those for food aid, have been predominantly from the free market. Total export commitments for all cereals for the current marketing year had reached 17·1 million tonnes by 16 April. Under the food aid convention the community and its member states are committed to supply a minimum of 1·65 million tonnes of cereal food aid per year.

In the year ended 12 April 1985 some 3 per cent. of the cereals held in intervention at the start of that period, plus intake over that period, was released for food aid and emergency food aid; and 6 per cent. as normal exports.

Milk

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further plans have been put forward by the EEC to eliminate the surplus production of milk; to what extent the existing quotas on production permit surplus production; what effect the various price and other proposals will have on United Kingdom milk producers' returns in the current marketing year; and if it is his intention to reduce the returns to producers to bring supply and demand into balance within the quota system.

Mr. MacGregor: At present the Community milk quotas permit production of some 13·5 million tonnes in excess of consumption.

The Commission has proposed an increase in the target price of 1·5 per cent.; this is accompanied by a cut in quotas of approximately 1 per cent. and a reduction in the rate of the corresponsibility levy from 3 per cent. to 2 per cent. of the target price. These proposals are currently being discussed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers in the context of this year's price fixing negotiations, and it is not possible at this stage to predict the outcome.

The Government place high priority on improving the balance of supply and demand in the milk sector and reducing the heavy financial costs to the Community budget. It is for this reason that we are continuing to argue for a price freeze in these negotiations.

Actual returns to producers in the United Kingdom are dependent upon the prices for milk obtained from the different outlets for milk by the milk marketing boards or by producers themselves where they sell direct. How far these reflect changes in institutional prices depends upon the market circumstances for the different outlets and the marketing skills of those supplying them.

Monofilament Nets

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research he has initiated into the use of monofilament nets and their impact upon salmon stocks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Directorate of Fisheries Research studies the use of gill nets made of various materials, including monofilament fibre, and the effects of their use. Work already carried out has indicated that monofilament nets tend to cause less damage to salmon than multifilament nets. Work presently in hand is not directly related to salmon stocks.

Olive Oil

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the expected cost to the European Economic Community budget of the current price proposals under the common agricultural policy for olive oil.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission estimates that its proposals on olive oil will cost 36·5 mecu in 1986 but have a nil effect in 1985.

EC (Spending)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he took into account the possiblity of a fall in the value of the dollar in agreeing to a limit being put on European Economic Community agricultural expenditure; and whether he is satisfied that such expenditure will not exceed the specified limit in the current year.

Mr. MacGreogr: The provision made for expenditure under the common agricultural policy in the draft budget for 1985, which was established by the Budget Council on 23 April, takes account of the possibility of a fall in the value of the dollar compared with the European currency unit and it is not expected to be exceeded.

Cereals

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the Government have not insisted on the full application of the price reduction formula on cereals; and if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage reduction which the application of the formula would require.

Mr. MacGregor: Our view is that the full 5 per cent. reduction required by the application of the guarantee threshold should be applied to the existing price level, without any offsetting norm price increase, although a norm price increase is not inconsistent with the existing guarantee threshold rules. We are continuing to make this clear in negotiations in the Council of Ministers, although there is widespread and stiff opposition to this view.

Birds (Special Protection Areas)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has made any objections to the listing as a European Commission birds directive special protection area and Ramsar convention site the following estuaries (a) Morecambe bay, (b) River Orwell, Suffolk and (c) the Wash.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tourism

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the grants over £10,000 given by the English tourist board to aid tourist development projects in each of the last five years, specifying also where appropriate the ultimate holding company of the recipient of the grant.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The English Tourist board made 1,800 grant offers to tourism projects under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 during the five financial years 1980-81 to 1984-85. Details of individual grants of over £10,000 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Telecommunications Equipment

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what proportion of telecommunications equipment which is assembled in the United Kingdom is manufactured locally, by ex-factory percentage of value; and what proportion of this value is accounted for by labour and what by component;

(2) if he is satisfied that British manufacturers of telcommunications equipment enjoy the same access to the Swedish market that Swedish manufacturers of telecommunications equipment have to the British market.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the value of imports of telecommunications equipment from Japan including components into the United Kingdom for the last 12 months for which figures are available; and what was the value of United Kingdom exports of telecommunications equipment including components to Japan for the same period;

(2) what was the value of imports of Swedish telecommunications equipment including components into the United Kingdom for the last 12 months for which figures are available; and what was the value of United Kingdom exports of telecommunications equipment to Sweden, including components over the same period.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Nippon Telegraph and Telephone

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government will seek to make arrangements with the Government of Japan to enable British investors to buy shares in Nippon Telegraph and Telephone.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Citizens Band Radio

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest position on the introduction of citizens band radio to the frequencies recommended by the Conference of European Posts and Telecommunications Unions.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

British Telecom

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance was made available in the United Kingdom to enable Japanese investors to buy shares in British Telecom.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Company Holdings

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list for each of the last five years the number of times the commissioners informally and confidentially approached companies in which they hold shares to discuss matters about the running of the company which cause the commissioners concern; and if he will detail the nature of these concerns.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The number of companies the Commissioners have approached over the last five years is as follows:

	Number
1980	16
1981	11
1982	15
1983	18
1984	21

As the question indicates such approaches (both in writing and at meetings) cover a wide range of social and ethical issues. They are made confidentially since the Commissioners are convinced that this is the most effective way to make them. In November 1984 the Commissioners did however announce that they had sold their investment in a major United States company, Carnation, because they had been unable to obtain satisfactory assurances regarding the working conditions of a proportion of its workforce in South Africa.

Staff Statistics

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list the total number of staff employed by the commissioners; and if he will clarify these data according to the following salary ranges and as to whether the staff are male or female: under £4,000, £4,001 to £5,000, £5,001 to £7,000, £7,001 to £9,000, £9,001 to £11,000, £11,001 to £13,000, £13,001 to £15,000, £15,001 to £17,000, £17,001 to £19,000, £19,001 to £21,000 and over £21,000 per annum.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The total number of staff employed by the Commissioners at 31 December 1984 was 371. They fall into the categories mentioned as follows:

Gross Annual Salary Range	Number of Males	Number of Females	Total
Under £4,000	Nil	Nil	Nil
£4,001 to £5,000	0	2	2
£5,001 to £7,000	51	52	103
£7,001 to £9,000	49	59	108
£9,001 to £11,000	32	22	54
£11,001 to £13,000	30	15	45
£13,001 to £15,000	22	1	23
£15,001 to £17,000	3	1	4
£17,001 to £19,000	4	1	5
£19,001 to £21,000	1	2	3
Over £21,000	23	1	24
Total	215	156	371

The Commissioners' staff hold posts graded by reference to Civil Service analogues and the salary figures used are the gross figures payable and based on the appropriate Civil Service scale for each grade and include the London weighting allowance (£1,300 per annum).

ENVIRONMENT

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each local authority in England according to the percentage of the national rate support grant that was allocated to it for each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1985, c. 89]: The information is in the table:

Notes:

(i) Figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 comprise needs, resources and domestic elements and are final entitlements. Figures for 1981-82 onwards comprise block grant and domestic rate relief grant. For 1981-82 they are final entitlements. Block grant entitlements in 1982-83 and 1983-84 are based on outturn expenditure after holdback; those for 1984-85 are based on budgets after holdback; and those for 1985-86 are based on budgets (where available) before holdback but after initial percentage close-ending.

(ii) The figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 are not comparable with those for later years. Resources element was not paid to non-metropolitan counties, and rate support grant was not paid to metropolitan counties or to precepting authorities in London prior to 1981-82. In 1981-82 and 1982-83 block grant in respect of the Metropolitan police was paid to the rating authorities in London; this arrangement applied also to the Greater London council in 1981-82 only.

Council Housing

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the number of empty council houses and flats which are for sale.

Sir George Young: According to local authorities' most recent housing investment programme returns, at 1 April 1984, 5,600 empty dwellings were awaiting sale, 400 were undergoing repair or improvement for sale, and 600 were awaiting repair or improvement for sale.

Performing Arts (Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the hon. Member for Stretford may expect a reply from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) to his letter of 25 February concerning the performing arts in Greater Manchester.

Sir George Young: I shall be replying very shortly. I regret the delay.

EC (Environmental Policy)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking in the EC to promote a common approach to environmental issues.

Mr. Waldegrave: In the Council of Environment Ministers, where I represent the United Kingdom, it is my prime concern to see that a common approach is adopted where action at Community level is justified. This involves being satisfied that there is a sound scientific basis for proposed measures and that their costs and likely benefits are fully assessed. The Government have endorsed a number of important principles within the Community: that there should be an environmental dimension to other Community policies; that prevention is preferable to cure; that due regard should be paid to the "polluter pays principle" and that Community legislation should be effectively implemented. The varying environmental conditions and practices of individual member states and the need to avoid environmental policy being used to attempt to set up barriers to trade are also crucial. These considerations apply both when we respond to draft legislation from the Commission and when we put forward our own proposals, such as our successful initiatives on unleaded petrol and the introduction of a new emphasis on conservation in the common agricultural policy. Increasingly, with our partners in the Community, we are seeking better ways of working together in co-operation with countries outside the Community, especially in helping to tackle the environmental problems of developing countries.

Local Authorities (Land Holdings)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the proportion of the total area of freehold land in the United Kingdom which is owned by local authorities in (a) England, (b) Yorkshire and Humberside region, (c) West Yorkshire and (d) Leeds.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not held centrally.

Asbestos

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, before placing a contract for the transport of asbestos from Faslane to Glenboig, the Property Services Agency sought the advice of Monklands district council or Glenboig community council; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No. The Property Services Agency satisfied itself that its chosen contractor would remove the asbestos waste to a suitable tip licensed for such a purpose by a local authority.

Regal Cinema, Edmonton

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider the listing of the Regal cinema, Edmonton, as a building of architectural and historic interest which is presently under the threat of demolition.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England, which is the statutory adviser to my right hon. Friend in these matters, has advised that the Regal cinema, Edmonton, does not possess sufficient special architectural or historic interest. My right hon. Friend has accepted this advice, and does not therefore intend to list the cinema.

Broad Street Station

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider the listing of Broad street station as a building of architectural and historic interest; and whether he has received any representations from the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England on this issue.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England wrote to the Department on 5 March this year to advise that in its opinion Broad street station was of a quality to be listed in grade II. However, the question of listing this building had been considered previously in 1971, 1975 and 1981. On each occasion it was decided that the building was not of sufficient special architectural or historic interest to warrant listing. My right hon. Friend studied the arguments of the commission but concluded that these did not justify reversing previous decisions. The commission was informed of this on 22 April.

Management Consultancy Contracts

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the contracts, with the subject of assignment, awarded to management consultancy firms by his Department in 1984, with the name of the consultants concerned.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I shall provide the information as soon as our current survey of consultancy contracts let in the financial year 1984-85 is completed.

Structure Plans

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the north-east Hampshire structure plan; and what proportion of these were against the plan.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have received approximately 130 objections and representations from some 60 organisations and individuals on proposals for alterations to the north-east Hampshire structure plan submitted to me by the Hampshire county council. Approximately 120 objections were made to various aspects of the proposed alterations.

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the report of the examination in public into the north-east Hampshire structure plan; and when this report and the Secretary of State's comments on it will be made public.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have received the report on the examination in public into proposed alterations to the north-east Hampshire structure plan. Full consideration is being given to all the recommendations in the report. I hope that the report and proposed modifications to the alterations will be published early in June.

Fly Posting

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to combat the growth of unauthorised fly posting.

Mr. Macfarlane: Unauthorised "fly-posting" is an offence which is open to prosecution by the local planning authority, under section 109 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. Since July 1982 district councils and London boroughs have also had power, under section 109A of the 1971 Act, to remove or obliterate any illegally displayed placard or poster after giving two days' notice of their intention to do so. Guidance about dealing effectively with "fly-posting" is given in paragraphs 39 to 41 of the annex to my Department's circular No. 11/84, which was issued to all local authorities on 9 April last year.

House Repairs (Warranty Scheme)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress made so far in respect of a warranty scheme for the repair of homes covered by the Housing Defects Act; and if he will indicate the steps which have been taken to ensure that the warranty will be acceptable to the building societies.

Mr. Gow: On 2 May the executive committee of the National House Building Council approved the arrangements for the scheme. Its subsidiary formed specifically for the purpose ("PRC Homes Limited") will invite designers and builders to submit systems of repair of precast reinforced concrete houses for approval. This approval will mean that local authorities, lending institutions and, most important, the owners can be satisfied that the system of repair has been examined carefully by technical experts, that the carrying out of the repair will be supervised closely by qualified engineers or surveyors and that the builders responsible for the work are reliable and reputable. In addition to all of these safeguards the scheme will provide insurance cover for 10 years against major structural defects arising from the failure of the repair. The Building Societies Association has participated in the setting up of the arrangements and I am confident that houses repaired under the scheme will prove acceptable to building societies generally.

I hope that the first approvals of repair schemes can be given this summer and that the first repairs to PRC houses under the scheme can be completed before the winter. My Department will be writing to the local authority associations and to individual local authorities, to explain how the arrangements under this scheme relate to the overall administration by local authorities, of assistance to owners under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

I record my thanks to the National House Building Council and to the Building Societies Association for their sustained help, without which this novel scheme would not have been introduced.

Conservation Orders

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in date order the requests from the Nature Conservancy Council for section 29 conservation orders he has received since 1 January; and which have so far not been granted or approved by him.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member with this information.

Block Grant

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 1 May to the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington, if he will indicate which local authorities there listed are to have their block grant reduced because their expenditure is above target, and for each of those authorities the grant per head that has been forgone.

Mr. Waldegrave: Although proposals for the basis of block grant reductions in 1985-86 were made in the main rate support grant report approved on 16 January, the reductions cannot be made until all authorities' budgets have been received and analysed. This is still in progress. The necessary recalculations will as usual be incorporated in a supplementary report to be laid before the House for approval in July.

Swans (Lead Poisoning)

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available in the Library the advice he has received from the Nature Conservancy Council on the subject of anglers' lead weights and the lead poisoning of mute swans.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall arrange for a copy of this report to be placed in the Library of the House. I am currently considering the NCC's findings and will make a statement shortly.

Council House Sales

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to continue with the special arrangements under which tenants of Norwich city council are currently exercising the right to buy their homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: Norwich city council has been processing right-to-buy applications from its tenants for the sale of council houses under the terms of a consent given by my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Defence following his decision to serve notice of intervention on the council on 3 December 1981. These arrangements, under which more than 2,000 tenants have purchased their homes, have been kept under review. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has concluded that, in view of the council's progress with the right to buy and the assurances given by the council about its future practices and performance, the notice of intervention should be removed.

My Department has given the council today a notice of withdrawal of intervention under which the specific timetables and processing arrangements set out in the terms of the consent will not apply to applications submitted after the notice of withdrawal has effect. Norwich city council, as with other local authorities, will continue to be subject to the statutory requirements of the Housing Act 1980 and the Housing and Building Control Act 1984 in its conduct of the right to buy. The removal of the notice of intervention makes no difference to the right of tenants of the council to purchase their homes or to make representations to the council or my Department if they feel they are being unfairly treated.

Housing and Construction Industry

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people work in the public and private sector, respectively, of the housing and construction industry.

Sir George Young: In 1984 there were some 1,055,000 employees working in the building and construction industry, 256,000 of whom were employed by public authorities. In addition, an estimated 463,000 self-employed persons were working in the industry.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of man-weeks worked in the housing and construction industry during the last 12 months for which figures are available differentiating between the public and private sectors.

Sir George Young: This information is not available centrally.

Local Authorities (Building and Repair Work)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of local authority housing, construction and repair work is carried out under contract to private firms.

Sir George Young: The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication "Direct Labour Organisations Statistics 1982-83 Actuals" gives details of the amount of building construction and maintenance work carried out by authorities' own employees and by outside constractors respectively. The figures do not, however, distinguish between housing and other work.

New Towns and Housing Associations (Grants)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will express total central Government subsidies to local authority and new towns' housing and housing associations as a percentage of total general subsidies to housing for each year since 1979-80.

Sir George Young: Central Government subsidies to local authority and new town housing and current and capital grants to housing associations are given in the table for the United Kingdom.

Estimates of amounts of other forms of Government support for housing costs were given in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 20 March, at column 505.

	*Central Government subsidies to Local Authority and new town housing £ million	Grants to† housing associations £ million
1979-80	1,828	577
1980-81	2,029	587
1981-82	1,437	561
1982-83	940	687
1983-84	656	1,110

* Including subsidies to Scottish Special Housing Association and Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

† Including revenue deficit grant and housing association grant.

Departmental Furniture

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 111, what were the individual costs of the three-piece suites purchased for Ministers' offices in his Department in 1983-84 and 1984-85, and the desk set purchased in 1983-84.

Sir George Young: The individual costs were as follows:

	1983-84 £	1984-85 £
3 piece suites	1,469	1,713
	750
Desk Set	130

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 28 March, Official Report, column 333, what has been the total cost in each of the past five years of the cars operated by the Crown Suppliers.

Sir George Young: A breakdown of the cost of cars as opposed to other vehicles in the Crown Suppliers' self-drive fleet cannot be provided within the time available. The total fleet budget for the years in question were:

1980-81	6,019,170
1981-82	6,286,546
1982-83	6,737,677
1983-84	6,663,244
1984-85	7,744,018

House Building

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permanent new dwellings were (a) started in the public and private sector, respectively, in England in 1984-85, (b) under construction and (c) completed.

Sir George Young: The provisional figures are as follows:

England: Financial Year 1984-85

Thousand dwellings

	Public Sector	Private Sector
Started	30·7	129·8
Completed	40·6	129·7
Under Construction at 31 March 1985	48·7	201·0

Public Sector Housing (Renovation)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many public sector house renovations were completed in 1984-85.

Sir George Young: Provisional public sector renovations completed in the first nine months of 1984-85 were published in table 2.13 of "Housing and Construction Statistics Part 2, No. 20". A copy is in the Library.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average cost per dwelling of a public sector renovation scheme in the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Sir George Young: The provisional average cost for 1984 is slightly below £7,000 for English public sector dwellings.

Rent Acts

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to announce the outcome of his Department's review of the Rent Acts.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on 13 March at column 144.

Rates

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the average rates payments for (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers for each local authority in England;

(2) what is the average increase in rates for each local authority in England; and if he will publish a table;

(3) what is the average increase in the rate poundage, in each local authority of England of (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers; and if he will publish a table or tables;

(4) what is the present average rateable value in each local authority in England of (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers; and if he will publish a table.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total value of contracts and the number of consultants retained by the London Docklands Development Corporation in each year since its creation.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985, c. 32]: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Number of firms engaged	Payments £ million
1981-82 (9 months)	37	1·434
1982-83	155	5·056
1983-84	146	9·235
1984-85	168	9·6

Royal Docks (STOLport)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has evaluated the effect of the development of a STOLport in the royal docks area on the willingness of foreign investors to establish businesses in the area.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 257]: The London Docklands Development Corporation, in its evidence to the public local planning inquiry into the STOLport development, provided information on its potential for attracting investment generally to the royal docks and surrounding area, although the question of foreign investment was not specifically examined.

Conservation

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he received the request from the Nature Conservancy Council for a section 29 conservation order to be applied on land within Ferry Ford farm, Staffordshire; and when he expects to sign the order.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 257]: I was first formally alerted by the Nature Conservancy Council to the need for an order on 3 April. After subsequent receipt of full details of the case for an order, and the completion of essential consultations, the order was duly made on 1 May 1985.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to list as a European Commission birds directive special protection area and Ramsar convention site the following estuaries: (a) Morecambe Bay, (b) River Orwell, Suffolk, and (c) the Wash.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 257]: The listing of sites under the EC Birds directive and the Ramsar convention is linked to the renotification programme for sites of special scientific interest, which is expected to be substantially complete by the end of 1986. The Wash has been renotified as a SSSI but it would be inappropriate to reach a decision about its listing in advance of agreement on a strategy for the area.

Asbestos Dumping (Glenboig)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the hon. Member for Monklands, West can expect to receive a letter from his Department regarding details of the dumping of asbestos at Glenboig, as promised in the answer by his right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, of 25 April, Official Report, column 520.

Sir George Young: I have written to the hon. Member today.

Bloodstock Breeders

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he has made in his consideration of the representations made to him by representatives of bloodstock breeders to introduce early legislation to reverse the Whitsbury Manor Stud decision in advance of a hearing before the Court of Appeal; and when he intends to announce his decision on this specific request.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have considered the representations carefully. I understand that the Court of Appeal will be considering this case in the near future. I shall await its decision before deciding what action, if any, would be justified.

Butterflies

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those species of butterflies found in the United Kingdom which the Nature Conservancy Council regards as having significantly or substantially declined or as threatened or endangered.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that out of a total British list of 55 resident breeding species, one—the large blue—became extinct in 1979, 10 more are regarded as vulnerable or endangered, and 13 have declined in numbers and become less widespread since 1960 because of contraction of their habitats. The species affected are as follows:

Butterfly species	State of species
Adonis Blue	vulnerable
Brown Hairstreak	declining
Chalkhill Blue	declining
Chequered Skipper	declining
Dark Green Fritillary	declining
Dingy Skipper	declining
Duke of Burgundy	vulnerable
Grayling	declining
Grizzled Skipper	declining
Heath Fritillary	vulnerable
High Brown Fritillary	vulnerable
Large Blue	extinct
Large Tortoiseshell	endangered
Marbled White	declining
Marsh Fritillary	vulnerable
Pearl-bordered Fritillary	declining
Purple Emperor	declining
Silver-spotted Skipper	vulnerable
Silver-studded Blue	vulnerable
Silver-washed Fritillary	declining
Small Blue	declining
Small Pearl-bordered	declining
White-letter Hairstreak	vulnerable
Wood White	vulnerable

Ministerial Cars

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide details by individual Ministers in his Department of the costs for ministerial cars in each year since 1980-81.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he will not express in numerical form the number of relevant representations he has received relating to section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: A precise figure could not be provided, since not all of the numerous representations received are in writing, and it is not always clear whether representations relate specifically to section 7 or to applications for consent under that section.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations have been received from prospective purchasers of properties for which consent had been sought under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: Numerous representations have been received, a significant proportion of which were made by telephone. Many involved transactions for which no application for consent had been received from the authority concerned.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the measures he is taking to ensure that all consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 are processed within one month of submission.

Mr. Waldegrave: Sufficient staff and other resources will continue to be deployed to ensure that all applications are considered expeditiously on their individual merits.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 39, what further information was requested from the Greater London council in respect of the three outstanding consent applications under section 8 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984; and when the additional information was sought.

Mr. Waldegrave: Letters requesting further information were sent to the Greater London council on 10 October 1984, 17 December 1984 and 29 January 1985. Copies are in the Library.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 35, when consents were sought under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1948 in respect of the following organisations: (a) the Women's Peace Bus, (b) the London Lesbian and Gay Centre, (c) Interights, (d) Spare Rib and (e) Searchlight; and what is the reason for the delay in processing each case.

Mr. Waldegrave: The applications for consent were received from the Greater London council on 11 March 1985. Each needs to be considered carefully and on its merits. A decision has now been issued in respect of the London Lesbian and Gay Centre. The council has been asked to supply further information about the proposed grant to Searchlight Publishing Ltd.

Local Authorities (Advertising)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many members of the public have made representations in writing or by other means to his Department about the level of advertising by local authorities.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Whale and Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to ban imports of all whale and turtle products.

Mr. Waldegrave: EC Regulation 3626/82, which has implemented the convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora within the European Community since 1 January 1984, already bans the import of whale and sea turtle products for commercial purposes. Only limited exemptions to the ban may be granted by my Department under the provisions of these regulations.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answers of 29 April, Official Report, columns 35 and 36, if he will list the individuals or organisations which took up import permits for whale and turtle products in each of the years since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take in response to the United Nations proclamation of 1987 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless.

Mr. Raison: The Government endorsed the United Nations resolution which instigated activity on behalf of the homeless in developing countries. The United Nations Commission for Human Settlement has been told that we will be pleased to consider funding, under aid programme arrangements, appropriate projects submitted by developing countries.

Countries have been asked to nominate, as a special contribution to the year, projects which are now being implemented which will be operational by 1987. We plan to nominate two such projects but agreement to do so is currently being sought from the recipient countries.

PRIME MINISTER

Dublin Council of Ministers

Q14. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the manner in which the decisions of the Dublin Council of Ministers have been implemented, with particular reference to the distribution of food aid by the European Economic Community; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Progress in distributing the 1·2 million tonnes of food aid pledged at Dublin for countries affected by famine in Africa has been slower than I would have wished. 230,000 tonnes will be delivered by the European Commission and 376,100 tonnes by the member states to the countries most seriously affected in the first half of 1985, although some may arise from pledges made before Dublin.

Bridges and Estuaries (Tolls)

Q44. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy with regard to the charging of tolls on bridges and estuarial crossings; what are the criteria by which the charging or non-charging of tolls are decided; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The policy of the Government towards estuarial crossings is that, except where there are counter-arguments on grounds of traffic diversion or congestion, they should be paid for by users rather than taxpayers because of the exceptional savings in time and money which these expensive facilities make possible.

Pensions

Q96. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister whether she will ensure that, in any reform of the basic state retirement pension scheme, men and women will be placed on the same basis of age eligibility for receiving their retirement pension.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 5 March 1985, Official Report, column 444. Proposals for the future of social security will be published shortly.

Falkland Islands

Q117. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister what plans are being made for her to visit the Falkland Islands; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to visit the Falkland Islands.

City Action Teams

Q118. Mr. John Fraser asked the Prime Minister if she proposes to visit any inner city partnership areas in relation to her initiatives on city action teams.

The Prime Minister: As in the past, I hope to visit such cities.

EC (Contributions)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she will provide figures for the United Kingdom contributions to the European Economic Community together with the expected increases in levies, in a form consistent with her answer of 4 March, Official Report, column 395, about increases in its own resources of the EEC.

The Prime Minister: On the basis of the draft 1985 budget established in Council on 22 April, the United Kingdom's contribution to the 1985 European Community budget is now expected to be 6,238 mecu including the United Kingdom share of the Intergovernmental Agreement. This represents a real increase compared with our contribution in 1984 of some 3·7 per cent.

Sugar and isoglucose and agricultural levies will be lower in 1985 than in 1984. The decreases are 20 million ecu—20 per cent.—and 130 million ecu—32 per cent. —respectively.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to propose the phasing out of restrictions under the multi-fibre arrangement on textile and clothing imports from all the 50 poorest countries during the Bonn economic summit.

The Prime Minister: The Government is still considering what regime should succeed the current multi-fibre arrangement when it expires in July next year; a matter which the House will be debating on 9 May. We shall be taking account of the needs of the world's least developed countries.

Debt Rescheduling

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy during the Bonn economic summit to seek to write off existing official aid debts and offer more generous and longer term rescheduling of other outstanding Government debts of the 50 poorest countries.

The Prime Minister: No. Britain has already been generous. Forty-four of the fifty poorest countries have no official aid debts to the United Kingdom. Of the remainder, India now receives local costs aid up to the total official aid loan repayments due each year. The outstanding amount from the others is only £5·3 million. The terms of rescheduling for other outstanding official debts are usually decided multilaterally in the Paris club, where Britain has supported generous treatment of many of the poorest debtors.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 7 May.

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 7 May.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 7 May.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Whale By-products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister whether any Government Departments or agencies make use of whale by-products; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I regret that this kind of information is not held centrally.

Rates

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Prime Minister (1) what was the level of the rate support grant including the per capita value for each year, from central Government to Scotland, England and Wales, for each of the last 10 years; what percentage this represented of total local government expenditure for each year; and if she will publish a table;

(2) what comparisons have been made between the relative rateable value of comparable properties, small businesses and industries in Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland, respectively; and if she will publish this information in the form of a table.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to my hon. Friend shortly.

Secretary of State for Energy (Speech)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if the speech made by the Secretary of State for Energy on 2 May concerning unemployment, housing and poverty represents the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Council of Ministers (Decisions)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister in what circumstances Her Majesty's Government decide to place before Parliament for decision matters decided by the European Economic Community Council of Ministers; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman shortly.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Foreign Language Teaching

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total cost of provision for foreign language teaching, other than mother-tongue teaching, in maintained schools; and what assessment he has made of the economic benefit resulting from this teaching.

Mr. Dunn: Information on the total cost of provision for foreign language teaching in schools is not available. The largest element of the cost relates to staffing: full results from the 1984 secondary school staffing survey showing the number of foreign language teachers and teacher deployment on foreign languages will be available shortly. My right hon. Friend is aware of studies by various organisations of the relationship between foreign language learning and overseas trade and will be taking these — and employer responses to the consultative document "Foreign Languages in the School Curriculum" — into account in the policy statement on foreign languages he proposes to issue later this year.

Integrated Education

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to the reply by the Under-Secretary to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, what the total additional resources amount to for schools to achieve integrated education; what, in detail, the additional resources are used for; and how many children have been able to attend mainstream schools instead of special schools as a result of these additional resources.

Mr. Dunn: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Under the Government's in-service teacher training grants scheme, about £2 million is available to local education authorities in the current academic year towards the cost of replacing teachers released to one-term courses concerned with teaching children with special educational needs in ordinary schools. Under the education support grants scheme £2·25 million has been made available in the financial year 1985-86 to local education authorities to provide new or specially adapted microelectronic aids for children with special educational needs. This includes aids to permit integrated placements. In addition, provided costs are contained and savings made elsewhere, the government's expenditure plans for the current financial year should allow a substantial increase, compared with 1982-83, in the number of educational psychologists employed by local authorities. This should enable them to offer a better service to children with special educational needs. Information about the numbers of children who have benefited from these measures is not available.

Human Embryos (Research)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of research involving the use of human embryos at the Medical Research Council experimental embryology and teratology unit, the Medical Research Council reproductive biology unit and the department of obstetrics and gynaecology, university of Cambridge, stating, in each case, when such research began, what are the terms of reference or guidelines for such research, what is the cost and from what source the embryos are obtained.

Mr. Brooke: I understand from the Medical Research Council that the following research involving the use of embryos in vitro is being carried out:—

MRC Experimental Embryology and Teratology Unit:

Low temperature preservation of embryos. Nutrition and biochemistry of post-implantation embryos. Factors affecting in vitro fertilisation and embryo transfer in the human. This work began in April 1984 using embryos derived from a clinic at the Cromwell hospital, London. Expenditure figures are not yet available.

MRC Reproductive Biology Unit:

Neuroendocrine studies of ovulation and luteal function, with reference to infertility and embryo transfer. Development of in vitro methods to improve the fertility of human eggs and spermatozoa, in the context of in vitro fertilisation and artificial insemination.

Chromosome analysis of human spermatozoa and cleavage-stage human embryos to explore the incidence, nature and origins of chromosomal abnormalities. This work began in April 1984 using embryos from a clinic at the Edinburgh royal infirmary. Expenditure figures are not yet available.

Department of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, Cambridge:

Basic and clinical research on pre-implantation development. This research is funded by means of an MRC programme grant awarded in 1983 at a cost of £277,182 over five years. The embryos used in the programme are made available by a clinic at Addenbrooke's hospital, Cambridge.

All MRC research programmes in this field are conducted within the Council's published guidelines "Research related to human fertilisation and embryology". The MRC requires that all such research has local scientific and ethical committee approval.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Commission of Human Rights

Mr. Silvester asked the Attorney-General what has been the cost to his Department of dealing with representations to Her Majesty's Government in respect of individual applications lodged against the United Kingdom with the European Commission of Human Rights, including those referred to the court, in the latest 12 months for which figures are available.

The Attorney-General: It is not feasible to ascertain that proportion of the expenditure of my Department which is attributable to dealing with representations to Her Majesty's Government in respect of individual applications lodged against the United Kingdom with the human rights institutions in Strasbourg.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the degree of import penetration in each year since 1975 to the latest available period of agricultural tractors, machinery and chemicals, respectively.

Mr. Channon: The information requested is given in the table.

Standard industrial classification (1980)
Import penetration

Per cent.

	AH 3212 *Agricultural tractors	AH 3211 *Agricultural machinery	AH 2513 & AH 2568 Agricultural chemicals†
1975	46	41	18
1976	43	44	18
1977	45	44	20
1978	46	45	23
1979	43	47	26
1980	51	47	23
1981	46	53	22
1982	47	58	23
1983	48	52	29
1984 to Q2	40	57	31

* The figures for agricultural tractors and agricultural machinery for the years 1975 to 1977 are based on the Standard Industrial Classification (1968) (MLH 380 and MLH 331 respectively). The coverage of these two industries is very similar to those of the corresponding SIC(80) industries and the continuity of the series is unlikely to be greatly affected.
† AH 2513 fertilisers and AH 2568 formulated pesticides.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the United Kingdom market in each of the main sectors of manufacturing is now taken by imports from the EEC and Japan, respectively.

Mr. Channon: Figures consistent with those published in Business Monitor MQ12 "Import Penetration and Export Performance Ratios", as far as possible within reasonable cost, are given in the table.

Classes of the standard industrial classification (1980)	Import penetration year to June 1984 European Community	Japan
Class 21—Extraction of preparation of metalliferous ores	4	0
Class 22—Metal manufacturing	16	0
Class 23—Extraction of minerals, NES	7	0
Class 24—Manufacture of non-metallic mineral products	7	0
Class 25—Chemical industry	23	1
Class 26—Production of man-made fibres	49	1
Class 31—Manufacturing of metal goods NES	7	0

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Presidents of the Board of Trade, Ministers of Technology, Secretaries of State for Trade, Secretaries of State for Industry, Secretaries of State for Prices and Consumer Protection, Ministers of Posts and Telecommunications and Ministers for Aerospace, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Butcher: Following is a list of committees of inquiry which have been reported since May 1979 on topics within the present scope of my Department. In view of changes in the machinery of government, it would require disproportionate expenditure to produce a list going back to 1955.

DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEES OF INQUIRY 1979 TO DATE

Fur Coats (Labelling)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require all fur coats made from wild animals to be labelled to that effect.

Mr. Fletcher: I am not convinced that a legal requirement of this kind is necessary in the interests of consumers.

Manchester Steel Company

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Government have any plans to bring the Manchester Steel Co. into the phoenix plan for development of the steel industry in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Government have no such plans. It is for firms in the industry themselves to initiate and carry through restructuring projects which they consider to be commercially sensible. Only plans which involve the establishment of new joint ventures between the British Steel Corporation and the private sector are considered by the Government, on the basis of proposals put forward by the parties concerned.

Mobile Radio Services

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to announce his final proposals on mobile radio services in Band III.

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement shortly.

British Aerospace

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will arrange for the offer for sale of shares in British Aerospace to take place in Paris and Frankfurt as well as in London; and if he will make a statememt.

Mr. Butcher: The prospectus for the offer was published last week, and copies were placed in the Library. Shares are not being offered for sale overseas except to existing shareholders and eligible employees of British Aerospace.

Mayfair Hotel (Satellite Television)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether a licence has been issued to the Mayfair hotel, London, to take satellite television transmissions from the Europe telecommunication spacecraft via two antennae mounted on its roof.

Mr. Butcher: A limited number of letters of temporary authority have been issued for the purposes of test and development and demonstration of reception of satellite television programmes. The operator of the system at the Mayfair has such a letter of authority.

Honduras

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the volume and value of trade with Honduras for each year since 1975.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Telecommunications Equipment

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the value of imports of telecommunications equipment from Japan including components into the United Kingdom for the last 12 months for which figures are available; and what was the value of United Kingdom exports of telecommunications equipment including components to Japan for the same period;

(2) what was the value of imports of Swedish telecommunications equipment including components into the United Kingdom for the last 12 months for which figures are available; and what was the value of United Kingdom exports of telecommunications equipment to Sweden, including components over the same period.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 3 May 1985, c. 276]: Available information relating to the period March 1984 to February 1985, is as follows:

Value £ million

	United Kingdom imports (cif)	United Kingdom exports (fob)
Japan	36·2	0·4
Sweden	22·9	4·1

Source: Data corresponding to SITC/R2 Sub-groups 764.1 and 764.2 (part) and Item 764.91 in the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics.
Note: The figures exclude some components that are not separately distinguished in the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics.

Nippon Telegraph and Telephone

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government will seek to make arrangements with the Government of Japan to enable British investors to buy shares in Nippon Telegraph and Telephone.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 3 May 1985, c. 276]: Decisions about how NTT's assets should be sold are for the Japanese Government to take, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his recent visit to Tokyo made clear out interest in opening up the telecommunication sector to British investment and to British products and services.

Citizens Band Radio

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest position on the introduction of citizens band radio to the frequencies recommended by the conference of european posts and telecommunications unions.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 3 May 1985, c. 276]: On several occasions the Government have stated that their longer term objective for CB is to adopt the CEPT recommendation which provides for common European frequencies for FM CB. I am happy to re-affirm that commitment now.

In moving towards the adoption of the CEPT frequencies at the lower part of the 27 MHz band, there is a need to relocate the existing users of the band. The Department has been consulting all interested parties about the appropriate transitional arrangements. We must give adequate time for existing users to modify or change equipment and in view of this 1987 is our earliest realistic target date for the start-up of the new CB service. Further consultations will need to take place with existing users before this can be confirmed. After the introduction of the new CEPT CB service the existing UK 27 MHz CB service will run in parallel with it for some time and no decision has yet been taken to phase out the present service.

British Telecom

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance was made available in the United Kingdom to enable Japanese investors to buy shares in British Telecom.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 3 May 1985, c. 278]: None within the United Kingdom, although a separate offering was made in Japan.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

El Salvador

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek assurances from the El Salvadorean authorities that their officers to be trained at Camberley have not been directly or indirectly implicated in the extra-judicial killings which have taken place in El Salvador in recent years.

Mr. Renton: As I told the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) on 11 March at columns 54-55 the Salvadorean Government are aware of our concern about human rights. Candidates for training should be both professionally and personally suitable.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will say whether further offers of training either to military, paramilitary, or police personnel from El Salvador will be made in the coming months.

Mr. Tim Renton: As I said to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) on 11 March at columns 54-55, we have offered places for one or two suitably qualified Salvadorean officers to attend staff college courses in Britain. It continues to be the case that no other offer of military assistance has been made and that we are not, at the present time, considering further military assistance to El Salvador.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the three depository powers under the 1963 non-proliferation treaty are willing to accept on-site inspection whenever it is unclear whether a nuclear test is peaceful.

Mr. Luce: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the 1968 non-proliferation treaty, of which the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union are depositary powers.

We believe that the United States proposal of September 1984 for exchanges of nuclear test-site observers would be a positive step in the direction of improving verification arrangements under existing treaties which constrain nuclear testing. We regret that the Soviet response has so far been dismissive.

We also remain committed to achieving progress towards a ban on all nuclear testing, including peaceful nuclear explosions, which we believe would be extremely difficult to distinguish from tests carried out for military purposes. The United Kingdom currently has no peaceful nuclear explosions programme.

Nicaragua

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the Contra rebellion against the Nicaraguan Government.

Mr. Renton: We support efforts, in particular the Contadora process, to reach an early and comprehensive negotiated settlement of the problems of central America. We believe this process offers the best hope for achieving stability, democracy and development in the region.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what statements he has made concerning United States' support for the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: I would refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend in the debates on 9 November 1984, at columns 1017-18, and 25 April this year at columns 325-26.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding recent arrests and killings in Chile; and what action he has taken as a result.

Mr. Renton: We receive frequent representations about the situation in Chile and continue to make clear to the Chilean Government, both bilaterally and in concert with our European Community partners, our concern over violations of human rights.

Spain (British Tourists)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have had discussions with the Spanish Government concerning the safety of British citizens on holiday in Spain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: During my visit to Spain in February, I took the opportunity to review with the Spanish authorities the measures they had in hand to improve security in tourist areas. Our consulates throughout Spain have a close and satisfactory working relationship with the local Spanish authorities on all matters affecting British citizens.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have had any talks with British tour operators about advice to British citizens who have booked holidays in Spain in the current year concerning their safety while in Spain.

Mr. Renton: The Association of British Travel Agents and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are in frequent contact. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office gives the association such advice and information as is necessary and helpful on the current security position in Spain.

GCHQ

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many employees of Government communications headquarters have died in each of the last three years; in how many cases an inquest was held; what was found to be the cause of death and the verdict in each such case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Details of the number of employees at the Government Communications Headquarters who have died between 1982 and 1985 are as follows: 1982—26; 1983—27; 1984—23; 1985 (first four months)—five. We are aware of inquests having been held in five cases. Details as follows:

(i) 25 July 1982 — Mr. J. Wolfenden. Verdict: accidental death; aeroplane crash.
(ii) 24 November 1982—Mr. E. P. Brockway. Verdict: suicide; death by hanging.
(iii) 17 September 1983 — Mr. S. D. Drinkwater. Verdict: death by misadventure; asphyxiation.
(iv) 3 April 1984 — Mr. G. Franks. Verdict: natural causes; heart attack.
(v) 8 April 1985—Mr. S. Oke. Open Verdict: death by hanging.

Gibraltar

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have been informed by the Spanish Government of their reasons for not lifting all the restrictions formerly imposed by Spain on aircraft intending to land at Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We remain in discussion with the Spanish authorities about the airspace in the region of Gibraltar following their recent action facilitating the use of Gibraltar airfield by civil aircraft.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting beginning on 2 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: With my hon. Friend, the Minister of State, I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Agriculture Ministers in Luxembourg from 2 to 5 May. The main subject of the Council was the Commission's price proposals or 1985-86.

After three days of discussion it became evident that it would not be possible to reconcile the divergent views of member states at this Council.

In the light of the discussion the Commission is considering whether any amendments to its original proposals should be made and the Council will resume discussion on Monday 13 May in Brussels.

The Council decided that the marketing years for milk products, beef and veal, sheepmeat, dried fodder and cauliflowers should be extended until 19 May.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Hayes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what unpublished instructions were issued to members of the Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for England and Wales on how they should decide quota awards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The tribunal was authorised by the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984 to issue general guidance to local panels in England and Wales in respect of the criteria to be used by them in determining proceedings before them. This general guidance was published. In addition, the chairman of the tribunal, Lord Grantchester, issued a number of notes to members of the tribunal advising them on certain aspects of their work. In accordance with normal tribunal practice these notes, which were concerned mainly with administrative matters, have not been published. However, I am aware that there has been concern about one particular note which was issued on 24 November 1984 and which gave guidance on the calculation of yields to be taken into account in dealing with development claims. The purpose of this note was to ensure consistency between tribunal decisions and fairness to producers.

In view of the widespread interest in this particular note I have exceptionally, and with Lord Grantchester's agreement, arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Forth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes there will be in milk quotas in England and Wales in 1985-86; and when these will be announced.

Mr. Jopling: I regret that the delay in reaching agreement in the price fixing negotiations makes it impossible to make any announcement for the time being. Arrangements are in hand to inform individual producers of their quotas for 1985-86 as soon as possible once decisions on the price fixing have been reached.

However, I am pleased to say that for 1985-86 small producers, that is those with less than 200,000 liters of quotas, will have their quota brought back up to their base year production levels, which in the vast majority of cases will mean their level of production in 1983. This means that for about 40 per cent. of all producers we have wiped out last year's 9 per cent. reduction. I am also pleased to say that for 1985-86 exceptional hardship awards will be made at 100 per cent. of the amount awarded. This means that the two principal objectives of the outgoers scheme have been achieved.

Direct sellers with less than 200,000 liters will, like wholesale producers, be brought back to their base year level. Producers with both direct sales and wholesale quota will benefit from similar adjustments if the total of their two quotas is less than 200,000 litres. However, no producer's quota will be increased above 200,000 litres, and the adjustments will be tapered to avoid anomalies between producers just above or below the 200,000 litre level. Moreover, the increases will not be applied to development quota.

Cereals (Intervention Expenditure)

Mr. Colvin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in tabular form figures showing the average cost per acre of cereals of intervention expenditure in each of the member states of the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: The cost of public intervention to the Community in 1983 is given in the following table. This is the latest year for which a breakdown of costs by member states is available.

Member State	Cost to FEOGA of public intervention (MECU)	1983 Harvest Area (M. Acres)	Cost per acre of public intervention (ECU)
Belgium	0·060	0·929	0·065
Denmark	40·023	4·243	9·433
Germany	235·457	12·459	18·899

United Kingdom	53·642	9·771	5·490
EC10	476·684	67·955	7·015

* Net profits on sales from intervention.

Pesticides

Dr David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list those experiments or surveys which his Department has conducted, commissioned or is aware of, regarding the impact of pesticides on butterflies on or around farmland in the United Kingdom;

(2) how many incidents of butterflies killed by pesticides were reported to the advisory committee on pesticides through the wildlife incident monitoring service, by species in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Production and Consumption (Statistics)

Mr. Spence asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out in the Official Report the latest available figures showing the comparison for the European Economic Community as a whole and for the United Kingdom separately between production and consumption, excluding intervention, quantities in the following items: common wheat, barley, sugar, butter, skimmed milk, eggs and beef.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Rural Estate

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to publish (a) a Green Paper and (b) a White Paper on the rural estate.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a complete list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in England and their value at the latest available date.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Liquid Skimmed Milk

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in the past year in the United Kingdom; and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ENERGY

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Ministers of Fuel and Power, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established who chaired them, and the dates they reported.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am writing to my hon. Friend.

British Petroleum

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of British Petroleum profits and capital investments were allocated by British Petroleum, over the past decade, to its Saudi and Gulf refining capacity.

Mr. Peter Walker: That would be a matter for the company.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Defence Debates

Mr. George asked the Lord Privy Seal on how many occasions in each year since 1979-80 the House has considered matters relating to defence, set out by category as follows: (i) ministerial statements, (ii) private notice questions, (iii) debates on substantive Government motions, (iv) debates on Opposition motions, (v) legislation (excluding Consolidated Fund Bills), (vi) Consolidated Fund Bills (including proceedings on Adjournment motions subsequent thereto), (vii) debates on the Adjournment other than half hour Adjournments, (viii) half hour Adjournment debates, (ix) debates on statutory instruments and (x) any other debates.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is given in the following table:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85 (to date)
(i) Ministerial Statements	2	2	8	5	5	4
(ii) Private Notice Questions	3	1	—	1	—	2
(iii) Debates on Government Motions	—	—	1	—	1	1
(iv) Debates on Opposition Motions	—	—	—	—	1	—
(v) Legislation (excluding Consolidated Fund Bill)	1	1	1	—	1	—
(vi) Consolidated Fund Bill (proceedings)	3	2	2	4	3	1
(vii) Debates on the Adjournment (other than half hour)	5	4	10	2	4	3
(viii) ½ hour Adjournment Debates	11	7	7	6	5	3
(ix) Debates on Statutory Instruments	1	—	1	1	1	—
(x) Other debates	3	1	—	1	—	—

Scottish Business

Mr. Wilson asked the Lord Privy Seal how many minutes, on average, were spent per sitting day during the 1983-84 Session on the Floor of the House on Scottish business.

Mr. Biffen: The average number of minutes per sitting day spent on the Floor of the House on Scottish business in Session 1983-84 was 28. This figure does not include daily Adjournment debates, statements, private notice questions, applications for debates under Standing Order No. 10 and Scottish elements of Consolidated Fund and holiday Adjournment debates, as it is frequently impossible to put such business firmly into the category of Scottish business.

WALES

Royal Ordnance Factory, Cynon Valley

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if the Welsh Development Agency was aware that the royal ordnance factory contained asbestos before it demolished the building on the industrial estate at Hiawain in Cynon Valley.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I understand that Agency was not specifically aware of the presence of any of the notifiable forms of asbestos in the building, but it advised the demolition contractor of the likelihood of such material being present. I understand also that prior to demolition the premises were inspected by the contractor and the Health and Safety Executive but no dangerous asbestos was found at that time. The demolition contract placed the onus on the contractor to identify asbestos material as work progressed and, if discovered, to deal with it in accordance with the provisions of the current legislation.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the incidence of cervical cancer in Gwynedd; and what proposals he has to reduce it.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The screening and treatment of patients with cervical cancer is primarily the responsibility of the health authorities. Gwynedd is one of the two health authorities in Wales which operate a system for calling women for initial testing as well as recalling them subsequently. The arrangements in Wales for calling and recalling women for testing and the notification of test results are currently under scrutiny by the joint NHS/ Welsh Office working party which will report to the Secretary of State by the end of June.

The figures for the number of positive cases of cervical cancer detected in Gwynedd and the number of deaths, for 1980-83, the latest year for which figures are available, are:

Year	Number of positive cases detected	Number of deaths
1980	53	11
1981	80	14
1982	73	11
1983	96	11

Overseas Visitors (Health Charges)

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what sums have been raised in each of the health authorities in Wales since the inception of the scheme to make overseas visitors pay hospital charges.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Cash received is as follows:

Health Authority	1 October 1982 to 31 March 1984 £ (actual)	1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985 £ (provisional)
Clwyd	2,630	600
East Dyfed	719	1,100
Gwent	1,192	5,900
Gwynedd	1,199	2,300
Mid Glamorgan	—	3,100
Pembrokeshire	—	1,300
Powys	354	500
South Glamorgan	8,169	22,000
West Glamorgan	5,711	6,000
Wales	19,974	42,800

Educational Maintenance Allowance

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales what would be the cost of providing in Wales an educational maintenance allowance of £25 per week, 52 weeks per year, to all those aged 16 and 17 years in full-time education including those in colleges of further education, taking into account savings in child benefit, and any existing educational maintenance allowances.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: About £34 million.

Tourism

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the grants over £10,000 given by the Wales tourist board to aid tourist development projects in each of the last five years, specifying also where appropriate the ultimate holding company of the recipient of the grant.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library.

Redundancies

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the companies notifying redundancies in Wales from 1 January; and what information he has as to the numbers of redundancies concerning each company.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information in the form requested is notified by individual firms on a confidential basis and could not be disclosed without breaching confidentiality.

Advance Factories

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many advance factories have been (a) built and (b) allocated in Wales since May 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the period from 1 May 1979 to 30 April 1985, 1,451 advance factories have been completed by the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and Cwmbran development corporation, providing 7·2 million sq. ft. of new industrial space. The total amount of space available is now 2·8 million sq. ft. which is about 12 per cent. of the total stock held by the three bodies concerned. 1,659 factories — 9·7 million sq. ft. of space — have been allocated in the same period.

Agricultural Produce (Storage Space)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what provision his Department is making for fluctuations in the storage space required for United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce over the coming year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce is keeping the position under constant review and will continue to reserve storage space as necessary.

Intervention Stocks (Value)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a complete list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in Mid-Glamorgan, and their value, at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As at 31 March 1985, the latest date for which information is available, there were no assisted private stocks of agricultural products in Mid-Glamorgan, stocks in intervention being 2,210 tonnes of skimmed milk powder, value £2·27 million.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he is now in a position to reveal the exact locations of all public intervention stores in Wales;

(2) if he will provide an up-to-date list of Welsh locations used for the storage of European Economic Community food surpluses.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The following is the list of intervention storage locations in Wales as at 31 March 1985.

Cardiff
Newport
Swansea
Rhyl
Milford Haven

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a complete list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in Wales and their value at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As at 31 March 1985, the latest date for which information is available, there were no assisted private stocks of agricultural products in Wales; intervention stocks were as follows:

Commodity	Amount Tonnes	Value £ million
Skimmed milk powder	4,143	4·25
Butter	12,766	24·63
Beef	857	2·42

Skimmed Milk

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in the past year in Wales; and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: During 1984, £1·192 million subsidy was paid on 19·3 million litres of liquid skimmed milk supplied by creameries and dairies in Wales for use as stockfeed.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners were found to be (a) mentally disturbed and (b) mentally sub-normal in the last census carried out by the prison medical service;

(2) how frequently the prison medical service carries out a census of the number of mentally disturbed people in prison; and when the last census was carried out;

(3) what criteria are used by the prison medical service in assessing mental illness in its census of mentally disturbed prisoners;

(4) if he will estimate the number of mentally disturbed prisoners, applying the same criteria of assessment as are so applied in the population as a whole.

Mr. Mellor: Prison medical officers make statistical returns at six-monthly intervals of prisoners whom they assess as suffering from mental disorder of a nature or degree which would satisfy the criteria in the Mental Health Act 1983 for detention in hospital for treatment. Two additional censuses were carried out in 1984 as a special exercise. Further details of the census arrangements are contained in circular instruction 36/1984, a copy of which is in the Library. The latest census for which figures are available is that for 31 December 1984, which showed that 282 prisoners were assessed as mentally disordered within the terms of the Act, of whom 225 were diagnosed as suffering from mental illness, 48 from psychopathic disorder, seven from mental impairment and two from severe mental impairment. We understand from the Department of Health and Social Security that there is no similar periodic survey of the general population.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current projection of the size of the prison population of England and Wales in 1989, 1990 and 1991, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The latest published projections of trends in the average prison population, made at the end of 1983, were given in Home Office statistical bulletin issue 8/84 on 18 April 1984. It is planned to publish soon a further bulletin giving the most recent annual projections.

Prisons (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners who committed suicide in 1984 at penal establishments had been identified as suicide risks but were not under any form of special observation.

Mr. Mellor: There were 22 deaths in prison establishments in 1984 on which the inquest returned a verdict of suicide. In seven of these cases the prisoner's records had been marked at some time during his imprisonment with an 'F' to denote suicide risk, but the prisoner was not under special watch at the time of the suicide.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those who committed suicide in penal establishments in 1984 were (a) alcoholic, (b) drug addicts and (c) mentally ill.

Mr. Mellor: The information which is available centrally on the 22 deaths in prison establishments in 1984 on which the inquest returned a verdict of suicide is as follows:

	History of Alcohol Abuse	History of Drug Abuse	Diagnosis of Mental Illness
Yes	6	7	6
No	2	2	12
Not Known	14	13	4

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if, in line with the recommendations of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector or Prisons, the phenomenon of suicide in prison is being monitored and studied more fully; and if education and training courses for staff have been developed to enhance their knowledge of prevention procedure and their understanding of suicidal behaviour;

(2) if he will detail the changes made for the prevention of suicides in penal establishments following the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on suicide in prison;

(3) what progress has been made on implementing the recommendations of the Chief Inspector of Prisons' report on suicides in prison.

Mr. Mellor: When my right hon. and learned Friend announced publication of the report by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on suicide in prisons on 3 September last, he said that he broadly accepted the report's recommendations and had set up a group to look in more detail at the issues raised and to consider any other ideas which might be put forward. The group will complete its work in the autumn. Prior to the chief inspector's report, procedures were changed in June last year to require fuller reports from governors on suicides in prison under circular instruction 33/1984, a copy of which is in the Library.

Holloway Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women were in the psychiatric wing in Holloway prison at the latest available date; what were the offences with which they had been charged or for which they had been sentenced; what was the length of time each had been detained in C wing; and what was their medical condition.

Mr. Mellor: Of the 36 women in C1 unit, Her Majesty's prison Holloway, on 30 April 1985, seven had been charged with or sentenced for offences of theft, seven with criminal damage, six with arson, five with deception and two with actual bodily harm. The main charges against the remainder related to assaulting a police constable, attempted robbery, causing a breach of the peace, assisting offences of buggery, causing grievous bodily harm, illegal possession of a child, interfering with a motor vehicle, wasting police time and wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm.

Thirteen of the women had been in C1 unit for one week or less, 12 for over one week but not more than one month, five for over one month but not more than two months, and six for over two months and up to six months.

C1 unit is part of the prison hospital: it caters for women prisoners who are highly disturbed and who are admitted on the direction of the prison medical officer.

Libyan People's Bureau

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton on 18 July 1984, Official Report, column 195, by the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) and subsequent official correspondence from the Minister of State he is now able to give a full and accurate list, with dates, of all Libyans claiming connection with the former people's bureau who were required to leave the United Kingdom between 17 and 27 April 1984, including those escorted from the bureau under police supervision, indicating which had any form of diplomatic immunity; and whether he will correct errors in previous ministerial replies to the hon. Member contained in the Official Report on this matter.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Following the break in diplomatic relations with Libya on 22 April 1984 all Libyan-based members of the Libyan diplomatic staff in London, and their families, were required to leave the United Kingdom, as were all those in the bureau at the time of the shooting on 17 April, whatever their status. One diplomat, Mr. Abdelghadr Kiaralla, was allowed to remain and was subsequently notified as a member of the diplomatic staff at the Libyan interests section of the Saudi embassy. All the administrative and technical staff of the bureau were required to leave with the exception of Mr. Mohamed Elbouaahi Elmasdhun, who was subsequently notified as a member of the diplomatic staff at the Libyan interests section of the Saudi embassy, and Mr. Younis Mohamed Elwafy, who was allowed to stay for six weeks for compassionate reasons.

The following left the bureau under police supervision on 27 April. Those marked with a letter after their names had been notified to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, either as diplomatic agents — labelled (B) — or members of the administrative and technical staff—labelled (C)—of the Libyan people's bureau. In one case the person concerned was the husband of a member of the administrative and technical staff. Those without a letter after their names were neither diplomatic agents nor members of the administrative and technical staff.

Aded, Salem Said Salem (C)
Alhkimi, Ahmed Omran Khalifa (B)
Ameri, Abdulmagid Saleh (C)
Bashir, Ahmed Elmhdi (C)
Daghais, Yousif Mohamed (C)
El-Bakush, Issa Ahmed (C)
El-Hinshiri, Shahata (B)
Elmismari, Mikail Bin Saud (C) (husband of Mrs. Mabruka Mohammed Giuma)
Fernana, Mehdi A. (C)
Abuminigil, Bashir M. (B)
Gaaka, Omar Mohamed
Abdelgiawad, Mohamed Mehemed (B)
Gratem, Ayad Ahmed (C)
Hemmali, Abdulkarim Shogwara (C)
Jalid, Ali Hassan (B)
Khebuli, Mufta Giuma
Magtouf, Mustafa A. (C)
Mghirbi, Mustafa Abdu Salam (B)
Mohamed, Ali Ibraik
Nisser, Almahdi Ashur (C)
Omar, Otman Ahmed (C)
Ali'oun, Mohamed (B)
Rabha, Salah Abdessalem Ben
Ramadan, Mohamed Omar (C)
Saleh, Ahmed Salhen (C)
Sherif, Mohamed Hadi (B)
Stuka, Salah Eyad
Tabulli, Ahmed Mohamed (B)
Tuhami, Abdulgader Mohamed Ali (C)
Zweit, Salem Ali (C)

The following Libyan diplomats and administrative and technical staff and locally engaged staff at the bureau also left the United Kingdom between 22 and 27 April. Letters B and C after their names have the same meanings as indicated above:

Ahmed, Mansur Ahmed (B)
Ali Daman, Abdalla (C)
Aldowadi, Mouloud M. (B)
El-Bussifi, Ali Hassan Ahmed (C)
Giuma, Mrs. Mabruka Mohammed (C)
Gleib, Ahmed Abdulla Mohamed
Ganbor, Nagi Hadi (C)
Ahmed, Abdelkadir O. (C)
Hdeddan, Mohamed Salem (C)
Ikhleif, Ahmed Mansur
Elkezza, Aboshnief (B)
Khamri, Ahmed Mansor (C)
Elmabrouk, Mrs. Imbarka Ali (B) (wife of Abdelgiawad Mohamed Mehemed)
Magtof, Mohammed Ahmed (B)
Mohamed, Mrs. Julie Hussain (C)
Abdulrahim, Salah O.
Said, Said Ali Masaud (C)
Abou-Sdera, Bashir Mohamed (C)
Sodani, Omar M. Ahmaida (B)
Werfalli, Mrs. Warda Ali (B) (wife of El-Hinshiri Shahata)

In addition, the following left on 29 April:

Elmarghani, Salah B. D. (C)
Farhat, Omar A. (C)
Fitouri, Muftah (B)
Jubran, Abdallah Ahmed (C)
Elkeeb, Abdulwahab H. (C)
Abourziza, Ibrahim A. (B)
Zlitni, Hameda B. (B)

Members of diplomats' families left the United Kingdom on 26 and 27 April, together with other Libyans who were not directly connected with the bureau. Separate lists of the individuals concerned are not available. Four diplomats who would have been required to leave were already outside the United Kingdom at the time of the break in diplomatic relations. Two members of the administrative and technical staff who were required to leave, Mr. Ismail M. M. El Basha and Mr. Maamari Hagiagi, are believed to be outside the United Kingdom but the dates of their embarkation are not known.

There were also three Libyans, connected with the bureau, who were deported during this period but who did not have any form of diplomatic immunity. They were:

Baghdadi, Abdul Ghader
Mabruk, Saleh Ibrahim
Matuq, Mohamed Matuq

The corrections required to replies to my hon. Friend's earlier questions are as follows:

8 May 1984 (c. 280) Mr. Ali Mohammed Tuhami Abdulgader should not have been identified as having diplomatic status; Mr. Mikhail Bin Saud Elmismari should have been so identified.

25 May 1984 (c. 608) the three diplomats named plus one other, Mohamed K. Benhamed were, in fact, already outside the United Kingdom on 22 April.

18 July 1984 (c. 246) Mr. Ibrahim A. Abourzizaa left the United Kingdom on 29 April, not 26 April.

Primates

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to support research and development into caring for primates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend will consider any specific proposals for research on the welfare of laboratory animals but he cannot, of course, give any undertaking that funds for this purpose will be available in any given case.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange courses at the civil defence college for elected members of councils and officers to attend together.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the question from the hon. Member for Knowsley North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 4 April 1985 at column 720.

Remand Hearings

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of prisoners not produced for remand hearings for each day in 1985 for each penal establishment.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available centrally and could only be collected at disproportionate cost.

Wakefield Prison

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the standard of medical treatment available at Wakefield prison; and when he expects his inquiries to be completed.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member wrote to my noble Friend on 25 October enclosing wide-ranging complaints made by a former prisoner at Wakefield. The person concerned also raised these matters directly with the governor, and through other channels. These matters have now been fully investigated and my noble Friend will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible. We have also received in the last six months six petitions from other prisoners about aspects of their medical treatment.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Residential Homes

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many registered residential and nursing homes charge fees that are equal to or less than the new rates of supplementary benefit limits of £110 and £138 per week, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: Comprehensive information on the fees charged for the different categories of residential care and nursing homes is not collected centrally. We believe the new supplementary benefit limits should allow reasonable charges to be met in homes meeting the registration requirements. Information available to the Department relating to supplementary pensioners indicates that, even under the previous arrangements which encouraged upward pressure on charges, up to about 60 per cent. of charges for private and voluntary homes would be at or below the new limits.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of people in residential care homes for the elderly in Suffolk in receipt of supplementary benefit under regulation 9 in each of the years 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Whitney: Separate figures for supplementary benefit claimants in residential care homes for the elderly in Suffolk are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the number of residential care homes for the elderly in Suffolk in each of the following sectors (a) voluntary, (b) private and (c) public for each of the years 1979 to 1985;

(2) what was the number of people in Suffolk living in residential care homes for the elderly in each of the following sectors (a) voluntary, (b) private and (c) public for each of the years 1979 to 1985.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the number of homes for the elderly and disabled in Suffolk, and their number of residents, for each of the years 1979 to 1984, is given in the table.

As at 31 March	Number of homes				Number of residents
	Statutory	Voluntary	Private	Total	Statutory	Voluntary	Private	Total
1979	32	12	40	84	1,420	225	530	2,175
1980	32	13	40	85	1,422	290	598	2,310
1981	32	15	41	88	1,413	318	620	2,351
1982	33	16	44	93	1,433	384	685	2,502
1983	32	16	47	95	1,480	377	711	2,568
1984	32	17	60	109	1,451	426	907	2,784

Information about the number of homes and residents as at 31 March 1985 is not yet available.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has of the number of recipients of family income supplement who have a total income which is less than their entitlement would be if they were in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: We estimate from the small sample of cases generated by the 1981 family expenditure survey data that about 15 per cent. of family income supplement recipients would then have had a total income less than their entitlement on supplementary benefit if they had given up work.

Benefits

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the total number of recipients and the total cost of benefit in each of the years 1979-80 to 1984-85 and estimated recipients and expenditure in 1985-86 on each of the following: (a) rent rebates and allowances to 1982-83 and standard housing benefit rent assistance from 1983-84, (b) rate rebates to 1982-83 and standard housing benefit rates assistance from 1983-84, (c) supplementary benefit to 1982-83 and certificated housing benefit from 1983-84 towards rent payments and (d) supplementary benefit to 1982-83 and certificated housing benefit from 1983-84 towards rates payments.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is in the table.

Notes:

1. Figures relating to the former rent rebate, rent allowance and rate rebate schemes are shown under standard cases, and figures relating to the former help through the supplementary benefit scheme are shown under certificated cases.
2. Figures for 1984-85 and for 1985-86 are provisional estimates and are subject to revision.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are dependent upon supplementary or housing benefit in south Yorkshire at the present time or at the most recent date for which statistics are available; and how this number compares with the position in the county six years earlier.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not available in the precise form requested. South Yorkshire is covered by 11 DHSS offices but the boundaries are not strictly conterminous. The number of claimants receiving supplementary benefit from those offices at February 1985 — the latest figures available — was 144,603, and at February 1979, 80,276.

About 85,000 households were receiving rate rebates in 1978-79. Local authority subsidy claims indicate that about 130,000 households were receiving standard rate rebates in 1984-85, about 7,000 of whom were also receiving housing benefit supplement and are therefore included in the supplementary benefit figures above.

Supplementary Benefit (Southwark)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will investigate the delays in the handling of supplementary benefit claims, particularly for single payments, at the Blenheim Grove office of his Department in Southwark.

Mr. Whitney: A routine survey of the Blenheim Grove, Southwark, local social security office was completed last month. The survey shows that there have been improvements in the time taken to deal with benefit claims. We will continue to monitor performance, as we do in all local offices, and would be happy to investigate cases of delay brought to the attention of the hon. Member.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Ministers of Health, Ministers of Pensions and National Insurance, Ministers of Social Security and Ministers of National Insurance, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the date they established, who chaired them, and the dates they reported.

Mr. John Patten: The information available from central records, which covers only the period since the Department of Health and Social Security was established, is in the table.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry 1968-1985

Maternity Leave

Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of women currently in receipt of unemployment benefits who have taken maternity leave within a month of obtaining such benefits.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not available.

Health Authorities (Private Contractors)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice or instructions have been given to health authorities as to whether action should be taken by them against private contractors who have given unsatisfactory service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 1 May to the hon. Member for Holborn and St Pancras (Mr. Dobson) at column 174.

Child Benefits

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures showing non means-tested child benefits for a family with two children aged 10 and 12 years as percentages of the gross earnings of the average production worker in each member state of the European Community.

Mr. Whitney: No figures are available which show reliably the gross earnings of the average production worker in each member state of the European Community. There are no standard official data about the average earnings of production workers in member states of the European Community. Meaningful comparisons cannot, therefore, be drawn.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to answer the letter dated 7 January 1985 from the hon. Member for Stretford in connection with supplementary benefit board and lodging payments.

Mr. Whitney: I have written to the hon. Member today.

Dental Charges

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give statistics for the last five years of the proportion of the cost of the general dental service borne by charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested, for England, is as follows:

	Per cent
1980-81	22·0
1981-82	23·9
1982-83	26·2
1983-84	26·5
1984-85	*26·3

* estimated.

Abortions (Wandsworth)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number of abortions that have taken place in hospitals in the Wandsworth health authority area in each of the last three years to women between 15 and 20 years of age.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not publish statistics about the number of abortions performed in individual health authorities for reasons of confidentiality.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that indoor corridors are not used as part of the eligibility test for mobility allowance, especially where the applicant's disabilities include sensory impairment.

Mr. Newton: The medical questions which arise on claims for mobility allowance are decided under an independent system of adjudication. It is for examining medical practitioners, medical boards and medical appeal tribunals to decide what tests are necessary in order to ascertain whether a particular claimant is unable or virtually unable to walk.

General Practice Finance Corporation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans for the privatisation or partial privatisation of the General Practice Finance Corporation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans at present to change the status or classification as a public corporation of the General Practice Finance Corporation. However, following the reclassification of General Practice Finance Corporation borrowing in 1984 the corporation itself has been examining ways by which the demands for loans could be met without adding to public expenditure.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the names and occupations of the current chairman and vice-chairman of the General Practice Finance Corporation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The chairman of the General Practice Finance Corporation is Mr. David Stebbings, a retired solicitor. The deputy chairman is Mr. Derek Hughes, managing director of the merchant bank, Samuel Montagu and Company Limited.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the General Practice Finance Corporation's budget for the current year; what is the estimated budget for the following year; and what was the budget for 1984-85.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The General Practice Finance Corporation receives no direct financial support from the Government. However, its borrowing to finance loans to general practioners is guaranteed by the Exchequer and is subject to Government control. The corporation's net borrowing in 1984-85 was £23·25 million compared with £3·5 million in 1982-83 and £12·5 million in 1983-84. Its borrowing for 1985-86 is fixed at £22·5 million. The provisional planning assumption for 1986-87 is £26·7 million.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will outline the facilities available in the South Yorkshire metropolitan area for cervical cancer screening; how many persons have been examined and in what age groups; how many have had a recall; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will outline the facilities available in Yorkshire and Humberside for cervical cancer screening; how many persons have been examined and in what age groups; how many have had a recall; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will outline the facilities available in Barnsley and district for cervical cancer screening; how many persons have been examined and in what age groups; how many have had a recall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 29 April at columns 49-51.

The total number of cervical smear tests taken in each of the health authority areas concerned in 1983 is as follows:

Regional Health Authority/District Health Authority	Number of tests
Yorkshire Regional Health Authority	224,437
Barnsley District Health Authority	11,274
Doncaster District Health Aurhority	17,830
Rotherham District Health Authority	16,308
Sheffield District Health Authority	49,065

The number of tests may not correspond exactly to the number of women tested, but we do not hold centrally information on the number of women screened, or the other detailed information requested. The right hon. Member may wish to seek this from the respective health authorities.

NHS (Waiting Lists)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 51. whether any patient on any Health Service waiting list has been, or could be, removed from the waiting list, without the specific agreement of their own consultant.

Mr. John Patten: We do not have this information. Health authorities have made their own arrangements for carrying out the exercise. It would be for the consultants to agree the conditions under which names could be removed from the lists.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answers of 29 April, Official Report, column 51, if he will explain the administrative arrangements which make central costing of the survey into National Health Service waiting lists impossible.

Mr. John Patten: Costing information could be obtained only by inquiry of all the individual districts and hospitals involved; the expense of such an exercise would clearly be disproportionate.

Community Homes

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many community homes were provided by local authorities and private bodies, respectively, at the most recent date for which figures are available; what responsibility his Department has for reviewing the operation of such homes; and how many such homes have been opened and closed down, respectively, since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: Figures are not held centrally of the numbers of community homes. Community homes may be provided by local authorities or voluntary organisations, but not private bodies.

The Department has overall responsibility to ensure that all homes are properly run, in accordance with the Community Home Regulations 1972, and they are therefore subject to inspection by the Department's social services inspectorate.

Pensions

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information is available to him as to the number of persons in contracted-out pension schemes who are entitled to inflation-proofing of their pensions after retirement; and what information he has as to the estimated cost of this provision in the years (a) 1985, (b) 1990, (c) 1995, (d) 2000 and (e) 2010, both in money terms and as a proportion of the total cost of the state earnings-related pension scheme;

(2) what are his estimates of the numbers of people expected to receive additional component under the state earnings-related pension scheme in the tax years 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88; what is the maximum estimated additional component; and what is the estimated average additional component in those years.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will indicate (a) the average amount of earnings-related supplement per week received by eligible pensioners and (b) the lowest and highest amount received per week by eligible pensioners in 1985-86;

(2) if he will publish his latest estimates of the number of retirement pensioners in receipt of the the state earnings-related pension in 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out a table showing the amounts of earnings-related supplement received by eligible pensioners, and the number of pensioners in each category for the current financial year.

Mr. Whitney: Information for the year 1984-85 is not yet available. The most recent data (30 September 1983) are summarised in the table.

Category B widows: pension based on late husband's contribution and paid at full basic rate.
Category ABL women: pension comprising category A topped up by category B entitlement to maximum of category B rate.
* Including any inherited additional component and before any deduction of GMP in respect of those pensioners who were in contracted-out occupational pension schemes.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of those in employment contributing to the state earnings-related pension scheme, and the amount contributed in 1985-86 and expected in 1986-87.

Mr. Whitney: The number of those currently employed who are contributing to the state earnings-related pension scheme is estimated to be 10·46 million. Information on the amounts of contribution income specifically allocated to the state earnings-related pension scheme is not available. However, the latest estimate of expenditure on the earnings-related component of the scheme is £291 million in 1985-86 and £395 million in 1986-87.

Health Regions (Manpower Targets)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much the total regional manpower targets for March 1986 differ from those for March 1985; how many regional staff have been transferred to family practitioner committees; by how much the March 1986 manpower targets for the four Thames health regions differ from the March 1985 targets for those regions; and in which staff groups he expects the reductions to be made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the table. Our ceilings are for all manpower and are not broken into staff groups. We expect regional health authorities to ensure, with districts, that some reductions are made in all regions in the numbers of administrative and clerical staff and that growth in any other staff groups reflects the need to develop patient care and services.

Hospital Ancillary Services (Salford)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is taking to accelerate the putting out to tender of hospital ancillary services by Salford district health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are looking to the north western region to ensure that Salford health authority carries out our policy on competitive tendering. I am sure that the authority can find valuable ways of spending the resulting savings to improve patient services within its district.

Population Statistics

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of people over the age of (a) 65 years and (b) 75 years, living in Suffolk in each of the years from 1979 to 1985; and what was the percentage increase over that period.

Mr. John Patten: The latest information available is given in the table:

National Insurance Contributions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates will be the financial effect on the National Health Service of the changes in national insurance contributions announced in the Budget.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The changes in employers' national insurance contributions will mean increased costs for higher paid staff but lower costs for other full-time and most part-time staff. It is likely that the net effect will be to reduce health authorities' costs, but reliable estimates cannot yet be made.

I will write to the hon. Member when reasonable estimates are available.

Children Act 1975

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when section 33 of the Children Act 1975 is likely to be brought into effect.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Association of Community Health Councils

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what grant he intends to make available to the Association of Community Health Councils for England and Wales for 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are offering the association a grant of £20,000 for 1985-86, principally to enable it to employ an information officer. The grant is subject to certain conditions relating to the association's accounts and to review of its activities and use of the grant.

Amenity and Pay Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of private hospitals which offer acute surgical care and the number of beds and the occupancy rate for all facilities offering such care by region in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 359]: The available information is given in the table. This type of information is not available centrally for 1979 or 1980. We do not collect information on bed occupancy centrally.

* Figures for 1982 and 1983 are based on a routine statistical return introduced in 1982 and relate to premises with operating theatres on 31 December each year. Figures for 1981 are based on an ad-hoc inquiry and relate to premises providing acute surgical and medical care in June 1981; they are therefore not strictly comparable with those for later years.
† Because of NHS restructuring in 1982, figures for these regions are not directly comparable between 1981 and subsequent years.

Mortality Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people on average have died (a) before the age of 60 years and (b) at 60 years and above of chest-related illnesses in (i) England and (ii) Wales, in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1985, c. 114]: The information is given in the table.

The figures for 1984 are not comparable with earlier years, because of a change in coding following a rule of the World Health Organisation. In 1984 some deaths previously coded to bronchopneumonia have been allocated to other chronic conditions mentioned on the certificate.

NORTHERN IRELAND

European Driving Licence

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date it is intended to introduce the new European driving licence into Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: 1 January 1986.

Less Favoured Areas Boundaries

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of appeals against the proposed less favoured areas boundaries received by 1 April.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Republic of Ireland (Gas Pipeline)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total amount of payments made to the authorities in the Republic of Ireland in connection with the proposed gas pipeline to Northern Ireland; and, following the abandonment of this proposal, how much of these funds has been recovered from the authorities in the Republic of Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: £5 million in October 1983 and nothing recovered.

Castlereagh (Grant Aid)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he received an application from Castlereagh borough council for grant aid towards the replacement of Belvoir community centre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: A grant application was received in the Department of Education on 31 January 1985. Insufficient details about the proposed scheme were submitted and have not yet been provided by the council. However, funds for such provision are limited, and the application will have to be considered along with many other priority schemes submitted by all district councils and in the light of other higher priority schemes planned by Castlereagh borough council.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he received an application from Castlereagh borough council for grant aid towards the cost of replacement of Braniel community centre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: A grant application was received in the Department of Education on 9 September 1983. Insufficient details about the proposed scheme were submitted and have not yet been provided by the council. However, funds for such provision are limited; and the application will have to be considered along with many other priority schemes submitted by all district councils and in the light of other higher priority schemes planned by Castlereagh borough council.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he has approved the submission by Castlereagh borough council of an application to the European regional development fund for financial assistance, either by grant or loan, towards the capital costs of the proposed Dundonald international ice-bowl by Castlereagh borough council;

(2) what is the amount of loan or grant to be paid from the European regional development fund towards the cost of the Robinson leisure centre in Castlereagh; what are the terms of this assistance; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he has approved the submission to the European Economic Community of an application by Castlereagh borough council for a loan towards the cost of the Robinson leisure centre.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Medical Cards

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for new medical cards have been received during the weeks beginning 4 March, 11 March, 18 March, 25 March, 1 April, 8 April, 15 April, 22 April and 29 April; and, in each case, how many applications were received by telephone, by letter and by other means.

Mr. Scott: This information is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many applications for new medical cards were received by the Northern Ireland Central Services Agency for Health and Social Services in the current year during January, February, March, April and including those received at the Belfast office on Friday 3 May;

(2) how many new medical cards have been issued during 1985 altogether to date to Northern Ireland applicants.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Anglo-Irish Encounter Group

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the answer he gave to the hon. Member for Belfast, South on 25 April 1985, Official Report, column 547, what specific subjects under discussion at the Encounter conferences interested the 10 officials.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave the hon. Member the titles of the three conferences which have been held in his answer of 1 April at column 453. Each of these subjects was of interest to the officials who attended because of the duties they perform.

Electors (Identification)

Mr. Neillst asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce regulations to add UB40 cards to the permitted list of electors' identification for the forthcoming local elections in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Government have no plans to alter the list of documents specified in the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 and the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 before the forthcoming local elections. I made it clear, however, during the passage of the legislation, that the range of documents might be varied in subsequent elections should that prove necessary or desirable. All electors in Northern Ireland are already entitled to possess free of charge at least one of the specified documents.

Water Service (Unpaid Bills)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what amount of money is still owed in payments to the Department of the Environment (Water Service) in respect of each of the last four financial years by those persons who have a metered supply.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Local Government Electors

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of local government electors in Northern Ireland who hold an allowance or pension book or books, which is acceptable as proof of identity for the purpose of exercising the franchise on 15 May.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 268]: The numbers of those receiving benefits, pensions or allowances in Northern Ireland by means of pension or allowance order books which are specified documents within the terms of the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 were as follows on the dates shown:

Benefit etc.	Number of Recipients	Date
Invalidity Benefit	24,032	30 April 1985
Severe Disablement Allowance	9,850	30 April 1985
Attendance Allowance	†20,000	3 January 1985
Invalid Care Allowance	697	21 February 1985
Maternity Allowance	4,890	31 March 1985
Mobility Allowance	7,284	31 March 1985
Disablement Pension	†8,000	19 February 1985
Industrial Death Benefit	879	19 February 1985
Supplementary Benefit*	†23,000	12 February 1985
Retirement Pension	185,086	31 March 1985
Widow's Benefit	12,623	31 March 1985
Child Benefit	205,666	29 March 1985

* Supplementary Benefit recipients not receiving a main National Insurance benefit or pension.
† Approximate.

Apart from those for retirement pensions, the figures above include a number of people aged under 18. Many child benefit allowance books, however, carry the names of both parents and may therefore be used as a specified document by a substantial number of people in addition to the figure given for recipients of child benefit.

In some cases one person may receive more than one of the above pensions, benefits or allowances. Some recipients will not be on the Northern Ireland electoral register for local electors. Nonetheless, given that only 1,491 of the recipients of retirement pension, or their spouses, and only 3,718 of those receiving widows' benefit also receive child benefit, it is reasonable to estimate that at least 400,000 people possess some form of allowance book which is a specified document in terms of the order.

Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors (Pay)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met representatives of the Royal College of Nursing in Northern Ireland to discuss the findings of the review body on pay for nurses, midwives and health visitors; and if it is his intention that the full recommendations of the review body should be implemented in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 266]: Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have had such a meeting. Pay awards made to nursing staff in the National Health Service will be applied in Northern Ireland.

TRANSPORT

M1 (Maintenance Works)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what major maintenance works are planned on the M1 in Hertfordshire this summer.

Mrs. Chalker: In early July we shall be renewing a short section of the northbound carriageway near junction 8 (Hemel Hempstead). Even with extensive traffic management measures, serious delays will be unavoidable. A special publicity programme warning of the problems will be mounted, commencing with a news conference tomorrow to explain what we are doing to minimise disruption.

CIVIL SERVICE

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors in the Management and Personnel Office, and the Civil Service Department, have commissioned since 1968; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them, and the dates they reported.

Mr. Hayhoe: The main inquiries commissioned since May 1979 are:

Subject investigated	Chairman	Date appointed	Date reported
Chain of Command: The Open Structure	Sir Geoffrey Wardale	1981	1981. ISBN 0 7115 0038
Civil Service Pay	Rt. Hon. Sir John Megaw	1981	July 1982. Cmnd. 8590
Selection of Fast Stream Graduate Entrants to the Home Civil Service, the Diplomatic Service and the Tax Inspectorate and of candidates from within the Service	Sir Alec Atkinson	1982	February 1983. ISBN 0 7115 00533

Information for the earlier period is not held centrally and it would be disproportionately costly to draw up a comprehensive list.

THE ARTS

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors at the Office of Arts and Libraries have commissioned since 1979; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Waldegrave: Excluding departmental working parties chaired by permanent officials, inquiries undertaken by one individual, and advisory committees of a permanent nature, no departmental committee of inquiry has been commissioned since 1979.

Eastern Area (Orchestra)

Mr. Lyell asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations the Minister for the Arts has received as to the respective merits of funding the Eastern Authorities Orchestral Associations or, as an alternative, setting up a new resident orchestra to tour the eastern area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and noble Friend has received a small number of direct representations, but it is for the Arts Council to determine the policy for orchestral provision in Eastern England. The council published a discussion paper on 18 April and hope to receive reactions and suggestions by midsummer, and to come to a decision in the autumn.

Mr. Lyell asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether any local authorities have expressed their support to the Minister for the Arts for the setting up of a new resident orchestra for the eastern area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: As I indicated in my answer of 7 May, it if for the Arts Council and not for my right hon. and noble Friend to determine policy on orchestral provision for eastern England. Several local authorities have expressed an interest in the council's proposals for a new resident orchestra. The council has published a discussion paper on the topic and will be considering formal reactions to the proposals in that paper, and coming to a decision in the autumn.

EMPLOYMENT

Health and Safety

1. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the Government have any plans to increase self-monitoring of health and safety for private companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This option, together with others put forward in the Health and Safety Commission's plan of work, is open for comment.

11. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what were the number of workplace accidents in 1984; and what were the numbers for each of the previous five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following is the information for workplace accidents from 1978 to 1983. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

The available figures for injuries and fatalities caused by accidents at work, and of dangerous occurences, in 1983 and the previous five years are as follows. Injuries to seamen, fishermen and air transport employees reported under merchant shipping and civil aviation legislation are excluded.

	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

To non-employees	—	—	—	129	132	152
Dangerous occurrences‡	—	—	—	3,645	3,153	2,797

Notes

* Spells of certified incapacity for work resulting in industrial injury benefit claims for the years 1 June 1978—31 May 1979 and 1 June 1979—31 May 1980. Some road accidents are included which are excluded from later years' figures.

† All injuries to employees reportable under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980, that is, absences from work for over three days (notified to HSE via DHSS), major injuries and fatalities.

‡ These categories became reportable under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations, in which they are defined, from 1 January 1981. Dangerous occurrences involving injury are also included in the injury count.

‖ 1978-80 figures include fatal injuries reported voluntarily before new reporting requirements were introduced in 1981, they are not necessarily complete and may include some non-employees.

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, further to the answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 47, he has plans to request the Health and Safety Executive to conduct a further survey of the number of employees covered by safety representatives.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No.

Labour Statistics

14. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been out of work for more than two years in Sunderland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985 the number of claimants in the Sunderland jobcentre area who had been unemployed for over two years was 6,829.

22. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the work force is currently unemployed ; and what was the proportion unemployed in April 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985 13·5 per cent. of the work force in the United Kingdom were unemployed. The corresponding percentage in April 1979 was 5·2 per cent.

26. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current rate of unemployment; and what are the numbers involved.

38. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest figure of unemployed throughout the United Kingdom.

39. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers unemployed; and what this is as a proportion of the work force.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,272,565, representing an unemployment rate of 13·5 per cent.

31. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest number of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, a total of 1,316,017 claimants had been unemployed for over one year in the United Kingdom.

34. Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of employees in employment at the latest available date and in June 1979, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: In December 1984, the latest date for which information is available, there were an estimated 20,803,000 employees in employment in Great Britain. The corresponding figure for June 1979 was 22,619,000. The figures have been adjusted to take account of seasonal variations.

41. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of unemployed people in the European Economic Community; and what percentage of them are aged under 25 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: At the end of March 1985 there were 13·3 million registered unemployed in the Community (excluding Greece), of whom 37 per cent. were aged under 25 years, as estimated by the statistical office of the European Communities.

48. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many males are at present in employment; and what was the comparable figure for 1980.

Mr. Alan Clark: In December 1984, the latest date for which information is available, there were an estimated 13,788,000 males in Great Britain in the employed labour force—that is employees in employment plus the self-employed plus Her Majesty's forces. The corresponding figure for December 1980 was 14,562,000.

51. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number and proportion of young people aged 17 or 18 years who are currently unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available for the age groups requested. On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available, there were 197,678 unemployed people under 18 years and 373,986 aged 18 and 19 in the United Kingdom. The figures represent provisional unemployment rates of 23·8 and 26·1 per cent. Respectively. These figures will shortly be revised to take account of employment estimates for mid-1984.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the regions of the United Kingdom in order of number of long-term unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The figures relate to unemployed claimants on 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available.

Claimants unemployed over one year

Region	Number
South East	274,121
North West	200,121

Northern Ireland	61,045
East Anglia	27,668

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of women, aged between 16 and 60 years, in the United Kingdom and each of the standard regions are in employment in (a) a full-time and (b) a part-time capacity.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information about the employment of women aged between 16 and 60 is from the 1983 labour force survey, as follows:

Region	Percentage of women aged 16 and under 60 years
	In full-time employment*	In part-time† employment	All in employment‡
United Kingdom	32·2	23·5	56·1

*Normally working not more than 30 hours per week.
†Normally working more than 30 hours per week.
‡Includes those with hours of work not stated.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the levels of male and female unemployment in inner city partnership areas; and how these figures compare with unemployment in Britain as a whole.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Jobcentres

16. Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many representations he has received about the future size of the jobcentre network; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: Four thousand organisations and individuals were consulted on the proposals for the jobcentre network and some 3,000 of these replied. The plans, which are now being implemented, will increase the number of jobcentres to the highest level ever, whilst at the same time improved efficiency will produce savings of some £8 million a year.

Skillcentres

17. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what alternatives his Department has considered to the Liverpool skillcentre, currently proposed for closure.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In addition to nearby skillcentres at St. Helens and the Merseyside advisory training unit, there are over 40 other training providers in the catchment area of the Liverpool skillcentre.

30. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is yet in a position to announce his decision on the future of skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) on 2 April at column 530.

43. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received on the future of the skillcentre network.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I have received around 280 letters on the subject since the proposals for the reorganisation of the skillcentre network were announced on 28 November. We have also met 10 delegations.

Youth Training

18. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made by the Manpower Services Commission in drawing up detailed proposals for extending the youth training scheme to two years.

Mr. Tom King: The Manpower Services Commission has begun discussions with employers, trade unions and other interested bodies about the expansion of the youth training scheme, and has been asked to make detailed recommendations by the end of June.

19. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many places are currently allocated from the youth training scheme and the community programme to (a) Basildon and (b) Essex.

Mr. Alan Clark: At the end of March 1985, there were 1,152 approved youth training scheme places in Basildon local authority district which includes Basildon, Billericay and Wickford and 9,403 approved youth training scheme places in the county of Essex. The corresponding figures for filled places on the community programme are 334 and 1,719 respectively.

20. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he proposes in order to improve the quality of training available in the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Over half of the participants on the community programme already receive some form of training directly related to their work. This is increasingly being supplemented by specially designed broader training courses provided under the adult training strategy.

27. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many vacant places there are currently on the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information is not available in the precise form requested. At the end of March 1985 some 396,000 youth training scheme places had been approved for the 1984-85 financial year, and there were around 271,000 young people in training. Not all of these approved places were available for occupation at that time.

50. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are currently being trained in Hampshire on youth training schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There were 6,200 young people in training on the youth training scheme in Hampshire at the end of March 1985.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment to what he attributes the current under-occupancy of mode A youth training scheme places.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We need to provide sufficient youth training scheme mode A places to satisfy the forecast demand from eligible young people and to allow them the choice of a range of training programmes. Some places have remained unfilled because it appears that more school leavers than expected have found jobs outside the scheme.

The Manpower Services Commission and my Department will shortly be issuing circulars to commission area staff and careers officers, respectively, about the need, where there is a choice of suitable places, for young people to be submitted in preference to mode A in accordance with the Government's and the commission's aim that the scheme should be primarily employer based.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the relative value of mode A youth training scheme schemes and mode B youth training scheme schemes, respectively, in making the transition from school to work.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his practice to refer to those who sponsor youth training schemes under both mode A and mode B as employers.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. The large majority of trainees in the youth training scheme are not employed by scheme providers. The terms "managing agent" and "sponsor" which are currently used more accurately reflect the relationship between providers and most trainees.

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has been able to examine the implications of an extension of the youth training scheme facilities from one to two years on the United Kingdom retail sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission's consultations about a two-year youth training scheme are at an early stage, but we will take full account of the needs and circumstances of the retail sector in drawing up detailed recommendations for the extended scheme.

Factory Inspectors

21. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present number of factory inspectors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 1 April 1985 there were 845 factory inspectors employed by the Health and Safety Executive.

Unemployment Levels

23. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received concerning the present level of unemployment and on future trends.

Mr. Alan Clark: We have received many representations about the level of unemployment. This issue was discussed in the recent White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation," which set out the Government's strategy for jobs. As the White Paper makes clear, a reduction in the present level of unemployment depends on the creation of new jobs. More than 600,000 new jobs were created between March 1983 and December 1984 and we need to ensure that there are no obstacles in the way of building on that achievement.

Long-term Unemployed Persons

24. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment what Government schemes specifically attempt to retrain or find new employment for the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill, (Mr. Davis) earlier today.

36. Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of the level of supplementary benefit on the motivation of the long-term unemployed to seek work.

Mr. Alan Clark: I know of no study which has specifically looked at the link between supplementary benefit and the motivation of the long-term unemployed to seek work. There is evidence, such as from the DHSS cohort study of unemployed men, that intensity of job search decreased with longer duration of unemployment. Econometric analysis of the results of this survey has also shown that higher benefits are associated with longer unemployment durations—holding other factors constant —but there has been no comparable study of the effect of benefits on job search.

High Technology Training

25. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment to what extent, in formulating their policies for the training of young people, Her Majesty's Government take account of representations from high technology industries regarding the future demand for skilled personnel.

Mr. Peter Morrison: When assessing the demand for training places for young people, the Manpower Services Commission takes into account the needs of industry both locally and nationally, and seeks the views of all parts of industry, including high technology firms.

Earnings

28. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest figure for average earnings; and what information he has as to the number of people earning (a) this figure and (b) £100 per week or less for a 40-hour week.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest available figure for gross average weekly earnings of full-time workers is for April 1984 and is published in table 1 of "New Earnings Survey 1984", part A. Estimates of the numbers working full-time earning less than various amounts are published in table 29 of "New Earnings Survey 1984", part B. Copies of both these reports are available in the Library.

44. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people currently earning less than two thirds average male earnings; and what were the corresponding figures for May 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is estimated that about 5·25 million adult employees working full-time earned less than two thirds of average male full-time earnings in 1984. The corresponding estimate for 1979 is 5 million. Average gross weekly earnings for full-time males aged 21 and over who worked a full week were estimated to be £98·8 in 1979 and £181·6 in 1984.

Job Creation

29. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he intends to take to offset the increasing unemployment in inner city areas, including the London borough of Lambeth.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are committed to maintaining our economic policies which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing, while encouraging enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. This is the only way to generate jobs in Lambeth, other inner city areas and elsewhere. Seven inner city partnership areas—including Lambeth—will receive some £270 million of Government assistance this year through the programmes which are being co-ordinated by the new city action teams. And all inner city areas benefit from our special employment and training measures, two of which—the youth training scheme and the community programme — are to be considerably expanded.

Wages Inspectors

32. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the present numbers of wages inspectors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are 120 wages inspectors.

"Employment: The Challenge for the Nation"

33. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many representations he has received regarding his White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation".

40. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has so far received in response to the White Paper, "Unemployment: The Challenge for the Nation".

Mr. Peter Morrison: The White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation" (Cmnd. 9474) has been well received as a comprehensive description of the employment scene and a clear statement of the Government's strategy for jobs. My right hon. Friend and I have received many representations on the specific issues and policies discussed in the White Paper.

35. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people earning less than £100 for a 40-hour week, pro-rata; and what proportion of these are women.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is estimated that about 3 million people working full-time in April 1984 earned less than the equivalent of £100 for a 40-hour week excluding overtime pay. Of these, it is estimated that just over a half were women.

City Action Teams

37. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail the exact role that will be played by his Department and the Manpower Services Commission in assisting the newly-announced city action teams in various inner city areas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Each of the five city action teams includes the Manpower Services Commission's director for the region concerned, who also acts as the Secretary of State's representative in that region. The director in northern region is the leader of the Newcastle-Gateshead team. They and their staff will be playing their full part working with colleagues from the Departments of the Environment and Trade and Industry to ensure that the best use is made of central Government programmes in the inner city areas concerned. The Government's employment and training programmes have an important role to play in assisting the regeneration of inner city areas, and the changes announced in the Budget, in particular the expansion of the community programme, will increase that contribution.

Health and Safety Inspectors

42. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the present numbers of health and safety inspectors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: At 1 April 1985 there were 1,266 inspectors employed by the Health and Safety Executive.

Job Release Scheme

46. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to increase the take-up of the job release scheme in Coventry.

Mr. Alan Clark: The full time job release scheme has been extended until 31 March 1986 and I announced to the House on 15 March, at columns 316-17, greater flexibility in the rules of the part-time job release scheme. I hope to see increased take-up throughout the country, including Coventry.

School Leavers

47. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many school leavers have found employment in their first year after leaving school in each of the last four years in Langbaurgh.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that, as statistics on youth employment patterns derive principally from sample surveys which provide valid estimates only for the country as a whole or for major regions, the information requested is not available for Langbaurgh.

Trade Unions (Postal Ballots)

49. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations he has received about the use of postal ballots in trade union elections.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend and I have received several letters.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Ministers of Labour and Secretaries of State for Employment and Productivity, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Unfair Dismissal

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has for excluding all firms employing fewer than (a) 50 people and (b) 100 people from the unfair dismissal provisions of the Employment Protection Act.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None.

Langbaurgh

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans there are to extend and improve jobcentre facilities in Langbaurgh.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The agreed plans for the development of the employment service will involve an increase in the numbers of jobcentres from 991 to 1,065 — the highest number ever as well as substantial investment in new technology to improve the handling of job vacancies while achieving savings to the taxpayer through improved efficiency. Five jobcentres already serve the various parts of the Langbaurgh constituency and it was not felt that any additions were justified, although of course the existing jobcentres will benefit from the investment in new technology.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many new jobs have been recorded in Langbaurgh in each of the past four years for all categories of employment; and how many of these were for part-time employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains is not available from the Department's statistics. Net changes in employment can be given but, for areas smaller than regions, only for those dates when censuses of employment are taken.

The latest available figures from the 1981 census of employment showed that just over 15,000 employees were employed in the constituency of Langbaurgh. Of these, 5,000 were working part-time. Estimates from the following September 1984 census are not yet available.

Employment Protection Act

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases under the Employment Protection Act in the past year taken before an industrial tribunal have involved persons who have been employed for more than one year but less than two years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available in the form requested. On the basis of a sample analysis of complaints of unfair dismissal for the calendar year 1983 it is estimated that 1,650 such complaints heard by an industrial tribunal involved persons who had been employed for more than one but less than two years.

The figure should be treated with caution because of the margin of error inherent in the sample.

Wages Councils

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recommendations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry during the past year concerning wages councils; what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government concerning the International Labour Organisation's convention 26 on wages councils; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In June last year the Confederation of British Industry submitted proposals for major reform of the wages councils system, or, failing that, its abolition.

Our adherence to International Labour Organisation convention 26 limits our freedom to act in the way we may judge best. We therefore propose to de-ratify the convention subject to the consultations required by International Labour Organisation rules.

Decisions on the future of wages councils will be taken when responses to the consultative paper issued on 21 March have been considered.

Hearing Protection

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what position the Government have taken on proposals for (a) a 90-decibel noise A level and (b) the compulsory wearing of hearing protection.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The draft European directive on noise does not require all action to take effect at a single exposure level. The Government agree that 90 dB(A) is one of the levels at which appropriate action is required. The Government accept that in some circumstances the wearing of hearing protection should be compulsory but regards the Commission's amended proposal an improvement on the original as fewer workers would be required to wear personal protection at noise levels where danger to their hearing might not be apparent.

Dock Workers

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons are currently registered dock workers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The total number of registered dock workers on 30 April 1985 was 12,135.

National Dock Labour Scheme

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total financial contribution made by port employers to the national dock labour scheme in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The total contributions by port employers to the National Dock Labour Board (NDLB), covering the board's own operations and those of the national voluntary severance scheme (NVSS) during the past five calendar years, were as follows:

	Total	National Dock Labour Board	National Voluntary Severance Scheme
	£ million	£ million	£ million
1980	14·4	4·9	9·5
1981	17·7	5·2	12·5
1982	17·3	5·0	12·3
1983	15·9	5·0	10·9
1984	16·0	4·5	11·5

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the total cost to public funds of the national dock labour scheme in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The industry's national voluntary severance scheme administered by the National Dock Labour Board has received help from public funds in a variety of ways.

Loans were made by the Government to the National Dock Labour Board as follows:

	£ million
1980-81	12·3
1981-82	45·0
1982-83	11·0

Capital repayment of £1·5 million was made in 1980-81 in respect of a previous loan. Of the loans made in 1980-81 and 1981-83, £23·8 million was written off under the provisions of the Transport Act 1983. £44·5 million of the loans remains outstanding.

Interest paid on these and previous loans was as follows:

	£ million
1980-81	0·4
1981-82	2·4
1982-83	*4·0

*In respect of previous year's interest.

Under the terms of the current loan conditions, the Government have waived interest payments for the three years 1982-82 to 1984-85.

In addition, the Government have paid the following amounts of grant to the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company in respect of the severance of registered dock workers.

	£ million
1980-81	nil
1981-82	9·7
1982-83	40·3
1983-84	17·7
1984-85	15·2

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Employment what he expects to be the total cost to (a) public funds and (b) port employers of the national dock labour scheme in 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Employers are expected to pay about £4 million for the National Dock Labour Board's operations in 1985. The costs of the industry's national voluntary severance scheme will depend on the number of severances achieved and on discussions which are now urgently in train with representatives of the National Association of Port Employers about future funding arrangements for the scheme.

Employee Involvement

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the proposals contained in the Greater Employee Involvement Bill.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government are committed to encouraging greater employee involvement. ACAS already plays an important role in this under its existing statutory duties, which are broad enough to cover the promotion of employee involvement. The Government are not convinced of the need to lay on ACAS the further specific duty of promoting the Industrial Participation Association and Institute of Personnel Management joint code. The code is being promoted effectively by those bodies and the Government have often commended it.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the Government's policy towards the Institute of Personnel Management and Industrial Participation Association code, "Employee Involvement and Participation Principles and Standard of Practice," a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government have often commended this code as a most valuable source of advice and guidance. We particularly welcome its recognition that practices which are likely to be successful may vary from one organisation to another. The code is especially authoritative for having been drawn up by leading industrialists, trade unionists, and other practitioners in the field.

Milk Roundsmen (Child Labour)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases of the use of illegal child labour by milk roundsmen have been brought to his attention; and what action he has taken as a result.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Construction Industry (Development Land Tax)

52. Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect he estimates that the abolition of development land tax will have on job creation in the construction industry.

Mr. Peter Rees: I would refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol North-West (Mr. Stern) on 25 April at column 526.

Small Businesses

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's attitude towards the policy of the European Commission on the harmonisation of the value added tax exemption thresholds for small businesses in the member countries of the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The European Commission, in its report on national VAT schemes for small businesses, has suggested that the VAT exemption threshold should be harmonised at a level of 10,000 ecu—about £5,900—to be increased by reference to inflation, and that member states with higher levels should freeze their exemption thresholds until the Community limit catches up. This report was placed in the library with an explanatory memorandum on 27 February 1984. The European Commission has not yet made a formal proposal to the council on this subject and when such a proposal is made it would require the unanimous approval of the member states before it could be implemented. The Commission's report did not demonstrate that the United Kingdom limit, raised in the budget to £19,500, causes any significant distortion of intra-Community trade and the Government could not accept a harmonised limit pitched at such an unrealistically low level.

EC (Agriculture Expenditure)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report, the percentage ceiling on agricultural spending in the event of the relevant figures under the agreed formula being the same in 1985 as they were in 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The method of calculating the financial guideline for agricultural expenditure, which will first apply fully for 1986 is set out in the Council conclusions on budget discipline which were placed in the Library of the House on 16 November 1984.

Development Land Tax

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the staff requirements and costs in the Inland Revenue and the development land tax office resulting from continuing to collect outstanding sums of development land tax after abolition from 19 March.

Mr. Moore: About 200 Inland Revenue staff are presently engaged on the assessment and collection of development land tax, eighty being in the development land tax office at Middlesbrough. It will cost about £5 million to collect the expected tax yield for 1984-85 of £80 million. These staff requirements and costs will decrease as the effect of abolition works through but it is not possible to forecast precisely the rate at which these savings will be realised.

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the saving in staff and costs in the Inland Revenue and development land tax office of abolishing outstanding liabilities to development land tax on projects of material development notified before 19 March.

Mr. Moore: Savings in staff and costs would be relatively small but the information on which to base a precise estimate is not available.

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has considered the letter from the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire concerning liabilities to development land tax for projects of material development started before 19 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend's letter has been considered.

Development land tax legislation contains a provision whereby notice may be given to vary a project already notified to the Revenue. That provision will continue to apply for projects started before 19 March 1985.

Bloodstock Breeders (VAT)

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects discussions on the draft 18th European Community directive on value added tax to be completed; and whether he envisages any early action to assist United Kingdom bloodstock breeders in advance of the completion of these discussions, with a view to eliminating their competitive disadvantages with France and Ireland.

Mr. Hayhoe: The draft 18th EC directive on VAT and the draft 19th directive, with which it is closely interlinked, propose the abolition of a range of derogations and comments have been invited from those industries, including the bloodstock interests, which are likely to be affected by the proposals. No discussions have taken place so far in the Council and any estimate of a date for completion of discussions would be purely speculative, at this stage.

As regards the last part of the question, I cannot usefully add to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 3 April at column 689.

Insolvency

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of revenue obtained from taxes in insolvency cases where the Inland Revenue makes use of its position as a preferential creditor.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (VAT)

Mr. George Robertson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list his powers to alter the amount of value added tax contribution paid by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Contributions of up to 1 per cent.1 of value added tax calculated on a harmonised base constitute part of the Community's own resources. The precise amount is determined during the budgetary process, in which the United Kingdom plays a part as a member of the Council of Ministers. The 1 per cent. ceiling on VAT own resources available to the Community may not be increased without the prior approval of Parliament.

EC (Budget)

Mr. George Robertson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what basis of farm prices has been used in the figures used in the letter of amendment No. 3 to the 1985 preliminary draft budget of the European Communities.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The agricultural prices underlying the Commission's estimates for agricultural expenditure in its letter of amendment No. 3 to the 1985 preliminary draft budget are based on the prices agreed last year by the Agriculture Council for the 1984-85 marketing years and the Commission's price proposals of 30 January for the 1985-86 marketing years. The Budget Council incorporated these estimates in the draft budget for 1985 which it approved on 23 April.

Mr. George Robertson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the United States dollar/European currency unit rate which has been assumed in the letter of amendment No. 3 to the 1985 preliminary draft budget of the European Community.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission assumed a European currency unit/US dollar exchange rate of 1·30 for 1985 in drawing up its letter of amendment No. 3 to the preliminary draft budget for 1985.

Mr. George Robertson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans have been prepared by the European Community Council of Ministers for a contingency involving the effect on the European Community budget of currency fluctuations, or varied farm prices; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what contingency funds have been earmarked by the European Community Council of Ministers for a shortfall in funds created by any failure to get ratification of the latent non-reimbursable advance by national Governments.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

State Earnings-related Pension Scheme

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the tax revenue figure in 1985-86 and 1986-87 if all those now paying into the state earnings-related pension scheme transferred to private personal or company occupational pension schemes in 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Moore: An estimate of the change in tax revenue would depend upon the assumptions made about the levels of contribution by employers and employees to private and occupational schemes after transfer from the state earnings-related scheme.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the loss of revenue if those pensioners now in receipt of the state earnings-related pension received the basic state pension alone, in 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many married couples claim the maximum amount of mortgage tax relief; and what proportion this is of all married couples.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 25 April 1985, c. 529]: It is estimated that about 425,000 married couples claim mortgage interest relief in respect of the qualifying portion of a mortgage loan of £30,000 or more. These are just under 4 per cent. of the total of tax-paying married couples.

Truck Manufacturers (Taxation)

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has concerning the total taxation revenue generated by firms manufacturing trucks in the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1985, c. 141]: I regret that information distinguishing the manufacture of trucks from other motor manufacture is not available.

EC Directives

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive from the EEC since 1979 relevant to his Department; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1985, c. 244]: Directives adopted by the Council of Ministers for which the Treasury has lead responsibility are as follows:

Council directive 83/350 on the supervision of credit institutions on a consolidated basis.

This comes into effect on 1 July 1985. The Bank of England will in due course publish a statement describing how it undertakes consolidated supervision of banks under the existing provisions of the Banking Act 1979 in a manner consistent with the directive.

Council directive 80/767 which adapts and supplements in respect of certain contracting authorities directive 77/62 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts.

EC directive 80/767 adapts and supplements the earlier EC directive 77/62 which coordinates procedures for the award of public supply contracts in EC member states and lays down common conditions of competition. EC 80/767 modifies the earlier directive to take account of the provisions of the GATT agreement on Government procurement (Cmnd. 7662). The effect of the directive is to ensure that British suppliers are not placed at a disadvantage compared with competitors from other signatories of the GPA when tendering for contracts in other EC countries. The directive has been implemented by administrative circular to departments and other bodies affected by it.

SCOTLAND

Rates

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many households in Scotland do not pay rates; and what percentage of the total this figure represents.

Mr. Ancram: There are some 4 million adults registered to vote on the electoral rolls in Scotland, and some 2 million domestic properties on the valuation rolls. Some 700,000 householders received assistance with their domestic rate bills in 1984-85 through the housing benefit system. On the basis of these figures, around 50 per cent. of electors, being non-householders, are not liable to pay any rates, and a further 18 per cent, on income grounds, pay either no rates at all or only a part of their rate bills.

Agricultural Colleges (Advisory Services)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the effects of the cut in funding for the advisory services operated by Scotland's agricultural colleges and on the standard of service offered by these bodies.

Mr. Younger: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State recently had a detailed meeting on this question with the chairman of the council of the colleges and the three college principals, and discussions are continuing between my department and the colleges about the ways in which the reduction in public funding in 1987-88 can be implemented. It is my intention that the present high standards of service offered by the advisory services in Scotland should be maintained, and that the representative bodies directly concerned should be given an opportunity in due course to comment on the details of any proposals for change in the way in which these services are delivered before changes take effect.

Defective Houses

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he intends to make regulations under the Housing Defects Act so that the owner of an Orlit house or other house covered by the terms of the Housing Defects Act will be entitled to a grant if he or she has purchased the house from another private owner, the property having been previously a tenanted council house.

Mr. Ancram: The Housing Defects Act already makes provision for grant, in the circumstances described, provided certain conditions under that Act are met.

Young Offenders

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what proportion of offenders (a) under 17 and (b) under 16 years who have committed indictable offences in each of the last 10 years have been (i) sentenced by courts, (ii) dealt with by children's hearings, (iii) received official warnings from the police or (iv) been otherwise dealt with, respectively;

(2) what proportion of the total number of offenders aged (a) under 17 and (b) under 16 years who have been dealt with by courts and children's hearings for indictable offences in each of the last 10 years have received custodial sentences and supervision with a residential condition, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: Information for the last 10 years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Figures for the most recent five-year period are given in the following table. Children's hearings statistics do not differentiate between types of offence committed by children; the figures therefore give all referrals to reporters to children's panels on offence grounds. For consistency, figures of cases dealt with by courts are provided on the same basis.

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
1. Children aged 16
(i) sentenced by courts	8,487	9,819	9,268	8,388	8,710
(ii) referred to reporter to children's hearings*			Not available
(iii) official warnings from police†	115	86	450	1,156	583
(iv) dealt with otherwise than as in (i)-(iii)			NIL
(v) received custodial sentences	416	459	437	489	596
(vi) placed on supervision with a residential requirement	Not available	Not available	9	3	4
2. Children under 16
(i) sentenced by courts	866	938	811	618	635
(ii) referred to reporter to children's hearings*	20,873	22,303	23,912	22,747	23,291
(iii) official warnings from police†	7,940	7,450	6,817	6,675	8,235
(iv) dealt with otherwise than as in (i)-(iii)			NIL
(v) received custodial sentences	105	99	77	88	107
(vi) placed on supervision with a residential requirement	Not available	907	911	872	937

Notes:

* Item 2(ii) includes children aged 16, for whom detailed figures are not readily available; they are estimated to account for some 1 per cent. of the total. Reporters dealt with the following numbers under their discretionary powers without reference to hearings.

1979— 9,297
1980— 9,738
1981—11,006
1982—10,892
1983—11,609

† These figures are affected by variations in recording practices. Consideration is being given to this problem.

Transport Subsidies (Strathclyde)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the total subsidies paid in each year since 1975 by Strathclyde regional council, under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968, to support British Rail's commuter traffic serving Glasgow and (b) the percentage which each of these sums represented of the region's total revenue spending in each year.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	(a) Strathclyde Section 20 Subsidy (£m)	*(b) (a) as percentage of Region's Total Revenue Expenditure
1975-76	8·1	1·8
1976-77	7·6	1·3
1977-78	8·5	1·4
1978-79	12·1	1·7
1979-80	14·9	1·9
1980-81	25·7	2·6
1981-82	23·3	2·0
1982-83	26·5	2·1
1983-84	27·2	2·1
1984-85	26·8	2·0

* The total revenue expenditure figures used for comparison with expenditure on S.20 payments are taken from the appropriate editions of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy Publication "Rating Review". The figures include all expenditure relevant for rate support grant purposes, including loan charges, and any non-relevant expenditure recorded in the publication.

Housing Associations

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the allocation of the additional £2 million towards the expansion of shared-ownership schemes in Scotland, indicating (a) whether the difficulties facing housing associations wishing to design and build schemes in terms of section 127 of the Housing Act 1980 have now been resolved and (b) the number of houses purchased from private builders and sold to date.

Mr. Ancram: When my right hon. Friend recently announced his decision to increase the allocation to the Housing Corporation by £2 million, he indicated his wish that most of the additional resources, perhaps £1·5 million should be applied to an expansion of shared ownership. He hoped that the balance might be used for housing for the disabled. The Housing Corporation will now prepare a revised development programme to accommodate the additional allocation.

The provisions of section 127 of the Housing Act 1980 do present certain difficulties to housing associations operating shared ownership schemes in Scotland and these have not yet been fully resolved. Nevertheless, associations have gained experience in the operation of shared ownership in recent years and have acquired greater expertise in identifying the types and locations of houses best suited to both the requirements of shared ownership and the housing needs of the area.

This is illustrated by the fact that, in the three shared ownership programmes undertaken since February 1982, 421 of the 433 houses acquired for the purpose have attracted sharing owners.

Dunblane Bypass

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the reasons which prevented his Department from announcing the route of the Dunblane bypass as promised at the end of March or April; and whether he is now in a position to announce the proposed line of the bypass.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Development Department had hoped to receive by the end of March or April the report of the consultants studying possible lines for the bypass, but their discussions with local landowners have taken longer than expected. The report is now expected this month. Once a preferred line has been selected, a draft trunk road order will be published as quickly as possible.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the net changes in hospital bed complements in each Scottish health board area during the five-year period September 1979 to September 1984; and how the figures compare with the preceding five-year period.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is as follows;

Health Board	September 1974-September 1979	September 1979-March 1984
Argyll and Clyde	−143	−43
Ayrshire and Arran	+48	+249

Tayside	−492	−324
Western Isles	No change	−17
Scotland	−3,256	−738

Notes:
September 1984 figures are not yet available.
Excluding joint-user and contractual beds.
Details of bed complements for each health board are set out in "Hospital Utilisation Statistics", which has been published by the information services division of the Common Services Agency of the Scottish Health Service each year since 1976.

Myocardial Infarction

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the incidence of myocardial infarction in Scotland in 1983 and in each of the preceding four years.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Coronary Artery Disease (Deaths)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of deaths due to coronary artery disease in Scotland in 1984 and in each of the preceding four years.

Mr. John MacKay: The number of deaths classified as being due to ischaemic heart disease were:

	Number
1980	17,885
1981	18,453
1982	18,633
1983	18,335
*1984	18,107

*Provisional.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the expenditure on the National Health Service in Scotland, in real terms, for the years 1975-76 onwards to the present time.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is as follows:

	£ million
1975-76	1,448·9
1976-77	1,454·2
1977-78	1,441·4
1978-79	1,504·9
1979-80	1,535·4
1980-81	1,635·7
1981-82	1,698·0
1982-83	1,723·0
1983-84	1,758·1
*1984-85	1,819·0

*Provisional.
Note: The figures given are for gross expenditure expressed in 1983-84 cost terms, using GDP deflator factors.

Hospitals

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the hospitals and hospital wings in Scotland which closed during 1984, giving the total number of beds lost with each closure.

Mr. John MacKay: Details relating to complete hospitals taken out of use in 1984 are given below. comprehensive detailed information on partial closures is not held centrally. Most of the beds closed have been replaced in existing facilities:

	Number of beds
Argyll and Clyde Health Board
Finnartmore auxiliary hospital, Kilmun	32
Ayrshire and Arran Health Board
Buckreddan maternity hospital, Kilwinning	26
Grampian Health Board
County hospital, Dufftown	26
Shetland Health Board
Old Gilbert Bain hospital, Lerwick	19

Note: The bed figures shown are the approved bed complements at the time of closure.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the hospitals, or new hospital wings, which opened during 1984 and give the total number of beds gained in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: Details of new hospital buildings funded from the central building programme, brought into use during 1984, are given below. Comprehensive information on locally funded schemes is not held centrally. The total bed compliment is given, but beds which replace outdated facilities elsewhere are not additions to the overall complement:

	Number of beds
Argyll and Clyde Health Board
Dunoon and district general hospital	* 30
Merchiston hospital—phase 1	120
Forth Valley health board
Sauchie hospital	60
Greater Glasgow health board
Gartloch hospital	120
Lanarkshire health board
Kirklands hospital—phase 1	120

* 10 day places.

Geriatric Hospitals

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total number of beds available in geriatric hospitals or units in Scotland at the present time; and if he will give relevant figures as at 30 September 1984, 1983, 1982 and 1981.

Mr. John MacKay: The average number of staffed hospital beds for geriatric patients available in Scotland on the dates shown were as follows:

	Average number
30 September 1981	9,995
30 September 1982	10,146
30 September 1983	10,401
31 March 1984 (latest available date)	10,531

Cervical Cancer

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement outlining the arrangments made by each health board for the provision of cervical smear tests.

Mr. John MacKay: A report by a working party on cervical cytology services in Scotland, which the Scottish Home and Health Department drew to the attention of health boards in December 1978, gave expert guidance on the operation of such services. This guidance is still valid; but in view of recent public concern the Department asked health boards on 29 March for detailed information on the service being provided in their respective areas. I shall be reviewing the position when this information has been assessed, and if any further action is called for as a result I shall give urgent consideration to this.

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report statistics in each health board area for (a) the number of women who have died from cervical cancer in each of the last five years and (b) the number of those who died who had previously undergone smear tests.

Mr. John MacKay: The statistics are given in the accompanying table. Information is not available on the number of women who died who had previously undergone smear tests.

Hospitals (Beds and Nurses)

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of (a) hospital beds and (b) qualified nurses per head of population.

Mr. John MacKay: At 31 March 1984 the total bed complement of all NHS hospitals in Scotland represented 11·7 per 1,000 of the population and the number of qualified nurses employed in hospitals represented 5·3 per 1,000 of the population.

Renal Treatment (Funding)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the funding available for renal treatment in the west of Scotland in the current year and in 1984-85 and the number of staff and patients, respectively; and what discussions he has had with the area health boards in the west of Scotland and the Kidney Patients Association about the level of funding.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why he has issued licences to kill cormorants for causing damage to fisheries rather than for causing serious damage to fisheries as specified in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. John MacKay: I can confirm that the licences are issued in terms of the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 relating to the prevention of serious damage to fisheries.

Rent (Scotland) Act 1984

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to amend the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984.

Mr. Ancram: The Government are presently examining the legislation relating to the private rented sector. This is a complex subject which requires careful consideration and my right hon. Friend will announce his intentions as soon as possible.

Sexual Offences (Report)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde as to what disciplinary action has been taken against police officers as a result of the dispute over publication of his Department's research report of sexual offences;

(2) if, in the light of the dispute between his Department and the Strathclyde police force over publication of his Department's research report on sexual offences, he will review the arrangements for the future publication of similar reports;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report the letter he has received from the chief constable of Strathclyde relating to the dispute over publication of his Department's research report on sexual offences;

(4) if he will appoint an independent person to inquire into the dispute between hit Department and the Strathclyde police force relating to the publication of his Department's research report on sexual offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The arrangements for the publication of research studies conducted by the Scottish Home and Health Department into aspects of police practice are clear. The Scottish Home and Health Department first discusses with the police the scope and nature of the proposed research. It then gathers evidence, prepares a draft report based on it, consults the relevant police forces for comment on the draft, considers whether to amend the draft in the light of such comment and submits the report through me to my right hon. Friend for him — and nobody else—to decide on the question of publication. This practice was followed with regard to the study of the police investigation into complaints of sexual assault, which was duly published in 1983. My right hon. Friend sees no cause for altering this standard research practice and it will be followed in respect of any subsequent research study.

During the preparation of the sexual assaults study in 1983 Strathclyde police criticised some of the material incorporated in the draft and challenged its accuracy. The Scottish Home and Health Department was able to demonstrate that the criticism was unjustified and arose from differences between, on the one hand, a version made available to the researchers of the initial records made by the police relating to alleged assaults and, on the other hand, records of such assaults made subsequently for the Strathclyde police file and also a precognition. As I informed the House on 2 May at column 447, the differences between the material seen by the Scottish Home and Health Department's researchers and the material held on record by the police were readily explainable: they were minor in extent, consisting of changes in phraseology which did not in any way affect the substance. It is to the credit of the chief constable of Strathclyde that, when the matter was drawn to his notice, he investigated within his force and wrote to the Scottish Home and Health Department apologising for the unfounded criticism that had been levelled at its officers and informing the Department that he had taken appropriate action in relation to his officers who had challenged the report's accuracy. When the research study was published the quotations from the police reports which had been the subject of this correspondence appeared as in the researchers original draft. After the research study was published changes were made in police practice.

When the hon. Member and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) raised this matter earlier this year with my right hon. Friend, they were informed of the full circumstances and were shown the relevant reports in the two versions. They have also been shown by the chief constable the letter of apology which he sent to the Scottish Home and Health Department in 1983. This matter was resolved satisfactorily in that year and my right hon. Friend does not consider that action on the lines suggested by the hon. Member is necessary.

Rates

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what are the average rates payments for (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers, for each district and region in Scotland;

(2) what is (i) the average increase in the rateable values, and (ii) the present average rateable values in each district and region in Scotland of (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers; and if he will publish a table or tables.

Mr. Ancram: I am obtaining this information and hope to publish it in the Official Report shortly.

Birds (Licences)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many licences he has issued in (a) 1984 and (b) so far in 1985 to kill birds under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act; and if he will indicate in each case the species of bird involved, the number allowed to be killed, the location and the reason.

Mr. John MacKay: Details of licences issued by my right hon. Friend in 1984 and so far in 1985, for the killing of wild birds under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 are set out in the following tables.

DEFENCE

Artillery Locating Equipment

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the development of proposed artillery locating equipment.

Mr. Butler: We are examining ways of improving our capability for weapon location. A number of United Kingdom firms are undertaking studies, and we are investigating the possibilities for collaboration with our allies.

Field and Anti-aircraft Gunners

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the United Kingdom's Army personnel are field and anti-aircraft gunners; by how much these figures have changed over the last 10 years for which figures are available; and if he will also give such estimates as he has as to the comparable data relating to the army of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Lee: The field and air defence regiments of the Royal Artillery account for 3·9 and 1·3 per cent. respectively of the trained strength of the Regular Army. Equivalent figures for the last 10 years, and comparable data for the army of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, could be provided only with disproportionate effort and expense.

Defence Act 1842

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the last five occasions since 1979 on which he, or his predecessors, used the powers in sections 16 and 17 of the Defence Act 1842 to stop up or divert any public footpaths or bridleways, stating in each case (a) the date of the stopping up or diversions, (b) the footpaths or bridleways affected by the stopping up or the diversions, and (c) the lengths of footpaths and bridleways stopped up and the length of footpath or bridleway created under the exercise of the powers.

Mr. Lee: The Defence Act 1842 has been used on one occasion since 1979 to stop up a bridleway. The details are as follows:

(a) 5 February 1985.
(b) Bridleway Molesworth No. 28.
(c) 1·17km and 2·15 km.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what rights of objection the public has to a proposal to stop up or divert a public footpath or bridleway under section 16 of the Defence Act 1842.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence when, and where, he next plans to use section 16 of the Defence Act 1842 to stop up or divert a public footpath or bridleway.

Mr. Lee: As and when the need arises.

Ex-gratia Payments

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many ex-gratia payments were made in 1984 to members, ex-members, or dependants of former members of Her Majesty's forces; and what were the reasons for such payments.

Mr. Lee: Ex-gratia payments are made to members and ex-members of the armed forces and their dependants for a wide variety of reasons and no central record is maintained of the number of such payments and the reasons for them. However, no ex-gratia payments were made in 1984 in cases arising out of the operations of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Pensions

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, pursuant to his reply of 15 April, Official Report, column 66, to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, he will list the individual clerical errors which resulted in £188,372 being returned to service pensioners as arrears of pensions previously underpaid, indicating in each case the nature of the clerical error.

Mr. Lee: Further checking has shown the estimate of £188,372 to be overstated. It should be revised to £187,091. The individual errors that gave rise to this total of arrears being returned to service pensioners are:

Category of error	Number of errors in the category	Arrears returned £
(a) Simple arithmetical error	59	37,853
(b) Oversight of further action	32	30,135
(c) Incorrect input to computer	25	21,573
(d) Incorrect interpretation of regulations	18	86,191
(e) Incorrect information passed to Paymaster General's Office	13	11,339
TOTALS	147	187,091

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, following the letter of the head of Man. S (Org) of his Department to Mr. T. G. Robson, Secretary of his Department's Council of Civil Service Unions of 2 April on the Rayner review of pensions, he will list what steps have been taken to check the state of affairs and put the matter right, where necessary, following the errors which have arisen in the course of the transfer of the original documentation on Royal Navy/Royal Marine pensions to the Paymaster-General's office.

Mr. Lee: A check of every RN ratings and RM other ranks pension will be carried out and the necessary corrections made.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list all pensionable allowances in all three services apart from basic pay.

Mr. Lee: There are no allowances received by service men that are relevant to the calculation of a service pension.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what rank categories were included in the transcription from manual records to computers of the three services for the purpose of the computerisation of service pension records.

Mr. Lee: In the computerisation of pension payment records the ranks affected were those of warrant officer class I and equivalent and below.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the computer storing Royal Air Force airmen's pension records closed down; what was the reason for the closure; and why manually recorded records are now being used to calculate airmen's pensions and to answer inquiries.

Mr. Lee: Royal Air Force airmen's pensions are maintained on either the Paymaster General's computer system at Crawley or the Director General of Defence Accounts computer system at Bath, neither of which has been closed down.

Royal Air Force airmen's pensions are awarded by the Director General of Defence Accounts staff at Worcester. The calculation of these pensions has always been undertaken manually on the basis of information provided from Royal Air Force pay and personnel records. Manually recorded records have always been referred to by the accounts staff at Worcester prior to answering inquiries.

Ex-Senior Civil Servants (Appointments)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the number of civil servants who resign or retire from his Department and take up appointments in defence-related industries other than immediately after leaving the Civil Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Civil servants resigning or retiring from the Ministry of Defence in order to take up appointments in defence-related industries are required to seek prior departmental approval before so doing. This requirement remains effective for a period of two years following an individual's date of retirement or resignation. The number of civil servants who take up such appointments within the two years is not readily available. The number who take up appointments after two years is not known to my Department.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will break down by grade and division within his Department the officials who have left to take jobs in industry in each of the years from 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Butler: The number of civil servants who made applications under the business appointments rules in the years in question are as follows:

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Below Higher Executive and equivalent	13	6	27	37	84
Higher Executive Officer and equivalent	14	17	32	44	67
Senior Executive Officer and equivalent	11	24	33	53	74
Principal and equivalent	21	28	19	44	89
Senior Principal and equivalent	6	7	9	23	32
Assistant Secretary and equivalent	5	7	8	13	22
Under Secretary	4	6	7	7	8
Deputy Secretary	—	2	2	3	4
Second Permanent/Permanent Secretary	—	1	—	—	1
TOTAL	74	98	137	224	381

Lists of the areas within the Ministry of Defence in which the individuals concerned were employed are not readily available.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to establish the companies subsequently employing civil servants who have resigned from his Department in each of the years from 1980 to 1984; and if he will list each of the subsequent employers concerned.

Mr. Butler: Civil servants resigning from the Ministry of Defence to take up alternative employment are required to notify details of their prospective employer(s) where the company concerned is in a contractual or other special relationship with the Department. Certain more senior grades, of the rank of under secretary and above, are required to notify any intended employment. No comprehensive list of companies or bodies employing former civil servants is available.

Departmental Selection and Management Organisation Procedures

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to re-evaluate selection and management organisation procedures in his Department in the light of the steady increase in the rate of departure of his civil servants for jobs in industry.

Mr. Butler: None.

Resignations

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the reasons given by civil servants resigning from his Department in each of the years from 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Butler: Civil servants resigning from the Ministry of Defence to take up alternative employment are not required to provide specific reasons for so doing; but where such information is volunteered, the reasons given vary widely and include such reasons as domestic circumstances and better career prospects.

Defence Research and Intra-mural Research Committee

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the recent reorganisation of his Department affected the defence research and intra-mural research committee; and what are its present functions and composition.

Mr. Butler: The defence research and intra-mural research committee (DRIRC) was replaced in the recent MOD reorganisation by a new body, the defence research committee (DRC). This committee has a similar task to its predecessor: to provide advice to the Chief Scientific Adviser (CSA) on policy options and priorities concerning scientific and technological research and, against the background of resource availability, to provide guidance to the Controller of R and D Establishments, Research and Nuclear (CERN) regarding the content of his research programme.

Membership of the new committee includes representatives of the major R and D "customers", the defence staff, the defence scientific staff, and the office of management and budget. Other scientific advisers and representatives of other Government Departments may also be invited to attend.

Defence Scientific Advisory Council

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the present functions and membership of the defence scientific advisory council.

Mr. Butler: The defence scientific advisory council is established to advise the Secretary of State for Defence on scientific and technological matters of concern to the Ministry of Defence. The chairman and other independent members are all distinguished scientists in the academic or industrial world, and their contributions to the MOD through the DSAC are much appreciated. Each is appointed in his personal capacity by the Secretary of State.

Defence Secretariat 17

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence which parts of his Department now handle the responsibilities formerly handled by defence secretariat 17.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Sensitive Information

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are taken in his Department to account for documents and manuals containing sensitive information.

Mr. Butler: Ministry of Defence security regulations specify the measures to be taken, which vary according to the classification of the documents and manuals.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the classified defence documents found lying on a rubbish dump near the Thames barrier.

Mr. Butler: Investigations are in progress into the circumstances surrounding the discovery of these documents and it would be wrong to comment further until these investigations have been completed.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will re-examine the procedures for the disposal of manuals and documents containing sensitive information.

Mr. Butler: Security procedures are regularly reviewed and changes are made when necessary.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement about the circumstances in which the plan of a proposed new security fence for AWRE Aldermaston were found in south-east London by two schoolboys near a rubbish tip.

Mr. Butler: Investigations are in progress into the circumstances surrounding the discovery of these documents, and it would be wrong to comment further until these investigations have been completed.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the documents relating to Tornado which were found on a rubbish dump near the Thames barrier.

Mr. Butler: Restricted documents relating to the servicing of the Tornado aircraft, reproduced on microfiche.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the documents relating to the Aldermaston research centre which were found a rubbish dump near the Thames barrier.

Mr. Butler: A plan of part of an internal security fence and of adjacent areas at AWRE Aldermaston, classified restricted.

HMS Otter

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence by whom the propellor shafts of HMS Otter are being repaired; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Replacement propellor shafts are being supplied by Devonport dockyard, where refurbishment of such items takes place. Their cost, together with the cost of other material supplied to the firm undertaking the refit, will be reflected in the final assessment of the overall cost of the project.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence by whom the hatch covers of HMS Otter are being repaired; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Such work as is necessary is being undertaken by the firm carrying out the refit. If it emerges that new hatch covers are needed, they will be issued from Ministry of Defence stock.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what technical and manpower assistance is being provided to Humber Ship Repairers in its work on refitting HMS Otter.

Mr. Lee: There is an eight-man Ministry of Defence team at Humber Ship Repairers to provide technical guidance and oversee the refit. Additional technical advice is provided by the Ministry of Defence as necessary. The cost of providing all such assistance will be reflected in the final assessment of the cost of the project.

Army Board (Appeals)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many appeals have been lodged by soldiers with the Army Board in the last two years; and of those, how many have resulted in a successful outcome for the appellant.

Mr. Lee: A total of 30 appeals against the findings of courts martial under section 8(2) of the Courts Martial (Appeals) Act 1968 and 46 applications for redress of complaints under the Army Act 1955, sections 180 and 181, lodged by officers and soldiers reached the Army Board in the last two years. Their outcome is as follows:

	Upheld	Denied	Sentence mitigated/ Partially upheld
Appeals against CM	4	17	9
Redress of complaint	8	21	17

I should stress that only those redress of complaint cases that are not upheld by the intervening authorities reach the Army Board.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken toward pest control on the Falkland Islands; and whether any private contractors have been used for this purpose.

Mr. Stanley: A military environmental health officer has been appointed to the staff of the Commander British Forces Falkland Islands. In addition to being responsible for pest control at all military establishments, he also advises the Falkland Island Government on pest control. I understand that the airport contractors at Mount Pleasant are taking normal pest control precautions and are employing a pest control officer.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions on which military personnel from other countries have visited the Falklands since 1983, stating in each case their country of origin and the purpose of the visit.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Porton Down (Waste)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what quantities of waste from Porton Down have been sent to Re-Chem plants at Bonnybridge and Pontypool for disposal since 1975.

Mr. Lee: Available records show that since 1975 the chemical defence establishment Porton Down has sent waste to the Re-Chem plant at Pontypool for disposal under contract on one occasion, in 1983. The material comprised 30 tonnes of solid waste, in the form of salt of phosphoric acid. No waste has been sent to the Bonnybridge plant.

Type 23 Frigate (Tenders)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to invite tenders for further type 23 frigates.

Mr. Lee: Tenders will be sought in the late summer for the third and fourth type 23 frigates. All United Kingdom shipyards capable of constructing frigates will be invited to bid.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on 28 January, Swan Hunter Shipbuilders Limited will at the same time also be invited to tender for the second type 23 frigate.

RAF Trainer Aircraft

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received following the award of the contract for the Royal Air Force trainer to Shorts; what is the substance of these representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: A number of representations have been received from British Aerospace. In particular, the company has expressed disappointment at losing the competition and said that it had believed that the final bid it submitted on 19 March for the PC-9 would have been cheaper for the Ministry than acceptance of the bid from Shorts for Tucano. This was definitely not so; the total acquisition cost would have been higher for the PC-9 than it was from the Tucano, as was also true of operating costs. British Aerospace has also asked both for the opportunity to be de-briefed on the trainer project which, following normal practice, has been granted and for a review of the ground rules governing such competitions.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any contract for the supply of the Royal Air Force trainer has yet been signed with Shorts.

Mr. Butler: Yes. The contract was signed on 30 April 1985, following a letter of intent on 4 April 1985.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether, subsequent to the receipt of Short's bid for the Royal Air Force air basic trainer on 14 March, any member of his Department requested Shorts to make a revised offer;

(2) why, on 15 March, the controller of aircraft of his Department's procurement executive requested a revised bid from British Aerospace for the new basic trainer for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 262]: On 15 March controller aircraft rang Sir Raymond Lygo, managing director of British Aerospace, to confirm that Sir Raymond understood that the bid received by the relevant MOD contracts branch before noon the previous day was indeed its final offer. Sir Raymond indicated that he was not aware that this was so and shortly thereafter submitted a revised bid. At the same time controller aircraft rang Sir Philip Foreman, chairman of Short Brothers, who confirmed that its bid submitted before 14 March deadline was its final one.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will state the ranks and posts held of the members of the procurement executive who telephoned British Aerospace on 13 March to inform it of the deadline date for tender for the new basic trainer for the Royal Air Force; to whom he spoke; and if the call was logged by his Department.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 262]: The telephone call was made by the principal director of contracts, air, to the group commercial director of British Aerospace. Telephone calls in the Ministry of Defence are not normally logged.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in the past the procurement executive has telephoned tenders for his Department's contracts or contracts worth more than £100 million giving the deadline date for tendering; whether this is the normal procedure within his Department; and on how many occasions such a telephone call has been confirmed by letter, telex or other written communication.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 261-2]: The original deadline for the receipt of "best and final" bids had been set by telex at 31 January. The telephone call made to British Aerospace on 13 March dealt only with the end-point for post-tender improvements to those bids and followed on previous discussions with the two firms who had submitted the most attractive bids. Written communications are the normal and preferred practice within the Ministry of Defence; the telephone is used only when this is more suitable for giving or receiving information in the time available, and such information is confirmed in writing where necessary.

PRIME MINISTER

Committees of Privy Councillors and Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Prime Minister (1) how many committees of Privy Councillors she and her predecessors have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the Privy Councillors investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported;

(2) how many committees of inquiry she and her predecessors have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

The Prime Minister: The information available is contained in the following two tables. As we do not hold central records, we cannot be absolutely sure that it is complete.

International Fund for Agricultural Development

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if she will give a commitment at the Bonn economic summit to contribute at least 50 million dollars to the new replenishment of the International fund for agricultural development.

The Prime Minister: The replenishment of the International fund for agricultural development (IFAD) was not discussed specifically in Bonn. IFAD is financed on the basis of equitable burden-sharing among its member countries. The Government contributed 5 per cent. of the share provided by OECD countries to the last replenishment, and we would expect to contribute a similar share of the next one if and when it is approved by the donors collectively.

Agriculture Aid

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to give a commitment at the Bonn economic summit to increase the amount of aid allocated to agriculture, especially to subsistence farmers in the Third world.

The Prime Minister: I draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to paragraph 9 of the communiqué reporting the outcome of the Bonn economic summit, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Africa (Aid)

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if, at the Bonn economic summit, she will reiterate Her Majesty's Government's commitment to maintain or increase resources for the aid programme for both emergency and long-term needs in Africa.

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to my statement on the Bonn economic summit, at columns 625-26, and in particular to paragraphs 7 and 9 of the communiqué issued afterwards, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Sharelga (Sinking)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Prime Minister how much compensation was paid by Her Majesty's Government to the Irish Government in respect of the sinking of the Irish trawler Sharelga; and for what reason such compensation was paid.

The Prime Minister: An Irish trawler named "Sharelga" was sunk in the Irish Sea in 1982 after its nets were snagged by a British submarine. The Ministry of Defence accepted liability for the incident and agreed to pay fair and reasonable compensation. The amount of compensation is a matter for negotiation between the vessel's owner and the Ministry of Defence. No payments have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Irish Government in respect of this incident.

RAF Trainer Aircraft

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will list the Departments which were involved, directly or indirectly, in the decision to purchase the Tucano fighter trainer; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The principle of collective responsibility applies to this as to all ministerial decisions.

Leeward Islands Air Transport (Aircraft Purchase)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if she is now in a position to publish the European Commission's reasons for rejecting the Leeward Islands Air Transport view that the Super 748 offer from British Aerospace best fulfilled the procurement criteria of the Lomé convention; if she has had further communication with the European Commission on this matter; whether she has had any recent representations from Leeward Islands Air Transport; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development published the European Commission's explanation in an answer given to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 26 February, at column 102. The European Commission is not involved with present arrangements to finance the purchase by the Leeward Islands Air Transport of four HS-Super 748 aircraft from British Aerospace; we have had no recent communication with it on this matter, and no representations from Leeward Islands Air Transport. Satisfactory arrangements have now been made for the package of two HS-Super 748 aircraft with finance provided by the Caribbean Development Bank, and LIAT has accepted Her Majesty's Government's offer of assistance from the aid and trade provision for a further two aircraft.

Rates

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Prime Minister what comparisons have been made between the relative rateable value of comparable properties, small businesses and industries in Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland, respectively; and if she will publish this information in the form of a table.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, Tuesday 7 May 1985, c. 310]: I regret that comparable information for Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland is not available centrally.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Prime Minister what was the level of the rate support grant, including the per capita value for each year, from central Government to Scotland, England and Wales, for each of the last 10 years; what percentage this represented of total local government expenditure for each year; and if she will publish a table.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, Tuesday 7 May 1985, c. 310]: The information is shown in the table.

Notes

* Needs/Resources/Domestic elements for the years 1975-76 to 1980-81 and Rate Support Grant for subsequent years.

† Grant as a percentage of 'relevant' Local Government Expenditure.

‡ The information is not available for England and Wales separately.

‖ The information on rate Support Grants and Local government expenditure is taken from the RSG (Scotland) Orders and therefore reflects the Government's provision for expenditure in each year. The price bases adopted are those pertaining at the time of the RSG Settlement each year.

¶ The financial year 1975-76 covers a period of 10½ months.

The percentage for England and Wales combined are as follows:

	England & Wales Grant as percentage of local Government expenditure
1975-76	57·9
1976-77	55·0
1977-78	52·3
1978-79	51·9
1979-80	48·6
1980-81	48·8

For the years 1975-76 to 1977-78 Revenue expenditure has been used to derive the percentages. For the years 1978-79 to 1980-81 Relevant expenditure has been used at November price levels.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many police complaints have been recorded in the course of the miners' industrial dispute.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 719]: During the relevant period 14 of the complaints against the police received by regional procurators fiscal related to the miners' industrial dispute. Other complaints of a non-criminal nature may have been received by the individual police forces concerned.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Attorney-General how many departmental committees of inquiry the Lord Chancellor and his predecessors have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them, and the dates they reported.

The Attorney-General: The following list, which may not be exhaustive, includes Royal Commissions dealing with areas in the Lord Chancellor's responsibility and other major inquiries most of whose reports were (or are expected to be) published by HMSO, and presented to Parliament; it excludes official committees and standing advisory committees.

TRANSPORT

Mersey Ferries

40. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to ensure the preservation of the Mersey ferries during the three years following the proposed abolition of the Merseyside county council; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The operation of the ferries after the abolition of the county council will remain the responsibility of the passenger transport executive, working within the policies determined by the new passenger transport authority.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including Ministers of Transport and Ministers of War Transport, have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Ridley: The following committees of inquiry have been set up since 1979.

Subject of investigation	Chairman	Date established	Date of report
Lorries, People and the Environment	Sir Arthur Armitage	24 July 1979	9 December 1980
Review of Railway Finances	Sir David Serpell	5 May 1982	20 December 1982
Pedestrian Safety at Public Road Level Crossings	Rt. Hon. Sally Oppenheim, MP	22 November 1982	20 April 1983
Review of Public Utilities Street Works Act (PUSWA)	Professor Michael Horne, OBE	30 January 1984	Expected late Spring 1985
Review of Arrangements for Protecting the Clients of Air Travel Organisers	Sir Peter Lane	12 April 1984	7 June 1984
Review of Road Traffic Law	Dr. Peter North	31 January 1985

Information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The list excludes standing advisory committees, departmental inquiries into accidents and public inquiries into road schemes. If my hon. Friend would like further information, I should be happy to write to him.

M1 (Service Stations)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many types of franchise exist in relation to service stations on the M1 motorway between London and Leeds; and if he will indicate the names and geographical locations of the company or companies involved and their responsibilities to retain continuation of their franchise.

Mr. Ridley: I have written to the right hon. Member enclosing a list of the nine motorway service areas on the M1 between London and Leeds, with the names and addresses of the operators. Each operates under a 50-year lease from the Secretary of State. The terms of the lease are fairly standard and I am arranging for a copy to be sent to the right hon. Member.

Cruise Ships (Anglo-Soviet Agreement)

Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether agreement has yet been reached between British and Soviet passenger cruise ship operators following the latest commercial talks encouraged by Her Majesty's Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Anglo-Soviet Joint Maritime Commission agreed at its last meeting that the British and Soviet cruise ship operators should meet to discuss the 1986 cruise programmes to be offered in the British market. These commercial talks took place in early April and it was agreed that there should be further reductions in Soviet capacity offered in the British market. It was also agreed that a further meeting will take place in 1986.

M2 (Traffic Study)

Mr. Aitken asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will extend his Department's traffic study on the future of the M2 motorway to include consideration of the car and freight traffic projections to the port of Ramsgate and their implications for the A299 Thanet Way.

Mrs. Chalker: Our present study of the possible need for more capacity on the section of the M2 between junctions 1 and 3 will take account of future traffic expected to use the motorway to and from Ramsgate. The A299 Thanet Way is the responsibility of the Kent county council, but I have undertaken to keep under review the possible need in the future to bring this road into the trunk road network.

Rail Closures (Strathclyde)

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the rail services closed within the Strathclyde regional council area since 1975, along with any future proposals to close rail services in that area.

Mr. David Mitchell: The only line to have been closed to rail passenger services in the Strathclyde region since 1975 is between Glasgow and Kilmacolm.

British Rail is considering whether to propose closure of a 500-yard stretch of line between Balloch Pier and Balloch Central. Financial support for this service was withdrawn by the Strathclyde passenger transport executive last December.

London Dockers (Pay)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is the minimum weekly gross pay receivable by registered dockworkers in the Port of London Authority;

(2) what is the minimum weekly gross pay receivable by registered dock workers in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company.

Mr. David Mitchell: At the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company £125·50; at the Port of London Authority £120·85.

Port Employees (Output)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the output per person employed by (a) the Port of London Authority and (b) the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company in each of the last five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: Both the PLA and MDHC have reported significant productivity improvements in many of their operations. My Department does not, however, have detailed information, which is in any case commercially confidential.

Ports (Lost Working Days)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many working days have been lost in each of the last five years due to industrial and other disputes in (a) the Port of London Authority and (b) the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company.

Mr. David Mitchell: The detailed information requested is not retained by the two undertakings, but the number of working days lost in stoppages of work in the ports of London and Liverpool as a whole are set out in "Port Statistics" published annually by my Department and the British Ports Association, copies of which are in the Library.

Non-scheme Ports (Employees)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have been employed in each of the last five years in non-scheme ports.

Mr. David Mitchell: According to a survey undertaken by the British Ports Association and the National Association of Port Employers, on 18 March 1983 9,514 people were employed in non-scheme ports. Figures for the other years are not available.

Ports (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) to what extent the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company currently is in receipt of assistance by way of grant loan and guarantee provided under the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981;

(2) to what extent the Port of London Authority currently is in receipt of assistance by way of grant, loan and guarantee provided under the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981.

Mr. David Mitchell: Loans and guarantees under this Act still outstanding are:

	Loans £ million	Guarantees £ million
MDHC	3·9	9·0
PLA	3·0	21·0

In addition, we are prepared to continue to make grants to both undertakings for the severance of surplus manpower. In the case of registered dock workers, these benefit all scheme port employers by relieving them of a cost which they would otherwise have to meet collectively through the national voluntary severance schemes. Grants for the severance of other employees are to be phased out.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much financial assistance has been given to (a) the Port of London Authority and (b) the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company under the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981 in each of the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984; and what is the level of assistance projected for 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is as follows:

Financial Year	PLA £ million	MDHC £ million
1981-82	21·8	25·8
1982-83	39·8	70·7
1983-84	32·4	39·4
1984-85	23·2	8·5

The assistance to be given in the financial year 1985-86 will depend principally on the number of staff severed by both undertakings.

Ports (Manpower Statistics)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many registered dockworkers were employed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company on 1 January in each of the years 1979 to 1985, inclusive;

(2) how many people were in the employment of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company on 1 January in each of the years 1979 to 1985, inclusive;

(3) how many people were in the employment of the Port of London Authority on 1 January in each of the years 1979 to 1985, inclusive;

(4) how many registered dockworkers were employed by the Port of London Authority on 1 January in each of the years 1979 to 1985, inclusive.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is as follows:

	MDHC		PLA
Year	RDWS	Total	RDWS	Total
1979	3,774	7,849	4,933	9,271
1980	3,260	6,806	4,578	8,597
1981	2,989	6,303	3,700	6,504
1982	2,215	5,125	2,851	5,269
1983	1,406	3,288	2,315	4,405
1984	1,497	3,114	1,948	3,601
1985	1,349	2,838	1,691	3,245

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport, how many people have left the employment of (a) the Port of London Authority and (b) the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company in each of the last four years; and, of these, how many were registered dockworkers.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is as follows:

PLA Year	RDWS	Non-RDWS	Total
1981	1,063	435	1,498
1982	801	386	1,187
1983	528	474	1,002
1984	348	124	472
MDHC
1981	709	478	1,198
1982	823	1,014	1,837
1983	95	287	382
1984	147	129	276

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many new recruits were employed by (a) the Port of London Authority and (b) the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company in each of the last four years; and, of these, how many were employed as registered dockworkers.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is as follows:

PLA	RDWs Recruits	RDWs Re-allocation*	Non-RDWs Recruits†
1981	Nil	214	49
1982	Nil	265	58
1983	Nil	127	20
1984	Nil	106	25

* The RDWs reallocated to the PLA are those surplus to other employers in the ports of London.

† Of the 152 recruits, 43 were apprentices or specialist staff. The remaining 109 were temporary cleaners where there was a higher turnover of staff.

MDHC	RDWs Recruits	RDWs Re-Allocations*	Non-RDWs Recruits†
1981	Nil	9	Nil
1982	Nil	Nil	3
1983	Nil	208	4
1984	Nil	Nil	Nil

Notes

* RDWs reallocated to MDHC were surplus to other employers in the port of Liverpool, the employers being in 1981, Huskisson Transit Company, and in 1983, West Coast Stevedoring Company.

† The only non-rdws recruited by MDHC were for specialist senior staff posts.

The figures exclude recruitment of temporary employees by Neptune Security Ltd., a subsidiary of MDHC, hiring security wardens on short-term contracts.

Ports (Financial Results)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what trading profit or loss the Port of London Authority has made in each of the last six years;

(2) what trading profit or loss the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company has made in each of the last six years.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is as follows:

	Trading Profit/(loss) PLA £ million	MDHC £ million
1979	1·28	(1·83)
1980	(1·65)	5·02
1981	3·66	1·25
1982	6·87	(2·34)
1983	3·3*	6·79
1984	Not yet published	1·92

* In 1983, in accordance with statutory requirements, the PLA changed its accounting policy to conform closely with the provisions of the Companies Act 1981. This figure is the profit before interest payable.

Driving (Offences)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to seek to amend section 5 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 so as to make it an offence to drive while under the influence of solvents or gases.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Driving Tests

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the pass rate for each driving test centre in 1984; and how this compares with figures for each of the past five years;

(2) what was the average waiting time in 1984 in each driving test centre prior to taking a car driving test; and how the figures compare with each of the past five years.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall write to my hon. Friend. Much of this information is not available and the available statistics will take a few days to assemble.

Mhari L (Loss Inquiry)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current stage of the inquiry into the loss of the Mhari L; when he expects to receive the report; whether the wreck is to be raised as part of the investigation; and if he will make appropriate arrangements for the burial of any bodies recovered.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department's inspector has not yet completed his inquiry. It is not intended to raise the wreck as part of the investigation, but fortunately my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence made available a vessel for a limited period to examine this wreck. No bodies were found.

Singapore Airlines (Manchester)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Transport what view British Airways has expressed during his Department's negotiations with the Singapore Government over flying rights to Manchester; and what reaction his Department has given to such views.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I do not wish to establish the precedent of revealing the views particular airlines may express about inter-governmental air service negotiations.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Transport why negotiations on an application by Singapore Airlines to open up flights to Manchester lasted for three days.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Since the Singapore Government first applied to negotiate a new agreement with us on 18 March 1985, I consider it extremely speedy that a conclusion was reached on 3 May.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Transport why Manchester airport authority was not invited to participate in the consultations between the aeronautical authorities of Singapore and the United Kingdom over Singapore Airlines' application to open a service to Manchester.

Mr. Michael Spicer: These are discussions between Governments; airports are not represented at the discussions but are consulted.

M40 (Otmoor Section)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he now anticipates being able to announce his Department's preferred route for the Otmoor section of the M40 extension.

Mrs. Chalker: I am continuing the investigations announced last December into the possibility of finding an eastern route which would avoid Otmoor and the Bernwood Forest. I will make a further announcement as soon as possible.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the sex and ethnic origin of the officer designated by his Department as equal opportunities officer.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985, c. 27]: My equal opportunities officer is a citizen of the United Kingdom. I do not see the relevance of the question as to sex.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the equality of opportunities in his Department in so far as they concern sex and race discrimination; and what advice has lately been given to staff in his Department in respect thereof by the officer designated as equal opportunities officer with responsiblity for giving such advice.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1985, c. 27]: Yes. All staff have been advised of the Department's general policy on race and sex equality of opportunity through office circulars published in November 1984 and March 1985.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what action the Bank of England took prior to the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers in pursuance of its duty to supervise the banking system;

(2) whether the review of the arrangements for banking supervision will comment on the justification of the Bank of England's takeover of Johnson Matthey Bankers; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether the review of banking supervision will deal with the monitoring by the Bank of England's banking supervision department of Johnson Matthey prior to its collapse and the steps it took prior to the collapse to identify and seek to correct Johnson Matthey Bankers' difficulties.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to the replies, 2 May 1985, c. 245-46 and 7 May 1985, c. 657]: As the hon. Member is aware, the answers which appear in the official record were not authorised by Ministers and the House has received an apology for and explanation of the episode.

The Governor of the Bank of England will include in the bank's annual report to the Chancellor under the Banking Act 1979 an account of events concerning Johnson Matthey Bankers and the subsequent rescue operation. This report will be published and a copy laid before the House in the usual way.

I have nothing further to add to the replies given in my name on 2 and 3 May.

Covenants

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, with a view to reducing the amount of paperwork involved and the work load of Inland Revenue staff, he will take steps to simplify the processes involved in the covenant procedure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1985, c. 95]: The repayment procedures must include checks that the claimant is in fact entitled to repayment and that tax has been deducted by the payer. In the case of covenants made by parents in favour of their adult student children, however, the Inland Revenue is intending to introduce, from the start of the academic year 1985-86, simplified procedures which meet these basic requirements. These will include forms to make it easier for parents to make out valid deeds, and a new repayment claim form introduced which is tailored to the needs of students. In addition, the Inland Revenue is preparing a package for students which will include leaflets explaining the effect of a deed of covenant on their tax, together with copies of all the necessary forms.

Direct Selling (VAT)

Mr. Lester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he proposes to take in the light of the judgment of the European Court that United Kingdom powers to require value added tax on the open market value of goods in the direct selling field is of no legal effect.

Mr. Hayhoe: A formal submission has now been made to the European Commission seeking to restore the vires for the VAT valuation provisions of paragraph 3 of schedule 4 to the Value Added Tax Act 1983, by derogation under article 27 of the sixth VAT directive. Customs and Excise are in communication with those traders who may consider that they have overpaid tax under the provisions affected by the European Court judgment.

Nationalised Industries

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the rates of return in each nationalised industry for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Peter Rees: It is not possible to provide information for each nationalised industry on a comparable basis and no rates of return are yet available for 1984. Available information for earlier years is as follows:

Rates of Return on Capital Employed—National Accounts Basis

Figures for 1982 have been revised, following publication of the 1983 edition of "National Income and Expenditure" and may, therefore, differ from those given in answer to my hon. Friend's question on 9 April 1984 at column 81.

underlying the rates of return for industries in the standard industrial classification division 1 (the energy and water supply industries), in particular asset lives assumptions, are at present under review by the CSO. 1983 rates of return, and revised rates for earlier years, are consequently not yet available for these industries.

The basis for the calculation of the figures, which relate to all the public corporations in particular standard industrial classifications, was set out in the Treasury evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in 1981 (published as appendix 12 of volume III of its report "Financing of the Nationalised Industries" HC 348-III). The rates of return given are based on national accounts statistics and, therefore, differ from figures based on nationalised industries published accounts.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many attempted suicides there were in each penal establishment in 1984 and so far in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not yet available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the measures taken at Pentonville prison to prevent suicides.

Mr. Mellor: A recent suicide at Pentonville revealed that there had been a failure in the procedure for checking on inmates at the beginning of the day; the governor has taken action to remedy this and I am not aware of any other specific points of this kind that need attention at Pentonville. I naturally regret the two suicides that have taken place in the prison so far this year, but, taking the figures for the last five years, it is clear that suicide is no more frequent at Pentonville than at other comparable establishments.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the age, sex, prison and accommodation occupied by each of those who committed suicide in penal establishments in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is as follows. Details of the location of the prisoners concerned are not recorded centrally.

	Age	Sex	Prison
1.	44	Male	Brixton
2.	31	Male	Brixton
3.	33	Male	Parkhurst
4.	37	Male	Parkhurst

Young Offenders

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of offenders (a) under 17 and (b) under 16 years who have committed indictable offences in each of the last 10 years have been (i) sentenced by courts, (ii) cautioned by the police or (iii) otherwise dealt with respectively.

Mr. Mellor: Information on offenders sentenced and cautioned for indictable offences is published annually in "Criminal Statistics England and Wales" (Chapters 5 and 7 of the issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9349, and in the supplementary volumes). The proportions requested for those aged under 17 are given in the following table. Corresponding information for offenders aged under 16 for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information is not collected centrally on offenders who were dealt with other than by a police caution or court proceedings. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Persons sentenced at all courts or cautioned by police for indictable offences

England and Wales Percentage of total

Age and Year	Sentenced	Cautioned
Aged 10 and under 17
1974	50·4	49·6
1975	50·7	49·3
1976	52·1	47·9
1977	48·7	51·3
1978	51·0	49·0
1979	49·8	50·2
1980	51·3	48·7
1981	49·6	50·4
1982	46·7	53·3
1983	43·7	56·3
Aged 10 and under 16
1983	44·2	55·8

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of offenders (a) under 17 and (b) under 16 years who have been dealt with by courts for indictable offences in each of the last 10 years have received custodial sentences and care orders, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested for offenders aged under 17 is published in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9349, tables 7A and 7.5-7.8) and also for the year ending 30 June 1984 in tables 2 and 3 of Home Office statistical bulletin 12/85.

For offenders aged under 16, about 7 per cent. of those sentenced for indictable offences in 1983 received a custodial sentence (detention centre, borstal or youth custody) and about 4 per cent. were given a care order; corresponding information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Complete information for 1984 is not yet available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether any information is available from research or surveys indicating the percentage of young offenders in custody who had been expelled from school or received home tuition;

(2) whether any information is available from research or surveys indicating the percentage of young offenders in custody who have no education qualifications;

(3) whether any information is available from research or surveys indicating the percentage of offenders aged 16 to 18 years in custody who were unemployed at the time of their offence or reception;

(4) whether any information is available from research or surveys indicating the percentage of young offenders who are from one-parent families.

Mr. Mellor: There is a body of general research on the factors associated with offending by young people, but we are not aware of any research or surveys which give the specific information requested by the hon. Member.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any information is available from research or surveys indicating the percentage of juvenile offenders in custody who have been in care.

Mr. Mellor: The reports "Offending by Young People" (DHSS, 1981) and "Tougher Regimes in Detention Centres" (HMSO, 1984) contain relevant information at paragraphs 79 ff and 2.21, respectively.

Public Disorder (East London)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis concerning incidents of public disorder which occurred at Forest Gate, east London, on Saturday 27 April; what was the cause and nature of the disturbance; how many persons were involved; how many persons were arrested; whether there were any injuries; what was the ethnic background of the persons involved; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that these incidents of public disorder occurred in connection with a march organised by the Newham police monitoring group, principally in support of seven people of Asian origin—the Newham seven—who are currently awaiting trial. Following some initial disorder, and the arrest of one demonstrator, the march halted outside Forest Gate police station. Missiles were thrown at police, and there was a sit-down protest. Eventually, after some further incidents of abuse and attacks on police officers, the remaining demonstrators were dispersed by police. A total of 1,500 people, of various ethnic backgrounds, were present at the beginning of the march. During the afternoon 11 police officers and two demonstrators were slightly injured. Thirty-three people were arrested, of whom 10 were white, 11 black and 12 of Asian origin.

Civil Defence

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which local authorities are not meeting the requirements of the 1983 civil defence regulations; and in which respects.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) on 20 December, in which I said many local authorities had much more to do. As a first step local authorities have been asked to complete the plans required by the 1983 regulations by the end of the year, and the civil defence adviser is currently engaged on a programme of visits to county councils in England and Wales to assess and discuss their progress.

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost per night of detaining prisoners in police cells.

Mr. Mellor: The average cost per prisoner/night of prisoners held in Metropolitan police cells during the financial year 1984-85 is estimated at £200. Figures for other forces are not readily available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he is satisfied with the conditions for prisoners detained in police cells;

(2) if he is satisfied that prisoners detained in police cells have adequate recourse to exercise;

(3) if he is satisfied with the conditions under which prisoners detained in police cells receive visits.

Mr. Mellor: I am conscious that it is not always possible to ensure that prisoners held in police custody receive all the entitlements that would apply if they were in prison custody and I am aware that there have been particular difficulties in relation to visits and exercise. Nevertheless, the police are doing their best to provide whatever facilities they can under very difficult circumstances.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces outside of the Metropolitan area have detained prisoners in police cells in 1985; why and where they were detained; and what were the prisoners' ages and sex.

Mr. Mellor: Between 1 January and 30 April prisoners were held in police cells by provincial forces as follows:

	Adult males	Under 21 males	Adult females	Under 21 females
Bedfordshire	—	—	1	—
Dorset	—	—	2	—
Essex	20	—	—	—
Hampshire	—	—	6	—
Hertfordshire	42	—	1	—
Kent	28	—	1	—
Leicestershire	—	—	4	—
Norfolk	—	—	2	—
Northamptonshire	—	—	3	2
Surrey	21	—	—	—
Sussex	30	—	2	—
Thames Valley	—	—	12	—
Total	141	0	34	2

Further information is not available centrally.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the longest period of time prisoners were detained in police cells in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Thirty-six nights.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average period of time that prisoners were detained in police cells in 1984;

(2) what is the average period of time that prisoners have been detained in police cells in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available; however, the majority of prisoners held in police cells were there for no more than one or two nights.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why it is necessary to detain prisoners in police cells.

Mr. Mellor: The reasons include lack of vacancies in the right place, transport and other logistical problems, and industrial relations difficulties.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were employed in guarding the 227 prisoners detained in police cells in the Metropolitan area from 16 to 19 February.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the locations in London in which prisoners have been detained in police cells in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The Metropolitan police support headquarters at Lambeth, the Highbury Corner, Camberwell Green, Horseferry road and South Western magistrates' courts and, occasionally, a number of police stations.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of prisoners by age, sex and location detained in police cells at the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: On 1-2 May 1985 there were 29 male adults and 11 male young offenders held in police cells, all in the Metropolitan police district.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the longest period of time that a prisoner has been detained in police cells in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: Sixteen nights.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost (a) in 1984 and (b) so far in 1985 of police officers guarding prisoners detained in police cells.

Mr. Mellor: Total expenditure on prisoners in police cells during the financial year 1984-85 was provisionally £2·99 million. A significant proportion of this is, however, attributable to prisoners held during the last months of the previous financial year.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what categories of prisoner have been detained in police cells in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: Mainly untried but also some sentenced adult males.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the conditions in which prisoners are detained in police cells.

Mr. Mellor: In addition to the hon. Member's own letter we currently have one from the chief metropolitan magistrate and one from a member of the public via an hon. Member.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects there to be a substantial reduction in the prison population.

Mr. Mellor: Seasonal fluctuations apart, I see no grounds for such an expectation at present.

Prisoners (Temporary Release)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the total expenditure on temporary release of prisoners in the most recent year for which figures are available;

(2) what was the total expenditure on home leave of prisoners in the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: Separate information about expenditure on home leave and temporary release is not available. According to the latest available information, total expenditure on grants and allowances to adult prisoners granted home leave or temporary release in 1984-85 amounted to £232,092.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were granted (a) terminal home leave and (b) short home leave in the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are yet available, terminal home leave was granted on 1,367 occasions and short home leave on 921.

Flyposting

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many successful prosecutions there have been in each of the last three years for unauthorised flyposting.

Mr. Mellor: Information collected centrally does not distinguish illegal bill posting from other offences against the Town and Country Planning Acts 1968-71.

Drug Offences (Leeds)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) prosecutions and (b) convictions there have been in Leeds in each of the last three years for drugs offences (i) involving cannabis and (ii) involving other drugs.

Mr. Mellor: The available information for the years 1981 to 1983 is given in the following table; corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Persons (1) proceeded against and sentenced at Leeds magistrates' court or at the Crown court after committal at Leeds magistrates' court for drugs offences by type of drug involved.

Number of persons

	1981	1982	1983
Persons proceeded against for offences involving:
cannabis only	132	156	165
cannabis and other drugs	7	15	33
other drugs	5	20	16
Total	144	191	214
Persons sentenced for offences involving:
cannabis only	124	150	155
cannabis and other drugs	5	14	32
other drugs	5	19	14
Total	134	183	201

(1) The figures are taken from central records and are approximate.

Community Service Orders

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of attendance by people serving community service orders.

Mr. Mellor: The responsibility for arranging work for offenders ordered to perform community service rests with probation committees. Subject to the statutory requirement that the hours of work specified in a community service order should be completed within 12 months, the arrangements for attendance of individual offenders are matters for probation committees. In 1983, the most recent year for which statistics are available, the average time taken by offenders to complete their specified hours of work was 6·9 months.

Departmental Facilities Agreement

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received concerning the departmental facilities agreement with the Civil Service trade unions in his Department.

Mr. Brittan: One.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the operation of the departmental facilities agreement with the Civil Service trade unions in his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: The official side and trade union side of the Home Office departmental Whitley council agreed last year to operate a new departmental facilities agreement for an experimental period of one year, beginning 1 September 1984. It is too early to say if this is working satisfactorily. The arrangements will be reviewed in the light of experience of the experimental period.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for the regular publication of statistics of recorded crime for the different parts of the Metropolitan police district.

Mr. Brittan: A number of right hon. and hon. Members have indicated to me that they would find it helpful to have regular statistics of recorded crime for the different parts of the Metropolitan police district. I am sympathetic towards this request, and I have therefore been considering, in consultation with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, how such statistics could best be provided. With his agreement, I am making the following arrangements.

I shall arrange for a table of notifiable offences recorded by the police in each borough and district in the Metropolitan police district to be placed in the Library each quarter. In addition, a table will be produced at the beginning of each year giving for each borough and district the numbers of offences recorded and the clear-up rate for the whole of the previous year. The first table, covering the first quarter of 1985, will be produced in June. As an interim measure, I am today arranging for tables to be placed in the Library showing the number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in each police district within the Metropolitan police district in the third and fourth quarters of 1984 and the clear-up rate for 1984 in each police district. Similar figures for previous quarters back to the beginning of 1983 were contained in a reply given on 12 December 1984, at columns 479-84, to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson).

I hope that the arrangements I have made will be helpful to right hon. and hon. Members. The statistics should also prove of interest to local police/community consultative groups since they will relate to the areas covered by the groups and will be available for discussion at group meetings.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Policy Statement

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to issue a policy statement, of the type referred to in paragraph 32 of "Better Schools", on education in schools in art, craft, design and technology.

Mr. Dunn: We propose to publish in due course, and after consultation, policy statements on a number of areas of the school curriculum. The timing and coverage of these statements will depend on the course of the consultations.

"Curriculum Matters"

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the "Curriculum Matters" series published by Her Majesty's inspectorate will include documents on art, craft, design and technology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Her Majesty's inspectorate intends that its "Curriculum Matters" series of discussion documents should cover all the main subjects and aspects of the curriculum for 5 to 16-year-olds, including art and craft, design and technology. The documents are at various stages of preparation and Her Majesty's inspectorate hope that most can be satisfactorily developed ready for publication during the coming year.

ENVIRONMENT

House of Commons (Cleaning)

15. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment who were the private contractors who shared the contract for cleaning the House of Commons with Exclusive prior to Exclusive being given the sole contract in 1982.

Sir George Young: Prior to 1982, the following firms in addition to Exclusive Cleaning and Maintenance (London) held contracts for cleaning parts of the Palace of Westminster and the Parliamentary Estate, although the contract for cleaning the House of Commons was not shared;

Strand Cleaning Services Ltd., Dulwich
Vigiliant Cleaning Services Ltd., London EC1
Daily Office Cleaning Contractors Ltd., Staines
C. & P. Bygraves Ltd., Streatham

Improvement Grant System

16. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to publish his review of the improvement grant system.

Mr. Gow: Tomorrow.

House Building

17. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to stimulate house building in the public and private sectors.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: According to the House Builders Federation, four out of five private housebuilders are expecting to maintain or increase starts in the next 12 months.

Housing Stock

18. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what new initiatives he intends to take in the next few months to improve the state of the housing stock.

Mr. Gow: The Government will publish tomorrow a Green Paper outlining new proposals to improve the condition of private housing in England and Wales. My Department has asked English local authorities for a report on the condition of their housing stock. The results are expected in July.

Gross housing provision in England in the current year is £3,051 million, of which a substantial part will be spent on improving public sector housing.

"Decaying Britain"

20. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Royal Institute of British Architects' publication "Decaying Britain", a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Gow: I have read the booklet with interest. I have no doubt that it will be discussed when my right hon. Friend and I meet the Group of Eight on 17 June to consider the NEDO report on the infrastructure.

Air Pollution

21. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further proposals he has to reduce levels of air pollution; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government intend to achieve further reductions in national sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions, aiming at a reduction of 30 per cent. from 1980 levels by the end of the 1990s, and it has played a prominent role in the Community negotiations which will lead to tighter vehicle emission controls.

Northern Regional Industrial Executive

22. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with members of the proposed northern regional industrial executive.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The group which I and other Ministers met on 17 April represented a range of interests in the public and private sectors. It described its proposals for a new body to co-ordinate promotion and industrial development in the north of England. Welcoming this positive effort to overcome the region's industrial difficulties, we said that if all the key elements in the region—including the local authorities—think that this initiative is the best way forward, then the Government would be ready to recognise it.

Development Policy

23. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards (a) the encouragement of development where it is economically and socially desirable and (b) green belt development in the wealthier parts of Great Britain.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer my hon. Friend to circulars 14/84, 15/84, 16/84 and 22/84 which set out the Government policies on the matters raised in his question.

Mobile Homes Act 1983

24. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to amend the Mobile Homes Act 1983.

Sir George Young: No. I do not believe that the 1983 Act requires amendment. I met representatives of mobile home residents, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt), on 22 April to discuss how the Act is operating. As a result, my Department will consult further with residents and other interested groups about how the Act can be made to work more effectively.

South London Boroughs

25. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the south London boroughs he has visited during the last 12 months.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have visited Lambeth, Hammersmith and Fulham, and Thamesmead which lies in Greenwich and Bexley. My colleagues have visited other south London boroughs.

Comité Euro-International du Béton

26. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Environment why the contribution of his Department to the Comité Euro-International du Béton has been reduced.

Sir George Young: The Government's contribution to the British National Committee (BNC) of the Comité Euro-International du Beton (CEB) via the Property Services Agency increased from £2,000 in 1980 to £3,600 in 1984. As the BNC has now opted for a less expensive membership classification in the CEB, a reduced contribution will be appropriate in 1985.

Asbestos

27. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional financial support he is giving to local authorities for the removal of asbestos from buildings.

Sir George Young: Funds are not made available specifically for the removal of asbestos, but rate support grant is paid in support of local authority revenue expenditure generally, including expenditure on asbestos. In the case of housing capital expenditure, it is open to any authority to raise the question of expenditure on asbestos in its housing investment programme bid, if it is in receipt of subsidy.

Borough Council Employees

28. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many borough council employees there are per thousand head of population in (a) Manchester and (b) Stockport.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The answer is 78·7 staff per 1,000 population in Manchester and 38·5 in Stockport.

Canal Improvement

29. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will allocate additional funds to the British Waterways Board to improve canals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. The board already receives adequate support to maintain its canals and to undertake a programme of improvements.

Public Footpaths

30. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in the last 12 months about the obstruction of public footpaths.

Mr. Waldegrave: Fourteen.

Building Land Reclamation

31. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the speed of building land reclamation in the inner cities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In general, yes. This year we will make available £76 million which we estimate will fund the reclamation of between 1,300 and 1,700 hectares. Since 1979 we have reclaimed 7,700 hectares. Much still needs to be done.

Precast Concrete Houses

32. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many precast concrete local authority houses there are in (i) Basildon, (ii) Essex and (iii) the United Kingdom; and how many have been sold under the legislation governing local authority house sales.

Sir George Young: Information is not available in the form sought. However, my Department understands that the number of prefabricated concrete dwellings built before 1960 by local authorities and other public sector bodies in the Basildon district council area is 80, the number in Essex approximately 4,500, and the number in the United Kingdom as a whole some 170,000, of which 16,500 are now in private ownership.

System-built Housing

33. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to provide additional resources to local authorities for the repair and renovation of system-built housing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: We will be considering what resources should be made available to local authorities for housing investment next year as part of the usual public expenditure planning process. We will take account of the information from the Department's inquiry into the repair and improvement needs of the local authority housing stock, individual authorities' housing investment programme submissions, and all other relevant information.

Government Purchasing

34. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he proposes following the conclusions of the recent report by the Management and Personnel Office on Government purchasing.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has welcomed this report. The purchasing organisations for which he has responsibility are submitting action documents describing how the conclusions are to be implemented to the Management and Personnel Office.

Water Authorities

35. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he has made in denationalising the water authorities.

Mr. Gow: I announced in answer to my hon. Friend on 3 April in column 668-69 that a discussion paper had been sent to water authority chairmen and to the chairman of the Water Companies Association. I hope that they will be able to reply by the end of this month. Meanwhile, I have set up an official working group which is examining the issues involved.

Air Pollution (Coal-Fired Power Stations)

36. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to monitor air pollution arising from harmful emissions from coal-fired power stations.

Mr. Waldegrave: Her Majesty's industrial air pollution inspectorate requires power station emissions of smoke and fine particulates and, where practicable, grit and dust to be monitored continuously. The CEGB also operates air quality monitoring stations around its power stations, within the framework of the United Kingdom smoke and sulphur dioxide monitoring network. In response to several recent reports, the Government are extending the network of sites monitoring atmospheric levels of sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxide and ozone and acid deposition.

City Action Team Policy

37. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he used in selecting certain inner city areas for designation and help by the city action team; and whether he will consider including the city of Leicester under this scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The five city action teams have been set up in the inner city partnership areas where they complement existing machinery for joint action. Ministers will keep the work of the teams under review, and consider, in the light of experience, whether other areas would benefit from similar arrangements. Meanwhile, the Government will continue to recognise the needs of the inner city areas of Leicester and other authorities through the urban programme and other programmes.

Rating

38. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to announce the outcome of the Government's consideration of rating reform.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. member to my reply earlier today to the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), my hon. Friends the Members for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) and for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) and the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright).

Traditional Urban Programme

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the projects submitted to his Department by the London borough of Southwark under circular 25 of the traditional urban programme have been visited by his officials.

Sir George Young: The London borough of Southwark submitted 15 projects under circular 25. An official from my Department visited five and met representatives of the other 10. Those visited were:

East Dulwich Community Project
Sojourner House
Peckham Black Women's Group
Community Development for Mentally Handicapped
St. Judes Community Centre.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will undertake to make available before the end of May to the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, for its comments, the draft circular for the traditional urban programme; and if he will further undertake not to publish the circular in its final form until he has received the comments of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Sir George Young: It is normal practice to consult the local authority associations in this way, but I cannot yet give a firm timetable for this year.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations advocating the disbanding of the traditional urban programme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I have received no such representations.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the traditional urban programme.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend will consider the future of the traditional urban programme in the light of the resources available for the urban programme as a whole, and his wish to concentrate them in the most needy areas.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the total financial allocation for the traditional urban programme for each of the years 1979-80 to 1985-86, inclusive.

Sir George Young: Total financial allocations for the traditional urban programme for each of the years 1979-80 to 1985-86 are as follows:

	Allocation £ million
1979-80	30
1980-81	33
1981-82	42
1982-83	47
1983-84	52
1984-85	44
1985-86	40

The allocation for 1983-84 includes resources for approvals under circular 23 to the eight authorities promoted to programme status in February 1983. From 1984-85 these areas are no longer a call on the traditional urban programme, as continuing projects approved under earlier circulars are included in their inner area programmes.

Smith Houses

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 5 July 1984, Official Report, column 258, if he will provide an updated list of the constituencies in which Smith houses have been reported to have defects.

Mr. Gow: My reply of 5 July 1984 to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre), column 258, listed those constituencies in which Smith houses were known to be located. The list is not exhaustive and the hon. lady has recently written to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment pointing out that there are Smith houses in the West Bromwich, West constituency.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information is available to his Department on the number of Smith system houses in the United Kingdom and the number of such houses in which defects have been reported.

Mr. Gow: The information available to the Department shows that some 4,500 Smith houses were built in England and Wales between 1945 and 1955. The Building Research Establishment report on the structural condition of Smith houses found that they are liable to exhibit thermal or moisture movement; but we have no evidence that this has led to any substantial reduction in value. Some Smith houses in Birmingham are defective because of the use of shale fill in their construction but this is not inherent in the Smith system of construction.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will designate Smith houses as a class under section 1 of the Housing Defects Act 1984; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: I refer the hon. Lady to the replies which I gave to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) on 31 July 1984, at column 253, and the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 11 March 1985, at column 9, on this subject.

House Building

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase the rate of house building in the public sector.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Government's plan for the housing programme set out in the public expenditure White Paper, show provision of over £3 billion this year and for the next two years. Most of this is allocated to local authorities and it is for them to decide how much to spend on new building.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the commercial activities of Ordnance Survey.

Mr. Waldegrave: The commercial activities of the Ordnance Survey will continue under the conditions clearly set out in the "Guidelines for OS Commercial Activities" published on 26 July 1984.

Urban Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report allocations approved for each local authority in England under the urban programme phase 25.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 17 April 1985, c. 179]: The allocations approved for each local authority in England under the traditional urban programme circular 25 are as follows. A full list of the projects approved under circular 25 will be deposited in the Library.

Rates

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the present average rateable value in each local authority in England of (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers; and if he will publish a table.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 303-4]: Latest available information relates to April 1984. I have today placed this in the Library.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the average rates payments for (a) domestic ratepayers, (b) commercial ratepayers and (c) industrial ratepayers for each local authority in England.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 303-4]: Latest available estimates of average rate payments relate to 1984-85. I have today placed these in the Library.

Quarry Hills Lane, Lichfield

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his decision will be announced in respect of the public inquiry held in January into the section 212 proposals for the possible closure of Quarry Hills lane, Lichfield.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been asked to reply. I expect to announce my decision shortly.

Birds (Public Health)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will specify the apparent danger to public health and the location, caused by feral pigeons, house sparrows, herring gulls and starlings for which licences to kill the birds were granted in 1984 and 1985.

Mrs. Fenner: I have been asked to reply.

Feral pigeons, house sparrows, starlings and herring gulls can carry bacterial diseases transmissible to humans.

Licences to kill these species were issued in the areas set out in my reply to the hon. Member of 25 April at column 544. In view of the large numbers of licences involved, it is not practicable to list every location.

Bullfinches

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the reasons for the granting of a licence to kill bullfinches in 1984 and 1985; if he will list the sites where they were killed; and if he will estimate the number of birds killed.

Mrs. Fenner: I have been asked to reply.

The general licence to kill or take bullfinches in 1984 and 1985, issued by my Department in consultation with the Nature Conservancy Council, permits fruit growers in certain specified areas to control bullfinches to prevent serious damage to the buds of fruit trees or fruit bushes.

The areas where fruit growers are permitted to take action are set out in the following table.

As agreed with the NCC, statistics on the numbers of bullfinches killed or taken are not required. It is not therefore possible to estimate the number of birds killed.

WILDLIFE AND COUNTRYSIDE ACT 1981

AREAS IN WHICH BULLFINCHES MAY BE KILLED OR TAKEN

In the county of Bedfordshire, the parish of Cockayne Hatley.
In the county of Berkshire, the parishes of Bucklebury, Hungerford and Cookham.
In the county of Buckinghamshire, the district of Chiltern, and the parishes of Cheddington, Drayton Parslow, Iver, Chepping Wycombe and Wooburn.
In the county of Cambridgeshire, the districts of East Cambridgeshire, Fenland, Huntingdon and South Cambridgeshire.
The county of Essex.
In the county of Gloucestershire, the districts of Cotswold, Forest of Dean and Tewkesbury, and the parish of Wotton-under-Edge.
In the county of Hampshire, the districts of Fareham, Havant and Winchester (City), and the parishes of Bramshott and Liphook, Selbourne, West End, South Warnborough, Hordle, Lymington and Pennington, Braishfield and Leckford.
In the county of Hertfordshire, the parishes of Cottered, Hertingfordbury, Bygrave, Colney Heath and Harpenden Rural.
The county of Hereford and Worcester.
The county of Kent.
In the county of Lincolnshire, the district of South Holland, and the parishes of Wyberton, North Scarle and Dowsby.
In the county of Greater London (SE), the London Borough of Bromley.
The county of Norfolk.
In the county of Northamptonshire, the parish of Nether Heyford.
In the county of Oxfordshire, the districts of South Oxfordshire and Vale of White Horse.
In the county of Shropshire, the district of South Shropshire, and the parishes of Prees and Lillieshall.
The county of Suffolk.
In the county of Surrey, the districts of Elmbridge, Runnymede, Tandridge, Waverley and Woking, and the parish of Charlwood.
In the county of East Sussex, the districts of Rother and Wealden, and the parish of Newick.
In the county of West Sussex, the districts of Arun, Chichester, Horsham and Mid-Sussex.
In the county of Warwickshire, the district of Stratford-on-Avon, and the parishes of Brandon and Bretford, Monks Kirby and Sherbourne.
In the county of Wiltshire, the parishes of Wilcot, Box and Bowerchalke.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Package Holidays

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the report from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's investigation into the supply of package holidays by tour operators through travel agents.

Mr. Fletcher: The report is due by 31 July 1986.

Telecommunications Development

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Government have completed their initial consideration of the report of the Independent Commission for World-Wide Telecommunications Development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: Yes. The Government have, in consultation with other interested parties, completed their initial review of the commission's report and I have written to the secretary-general of the International Telecommunications Union with our comments. Points included in my letter are:

—we endorse the Commission's general approach and support many of its recommendations;
—we already provide substantial financial and technical development assistance for telecommunications under bilateral and multilateral aid programmes;
—individual developing countries will wish to consider the weight to be given to telecommunications development in the light of their particular priorities; we are ready to review with recipient countries the relative priority for telecommunications under our aid programmes;
—we support the concept, outlined in the report, for a Centre for Telecommunications Development but this proposal must be further developed before finance is sought from the private sector.

I have arranged for a copy of the commission's report and of my letter to the secretary-general to be placed in the Library of the House.

Ceramic Sanitaryware

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give full details of the representations made to him by the ceramic industry regarding the state aid given by the Belgian Government to Boch S.A.; and what action his Department is taking to protect the interests of British ceramic sanitaryware manufacturers.

Mr. Channon: The Council of British Ceramic Sanitaryware Manufacturers and others have made representations to my Department on a number of occasions about the damaging effects of imports of subsidised ceramic sanitaryware produced by Boch S.A.

We have repeatedly made clear to the Commission, whose responsibility it is to enforce the state aid provisions of the treaty, our concern about the deleterious effects of these subsidised imports on British manufacturers. Indeed I discussed this personally with Commissioner Sutherland in February and continue to press him for a satisfactory conclusion to this matter.

Regional Aid (Jobs)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many jobs have been created directly as a result of regional development grants and regional selective financial assistance in each region of the United Kingdom in the last 12 months; and if he will estimate the number of jobs resulting indirectly.

Mr. Trippier: There are no estimates available for the number of jobs created as a result of regional development grants alone over the last 12 months. Estimates are, however, available of the employment expected to be created or safeguarded by projects receiving offers of assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 (Regional Selective Assistance) in the regions and counties of Great Britain and projects receiving offers of selective assistance in Northern Ireland. These estimates are shown in the table below. We have no evidence about the number of jobs resulting indirectly, but our normal assumption is that for every 100 jobs created in manufacturing in a region, there will be another 40 jobs created in other industries within the region.

Employment Expected to be Created or Safeguarded by Projects in Receipt of Offers of Section 7 Assistance (Great Britain) or Selective Financial Assistance (Northern Ireland) During 1984-85 by Standard Region and County

	Number
North	12,889
North West	5,204
Yorkshire and Humberside	2,655
East Midlands	1,700
West Midlands	259
South West	2,195
Scotland	24,213
Wales	17,080
Northern Ireland	15,862

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the cost-per-job limit set on projects financed by regional development grants and regional selective financial assistance.

Mr. Trippier: Under the new regional development grant scheme the grant payable in respect of the carrying out of an approved project is the higher of 15 per cent. of RDG eligible capital expenditure, subject to a grant-per-job limit of £10,000 for each net new job created or £3,000 for each such job. The grant-per-job limit does not apply to the first £500,000 of RDG eligible expenditure on a project which is carried out by an undertaking which, together with any associated undertaking, employs 200 or fewer people. In the case of manufacturing projects, grant calculated on the basis of jobs created may not, because of a requirement of the European Community, exceed 40 per cent. of the total capital expenditure involved in the project.

Regional selective assistance is negotiated on the basis of the minimum grant necessary to enable a project to go ahead. Internal negotiating guidance is not revealed publicly.

Honduras

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the volume and value of trade with Honduras for each year since 1975.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 7 May 1985, c. 316]: Information relating to volume is not available for individual countries. The available information is as follows:

Value £ million

	United Kingdom imports	United Kingdom exports
1975	0·7	4·2
1976	0·5	4·6
1977	1·1	7·0
1978	2·2	8·4
1979	4·0	9·0
1980	8·7	11·8
1981	4·1	8·6
1982	4·7	4·7
1983	7·1	9·6
1984*	12·4	7·4

Notes:

(i) all data is on a SITC/R2 basis.

(ii) United Kingdom imports are valued cif, United Kingdom exports are valued fob.

(iii) *1984 figures are provisional.

Telecommunications Equipment

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied that British manufacturers of telecommunications equipment enjoy the same access to the Swedish market as Swedish manufacturers of telecommunications equipment have to the British market.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 3 May 1985, c. 276]: Access to other markets by British manufacturers of telecommunications equipment can be impeded by technical requirements and by procurement policies in the markets concerned. The position is unsatisfactory and, where this is so, I shall continue to bring to the attention of other administrations the advantages, both to users and to suppliers, of greater liberalisation.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of telecommunications equipment which is assembled in the United Kingdom is manufactured locally, by ex-factory percentage of value; and what proportion of this value is accounted for by labour and what by component.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 3 May 1985, c. 276]: This information is not available from official statistics.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy (R and D)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the recent review of the renewable energy research and development programme and the Advisory Council on Research and Development recommendations on that review before making a decision on the future of the programme.

Mr. David Hunt: My colleagues and I are now considering how renewable energy research and development can best be carried forward during the next few years. We have the benefit of analyses by our Energy Technology Support Unit and the Department's Renewable Energy Advisory Committee as well as recent advice from my chief scientific adviser and the Advisory Council on R and D (ACORD). I expect to make an announcement to the House during the next few weeks and to make available supporting documents including details of ACORD's role in the current review of renewables.

British Petroleum

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many copies of the most recent annual report of British Petroleum have been received by his Department; how many were received of the previous such report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Department does not keep relevant records.

North Sea Gas

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the quantity of gas flared off in the North sea in 1984, 1983, 1982 and 1981.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The quantity of gas flared in the North sea during the last four years is as follows:

(million cubic metres/day)

Year	Gas flared
1981	11·54
1982	11·09
1983	9·67
1984	8·65

Over the same period, production of oil has increased by over 40 per cent. from 89·4 million tonnes to 125·9 million tonnes.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give renewed consideration to a gas-gathering project for the North sea to collect some of the gas currently flared.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Substantial progress is already being made within the offshore industry in reducing levels of gas flaring, through reinjection, piping gas to shore in solution with oil, improvements in the design and efficiency of plant and through construction of gas gathering schemes. All these contribute significantly to the Government's objective of securing maximum economic recovery of reserves. We shall continue to pursue vigorously that objective.

Nuclear Installations Inspectors

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the implications of dispersal of Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectors, for the dates for commissioning the Heysham 2 and Torness power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by the Health and Safety Commission that dispersal of HM NII will not have any implications for the anticipated commissioning dates of the Heysham 2 and Torness power stations.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those Magnox nuclear power stations which will reach 20 years' operation within the next two years.

Mr. Goodlad: The information is as follows:

Hinkley Point 'A'—(1985)
Trawsfynydd—(1985)
Dungeness 'A'—(1985)
Sizewell 'A'—(1986)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list those Magnox nuclear power stations which have been operating for over 20 years; whether Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate has re-endorsed the safety cases for those stations listed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received from Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate concerning safety reviews of the older Magnox nuclear power stations operated by the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board in order for their operation to continue beyond their original nominal design life of 20 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I have received no representations from Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate concerning safety reviews of the older Magnox nuclear power stations operated by the CEGB and SSEB.

The following Magnox nuclear power stations have been operating for over 20 years:

Calder Hall
Chapel Cross
Bradwell
Berkeley
Hunterston 'A'

The safety of nuclear power reactors in the United Kingdom is the subject of continuous assessment. Each nuclear power reactor is required by a condition of its nuclear site licence to be shut down every two years for examination, inspection, maintenance and testing. The reactor cannot be started up after its shut-down until Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is satisfied that it is safe to operate and consent has been given by the Health and Safety Executive.

In addition, the NII and the licensees of these nuclear power stations agreed some years ago that a review would be undertaken by the licensee of each station's safety features and performance after some 20 years of operation. Such a review is either completed or under way for each station.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will instruct Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to carry out a fully-detailed assessment of the safety cases for Heysham 2 and Torness nuclear power stations to the standard of assessment of the Sizewell B pressurised water reactor before these stations are allowed to operate.

Mr. Goodlad: Heysham 2 and Torness are the latest of a line of advanced gas cooled reactors of a design familiar to the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and for which there have been many years of operational experience in the United Kingdom. They were licensed in 1980 by the Health and Safety Executive after a comprehensive assessment of the pre-construction safety reports by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

The assessment of the safety case for Heysham 2 and Torness is being made to similar standards as those for Sizewell 'B'.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia and Sudan (Food Aid)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much food aid has been promised by the European Communities and the United Kingdom to Ethiopia and Sudan for 1985; and how much has been delivered so far in the current year.

Mr. Raison: The figures are as follows:

Tonnes of wheat or wheat equivalent

	Ethiopia	Sudan
1. European Community
Commitments	200,000	94,000
Deliveries*	70,000	29,400
2. United Kingdom
Commitments	15,000	45,000
Deliveries	15,000	†10,000

Notes:
* Includes deliveries from commitments made in 1984 and 1985.
† The remaining 35,000 tonnes will reach Sudan during May.

International Fund For Agricultural Development

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government intend to make an additional contribution to the international fund for agricultural development.

Mr. Raison: The Government intend to make a contribution to the second replenishment of the International Fund for Agricultural Development, if and when the replenishment is approved by the donors. The question of additional contributions, outside the replenishment, cannot arise until after the replenishment itself has been set in place.

WALES

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors have established since 1964; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is set out below. It does not include either departmental working parties chaired by permanent officials or inquiries undertaken by one individual.

Committee	Chairman	Date appointed	Date of report
Committee on the Status of The Welsh Language	Sir David Hughes Parry, QC	*30 July 1963	October 1965
Committee of Inquiry into Allegations of ill treatment of patients and other irregularities at the Ely Hospital, Cardiff	Mr. Geoffrey Howe, QC	27 August 1967	27 March 1969
Committee of Inquiry into water charges in the area of the Welsh National Water Development Authority	Sir Goronwy Daniel	4 September 1974	5 March 1975
Council for the Welsh language	Mr. Ben G. Jones	October 1976	1978

* Established by the Minister of Housing and Local Government and Minister for Welsh Affairs, but reported to the Secretary of State for Wales.

Rhymney Valley (Deprivation)

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer on 22 April, Official Report, column 605, about deprivation in the Rhymney Valley, how many reports were sent to the Rhymney Valley council; to whom and under what terms; when he received the report; what action he took upon the report; and whether he will now send a copy to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: One copy of the area improvement renewal policy report was sent to the director of environmental services of Rhymney Valley district council. As the report had not been commissioned for publication, the copy was sent to him on a personal basis; but the Department accepted that he would take account of its contents in advising his council. The report was received in April 1984 and it has been taken into account in formulating the Welsh Office input to the inter-departmental review of private sector improvement policy, resulting in a Green Paper which will be issued this month. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply my right hon. Friend gave him on 29 April 1985, in columns 16-17.

Job Creation

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the cost per job created as a result of the European Coal and Steel Community funds to projects in Wales over the past 12 months for which figures are available; and how this compares with equivalent figures for all European Economic Community funds and the Government's own regional industrial policy, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As many projects benefit simultaneously from aid from more than one of these sources, it would be misleading to relate the value of European Coal and Steel funds provided in any year to an expected number of jobs in the form of a cost per job ratio. For the same reason, it is not possible to draw a valid comparison in cost per job terms between ECSC aid, European Community aid as a whole and assistance provided under the Government's regional industrial policy.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Drugs

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with other Foreign Ministers regarding concerted action to prevent raw drugs entering Europe from other parts of the world; and if any initiatives are planned in conjunction with Third world Governments.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend had discussions with other Heads of Government and Foreign Ministers at the economic summit on 3 May about the misuse of drugs. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House yesterday, it was clear that almost every country was deeply concerned about the effects of drugs and anxious to ensure that we could do more to combat drug trafficking. It was agreed to set up an expert committee to see what further could be done. These discussions were part of our continuing co-operative efforts, both bilateral and multilateral, in this field. These efforts are described more fully in the recent published summary of our strategy "Tackling Drug Abuse".

Non-proliferation Treaty Conference

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the non-governmental organisations accredited with observer status at the non-proliferation treaty conference to be held in Geneva through September.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 31 January, in column 274. Non-governmental organisations may attend meetings of the plenary and of the main committees as observers. Those wishing to do so should inform the provisional secretary general of the review conference, who may be found at the United Nations Department for Disarmament Affairs in New York.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the conclusion of the preparatory committee meeting on 3 May of the non-proliferation treaty review conference.

Mr. Luce: The conclusion of the recent meeting of the preparatory committee for the non-proliferation treaty review conference was that the conference should now start on 27 August 1985 and that there should be three, instead of two, main committees for the performance of its functions.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the announcement by the Soviet ambassador to the United States of America, that his Government are prepared to implement a moratorium on Soviet nuclear tests on 6 August; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The Soviet proposal calls for a moratorium on nuclear weapons testing by all states. Declaratory statements of this nature do nothing to resolve the outstanding problems of verification which continue to surround any agreement on nuclear testing constraints. These problems we believe to be as great in the case of a moratorium as in a comprehensive test ban. The Soviet announcement also appears to overlook the problem of peaceful nuclear explosions which must be covered by a comprehensive test ban. We continue to seek progress towards the latter at the Geneva conference on disarmament.

Pakistan

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have had any recent discussions with Pakistan concerning that country rejoining the Commonwealth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Pakistan Government have referred to this issue on a number of occasions. It is of course a matter for the Commonwealth as a whole to decide.

Embassies and High Commissions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give a breakdown year by year since 1979 of manpower levels in British embassies or high commissions in eastern Europe, western Europe, north America, south America and central America.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is not readily available but is being compiled. I will write to the hon. Member.

Consulate-General (Stuttgart)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why he decided to close the British consulate-general in Stuttgart.

Mr. Renton: Only modest use was being made by British exporters of the general export promotion services provided by the consulate-general and it was decided in 1983 that, following the pattern established in France and Switzerland, documentary consular work in the Federal Republic of Germany should be centralised in Dusseldorf. A marketing office has, however, been established in Stuttgart to assist in identifying opportunities for British exporters in the high technology field. An honorary consul-general has also been appointed.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Less Favoured Areas Boundaries

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of appeals against the proposed less favoured areas boundaries received by 1 April.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 346]: A total of 320 representations have been received by the Northern Ireland less favoured areas independent panel against exclusion from the 28 February 1984 redefinition of the less favoured areas.

Castlereagh (Grant Aid)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has approved the submission to the European Economic Community of an application by Castlereagh borough council for a loan towards the cost of the Robinson leisure centre.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 347]: No such application has been received.

Medical Cards

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for new medical cards were received by the Northern Ireland Central Services Agency for Health and Social Services in the current year during January, February, March, April and including those received at the Belfast office on Friday 3 May.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 348]: The Central Services Agency does not normally maintain records of the number of applications for new medical cards. However, approximately 25,000 such applications were received between 29 April and 6 May 1985.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new medical cards have been issued during 1985 altogether to date to Northern Ireland applicants.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 348]: Information on the number of medical cards issued is not normally maintained. The number of cards issued up to 7 May by the Northern Ireland Central Services Agency for the Health and Social Services, since detailed figures began to be kept on 29 April, was 23,500.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Lord Privy Seal how many departmental committees of inquiry the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and his predecessors have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Biffen: No such committees have been set up in the Duchy office.

Mr. Eggar asked the Lord Privy Seal how many departmental committees of inquiry the Lord President of the Council and his predecessors have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Biffen: One departmental committee of inquiry was set up by Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone during his time as Lord President of the Council. It was commissioned on 20 December 1961 to consider and advise on the extent of the participation of Her Majesty's Government in research and radio astronomy under the chairmanship of Lord Fleck and reported in April 1965.

Written Answers

Mr. Pawsey asked the Lord Privy Seal why, pursuant to the answer by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth on 26 April, Official Report, columns 571-2, about the percentage of gross domestic product disbursed by the public sector since 1970, the information was not published in the Official Report in the form of a graph.

Mr. Biffen: The Hansard Press does not have the facilities to reproduce graphs. There are a number of technical difficulties which it would be costly to surmount.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment the Manpower Services Commission has made of the extra cost of having a trainee allowance of £55 per week on the youth training scheme and the impact such cost would have on the money available for training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No such assessment has been made by the Manpower Services Commission, but, if the number of entrants and their duration on the youth training scheme remained at their planned levels, the cost of increasing the trainee allowance to £55 per week would be around £430 million in 1985-86. This would result in more than the whole of the £780 million set aside for the scheme in 1985-86 being required for the allowance, with no funds at all being available to meet other training costs. Clearly, the scheme could not possibly be operated on such a basis. Were the allowance to be increased to £55, the only way that the scheme could continue to provide training of the present kind and quality within existing funding would be by greatly reducing the number of youngsters on the scheme.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board, the number and proportion of trainees on mode A, mode B1 and mode B2 schemes, respectively, who will spend fewer than 13 weeks off-the-job training.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 144]: The survey of youth training scheme providers, which covered 49,764 trainees (38,756 on mode A, 7,599 on mode B1 and 3,409 on mode B2) shows the minimum length of off-the-job training offered by schemes in the 1983-84 year. In modes A and B2 the proportion of trainees on schemes offering a minimum of less than 13 weeks off-the-job training was 2 per cent., which is not considered statistically significant. The survey shows that mode A schemes were offering on average a minimum of 15 weeks off-the-job training and 19 weeks on average for mode B2 schemes. For mode B1 the survey indicated that 7 per cent. of the trainees covered were on schemes which offered a minimum of less than 13 weeks off-the-job training though, on average, mode B1 schemes were offering a minimum of 15 weeks off-the-job training.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme leavers reported to the last meeting of the youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A, mode B1 and mode B2 work experience placements provided in each of the industrial categories used in the survey, and in each of the occupational training families.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 144]: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The youth training scheme providers survey did not collect information on the number and proportion of work experience places by occupational training families, nor did it cover work placements provided in mode B1.

The survey covered 28,586 mode A and 2,032 mode B2 work placements and the table shows the industrial distribution of these placements by standard industrial classification.

Industrial distribution of work experience placements 1983-84

† The column totals do not add up to exactly 100 per cent. due to rounding.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board (a) the number and proportion of mode A managing agents who require prospective trainees to have one or more O-levels and (b) the number and proportion of mode B1 and mode B2 sponsors, respectively, who require prospective trainees to have one or more O-levels.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 144]: The youth training scheme providers survey covered a sample of 464 managing agents and sponsors (236 mode A schemes, 148 mode B1 schemes and 80 mode B2 schemes). The proportions of these schemes requiring some or all of their trainees to have one or more O-levels are:

	Percentage
Mode A	15
Mode B1	2
Mode B2	3

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A managing agents who deploy, per 100 trainees (a) fewer than three (b) from three to five, (c) from six to eight, (d) from nine to 11, (e) from 12 to 14 and (f) more than 14 full-time equivalent staff in managing, administering, and providing off-the-job training for their scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 144]: The information requested from the youth training scheme providers survey, which covered a representative sample of 236 mode A managing agents, is as follows. The ratio of staff to trainees is very largely dependent on the extent to which a managing agent subcontracts off-the-job training to other providers.

*Number of full-time equivalent staff per 100 trainees	Percentage of managing agents

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the cost of dispersal of Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to Bootle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is not possible to estimate the total costs of the dispersal of Health and Safety Executive staff to Merseyside, nor to separate the dispersal costs of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate from those for the other parts of the Health and Safety Executive which are being dispersed.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the reasons for the dispersal of Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to Bootle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government decided in 1979 that as part of a broader dispersal programme the majority of the Health and Safety Executive's London based headquarters staff should disperse to Merseyside. A policy branch is being established in the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and this will remain in London when the rest of the inspectorate goes to Merseyside.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current establishment of Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and how this compares with the number of staff currently in post.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Nuclear Installations Inspectorate's current manpower plan provides for 102 inspectors and 51 support staff at 1 April 1985. There were then 102 inspectors and 54 support staff in post.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the current level of staff of Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is adequate to enable it to discharge its functions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is currently staffed to its planned level.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will assess the likely effects of dispersal of Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to Bootle on the assessment of the safety of power stations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Commission attach the utmost importance to maintaining safety standards for nuclear power stations. The inspectorate's move to Bootle should not result in a fall in standards. The Health and Safety Executive is making every effort to minimise temporary disruption of work for those, including the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, who are being dispersed.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the number of visits by members of Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to nuclear licensed sites in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of separately identifiable visits is:

Year	Number of visits
1980	467
1981	509
1982	449
1983	491
1984	436

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the lastest available figures for the number of persons engaged in full-time employment and the number of persons who are unemployed or engaged in full-time job creation activity.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. In December 1984, the lastest date for which information is available, there were an estimated 23,655,000 persons in the employed labour force in Great Britain. Included in this total were 4,282,000 female employees in employment who worked part-time. The number of part-time workers in the other components of the employed labour force—that is, male employees in employment the self-employed and HM forces—is not available.

On 6 December 1984 the number of unemployed claimants in Great Britain was 3,100,005. The total number of people engaged full-time in job creation activity is estimated to have been about 319,000 at the end of December.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive relevant to his Department from the EEC since 1979; and what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1985, c. 190]: The information requested is set out in the table. It relates to directives adopted by the EC Council of Ministers since May 1979 and for the implementation of which my right hon. Friend has overall responsibility in Great Britain.

SCOTLAND

Broadleaved Woodland

39. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about policies for the conservation of broadleaved woodland.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission is conducting a review of policies for broadleaved woodland. My right hon. Friend expects to make a statement to the House before the summer recess.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to ensure that agreement is reached between the Forestry Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission over management guidelines for broadleaved woodlands before any statement is made to the House regarding changes in policies for broadleaved woodland.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend intends to make a statement on a policy for broadleaved woodlands by the summer recess. The Forestry Commission's aim is to agree the main terms of management guidelines for such woodlands with the Nature Conservancy Council and the two countryside commissions before that statement is made.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 25 April 1985, Official Report, column 532, concerning broadleaved woodland licensed for clearfelling for conversion of the land to agriculture, if he will give the exact location of those woodlands so felled on Cwm Mosydd Farm, Gwent.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 1985, c. 247]: The grid reference is 203886 on Ordnance Survey sheet No. 171. The felling licence does not expire until 19 October 1986 and it is not known whether any felling has yet taken place.

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors have established since 1955; and what were the subjects the committee investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Younger: It would not be possible without disproportionate cost to produce a definitive list of all the committees which beyond argument should be described as departmental committees of inquiry. The following lists are drawn from central records and show, first, committees of inquiry set up by myself and my predecessors acting alone and, second, those set up in conjunction with the Lord Advocate. Committees established jointly with other Secretaries of State are not shown.

Forestry

Mr. David Marshall: asked the Secretary of Scotland what were the tree species used and proportions of those species planted by the Forestry Commission in its restocking programme in the periods 1961 to 1970, 1971 to 1980 and 1981 to 1985.

Mr. John MacKay: The main species used in the Commission's restocking programmes in these periods in these periods were Sitka spruce, larches, Douglas fir and Corsican pine on coniferous sites, and oak, beech, birch, ash and sycamore on broadleaved woodland. A further breakdown is not available in the form requested as detailed records on restocking were not kept prior to 1974-75, and information for the year ended 31 March 1985 is not yet to hand. Details of the species used in the years ended 31 March 1975 to 31 March 1984 were provided in my reply of 16 April, in column 97, to a question from the hon. Member of East Lothian, (Mr. Home Robertson).

Mr. David Marshall: asked the Secretary of Scotland what was the Foresty Commission's forestry enterprise expenditure for each of the last five years on (a) recreation and amenity, (b) wildlife conservation and (c) landscape conservation.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission's gross expenditure on these items, including oncost and overheads, was as follows:

Year ended 31 March	Recreation and Amenity £	Wildlife Conservation £	Landscape Conservation £
1980	3,013,000	459,000	581,000
1981	2,805,000	423,000	775,000
1982	3,022,000	550,000	627,000
1983	3,122,000	605,000	731,000
1984	3,614,000	559,000	867,000

Mr. David Marshall: asked the Secretary of Scotland if he will list the Official Report the number of sites, their names and their sizes, which comprise the 444 hectares of land estimated to be planted without grant-aid in 1983-84 given in the Forestry Commission's 64th annual report.

Mr. John MacKay: This figure is made up from a large number of local estimates of small areas of plantings, and I regret that it is not possible to produce a comprehensive list.

Mr. David Marshall: asked the Secretary of Scotland what action he will take to ensure that there is no repetition of the recent case at Crichness Farm in East Lothian where private afforestation was carried out despite refusal of grant-aid on landscape and agricultural grounds.

Mr. John MacKay: The planting at Crichness took place while a grant application was still under consideration by the Forestry Commission in consultation with other authorities. Although it is possible that the planting of the area concerned would eventually have been approved for grant aid, the Forestry Commission takes a serious view, which my right hon. Friend shares of the applicant's failure to await the outcome of the consultation exercise. Nevertheless, this is the first significant case of its type since the present procedures were introduced in October 1974, and my right hon. Friend does not propose to take any action at this stage. The Forestry Commission has had discussions with Timber Growers UK aimed at ensuring that the consultation procedures continue to operate effectively.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the cases in the last 10 years when afforestation has taken place on sites where forestry grants have been refused by the Forestry Commission.

Mr. John MacKay: I am not aware of any such cases.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will ask the Forestry Commission to publish guidelines to assist the private sector in introducing good management practice for new afforestation schemes, taking into account wildlife and landscape conservation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has published a number of guides to good forestry practice. A complete list of these is available to private woodland owners from Her Majesty's Stationery Office (Sectional List No. 31).

Timber Growers UK is preparing a code of practice for private growers in consultation with the Forestry Commission, the two Countryside Commissions, the Nature Conservancy Council and a number of other interested Government and non-Government bodies.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations there are between the Forestry Commission and the regional water authorities in England and Wales and the river purification boards in Scotland, over proposals for new upland afforestation either by the Forestry Commission or by private forestry operations.

Mr. John MacKay: As far as its own operations are concerned, the Forestry Commission has informal arrangements for consulting water authorities over proposed afforestation schemes within the immediate catchments of reservoirs.

In considering applications by private owners for grant aid for planting, the commission consults the Welsh water authority on all schemes in areas in which the authority has asked that this be done. In other parts of Wales and in England, the commission looks to the local authorities to take account of the water interest when considering private planting proposals, as part of their general planning overview.

The river purification boards in Scotland are not consulted directly by the commission either in respect of its own or private planting proposals.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names, locations and areas of forest sprayed with the insecticide fenitrothion in each of the years 1978 to 1984, indicating which areas were sprayed more than once in this period, and indicating whether any of these areas are within the Forestry Commission's recently announced proposals for fenitrothion spraying in 1985.

Mr. John MacKay: The forest areas sprayed with the insecticide fenitrothion in the years 1978 to 1984 are as follows:

Year	Region	Forest	Block	Area (hectares)
1978	Highland	Naver	Rimsdale	640
			Strathy	240
			Achruggan	590
			Truderscaig	770
			Rossal	680
			Syre	420
			Creag Dhu, Chicken Dhu and Barren Ridge	140
		Helmsdale	Auchentoul	150
			Badenloch	100
			Suisgill	410
		Shin	Fiag	140
		Rumster	Watten	30
		Private Woodlands	Borrobol	140
			Auchentoul	250
1979	Highland	Naver	Strathy	236
		Shin	North Dalchork	552
			Caplich	107
			Inveroykel	371
		Torrachilty	Garbat and Strathrannoch	996
	Grampian	Craigellachie	Elchies	770
	Dumfries and Galloway	Bareagle	Annabaglish	220
1980	Highland	Naver	Truderscaig	166
			Rossal	125
			Syre	420
			Chicken Dhu and Barren Ridge	78
			Mudale	20
			Poles	102
			Garvel	20
			Grumbeg	20
			Cnoc Dubh	13
	Dumfries and Galloway	Bareagle	Annabaglish	220
			North Annabaglish	37
1981	Highland	Helmsdale	Badenloch	66
1982		No Spraying took place
1983	Borders	Private Woodland	Myredykes	340
	Grampian	Craigellachie	Elchies	142
1984	Grampian	Craigellachie	Elchies	142 For experimental purposes only

The areas of Strathy, Truderscaig, Rossal, Syre Chicken Dhu and Barren Ridge in Naver Forest, Annabaglish in Bareagle Forest, Badenloch in Helmsdale Forest and Elchies in Craigellachie Forest were sprayed in more than one year.

The 1985 programme of spraying will not be finally drawn up until assessments of the numbers of eggs of pine beauty moth are carried out in May, but it is likely to include the previously sprayed areas of Truderscaig, Rossal and Cnoc Dubh in Naver Forest, Watten in Rumster Forest, North Dalchork and Inveroykel in Shin Forest and Garbat and Strathrannoch in Torrachilty Forest.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total staff complement of the Forestry Commission in the years 1961, 1971, 1981 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: The figures were as follows:

Year	Number of Staff in Post
1961	14,581
1971	9,515
1981	7,952
1984	6,836

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals the Forestry Commission has for the revision of the native pinewood grant scheme in the light of the changes proposed for broadleaved woodland grants under the "Broadleaves in Britain Review".

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has no plans to revise the grant arrangements for native pinewoods in the context of the present review of broadleaves policy. It does, however, intend to review the provisions for native pinewood grants, in conjunction with the Nature Conservancy Council, once the broadleaves review has been completed.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the estimated number of people employed directly in forestry operations by the private sector forestry companies in the years 1961, 1971, 1981 and 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is not available in the form requested. Estimates of the numbers employed on forestry operations in private forests as a whole, including employees of the forestry companies, are as follows:

	Number
1961	9,400
1971	9,300
1981	8,000
1983	8,000

Estimates for 1984 are not yet available.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many dwellings were owned by the Forestry Commission in 1981 and 1984; and how many of these were (a) occupied by Forestry Commission employees, (b) occupied by other tenants and (c) unoccupied in each year.

Mr. John MacKay: The best available information is as follows:

	As at 31 March 1981	As at 31 March 1984
(i) Total number of houses managed by the Forestry Commission (categories (ii) and (iii) below	3,909	2,891
(ii) Number of Foresters' and Forest Workers' houses	2,320	1,597
(iii) Other houses	1,589	1,294
(iv) Total number of unoccupied houses (mainly awaiting sale)	279	260

Because of the turnover in tenancies and the large number of sales that have taken place, it is not possible, except at disproportionate cost, to split the total number of unoccupied houses between categories (ii) and (iii) in order to obtain the precise numbers of houses occupied in each of these categories on 31 March in each year.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that the membership of the Forestry Commission's new regional advisory committees adequately represents the degree of environmental interest in forestry matters.

Mr. John MacKay: There is a place on each regional advisory committee allocated to a member representing the environmental interest. It is difficult, because of statutory constraints on numbers and membership, to extend the environmental representation at this stage. However, as announced on 31 January 1985 by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, in his response to the Countryside Commission's report "A Better Future for the Uplands", in columns 282-90, the Forestry Commission is looking at ways of achieving greater public accountability for the regional advisory committees. This might go some way towards compensating for the present constraints on the committees' membership.

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of the Forestry Commission's examination into ways of achieving greater public accountability in its regional advisory committees as announced in the Government's response to the Countryside Commission's report on the uplands.

Mr. MacKay: The Forestry Commission's consideration of this matter is still at an early stage and my right hon. Friend is not yet in a position to make a statement.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Surplus Land)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he issues to health authorities as to the extent to which in releasing land no longer required by the National Health Service they should give priority to other medically related uses for such land.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The guiding principle of NHS land sales is that health authorities should seek to realise the full market price in order that this may be re-used to the maximum benefit of the service and its patients. We have recently terminated an arrangement whereby local authorities and certain other organisations providing services complementary to those of the National Health Service were given a prior opportunity to purchase at the district valuer's valuation. This tended to cause delay and in many cases led to health authorities receiving less than would have been obtained through the open market. The National Health Service should not forego capital receipts which can be used for extra capital investment in the service.

Arrangements under which NHS property may be leased on concessionary terms to certain bodies providing complementary health oriented services remain in force.

Liverpool Women's Hospital

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what is the waiting list at the women's hospital, Liverpool, at the latest available date.

Mr. John Patten: The latest information held centrally is contained in my reply to the hon. Member on 2 May at column 235.

Diabetics (Syringes)

Mr. Cyril Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the rate of supply per patient per annum of U100, or similar, glass syringes for (a) child diabetics and (b) adult diabetics.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We only have figures of the total number of syringes dispensed on GPs' prescriptions. Some patients purchase their syringes privately and others have them supplied through the hospital service.

	1981	1982	1983
Number of Syringes dispensed on GPs' prescriptions	85,400	85,100	96,900
Estimated number of insulin dependent diabetics*	234,100	233,970	234,230

* Based on the advice that 0·5 per cent. of the population are insulin dependent diabetics.

Fraud (Investigation)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 23 April, Official Report, column 419, if he will estimate the approximate proportion of the 261,302 investigations by staff of his Department, in the period 9 May 1984 to 12 March 1985, into cases of actual or suspected fraud by social security claimants that have led to, or are likely to lead to, prosecutions for serious offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Figures relating to those particular investigations are not available but in the year ended 12 February 1985, prosecution was authorised by the Department in 6,945 cases. In addition, 4,038 prosecutions were brought by the police for social security offences — following initial investigations by the Department.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of 23 April, Official Report, column 419, if he will publish a list showing the numbers and grades of staff of his Department working, in the period 9 May 1984 to 12 March 1985, on the 261,302 investigations into cases of actual or suspected fraud by social security claimants; and if he will name and describe the administrative units in which these staff were working.

Mr. Whitney: During the period in question, 1,813 man years were used on the investigation of benefit fraud. The staff are all located in local offices and are in grades ranging from clerical assistant to higher executive officer, inclusive, the majority being at executive officer level.

Pharmacists

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to salaries paid to newly qualified pharmacists who have taken a three-year degree course followed by one year's practical training, in retail and industrial pharmacy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our Department has no involvement in or responsibility for private contracts of employment. We therefore have no information on salaries paid to retail and industrial pharmacists.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many vacant posts there are for basic grade pharmacists in the North-East Thames regional health authority; what percentage this represents of the total of such authorised posts; and what is the percentage of such vacant posts in all other regional health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this local information centrally.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the salary in the National Health Services of a newly qualified pharmacist, who has taken a three-year degree course, followed by one year's practical training.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The starting salary of a basic grade hospital pharmacist is £6,699 per annum exclusive of London weighting.

Health Authorities (Resources)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the new cash available to the South-West regional health authority the North Devon health authority will obtain.

Mr. John Patten: Allocations to this district health authority are the responsibility of the South Western regional health authority. I suggest that my hon. Friend contacts the chairman of the RHA for this information.

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what extra health staff the North Devon health authority will have in 1985.

Mr. John Patten: We do not hold this information centrally. I suggest that my hon. Friend contacts the chairman of the authority for the details he requires.

Kidney Patients (North Devon)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) of the extra funds available in the south-west region for kidney patients, how much is available for North Devon health authority;

(2) in view of the extra money available for kidney patients, he will set up a kidney treatment centre for north Devon at Barnstaple hospital.

Mr. John Patten: Renal services in the south-western region are funded as a regional specialty, so it is for the regional health authority, in discussion with the relevant district health authorities, to decide where the facilities for the treatment of end stage renal failure should be provided. In 1984-85, £65,000 was allocated to the south-western region on a recurring basis for new initiatives in renal service provision. It is for the regional health authority to decide how and where these additional funds should be spent.

Inherited Diseases (Research)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research has been conducted by his Department into the possible effects of the implementation of the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill on future methods of reducing the incidence of the following inherited diseases; muscular dystrophy, haemophilia, thaussaemia, cystic fibrosis, Huntington's chorea, fragile X mental retardation, phenylketonuria, and Down's syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science gave him on 3 April, at column 617.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the effect of the changes in board and lodging allowances on the work of social services departments.

Mr. Whitney: We do not expect the changes in board and lodging allowances to have a significant effect on the work of social services departments, whose statutory duties and responsibilities remain unchanged.

Terminally Ill Persons

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which health authorities offer specialised care for the terminally ill (a) in hospices and (b) through community support teams; and if any action is being taken to increase the availability of such specialised care.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not collected centrally. We expect all district health authorities to ensure that appropriate care is provided for the terminally ill, whether directly or in collaboration with the voluntary sector.

"Living Options"

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has considered the "Living Options" report from the Prince of Wales's advisory group on disability; if there is any action his Department will be taking in the light of the recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The report was in fact discussed with the Department before publication. The guidelines it contains should prove helpful to those planning services for people with severe physical disabilities and officials will continue to keep in touch with the group.

Disabled People (Discrimination)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to introduce legislation to outlaw the kinds of unjustified discrimination documented in the paper by the Spastics Society on "Discrimination and Disabled People", a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans for such legislation. The Spastics Society paper is, however, welcome as a constructive contribution to discussion. It recognises some of the difficulties of framing such legislation, for example, how to define discrimination and how to deal with the issue of positive discrimination in favour of disabled people.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of alleged discrimination against disabled people have been referred to his Department in the last year; which of these cases reveal evidence of unjustified discrimination; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Since the beginning of May 1984 four cases of alleged discrimination against disabled people have been referred to the Department for investigation. Two were concerned with employment, one with education, and one with an access matter. Two cases are still under consideration. A third, involving an access complaint in Wales, was referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. In the fourth my judgment is that the evidence available does not substantiate a charge of unjustified discrimination.

Fluoridation

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why chemicals added to the public water supply for the purpose of enhancing the level of fluoride ion have not been regarded as medicinal products; what they are regarded as; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will refer to the Committee on Safety of Medicines the question as to whether an order should be made applying the provisions of the Medicines Act to chemicals added to the public water supply for the purpose of enhancing the level of fluoride ion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Compounds of fluorine when added to the water supplies would be medicinal products within the meaning of the Medicines Act 1968 only if the water itself was administered to the consumer wholly or mainly for a medicinal purpose.

The safety of fluoride as used in the fluoridation schemes operated in this country has been confirmed by a number of expert bodies and the schemes are monitored by water authorities in accordance with the guidelines of the standing technical advisory committee on water quality on fluoridation of water supplies. No useful purpose would therefore be served by seeking the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines as to whether to bring the compounds of fluorine concerned within the scope of the Medicines Act.

Cyclosporin

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the costs per annum to the National Health Service of purchasing cyclosporin; if he will detail the current uses of this drug in the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not usually give details of the sales of any drug as this information is regarded as confidential because of its commercial value. The current uses of cyclosporin include prevention of graft rejection following bone marrow, kidney, liver, pancreas, heart and heart-lung transplantation and prophylaxis of graft-versus-host disease.

Health Services Privatisation (Salford)

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the Salford district health authority about the effect of privatisation on the health authority's under-funding; and if he will make it his policy not to pressure one authority to privatise its support services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We expect all health authorities to carry out fully our policy of putting out to competitive tender their domestic, catering and laundry services. The work will then be done by whoever can provide the high standard of service required most economically, whether it is the in-house service or a contractor. In many authorities this is already achieving worthwhile savings which are retained by the health authorities to improve their services to patients. Salford health authority is not under-funded, but I have no doubt it could find worthwhile ways of spending savings from its support services on improvements in patient care.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Tomatoes

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the scale of production aid for tomato products in 1973 and in each of the past five years under the Common Agricultural Policy, the amount of the surpluses produced, and the cost to the European Economic Community budget of the production and disposal of tomatoes and tomato products.

Mrs. Fenner: There were no EEC production aids for tomato products in 1973. The varying rates of aid which apply from 1980-81 are complex. Details will be found in the following volumes of the Official Journal of the European Communities which are in the Library of the House: L135 of 31 May 1980 (Regulation 1345/80); L192 of 15 July 1981 (Regulation 1963/81); L178 of 22 June 1982 (Regulation 1585/82); L159 of 17 June 1983 (Regulation 1618/83) and L179 of 6 July 1984 (Regulation 1925/84).

There has been no surplus of tomato products stored at Community expense. The cost to the Community budget of the production aid for tomato products was 418·5 mecu in 1982, 469·2 mecu in 1983 and 556·0 mecu in 1984. Separate figures for 1980 and 1981 are not available and tomato products cannot be separately identified within the costs of export refunds for processed fruit and vegetables.

The following two tables set out the information requested in respect of fresh tomatoes.

Compensation for Withdrawals

	(MECU)
1973-74	1·58
1979-80	13·46
1980-81	6·39
1981-82	4·65
1982-83	5·03
1983-84	2·63

Export Refunds

1979-80	0·72
1980-81	0·58
1981-82	1·44
1982-83	1·86
1983-84	*

* Separate figure for tomatoes not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the quotas for the production of tomato products for the three years starting in 1985-86; how these compare with production in 1973 and in each of the past five years; whether any compensation is being paid to producers for the cut in production; and what is the saving to the European Economic Community budget.

Mrs. Fenner: The proposals for support for tomato products in 1985-86 are still under discussion in the Council. The Commission's proposals to the Council have been summarised and explained in a memorandum (No. 4582/85) deposited in the Library of the House.

Surpluses

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the quantity of surpluses produced of each agricultural product under the common agricultural policy.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is published in the markets section of the Commission's annual reports on the agricultural situation in the Community which are available in the Library of the House.

Cereals

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what saving to the European Economic Community budget is represented by the proposed 3·6 per cent. reduction in cereal prices; and what will be the additional cost to the budget of the German proposals for cereals.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission estimates 151 mecu would be saved in the 1985-86 marketing year if its proposals on cereal prices were adopted. German counter proposals have not been defined in sufficient detail to enable them to be accurately costed.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the cost per tonne of growing wheat on a large wheat-growing owner-occupied farm in East Anglia in 1984 or 1983, excluding any notional rent for the land; and what part of the cost represents a charge for interest on capital.

Mr. MacGregor: The University of Cambridge has recently published its report on farming in the eastern counties of England 1983-84, to which the hon. Member may wish to refer.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the basis for the proposed increase in the cereals threshold from 21·5 million to 26 million tonnes.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission's proposal is to add the durum wheat guarantee threshold (4·6 million tonnes) to that for other cereals (121·32 million tonnes) and form a single threshold target of 126 million tonnes for 1985-86.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the original formula for reducing cereal prices in the event of a surplus was based on the previous year's price or that price increased by a notional margin.

Mr. MacGregor: Price reductions under the guarantee threshold arrangement are applied to the prices set for the marketing year following the three year period used as the basis of the calculation.

EC (Spending)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the fall in the value of the dollar against the European currency unit since the beginning of 1985 will have on forecast expenditure under the European Economic Community budget on agricultural products; and which items will be most affected.

Mr. MacGregor: The rate of the dollar against the European currency unit remains higher than the assumption made by the Commission in preparing its revised budget estimate for 1985.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the total amount spent under the European Economic Community budget on each agricultural product.

Mr. Jopling: Information on expenditure from the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund for each agricultural product for 1973 and 1980-83 is set out in the EC Commission's EAGGF financial reports which have been deposited in the House of Commons Library under the following references :

1979 EAGGF Report—R/263/75 of 29.1.75
1980 EAGGF Report—(Guarantee)—10418/81 of 30.10.81
1981 EAGGF Report—(Guarantee)—9895/82 of 5.10.82
1982 EAGGF Report—(Guarantee)—9421/83 of 27.9.83
1983 EAGGF Report—(Guarantee)—9372/84 of 26.9.84

Provisional Commission figures for expenditure from the FEOGA guarantee section in 1984 are as follows:

	(mecu)
Cereals and rice	1698
Sugar	1631
Olive oil	1096
Oilseeds and proteins	871

Tobacco

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the norm, premium and intervention prices for tobacco, the amounts taken into intervention, the cost of the tobacco regime to the European Economic Community budget and the proportion of the market supplied from European Economic Community sources.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested is as follows:

Year	*Norm price (ecu/Kg)	*Premium (ecu/Kg)	Intervention price (ecu/Kg)*	Intervention quantity (tonnes)	Cost of regime (mecu)
1973	†1·749	†1·047	†1·575	1,049	†118·3

* These figures are averages for the 26 varieties of tobacco grown in the European Community.
† These figures are in units of account/Kg.
‡ Provisional.

The European Community is 48 per cent. self-sufficient in tobacco. This figure has remained fairly static over the last decade.

Milk

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the percentage increase in the intervention price of skimmed milk under the common agricultural policy in European currency units and, after adjustment, in national currencies; what was the purpose of the increase; and by how much production is expected to increase and where it will be disposed of.

Mr. MacGregor: In its 1985-86 price proposals, the Commission has proposed an increase of 6·77 per cent. in the intervention price for skimmed milk powder. After the adjustments in green rates proposed by the Commission the increase in national currency terms for all member states would be:

	Per cent.
Belgium	+6·77
Denmark	+6·77
Germany	+5·65
France	+7·74
Greece	+10·12
Ireland	+6·77
Italy	+6·77
Luxembourg	+6·77
Netherlands	+5·64
United Kingdom	+6·77

The purpose of this increase, when combined with the proposed reduction of 3·99 per cent. in the intervention price for butter, is to effect a 1·5 per cent. increase in the target price for milk and an adjustment in relationship between the butter and skim element of milk. Total milk production is expected to decline in line with the reduction in quota levels by about 1 per cent. in 1985-86. The level of production of skimmed milk powder will depend on the uptake of whole milk and skimmed milk for various purposes including the use of skimmed milk for animal feeding.

Rice

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the target, intervention and threshold prices for rice, the amount of rice produced, imported and exported, and the cost to the European Economic Community of budget support to the production of rice;

(2) whether he will published a table in the Official Report showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the target, reference and intervention prices for the different cereals, the amount of the surpluses produced, and the cost to the European Economic Community budget of the disposal of those surpluses.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested for the most recent years can be obtained from the Commission's publication "The Agricultural Situation in the Community" report 1984; similar information for the earlier years is contained in previous reports. Copies of these are available in the Library of the House.

Alcohol

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much alcohol was distilled from wine, sugar-beet and other surplus agricultural products in the European Economic Community in 1973 and each of the past five years with the aid of subsidy; how this compares with the production of industrial alcohol; and what was the cost of the subsidies to the European Economic Community budget.

Mrs. Fenner: The quantities of alcohol distilled from wine and from surplus fruit under Community financed agricultural support arrangements and the costs involved were as follows. No alcohol was produced from sugar beet at the Community's expense.

Hill Farming

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the grants and subsidies to hill farming are mandatory; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the extent to which the different benefits are financed out of the European Economic Community budget.

Mrs. Fenner: The special aid to farmers in the less favoured areas is provided at my discretion within the limits permitted by EC directive 75/268 in order to ensure the continued viability of our hill and upland farms.

Details of aids paid in the less favoured areas in 1983 and of the European Community's contribution to them are as follows:

	Grant paid in 1983 £ million	Reimbursement from FEOGA £ million
Hill livestock compensatory allowances	85·347	21·337
Development plans	32·922	6·826
Joint investment schemes	0·034	0·009
Total	118·303	28·172

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the grants and subsidies covered by the figures given in his written reply dated 19 December, Official Report, colum 200, on support to hill farms; and if he will give the amounts spent under the various headings.

Mr. MacGregor: The following grants and subsidies were included in the derivation of the percentage figures quoted in the written reply dated 19 December 1984, at column 200:

Hill livestock compensatory allowances; annual premium on ewes; guidance premium; suckler cow premium; payments made under milk non-marketing schemes; other miscellaneous grants and subsidies.

Details of public expenditure under the common agricultural policy and on national grants and subsidies appear at table 28 of the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" White Paper (Cmnd. 9423).

Farm Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the latest farm price proposals are forecast to have on expenditure under the European Economic Community budget in 1985 and 1986 compared with 1984; and if he will give a breakdown by commodities.

Mr. Jopling: Expenditure from the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund in 1984, 1985 and 1986 is expected to be as follows:

1984 — 18,346 mecu (provisional commission outturn figure)
1985 — 19,817 mecu (1985 Draft Budget excluding allowance made for price fixing)
1986—19,500-20,000 mecu (Commission initial estimate)

The effect on this expenditure of the Commission's price proposals broken down by commodities is given in volume II of the proposals, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Pigmeat

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the basic price for pigmeat, the sluice-gate price, and the basic import levy, together with the amount spent on market support for pigmeat, including restitution payments on exports.

Mr. MacGregor: The information is as follows:

Public Companies (Agricultural Production)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to how many public companies are engaged wholly or mainly in agricultural production; and whether his Department reviews their profitability in the course of its investigations into farm costs and incomes.

Mrs. Fenner: Information on public limited companies engaged wholly or mainly in agriculture production is not separately identified within the statistics collected by my Department.

Silk

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the amount of aid per box of silkworm eggs under the common agricultural policy, the cost to the European Economic Community budget and the ratio of domestic production of silk to total usage in all forms in the European Economic Community, including imports.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested on usage and imports of silk is not readily available. The other information for the most recent years can be obtained from the Commission's publication "The Agricultural Situation in the Community" report 1984. Similar information for the earlier years is contained in previous reports. Copies of these are available in the Library of the House.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Watson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any fresh proposals to make to the European Economic Community concerning the transferability of milk quotas.

Mr. Jopling: I am actively pursuing the possiblity of both sale and leasing of milk quotas separately from the land in my discussions within the Community. Changes would be required to both Community and domestic legislation before either form of transfer could be implemented. It is clear, however, that there is very strong resistance from the Commission and some other member states to a sale and purchase scheme. There is also resistance, although on a lesser scale, to a leasing scheme. Thus, changes to the Community legislation will be very difficult to secure and I cannot predict the outcome of our negotiations at this stage.

Liquid Skimmed Milk

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in the past year in the United Kingdom; and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 7 May 1985, c. 323]: In 1984, a total of 1,198,970,965 litres of liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed at a cost of £75,548,829.

Pesticides

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many incidents of butterflies killed by pesticides were reported to the Advisory Committee on Pesticides through the wildlife incident monitoring service, by species in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 7 May 1985, c. 322]: No incidents involving butterflies have been reported to the wildlife incident investigation scheme.

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those experiments or surveys which his Department has conducted, commissioned or is aware of, regarding the impact of pesticides on butterflies on or around farmland in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 7 May 1985, c. 322]: Information on surveillance programmes and the effects of pesticides on butterflies is given in the paper "The Environmental Cost of Pesticide Usage in the United Kingdom", published in 1983, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. In addition, the game conservancy, cereal and game bird project is monitoring the effect on butterfly populations of applying pesticides to cereal field margins.

Production and Consumption (Statistics)

Mr. Spence asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out in the Official Report the latest available figures showing the comparison for the European Economic Community as a whole and for the United Kingdom separately between production and consumption, excluding intervention, quantities in the following items; common wheat, barley, sugar, butter, skimmed milk, eggs and beef.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 322]: The information requested is as follows:

Latest estimates of production and consumption† of selected agricultural commodities*

Birds (Special Protection Areas)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has made any objections to the listing as a European Commission birds directive special protection area and Ramsar convention site the following estuaries: (a) Morecambe Bay, (b) River Orwell, Suffolk and (c) the Wash.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 3 May 1985, c. 275]: My Department has not been approached about the listing of the first two of these sites. In relation to the Wash, we have expressed the view that any decision on listing should not be taken in advance of decisions on an overall strategy for the area.

Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent the agreed increase in agricultural spending in 1985 and the actual spending in 1984 under the common agricultural policy meet the Government's wish that spending on agriculture should be subject to a strict financial guideline.

Mr. Jopling: The Council's conclusions on budget discipline, including the financial guideline for agriculture, first apply to the exercise of the Council's powers in 1985 concerning expenditure in 1986.

Merchant Navy (Consultants' Report)

Sir Edward du Cann asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek to accelerate the consultants' study into the causes of the decline in Britain's merchant fleet; and if he will publish their results as soon as they are available.

Mr. Ridley: I have not engaged consultants to study the causes of the decline of Britain's merchant fleet. I expect to receive later this month the report of the consultants I have engaged to forecast the future availability of merchant shipping to meet defence needs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I will then examine the consultants' findings against foreseen future defence needs. That examination will take some time. It would not be appropriate to make any report until it has been completed.

Leadenham (Bypass)

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the proposed construction of a bypass for Leadenham in Lincolnshire.

Mrs. Chalker: The options for a scheme for Leadenham are being reappraised because of new traffic growth figures, which I explained in my letter of 8 February. Our reassessment is reaching its final stages and I hope to announce our preferred scheme in the near future.

Roads (London)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of the consultation exercise on an east London road assessment study.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 25 March 1985 at column 29.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the results of the East London road assessment study consultation will be published.

Mrs. Chalker: The consultants will be drawing on these results for their initial report about problems—to be published later this year.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the numbers of (a) motor vehicles and (b) heavy goods vehicles using the A1-A102 route.

Mrs. Chalker: Collection of this data will form part of the east London assessment study.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost of all public inquiries into the Archway road since 1967.

Mrs. Chalker: Approximately £430,000.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport when Her Majesty's Government will publish the proposed routes of the road widening for the A1-A102 link in north London.

Mrs. Chalker: There is no such proposal.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the month-by-month comparisons for the daily usage of the north-east sector of the M25 since it was opened from the A1 to the Dartford tunnel.

Mrs. Chalker: The M25 became continuous from the A1(M) to the northern approach to the Dartford tunnel in January 1984. Flows are estimated to vary from section to section. At the only location, at Ockendon, where there has been continuous monitoring, the average daily (16-hour) two-way flow for each month was as follows:

Month 1984	*Vehicles per day
February	40,000
March	47,000

Motorways

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the average cost of motorway building in rural and urban areas in each year since 1975.

Mrs. Chalker: Motorway construction costs per mile vary significantly depending on the standard and location of the road concerned. The figures represent very broad average works costs at outturn prices by type of motorway. Additional associated costs such as land acquisition may add between 20 and 25 per cent. to these figures.

Civil Aviation Bill

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the Civil Aviation Bill.

Mr. Ridley: I undertook not to proceed with the Civil Aviation Bill until decisions had been taken on the inspector's report on the Stansted/Heathrow terminal 5 planning inquiries. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction and I will not be in a position to announce those decisions in time for the Bill to complete all its remaining stages this Session. I am therefore withdrawing this Bill.

Marine Pilotage

Sir Julian Ridsdale asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has now completed his consideration of the responses to the Government's consultative document on marine pilotage.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am grateful to all those who have submitted comments on the document, and I am considering them most carefully. It will necessarily be a little time before the proposed new arrangements can be settled, and in the meantime I have decided to give the leading parties concerned with pilotage an opportunity to reflect on the comments of the other leading parties and to put forward any new suggestions which could be expected to attract a consensus of support. I am accordingly arranging, with the leading parties agreement, for their comments to be made publicly available. Copies will be placed in the Library, and can also be obtained on application to my Department.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Programme

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy that, with regard to the traditional urban programme, the total financial allocation for new and time-expired projects under circular 26 will be no less in real terms than the total financial allocation for new and time expired projects under circular 25.

Sir George Young: No. Decisions on the allocations for different parts of the urban programme in 1986-87 have yet to be taken.

Holiday Play Schemes

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of the representations he has received from local authorities, voluntary organisations and hon. Members were in favour of the cuts in traditional urban funding for holiday play schemes; and how many were against the cuts.

Sir George Young: The representations received have argued for urban programme funding, or increased funding, for particular schemes or groups of schemes.

Sports Council

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now make a statement on the chairmanship of the Sports Council.

Mr. Macfarlane: Following the resignation of Mr. Dick Jeeps, my right hon. Friend has appointed Mr. John Smith as the next chairman of the Sports Council. Well-known in Merseyside, in business, in football and in tennis, John Smith has been a member of the Sports Council since 1980; I feel sure that his well-known expertise in financial and corporate management, added to his unrivalled experience as chairman of Liverpool football club, will enable him to lead the Sports Council successfully towards the 1990s.

The new chairman will give two days a week. John Smith has other responsibilities which he wishes to maintain. He will, as chairman, oversee the business and direction of the Sports Council, and he will be supported by two vice chairmen, each with executive responsibilities. Ian McCallum, the present vice chairman, will continue in his post. My right hon. Friend has appointed Mr. James Harvie-Watt as a second vice chairman. A member of the Council since 1980, Mr. Harvie-Watt's financial expertise and good sense have already made a strong impression. I believe that he and Ian McCallum will give John Smith first-class support, and that they will make a very strong team, giving the council a fresh impetus for the future.

These new appointments take effect from 20 May 1985. The cost of the new team to public funds is less than the present arrangement.

I will continue to review the membership and structure of the council, with the advice of the chairman and vice chairmen.

Unfit Dwellings

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the number of homes which are felt to be unfit for human habitation and the number so seriously affected by damp as to present marked discomfort or disadvantage to their occupants.

Sir George Young: In the 1981 English house condition survey it was estimated that in 1981 some 1·1 million dwellings—6 per cent. of the stock—were unfit for human habitation. There is no readily available estimate of the total number of dwellings affected by damp sufficient to be a discomfort or disadvantage to their occupants.

However, the survey indicated that 10 per cent. of households considered themselves to be troubled by damp.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next plans to meet leaders of council housing departments to discuss with them the problems they are facing in housing local citizens whose names are on long waiting lists.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend will be meeting representatives of the local authority associations at the meeting of the Housing Consultative Council on 10 June 1985.

English House Condition Survey

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet decided when the next English house condition survey will be held.

Mr. Gow: The next English house condition survey will be undertaken in the autumn of 1986; preliminary work has begun. It is envisaged that the survey will have broadly the same format as that held in 1981, but the sample size will be increased considerably. The first results from the survey should be available at the end of 1987.

Housing Improvement Policy

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the Government's review of private sector housing improvement policy.

Mr. Gow: A Green Paper entitled "Home Improvement — A New Approach" (Cmnd. 9513) is being published today. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have arranged for copies to be sent to all local authorities in England and Wales and to other interested bodies. The closing date for comments is 9 July 1985. Copies have been placed in the Library and in the Vote Office.

The primary responsibility for maintaining and improving private housing rests with the owners, though they should receive appropriate help and encouragement in fulfilling that responsibility. The Government intend to discuss with the building industry and the lending institutions ways in which more can be done to encourage owners to help themselves.

While there is still a place for public sector financial help, it needs to be better channelled towards those who could not otherwise afford to carry out essential repairs and improvements. Rateable value limits are unsatisfactory in this respect and the Government propose that they should be replaced and that eligibility should be based directly on the financial circumstances of owner-occupiers. Under the new proposals, mandatory grants would be available more widely than at present. All improvement and repair work needed to make a dwelling fit would attract a mandatory grant subject to the new eligibility test. Discretionary help would also continue but in the form of equity-linked loans, repayable on the sale of the property. New powers are envisaged for enveloping schemes and to grant-aid dwellings which are being improved for sale.

Those who are most deserving should be encouraged to apply. The Government support the development of agency services as one way of achieving this.

In most cases renovation would continue to be the answer, but where redevelopment was justified the Green Paper proposes a fairer system of compensation for those affected, and the involvement of the private sector, wherever possible, in the subsequent redevelopment.

Ministerial Cars

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide details by the individual Ministers in his Department of the costs for ministerial cars in each year since 1980-81.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 306]: The cost to the Department of the Environment of ministerial cars allocated to the Secretary of State and Ministers in the years in question were:

	1980-81 £	1981-82 £	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	1984-85 £
Secretary of State	18,720	21,320	23,920	28,600	28,600

ENERGY

Central Electricity Generating Board

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much the Central Electricity Generating Board is paying back to the Treasury this year to write off its historic costs.

Mr. Goodlad: The external financing limit (EFL) is set for the electricity supply industry as a whole, not for each electricity board. The electricity supply industry's EFL for 1985-86 was set at minus £1,128 million. As shown in table 5.5 of Command 9428, this EFL is mainly composed of the repayment of borrowing from the national loans fund and from market and overseas lenders. The EFL is under review in the light of the effects of the miners' strike.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Advanced Supplementary Level Examinations

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to obtain the views of those likely to sit advanced supplementary level examinations of the work load they anticipate will arise from these examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No. My right hon. Friend has made clear that AS-level courses should be designed to require half the study time of A-level courses.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the years in which union representation on the Burnham committee has been reviewed ; and what changes in representation resulted in each case.

Sir Keith Joseph: Changes in the composition of the teachers' panel, since the setting up of the Burnham primary and secondary committee under the provisions of the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965, are as follows:

Name of Association	1965	1966	1979	1981
Assistant Masters' and Mistresses' Association (AMMA)	4	4	4	4
National Association of Head Teachers (NAHT)	1	1	2	2
National Association of Schoolmasters/ Union of Women Teachers (NAS/ UWT)	2	3	6	7
National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE)	4	2	1	1
National Union of Teachers (NUT)	16	16	16	16
Professional Association of Teachers (PAT)	0	0	0	1
Secondary Heads Association (SHA)	2	2	1	1

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he received requesting a review of representation on the Burnham committee prior to his announcement of such a review.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department received specific requests for a review from 10 organisations and seven individuals.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Community Radio

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a further statement about the future of community radio.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to make a further statement within the next few weeks.

Holloway Prison

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are engaged on the special project committee which he has set up to review the role and future of Holloway prison; from what professional bodies they come; and if he will list their names in the Official Report.

Mr. Mellor: The membership of the Holloway project committee is as follows:

Mr. C P Honey — Regional Director, South East Region, Prison Department
Mr. C J Allen—Governor, Her Majesty's Prison Holloway
Dr. P Mason — Director, Mental Health Divison, Department of Health and Social Services
Mrs. J Galbraith JP—latterly Chairman, Board of Visitors, Her Majesty's Prison Holloway
Dr. D A F Doherty—Principal Medical Officer, Directorate of Prison Medical Services
Mrs. M M Donnelly — Governor II, Prison Department Headquarters
Mr. B Chaplin—Principal, Prison Department Headquarters
Mr. D Twiner — Governor II, Prison Department Headquarters

Miss J Kinsley — Governor, Her Majesty's Prison, Brixton — attended meetings of the committee while governor of Holloway.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to establish any special counselling and advisory services at Holloway prison to help women there who have attempted self-mutilation; and what plans he has to increase the level of prison medical staff to deal with this problem.

Mr. Mellor: Inmates at Holloway prison who attempt self-mutilation are seen, as a matter of course, by a prison medical officer, who can refer them, if necessary, to a consultant psychiatrist. A wide range of counselling and advisory services is also available. There are no plans at present to increase the level of medical cover at Holloway.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will invite probation and education officers to discuss with him their views on the imposition of restrictions on contacts between professional staff and former inmates of Holloway prison.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of women prisoners in Holloway prison in each year since 1970 and the number of cells in that prison which contained (a) one inmate, (b) two inmates, (c) three inmates and (d) four inmates in each year during the same period.

Mr. Mellor: Table A sets out the average number of inmates in Holloway prison in the period 1970 to 1984.

Information on the occupacy of cells before 1976 is not readily available. Table B sets out the occupancy of cells in mid-December each year from 1976 up to 1984. No cells accommodated more than three inmates. These figures do not cover rooms and dormitories designed for multi-occupancy, nor do they cover hospital accommodation.

Women Prisoners

Mrs Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown of the category of offences for which present women prisoners are serving sentences in percentage terms.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information is given in the following table. More detailed information relating to 30 June is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales"—table 1.5 of the latest issue for 1983 (Cmnd. 9363).

Population of females under sentence† on 31 March 1985 by offence group*

Percentages*

Offence group	Young offenders	Adult prisoners	Total
Violence against the person	16	15	15
Sexual offences	1	1	1
Burglary	13	6	7
Robbery	12	3	5

† Including persons committed in default of payment of a fine, compensation order or costs.

Police (Complaints)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have had criminal proceedings instituted against them resulting from allegations of rape and indecent assault on females detained in their custody, since 1955; and how many of these were convicted.

Mr. Mellor: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

In the period 1980 to 1984, 12 police officers in England and Wales were convicted of sexual offences but information is not available centrally as to the offences in each case, or whether they were committed while the officer was on or off duty.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in each single year since 1970 the number of men and women prisoners who have committed suicide while serving gaol sentences; and if he will list the length of the sentences which had been imposed on them individually.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Total	Lengths of sentences
1970	2	Life, 4 years.
1971	8	7½ years, 5 years × 2, 4 years, 3 years × 2, 12 months, 9 months.
1972	10	Life × 2, 8 years, 4 years × 2, 18 months × 3, 15 months, 9 months.
1973	8	14 years, 6 years, 5 years, 4½ years, 3 years, 2 years × 2, 9 months
1974	2	6 years × 2.
1975	6	Life, 5 years, 4 years × 2, 6 months, 21 days*.
1976	9	Life, 10 years, 5 years, 4 years, 3 years, 2 years 9 months, 18 months, 12 months, 9 months.
1977	7	Life, 12 years, 7 years, 4 years, 2 years, 18 months, 1 month.
1978	7	Life × 4, 5 years*, 18 months, 12 months.
1979	12	Life × 3, 5 years, 4 years, 3 years × 2, 18 months, 12 months, 9 months, 6 months × 2.

Asylum

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by national origin and date of application the total numbers of people who have (a) sought and (b) been granted asylum in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waddington: I shall shortly place in the Library refugee statistics for 1984, together with revised figures for earlier years.

Prisoners (Rape and Murder)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners convicted of (a) rape and (b) murder have been released since 1955 on the basis of fresh evidence presented subsequently clearing their name; and how many were pardoned (i) before and (ii) after their execution in cases of murder between 1955 and the year of the last implementation of the death penalty.

Mr. Mellor: The information readily available is as follows. Since 1955 one man convicted of rape and one man convicted of sexual offences (unspecified in the available records) have been granted free pardons. Four men convicted of murder and one man convicted of rape have had their convictions quashed following a reference to the Court of Appeal by the Home Secretary. Between 1955 and the coming into force of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965 no person convicted of murder was granted a free pardon; 79 persons convicted of murder and sentenced to death were granted a conditional pardon and the death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. One man convicted of murder was granted a free pardon posthumously in 1966.

Nottinghamshire Constabulary

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (a) what is the current establishment of the Nottinghamshire constabulary, (b) how many officers were in post effective 31 March and (c) to what circumstances or reasons he ascribes the reduction in strength; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The authorised establishment of the Nottinghamshire constabulary is 2,259, an increase of 114 since May 1979. The strength of the force was 2,150 on 31 March 1985. Police manpower levels fluctuate from month to month because of different recruiting and wastage patterns, seasonal changes and other local reasons. I understand that there was further recruitment to the Nottinghamshire constabulary in April 1985 and the present strength is 2,166.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he intends to take to implement his Budget proposals to relieve from value added tax certain temporarily imported goods and to change the arrangements for charging value added tax on certain reimported goods; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Budget proposals relating to VAT on certain temporarily imported and reimported goods will be given effect by regulations made by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under powers in the Value Added Tax Act 1983. These regulations have now been made and are being laid before the House today. They are subject to the negative procedure.

The regulations provide relief from VAT for goods which are temporarily imported solely for repair, renovation, modification or treatment and which upon re-exportation are identifiable as the imported goods. The ownership in the goods may not be transferred to any person in the United Kingdom either at importation or during the time they remain in the United Kingdom and the goods must be re-exported within six months.

The regulations also provide for VAT to be charged on goods which are reimported after repair, process or adaptation abroad as if that repair or process had been carried out in the United Kingdom—that is, generally on the cost of the work, plus any duty and freight. There must be an intention at the time of exportation to reimport the goods on completion of the process abroad, and the ownership in the goods must not be transferred to a person outside the United Kingdom either at exportation or during the time they remain abroad.

The changes under these regulations will take effect from 1 June 1985.

Nationalised Industries (Consultation Note)

Mr. Ryder asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he proposes to take in the light of comments he has received on the consultation note on nationalised industries legislation issued on 20 December 1984.

Mr. Peter Rees: Comments on the consultative document issued last December are being carefully considered and discussions with the industries are continuing. The Government do not intend to propose general nationalised industry legislation in the 1985-86 Session.

Income and Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the manner of the reply given to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North Official Report, 13 February 1984, column 65, he will compare in local currencies and in pound sterling equivalent (a) gross domestic product per person, (b) average income tax paid per person, (c) average value added tax paid per person and (d) average per capita annual income in each of the United Kingdom, Germany and France during the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Peter Rees: The information available is given in the following table. For corresponding data for 1982 on items (b) and (c) I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him on 11 February at column 52; no later data are available. Exchange rates do not necessarily provide a satisfactory basis for converting other national currencies into pound sterling in the context of GDP and a more realistic assessment of relative levels of GDP in terms of their domestic purchasing power can be made through the use of purchasing power parities. Estimates on both bases are given in the table.

United Kingdom—latest estimates supplied to OECD.

France and German Federal Republic—GDP and Personal income from OECD National Accounts publications. Tax data from Revenue Statistics of OECD Member countries 1965-83.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to (a) the comparative gross domestic product and (b) the percentage of gross domestic product accounted for by income taxes and value-added tax, respectively, for each member state of the European Economic Community, for each year since 1981 inclusive; and if he will also provide for each country the total of individual salaries or incomes as a percentage of that country's gross domestic product.

Mr. Peter Rees: Comparisons of gross domestic product per head between EC member states for the years 1981-83 are given in "OECD National Accounts 1960-1983" (volume 1, page 125). A copy of the publication is available in the House of Commons Library. For information on the percentage of gross domestic product accounted for by income taxes and value added tax in the period 1981-1983, and provisional estimates of comparative gross domestic product in 1984, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him on 11 February at column 54.

The following table gives percentages of gross domestic product accounted for by personal income in 1981 and 1982 for Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. Corresponding figures for later years (apart from the United Kingdom) and for the other EC member states are not available. These figures should be used with caution since they are not comparable partly for the reasons indicated by the footnotes to the table and partly because of variations between countries in the relative importance of the corporate sector and the self-employed.

Wholesale Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the increase in wholesale prices in March can be directly attributed to the fall in the exchange rate since 1 January; and if he will break down the figures to show the effect in detail.

Mr. Peter Rees: The producer price index for materials and fuel purchased by manufacturing industry fell by 1·4 per cent. between February and March, while the producer price index for home sales of manufactured products rose by 0·5 per cent. It is not possible to quantify with any accuracy the contribution of exchange rate movements to either of these figures.

Woodlands (Taxation)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what measures he is taking to review the tax reliefs available to private woodland owners in the light of the case at Crichness in East Lothian where afforestation proceeded despite the Forestry Commission refusing planting grants, and in the light of the recommendations and findings of the Eighth Report of the Committee of Public Accounts on the taxation of woodlands managed on a commercial basis;

(2) what measures he takes to ensure that owners of forests claiming tax relief under schedule D are doing so only on schemes considered appropriate and viable by the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Moore: The tax treatment of forestry owners is determined under the appropriate tax law which does not differentiate between planting schemes which attract grant aid from the Forestry Commission and those which do not. The existing tax arrangements are of long standing and I have no plans at present to change them.

Taxpayers (Inquiries)

Mr. Nicholls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria govern the implementation of an in-depth inquiry by the Inland Revenue into the affairs of a particular taxpayer; what steps are taken to ensure that unfair pressure is not applied to the taxpayer during the process; what advantages are gained from an in-depth inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Inquiries are undertaken where the inspector of taxes is not satisfied that the taxpayer has fully declared his profits and where the potential amount of tax at stake is likely to make an investigation cost-effective.

The taxpayer's principal safeguard is his right of appeal to the independent Commissioners. Within the Inland Revenue, procedures for the control of in-depth inquiries are designed to ensure that the rights of taxpayers are strictly observed; for example, district inspectors are personally responsible for ensuring the satisfactory conduct of investigations within their offices. For a more detailed account of the powers of the inspector and the rights of the taxpayer I refer my hon. Friend to chapter 10 of volume 1 of the Keith report (Cmnd. 8822).

In-depth inquiries help to secure compliance with tax laws and deter evasion. In the year ended 31 March 1984, investigations by the Inland Revenue resulted in the collection of £371 million additional tax.

Overseas Private Investment

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing which countries were the recipients of British private investment overseas in 1984 with the relevant figures.

Mr. Peter Rees: Geographical details of direct investment overseas by United Kingdom companies (excluding oil companies) are given in "Business Monitor MA4" which is available in the House of Commons Library. The latest issue gives figures for 1982. Summary figures for 1983 (including geographical information) will be published by the Department of Trade and Industry in "British Business" very shortly. Direct investment covered about a quarter of British private investment overseas as a whole in 1982: no geographical details are available of the investments made by oil companies or of portfolio or property investment by United Kingdom residents.

EC (Budget)

Mr. George Robertson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contingency funds have been earmarked by the European Community Council of Ministers for a shortfall in funds created by any failure to get ratification of the latent non-reimbursible advance by national Governments.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 366]: None.

Consolidated Fund (Unused Balances)

Mr. Faulds asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate, pursuant to the answer on 18 April, Official Report, column 244, whether a symbol relating to non-surrender to the Consolidated Fund of unused balances was likewise omitted in error from the Supply Estimates in respect of the votes sought for the purposes specified in Class V, 10, C2, and Class VIII, 4, B5; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 26 April 1985, c. 571]: No symbol is required for these subheads. The symbol regrettably omitted in error from subhead C1 of Class V, vote 10 and subhead B4 of Class VIII, vote 4 is one of those used to indicate the accounting and audit arrangements for grant in aid and certain subscriptions etc. to international organisations. (A full list of symbols can be found in the introduction to each Estimates booklet.) Subheads C2 and B5 are not grants in aid.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the London telephone number of the Export Credits Guarantee Department is always engaged or subject to long delays before being answered.

Mr. Channon: ECGD's London telephone facilities are provided by a modern electronic branch exchange and include provision for direct dialling to individuals and the automatic redirection of calls if a number is engaged or the intended contact is not available. The Department is unaware of any general difficulties with calls handled through the switchboard itself. If my hon. Friend has had a particular problem and gives me details, I shall have the matter investigated further.

Origin Labelling

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the implications of the decision of the European Court as to the incompatibility of current United Kingdom country of origin labelling requirements with article 30 of the treaty of Rome for the future policy of Her Majesty's Government on country of origin labelling.

Mr. Butcher: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for corporate and consumer affairs of 30 April, at column 92, to my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg).

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to assess the level of public support for country of origin labelling of products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: My Department will be consulting a wide range of interested organisations in connection with the recent judgment of the European Court of Justice on the Trade Descriptions (Origin Marking) (Miscellaneous Goods) Order 1981.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the employment implications for the United Kingdom of compliance with the recent judgment of the European Court on the legality of current United Kingdom country of origin labelling requirements.

Mr. Butcher: We shall be considering the views of interested parties on all the implications of the judgment, bearing in mind that the purpose of the order to which the judgment relates is to assist consumers in making their purchasing decisions.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the countries from which goods may be imported without country of origin labelling if the United Kingdom implements the recent judgment of the European Court on the legality of current United Kingdom country of origin labelling requirements.

Mr. Butcher: The judgment is directly relevant to goods imported from other member states of the European Community or goods originating from third countries which entered into free circulation within the Community before importation into the United Kingdom.

"Think British" Campaign

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he takes to promote the awareness amongst the public as to British-made products; whether in this he liaises with the "Think British" campaign; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The Government encourage people to buy British where British goods are the best, most competitive and most suitable to the buyer. Ministers and officials in the Department of Trade and Industry have had several meetings with representatives of the "Think British" campaign.

Banana Imports

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state the quota for banana imports into the United Kingdom for each of the years 1983, 1984 and 1985; if he will break these figures down into the allocations for Northern Ireland and Great Britain, respectively, in each year, and if he will also state the actual level of imports into both parts of the United Kingdom in each year mentioned.

Mr. Channon: The requested details of the United Kingdom import quota for bananas originating in the dollar area are, by quota period:

(tonnes)

	1 October 1982 to 30 September 1983	1 October 1983 to 30 September 1984	1 October 1984 to 31 December 1985 (15 months)
TOTAL	124,848	120,114	122,450

Northern Ireland	7,865	7,865	10,000
Great Britain	116,983	112,249	112,450

Source: DTI Import Licensing figures

Import statistics are collected for the United Kingdom as a whole and are not separately identified by region; and in the case of bananas they include plantains. The details requested are as follows:

	1983	1984	1985 (Jan-March)
Total imports of fresh bananas (including plantains)	307,169	309,327*	78,797*

P and O Ferries (Take over)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he intends to refer the acquisition by European Ferries of P and O cross channel ferry operations to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Alex Fletcher: The acquistion is being considered by the Office of Fair Trading in accordance with the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973. Once the Director General of Fair Trading has submitted advice on whether the acquisition should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the Secretary of State will announce his decision as soon as practicable.

Taiwan (Trade Mission)

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will send a Government-sponsored trade mission to Taiwan.

Mr. Channon: I regret that I cannot send a Government-sponsored trade mission to Taiwan, because we have no diplomatic relations with that territory. However, I am happy for any bodies such as chambers of commerce or trade associations to sponsor trade missions to Taiwan.

Lord Jellicoe, in his capacity as chairman of the British Overseas Trade Board, led a small high-level trade mission to Taiwan last August. I hope that this will lead to an increase in exports from Britain to Taiwan, and a reduction in our large adverse trade balance.

Alvey Fund

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been paid out in grant each year from the Alvey fund; and what proportion was allocated to projects in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Pattie: Total payments under the Alvey programme from the Department of Trade and Industry, the Ministry of Defence and the Science and Engineering Research Council were £4·2 million in 1983-84 and £14·6 million in 1984-85.

None of the recipient companies or academic institutions was located in Northern Ireland. However, one academic institution in the Province is a partner in three projects and will therefore receive some Alvey funding in the future.

Vietnam

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list details of trade between the United Kingdom and Vietnam in each of the past five years to the latest date.

Mr. Channon: The value of British trade with Vietnam for each of the last five years for which complete annual figures are available is as follows:

	United Kingdom exports £ million	United Kingdom imports £ million
1980	15·2	—
1981	1·2	0·1
1982	0·9	0·1
1983	0·9	0·6
1984	1·8	1·2
*1985	0·3	0·1

* Two months January and February.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to improve trade between Her Majesty's Government and Vietnam; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Her Majesty's Government would welcome improved trade relations with Vietnam. The chairman of the British Overseas Trade Board's South-East Asia trade advisory group paid a fact-finding visit to Vietnam last autumn. But in present circumstances the prospect of increasing trade with Vietnam does not seem high.

Leipzig Trade Fair

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grants are available each year from his Department for British companies who wish to be represented at the annual Leipzig trade fair in the German Democratic Republic; and what plans he has to increase the availability of such grants.

Mr. Channon: If there is sufficient industry interest, British companies which wish to exhibit at the Leipzig trade fair can obtain assistance under the terms of the British Overseas Trade Board's joint venture scheme, subject to the BOTB's priorities within the resources available. In 1985-86, 45 per cent., 50 per cent. and 55 per cent. of the BOTB's forecast direct costs in providing a stand and display aids are charged to first and second time participants and regular exhibitors respectively. In 1986-87 the charges will be 40 per cent., 55 per cent. and 75 per cent. respectively. Travel grants are also available for up to two representatives of each company in the BOTB group. In 1985-86 the travel grant is £115 each. In 1986-87 the grant will be about 90 per cent. of this amount for three visits to the exhibition and at half that rate for one further attendance.

Nicaragua

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the annual trade between the United Kingdom and Nicaragua by (a) value, and (b) volume for each year since 1975.

Mr. Channon: Information relating to volume is not available for indivual countries.

The information on value is as follows:

Value £ million

	United Kingdom imports	United Kingdom exports
1975	9·9	5·5
1976	1·2	8·2
1977	1·3	8·8

Centaur

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the possible uses of the Centaur military vehicles which are promoted by the Defence Sales Organisation.

Mr. Butcher: The Centaur multi-role all-terrain vehicle is a stretched Land Rover the half-tracked characteristics of which greatly enhances its off-road capabilities.

Like the Land Rover it has a variety of potential military and non-military applications, including stores transportation, ambulance-medical adaptation and communications.

EMPLOYMENT

Trade Union Act 1984

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will amend the Trade Union Act 1984 so as to make all members of the principal executive committees of trade unions subject to the periodic balloting provisions of part I of the Act.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 concerning union elections come into force on 1 October. It would be premature to consider further amending legislation which has not yet taken effect.

Trade Union Funds

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will introduce legislation to prevent the funds of trade unions being used to indemnify members against the consequences of illegal acts by them.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have no plans to introduce legislation at present.

Community Programme

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place a copy of the letter to Baroness Platt of 15 January, concerning changes in the eligibility criteria for the community programme, in the Library.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have done so, together with a copy of Baroness Platt's reply.

Manufacturing Industry (Jobs)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many manufacturing jobs were (a) lost and (b) created in (i) Coventry, (ii) west midlands and (iii) nationally in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics but an indication of net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employees in employment at different dates.

The following tables give the available information. Table 1 gives, for the west midlands region and Great Britain in the years specified, the annual change in the estimated number of employees in employment in manufacturing industries, analysed according to the 1980 standard industrial classification (SIC).

Information about employment for local areas is only available from the Department's censuses of employment. Table 2 gives, for the Coventry jobcentre area, the change between each census date since 1974 in the estimated number of employees in employment in manufacturing industries, analysed according to the 1968 SIC. Analyses according to the 1980 SIC are not available for local areas prior to 1981.

Youth Training

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the relative value of mode A youth training scheme schemes and mode B youth training scheme schemes, respectively, in making the transition from school to work.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 356]: One of the main aims of the youth training scheme is to help young people make the transition from school to work. Most places on the scheme are sponsored by employers under "mode A" of the scheme as this provides the most realistic introduction to working life and generally the best prospects for employment. However, there is a continuing need for "mode B" schemes, particularly in areas where there may be a shortage of employer-led schemes.

The Manpower Services Commission conducts sample surveys of young people who leave the scheme. The results to date show that leavers from mode A schemes are significantly more successful in finding work than their counterparts in mode B.

WALES

Planning Appeals

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what steps have been taken to speed up decision-making procedures on appeal; and what is the longest delay at present in the Welsh Office between the original appeal and the decision;

(2) what is the median time for planning appeals using (a) the public inquiry procedure with the decision reserved to the Secretary of State, (b) the public inquiry procedure with the decision power devolved to the inspector and (c) the written representation procedure; and how all these times compare with the average two years ago.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The required information is given in the following table. Speedier handling has resulted from the transfer of most appeals to inspectors and from a number of other procedural improvements. Most significant have been the creation of a separate Welsh-based unit of the inspectorate and the introduction of the "Express Appeals" system for accelerating the initital stages of documentation. The longest delays occur on cases recovered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and dealt with by the written method. Such cases are generally complex and require more time for proper consideration. In 1984 the median time for such cases was 48 weeks.

Median times taken to determine appeals under sections 36 and 53 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 in Wales.

		1982 Weeks	1984 Weeks
Appeals decided by Secretary of State	Inquiry method	59	32
	Written method	54	48
Appeals decided by inspector	Inquiry method	33	30
	Written method	25	21

Note: Median times are derived by ranking all appeals in order of times taken and taking the middle case as being representative of all.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospital Staffs (Hours)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average number of hours worked each week by National Health Service nurses and junior hospital doctors, respectively; and what have been the trends in these figures in recent years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Following is the information requested. The figures for nurses and junior hospital doctors cannot sensibly be compared with each other at all.

Those for nurses are the averages of the actual hours worked by a sample of NHS nursing and midwifery staff during a specified pay period. We reduced nurses' contracted hours from 40 to 37½ per week in 1980-81.

The figures for junior doctors show the average number of contracted hours, which include a standard working week of 40 hours plus periods of on-call liability. In many cases, however, these are hours during which the doctor may be called in for duty, not hours actually worked. Nevertheless, we continue to take active steps to encourage authorities to reduce the excessive hours of some junior doctors and to press the profession to co-operate with this aim at local level.

NHS (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he has taken to ensure that health authorities are fully taking into account the compensation element of early retirement expenditure and the net costs of redundancy payments when assessing competitive tenders for ancillary services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Health authorities received guidance in our circular HC(83)18 that the total costs to them of redundancy payments and other severance payments should be taken into account in the appraisal of competitive tenders.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is available to him concerning the costs and total numbers of early retirements and redundancies from National Health Service ancillary services following the replacement of in-house provision by outside contractors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As explained in my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on 24 April, at column 494, we do not collect information centrally on the numbers of redundancies or their cost, and detailed information on premature retirements has been collected only since 1 April 1984.

However, between 1 April 1984 and 31 March 1985, 303 ancillary workers were prematurely retired as a result of competitive tendering, either because the contract was let outside or because of staff reductions in-house. The lump sum compensation paid totalled £354,482·67, with an average of £1,169·91, and the average compensation element in the annual pensions awarded was £389·96.

Cancer (Nuclear Power)

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further work is currently being undertaken following Sir Douglas Black's recommendations that more research is needed into the possible link between childhood cancers and nuclear power installations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have commissioned research projects which will implement the first four recommendations of the report. Work is under way and the results of this research will become available over the next three years.

We are still discussing with other Government Departments, outside bodies and clinicians from West Cumbria the best means of carrying out the other research and investigations recommended in the report.

Equipment (Costs)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average cost of a new (a) King's Fund bed, (b) operating table, (c) renal dialysis machine and (d) whole-body scanner.

Mr. John Patten: Costs vary with the types and models of equipment. Approximate average costs or ranges of costs are:

King's Fund Bed*	330
Operating Table	5,000-15,000
Renal Dialysis Machine	7,000-10,000
Whole-Body Scanner	220,000-1 million

* Standard variable height model.

Doctors (Salaries)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average salary of a junior doctor employed by the National Health Service in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is as follows:

Grade	Average Salary (mid-point of Scale) £
House Officer	11,400
Senior House Officer	13,875
Registrar	15,700
Senior Registrar	17,940

However, I should advise my hon. Friend that, for a variety of reasons concerned with the duties and conditions of junior doctors, average salary is not a very accurate guide to average earnings. It is also difficult to define average salary, but our calculations of the number of contracted hours multiplied by mid-point of scale for the figures above is the best we can do.

Islington Health Authority

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what value of services are done by private contractors in the Islington health district.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The annual accounts for Islington health authority for 1983-84, the latest available, show a total expenditure of £853,771 for services undertaken by private contractors.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the annual budget of the Islington district health authority for each year since 1982 and projected until 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Allocations to district health authorities are the responsibility of regional health authorities. The hon. Member may wish to approach North-East Thames regional health authority for this information.

Homeless Persons (Removal Expenses)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what provision exists through the Department of Health and Social Security to meet removal expenses of homeless persons on supplementary benefit at short notice who have been refused help by the local authority;

(2) whether he has any plans to allow for the provision of removal expenses for homeless families.

Mr. Whitney: Subject to satisfying the normal conditions, homeless persons can receive help for removal expenses by way of single payments of supplementary benefit under the provisions of regulation 13 of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations if they are being moved under the provisions of section 5(3) of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 which covers the situation where the homeless person is moving from one local authority area to another where he has a close connection with the area of the receiving authority. Payments to other homeless persons can be made only under regulation 30 of the regulations where the adjudication officer is of the opinion that a single payment is the only means by which serious damage or serious risk to the health or safety of any member of the assessment unit may be prevented.

Benefits

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average payment of social security benefits, including housing benefit, paid to unemployed claimants at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated average weekly payment of social security benefits to unemployed claimants for 1984-85 was £44. This includes certificated housing benefit but excludes standard housing benefit and those benefits such as child benefit which remain payable in the event of the claimant not being unemployed.

Community Nursing Services

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he is making for a review of community nursing services in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In recent years there have been changes in the organisation of the National Health Service and shifts in patterns of care which have led to increasing demands on nursing services provided for and in the community. We have decided that the time has come to take a fresh look at important questions about the role of nurses, midwives and health visitors working as part of primary health and care teams and in different community health programmes. We are concerned about the extent to which different services may overlap, whether there are gaps, whether the training provided is well matched to the tasks community nursing staff now face, and whether the services are cost effective.

We have decided therefore to set up a community nursing review team with the following terms of reference:

"To study the nursing services provided outside hospitals by Health Authorities, and to report to the Secretary of State on how resources can be used more effectively, so as to improve the services available to client groups. The input from nurses employed by general practitioners will be taken into account."

The team will be led by Mrs. Julia Cumberlege, chairman of Brighton health authority. There will be three other members; Mr. Anthony Carr, who recently retired as district nursing officer for Newcastle HA; a lay member and a management consultant whose names will be announced shortly. We expect the review to examine carefully the present position in England, through a programme of visits and consideration of written evidence.

The review will begin in June, and I have asked Mrs. Cumberlege to report back before the end of the year.

Homeless Families (Removal Expenses)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities exercised their discretion to meet the removal expenses for homeless families in receipt of supplementary benefit and unable to make their own arrangements in each of the last four years for which figures are available.

Sir George Young: I have been asked to reply. This information is not available.

SCOTLAND

Forestry

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the tree species used, and proportions of those species planted, by the private sector with forestry grant-aid in the restocking of forests in the periods 1961 to 1970, 1971 to 1980 and 1981 to date.

Mr. John MacKay: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Forestry Grants Scheme

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria the Forestry Commission employs in deciding whether or not to impose conditions when awarding grants made under the forestry grants scheme regarding the management practices of afforestation, including areas to be left unplanted for amenity or conservation purposes.

Mr. John MacKay: The objectives of the forestry grant scheme, to which all applicants have to adhere, include the management of the land to secure good land use and environmental benefits, and the provision of appropriate opportunities for recreation. Every application for grant is considered carefully by the Forestry Commission in the light of these objectives, and consultations are undertaken with other authorities to ensure that the needs of land use, agriculture, amenity and recreation are taken into account before a decision is reached. In many cases modifications, including leaving areas unplanted for amenity or conservation purposes, are made to planting proposals as a result of such consultations.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what powers the Forestry Commission possesses to ensure that afforestation schemes which are refused grant-aid for whatever reason under the forestry grants scheme do not proceed without grant aid.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has no such powers.

Strathclyde Regional Council

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the total revenue expenditure of Strathclyde regional council in each year since 1975, (b) the equivalent figure for each of these years, expressed at November 1984 prices and (c) the percentage of Strathclyde's revenue expenditure which was met by Government rate support grant in each of these years.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	(a) Cash prices			November 1984 prices
Year	(1) Total excluding loan charges	(2) Loan charges	(3) Total	(4) (b) Total excluding loan charges	(5) (c) Percentage of total revenue expenditure (as at col. 3) met by Rate Support Grant per cent.

Notes:

1. All expenditure information on a cash basis in columns (1), (2) and (3) is taken from the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication "Rating Review" and reflects planned expenditure for the years in question. The figures in column (4) include all expenditure relevant for rate support grant purposes, excluding loan charges, and any non-relevant expenditure recorded in the publication. Column (2) gives the level of loan charges relevant for rate support grant and column (3) the total of columns (1) and (2).
2. The figures in column (4) have been converted to November 1984 prices using revaluation factors agreed with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. It is not possible to express loan charges on a fixed price basis.
3. Column (5) provides the percentage of total revenue expenditure (as shown in column (3)) met by rate support grant. The RSG figures have also been taken from "Rating Review". These figures do not include any specific grants paid by the Government to Strathclyde regional council.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the broadleaved woodlands clearfelled under licence and not replanted in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in the Forestry Commission's north Scotland conservancy;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the broadleaved woodlands clearfelled under licence and not replanted in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in the Forestry Commission's east Scotland conservancy;

(3) if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the broadleaved woodlands clearfelled under licence and not replanted in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in the Forestry Commission's west Scotland conservancy;

(4) if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the broadleaved woodlands clearfelled under licence and not replanted in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in the Forestry Commission's south Scotland conservancy;

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Foreign Compensation (Czechoslovakia) Order 1982

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many claims have been lodged under the Foreign Compensation (Czechoslovakia) Order 1982; what is the reason for the delay in making payments; what time limit there is on the making of such claims; whether arrangements exist for payment while claimants are still alive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Altogether 2,204 claims have been lodged with the Foreign Compensation Commission under the terms of the Foreign Compensation (Czechoslovakia) Order 1982. The closing date for lodging claims under this order was 31 August 1983. The circumstances which led to many of these claims were such that we have had to approach the Czechoslovak authorities on behalf of the Foreign Compensation Commission to try and obtain additional information which the claimants have been unable to provide themselves, in order to verify the claims. Some 1,700 queries have been put to the Czechoslovak authorities and, while they are being very co-operative in this matter and have already supplied over 330 replies to the queries, it is inevitable that they will need more time to process the large number which remain outstanding. Up to the end of April 1985, the Foreign Compensation Commission had reached decisions on 373 of the claims.

European Commission of Human Rights

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much Her Majesty's Government have contributed to the running of the European Commission of Human Rights and the Court since 1979.

Mr. Renton: Since there is no separate budget for the European Commission and Court of Human Rights, the actual cost of our contribution since 1979 is not readily available. I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Vietnam

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans to improve diplomatic and cultural relations with Vietnam.

Mr. Luce: There is little scope for closer diplomatic and cultural relations between Britian and Vietnam while the Vietnamese Government continue their illegal occupation of Cambodia and their serious abuses of human rights.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current relations with Vietnam.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 21 February 1984, at column 478.

Chile

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department takes in accordance with Her Majesty's Government's policy on human rights to monitor the publications and activities of the opposition parties and human rights groups in Chile.

Mr. Renton: One of the many functions of Her Majesty's embassy in Santiago is to maintain regular contact with the democratic opposition and with human rights groups in Chile.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office also monitors regularly the publications put out by opposition and human rights groups.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to ban all arms sales to Chile.

Mr. Renton: We believe that a total embargo would be ineffective. Nevertheless, as in the past, we seek to ensure that British firms do not sell items to Chile which, in our judgment, are likely to be used for internal repression.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if relations with Chile were re-examined in the wake of the imposition of the state of siege there in November 1984.

Mr. Renton: We keep the situation in Chile under constant review and leave the Chilean Government in no doubt about our concern over the violation of human rights and the absence of normal political liberties.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will take part in a meeting of Foreign Ministers of the European Community, as called for in the European Parliament resolution of 17 April to discuss Chile;

(2) what policy Her Majesty's Government have adopted in the institutions of the European Community with regard to the resolution of the European Parliament about Chile passed on 18 April.

Mr. Renton: We remain in frequent and close touch with our Community partners about matters of common concern, including the situation in Chile, both at the European Council and through the political co-operation machinery.

German Democratic Republic (Embassy Staff)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to increase staffing levels at the British embassy in the German Democratic Republic in order to seek to improve trade prospects for British firms.

Mr. Renton: The staffing levels of Her Majesty's embassies are reviewed periodically during visits by teams of Foreign and Commonwealth Office inspectors. The last inspection of the embassy in the German Democratic Republic was in September 1984.

Drugs

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his meeting with his European counterparts to discuss drug taking in member states.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) yesterday, at column 428.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Meat (Refund Payments)

18. Mr. Beggs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated cost to the Northern Ireland meat industry of financing eight to nine week delays in exchange refund payments by the Intervention Board for Agriculture for meat placed under customs control in Northern Ireland; and if he will take steps to reduce delay in payment to the 10 to 14-day pattern of other EEC countries.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that the information requested is not available, but every effort is being made to overcome these delays.

Sugar

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate how the proposed minimum price for B quota sugar compares with the cost of production on a large sugar beet farm; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving the breakdown of costs on a representative large sugar beet farm in 1984 or 1983.

Mr. MacGregor: Sugar beet is grown as a single crop and it is not meaningful to relate costs of production to A B or C quota sugar.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the export restitutions on exports of white sugar and the quantities exported, together with the levies on imports of raw sugar;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1973 and each of the past five years the threshold target and intervention prices for white sugar, the basic beet price, the amount and price for A and B quota sugar beet, the amount of the import levy on raw and white sugar and net exports of white sugar.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested on import levies is not readily available and an be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The other information can be obtained for the most recent years from the Commission's publication "The Agricultural Situation in the Community" report 1984. Similar information for the earlier years is contained in previous reports. Copies of these are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1970 the United Kingdom price for white sugar compared with the world price.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is given in the table:

* For 1970-71 to 1972-73 no guaranteed prices for white sugar were set in the United Kingdom. The prices shown for 1973-74 onwards are the intervention prices for white sugar which from 1977-78 include the storage levy.

† There were two price settlements in 1974. The price shown is that fixed in the autumn.

‡ There is no single world price for sugar. The prices shown are the average London daily price which is representative of the world price.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the basis for the proposed increase in the price of sugar under the common agricultural policy.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested can be found in volume 1 of the European Commission's proposals concerning the fixing of prices for agricultural products for 1985-86 (explanatory memorandum 4582/85 dated 28 February 1985) a copy of which is in the Library.

Cereals

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the output of cereals in each European Economic Community country over the past five years compared with 1970, 1960 and 1955.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest available estimates for the level of production in 1984 are set out. Those for 1955, 1960 and 1970 were published by EUROSTAT in "Land use and production, 1955-1979" and for 1980 to 1983 in the Commission's publications "The Agricultural Situation in the Community" reports 1983 and 1984.

Hill Farming

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the net income of hill farmers in the latest year for which estimates are available.

Mr. MacGregor: Average net farm incomes on hill and upland (less favoured areas) cattle and sheep farms for 1983-84 are shown in table 27 of the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" (Cmnd. 9423) which is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish a table in the Official Report giving the size distribution of hill farms by (a) acreage and (b) standard man-days or European supply units, or both.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is not readily available and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

EC (Spending)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the cost per cow of all the European Economic Community subventions to dairy products, the cost per animal of the subventions to beef, sheep and pigs and the cost per tonne of the subventions on other crops.

Mr. MacGregor: Information on European Commission expenditure in recent years on the main agricultural products is summarised in "The Agricultural Situation in the Community — 1984 Report" published by the Commission which is in the Library. The report also contains details of livestock numbers and crop production.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each common agricultural policy product the amount exported with financial aid from the European Economic Community budget in 1973 and in each of the past five years.

Mr. MacGregor: Information on the volumes of exports receiving aid from the Community budget is not readily available. However details of Community exports of agricultural products for the latest years are summarised in "The Agricultural Situation in the Community—1984 Report" published by the Commission. Information for the earlier years is contained in the reports for 1981 and 1975.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the proposed guide and intervention prices under the common agricultural policy as a percentage of the relevant United Kingdom price in 1972-73.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission's proposals for CAP prices for 1985-86 are contained in European document 4582/85 (explanatory memorandum of 28 February 1985); guarantee prices obtaining in the United Kingdom in 1972-73 are contained in the "Annual Review and Determination of Guarantees 1972" (Cmnd. 4928). Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the cost in 1973 and in the latest available year of the European Economic Community subventions on the various cereal crops, sugar beet and rapeseed in terms of cost per acre of crop produced, together with the corresponding United Kingdom figure for the average of the years 1967-68 to 1970-71.

Mr. MacGregor: Information about European Community expenditure on the main agricultural products is summarised in the series of annual reports entitled "The Agricultural Situation in the Community" published by the Commission: these reports also contain information on the areas of individual crops produced and more detailed analyses are available on the Eurostat computer data base, CRONOS. Copies are in the Library. Detailed information on expenditure on agriculture by the United Kingdom exchequer and on crop areas is contained in the "Annual Review of Agriculture" for the appropriate years. Copies of this are also available in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the agreement reached in the European Council on the restriction of agricultural spending relates only to expenditure under the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage of the European Economic Community budget accounted for by this section in each year since 1981 and the percentage implied in the budget for 1985.

Mr. MacGregor: The financial guideline for agriculture, which forms part of the Council's conclusions on budgetary discipline, applies to the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, excluding fisheries. The percentage shares of total budget taken by this expenditure (titles 1 and 2) since 1981 are as follows:

	Per cent.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in agricultural spending under the common agricultural policy in 1984 and budgeted for 1985 compared with the increase in other spending under the European Economic Community budget.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1970 the percentage increase in the European Economic Community and in the United Kingdom of gross domestic product expenditure on food and the increase in spending under the common agricultural policy.

Mr. MacGregor: Details of expenditure on food in individual member states of the European Community are available from the databank of the European Commission (CRONOS). Expenditure under the common agricultural policy is published in the reports of the EC Court of Auditors and in the financial reports on the EAGGF. This information is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in expenditure proposed for agriculture under the European Economic Community budget for 1985 and the distribution of the increase within and between the main sections of the agricultural budget.

Mr. MacGregor: The following table sets out the increase foreseen in expenditure under the common agricultural policy between 1984 and 1985.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the proportion of agricultural land cultivated in holdings with 10 or more regular whole-time workers.

Mr. MacGregor: The proportion of agricultural land in England and Wales on holdings with 10 or more regular whole-time workers as recorded at the June 1984 agricultural census was 6 per cent.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1955 the number of agricultural holdings larger than the threshold below which minor holdings have been excluded from the census from time to time; and if he will distinguish the number of tenanted holdings.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 26 April 1985, c. 587]: The information requested is as follows:

* Information on tenure is not available for years before 1970.
† From 1955 to 1967, all holdings with an acre or more were included, except where agricultural activity was known to be small.

‡ From 1968 to 1969, main holdings were those with at least an acre in total and —at least 10 acres of crops and grass, or at least one full-time worker, or a standard labour requirement of at least 26 standard man days a year.

From 1970, holdings with less than an acre were included, if they met one of the three other criteria at ‡.

ʿ From 1973, the standard man day criterion was raised to 40, the other two criteria remaining the same.

• From 1980, the threshold criteria were changed to include holdings with one or more of the following: at least six hectares of total area; a standard annual labour requirement of at least 100 standard man days; at least one regular whole-time worker; a glasshouse area of at least 100 sq. metres.

General

Changes in numbers of holdings from year to year are affected by addition and deletion of smaller holdings near the threshold, and by the amalgamation of previously separate holdings. This is a continuous process but in some years special exercises produce larger changes. For instance, the net fall of 3,000 between 1983 and 1984 was largely the result of reclassifying holdings up or down across the threshold, following the June 1983 census and the minor holdings census of March 1983. Such changes affecting smaller holdings are of little significance in measuring the aggregates of agricultural activity.

Apple Intervention Scheme

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is proposed to extend the European Economic Community apple intervention scheme for Bramley apples beyond 31 May of the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: No. After consultation with growers' representatives and in the light of the existing market situation, the European Commission has decided not to propose an extension of the scheme for apples beyond 31 May.

Rural Estate

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to publish (a) a Green Paper and (b) a White Paper on the rural estate.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 7 May 1985, c. 322]: One of the recommendations of the House of Commons Environment Committee's first report, on the operation and effectiveness of part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, was that the Government should undertake a review of the whole use of the rural estate and produce a White Paper. The Government's response to that report, which will include a reply to this recommendation, will be issued shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Security

1. Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: Since I last answered questions in the House on 4 April, two civilians have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province.

The security forces' efforts to defeat terrorism continue, and since the beginning of this year a total of 171 people have been charged with serious offences, including 20 with murder, 89 weapons, 3,327 rounds of ammunition and 2,222 lb of explosives have been recovered.

Most of these explosives—about 1·5 tonnes—were found near Dungannon on 25 April. By denying the terrorists the use of this murderous material, the security forces undoubtedly prevented them from inflicting a great deal of destruction and suffering on the community and I echo the commendation by my hon. Friend earlier.

Mr. Yeo: asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the security position in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) earlier today.

Housing Executive

15. Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is satisfied with the operation of the Housing Executive's arrangements for repairs.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter that I have discussed with the chairman of the Housing Executive. The current arrangements for dealing with repairs are generally effective, but the Executive is continually searching for ways of improving its maintenance systems and its repairs service for tenants.

Magilligan Prison

17. Rev. Ian Paisley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the situation at the Magilligan prison.

Mr. Scott: Her Majesty's prison, Magilligan, at present holds 317 prisoners, all of whom are conforming to prison rules. The structure of the prison system as a whole, including Magilligan, is being considered in the context of the planned opening of Her Majesty's prison, Maghaberry.

Asbestos

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement on the current approach of the Departments under his control to the problem of asbestos in Northern Ireland;

(2) if he has any plans for launching a publicity campaign in order to make the population of Northern Ireland more aware of the dangers of asbestos and remedial measures which ought to be taken to prevent asbestos-related diseases.

Mr. Chris Patten: The current approach is contained in the Asbestos Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1969 and the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1984. These regulations impose requirements for the safety and welfare of persons employed in factories and other premises and places where processes are carried on which involve asbestos or any article capable of giving rise to asbestos dust. In addition, the licensing regulations require an employer or self-employed person who carries out work with asbestos insulation or coating to do so in accordance with a licence issued to him by the Department of the Economic Development. That department is currently consulting on a Northern Ireland equivalent of proposed Great Britain regulations which will prohibit the importation, supply or use of certain types of asbestos.

There are no plans to launch a specific publicity campaign on the dangers of asbestos. The Health and Safety Agency established by the Department of Economic Development regularly publicises both the hazards of asbestos at work and the requirements of the relevant legislation.

A leaflet entitled "Asbestos in Housing" which was issued by the Government throughout the United Kingdom in 1983 is being revised, and copies of the new version will be made available for distribution in Northern Ireland.

Homoeopathy

Sir John Wells asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends to implement the recommendations by the Health and Social Services Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly on homoeopathy within the National Health Service.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is giving careful consideration to the Assembly's report and will be responding to it as soon as possible.

Castlereagh (Grant Aid)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the amount of loan or grant to be paid from the European regional development fund towards the cost of the Robinson leisure centre in Castlereagh; what are the terms of this asssistance; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply,7 May 1985, c. 347]: No European regional development fund assistance has been committed to the cost of this centre.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has approved the submission by Castlereagh borough council of an application to the European regional development fund for financial asistance, either by grant or loan, towards the capital costs of the proposed Dundonald international ice-bowl by Castlereagh borough council.

Mr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 347]: No; Castlereagh borough council has written to the Department of Economic Development applying for a European regional development fund grant and has provided preliminary information which is being considered.

Water Service (Unpaid Bills)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what amount of money is still owed in payments to the Department of the Environment (Water Service), in respect of each of the last four financial years, by those persons who have a metered supply.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 7 May 1985, c. 348]: Information is available only to illustrate the accumulated amount carried forward at the billing cycle closest to the end of each financial year as follows:

PRIME MINISTER

Tax Credit System

35. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister what is the Government's policy towards the introduction of a tax credit system.

The Prime Minister: This question will be among those considered in the Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation, which will be published later this year.

Scotland (Visits)

Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister if she will list in the Official Report all the parliamentary constituencies in Scotland which she has visited in an official capacity since May 1979, and the dates on which each visit took place.

117. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister how many days she has spent on official visits to Scotland in each of the last five years.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

5-6 September 1984	Edinburgh Central Livingston Stirling Perth and Kinross Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber

Visits where I have been a guest of Her Majesty the Queen are excluded.

Prior to June 1983 constituencies are given on the old basis before the Boundary Commission changes came into effect.

Foreign Tours (Cost)

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister what is the latest figure for the cost of her foreign tours since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The latest estimate for expenditure by the Prime Minister's Office on foreign visits during the period May 1979 to March 1985 is £2,426,531.

Entertainment Costs

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister what is the latest figure for the cost of entertainment at (a) Chequers and (b) 10 Downing street (i) since May 1979 and (ii) since June 1983.

The Prime Minister: The latest figure for the cost of entertainment during the period of May 1979 to March 1985 is £96,598. The latest figure for the period June 1983 to March 1985 is £34,635. These figures cover entertainment at both Chequers and No. 10 Downing street; the information is not available by location.

Private Office (Cost)

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister what is the latest cost figure for maintaining her private office since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The cost figure of running No. 10 Downing street and all costs associated with the Office of the Prime Minister, from and including the financial year 1979-80, is as follows.

*Total annual cost at outturn prices

Year	Cost £
1979-80	1,299,601
1980-81	1,614,824
1981-82†	2,303,301
1982-83	2,554,752
1983-84	2,885,042
1984-85‡	3,288,367

* Includes salaries and wages, pension liability and administration costs, but excludes the salary of the Prime Minister, messengerial and cleaning services; and any allowance for accommodation until 1983-84 when the property repayment scheme was introduced. Following the abolition of the CPRS the policy unit in the Prime Minister's Office was strengthened by four staff. In the last full year of its existence (1982-83) CPRS employed 35 people and cost £1,109,000. Thus, while the cost of the Prime Minister's Office increased as a result of the abolition of the CPRS, substantial net overall savings were made.

† The increase in cost between 1980-81 and 1981-82 reflects the change in the basis of charging by MOD for aircraft used by the Prime Minister, and the introduction of repayment for the service staff at Chequers, previously provided as an allied service.

‡ Latest estimate of 1984-85 outturn.

Economic Summit

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister what consultations she had with Commonwealth countries on matters to be discussed at the Western economic summit meeting in Bonn.

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the views of Commonwealth countries on international economic issues from the frequent discussions I have with my Commonwealth counterparts. I am looking forward to discussing such matters further with them at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting this autumn.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Council of Ministers (Decisions)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister in what circumstances Her Majesty's Government decide to place before Parliament for decision matters decided by the European Economic Community Council of Ministers; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, Tuesday 7 May 1985, c. 310]: Decisions of the European Council which fail to be implemented by means of Community instruments become the subject of normal Council procedures and of the parliamentary scrutiny procedure in this country. Decisions in the field of political co-operation are implemented as part of our foreign policy, for which Ministers are answerable to Parliament.

WALES

Homes (Insulation)

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many grants for homes insulation have been given in each year since 1978; and what estimate he has of the number of grants paid to households where one member of the household was in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information on the number of grants paid is as follows:

Number of Insulation Grants Paid

Year	Number
1978	5,815
1979	20,231
1980	19,523
1981	24,231
1982	28,883
1983	29,480
*1984	20,362

* Provisional

No information is collected centrally which identifies households in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of public sector houses which do not benefit from adequate insulation.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: An estimate is only available on a Great Britain basis.

ENERGY

Offshore Fields

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the offshore oilfields which have or may have already passed the point of peak production.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Department of Energy's annual report entitled "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom 1985" lists in section 4 operators' estimates of when producing oilfields have achieved, or are expected to achieve, peak production.

DEFENCE

Departmental Committees of Inquiry

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many departmental committees of inquiry he and his predecessors, including First Lords of the Admiralty, Secretaries of State for War, Secretaries of State for Air, Ministers of Supply, Ministers for Defence Procurement, Ministers of Aviation and Ministers of Aviation (Supply), have commissioned since 1955; and what were the subjects the committees investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them and the dates they reported.

Mr. Stanley: The reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury, on 1 May at column 142 applies also to Ministry of Defence committees of inquiry. However, from records that are readily available, it appears that since 1973 the report of one other departmental committee of inquiry established by the Secretary of State for Defence has been published as a Command Paper, that being "The Protection of Military Information — Report of the Study Group on Censorship" chaired by General Sir Hugh Beach — Cmnd. 9112 which was published in December 1983. In addition, an explanatory memorandum on the report of the defence lands committee chaired by the right hon. the Lord Nugent of Guildford was published as Cmnd. 5364 in July 1973.

Far East Pilgrimage

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is prepared to include Burma in the far east pilgrimage which he is organising for veterans and war widows.

Mr. Lee: Detailed planning continues for the proposed visit to the far east, which was announced by the Prime Minister on 14 February at column 230. We are not, therefore, in a position to say which countries will be visited. A further announcement will be made in the near future.

Classified Documents

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent discovery of classified defence documents relating to Aldermaston and the Tornado aircraft on a rubbish dump in London.

Mr. Butler: Investigations are in progress into the circumstances surrounding the discovery of these documents and it would be wrong to comment further until these investigations have been completed.

Trident

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide a breakdown, by the following budget categories, of the savings attributable to the King's bay decision on maintaining United Kingdom Trident missiles in the United States of America: the submarines, the missiles, the weapons systems, the shore construction, the warhead miscellaneous and unallocated contingencies.

Mr. Butler: The savings attributable to the decision to process missiles at King's bay instead of in the United Kingdom are approximately £700 million at average 1984-85 prices and at an exchange rate of £1−$1·38. The missiles and shore construction each account for some 45 per cent. of the saving, with the remainder being attributed mainly to weapon systems.

Nuclear Devices (Testing)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in their undergound testing of nuclear devices, Her Majesty's Government restrict underground explosions to devices with a force of 150 kilotons of TNT or less, in line with policies adopted by the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Butler: Yes.

Dechmont Rifle Range

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many members of (a) the regular forces, (b) reserve forces and (c) civilian organisations used Dechmont rifle range in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) on how many days per year on average Dechmont rifle range is used by (a) the regular forces, (b) reserve forces and (c) civilian organisations;

(3) what was the total cost to public funds in the last year for which figures are available of the Dechmont rifle range;

(4) how many units of (a) the regular forces and (b) reserve forces used Dechmont rifle range in the last year for which figures are available;

(5) how many accidents to persons, livestock and property arising from the operation of the range have occurred on or near to Dechmont rifle range in the last five years;

(6) what is the exact distance between the firing points at Dechmont rifle range and the nearest civilian residential accommodation;

(7) how much money was paid by his Department to Strathclyde regional council and Glasgow district council either in the form of rates or for other services in the last year for which figures are available;

(8) how often Dechmont rifle range was used on a Sunday in the last year for which figures are available;

(9) how much money was received by his Department from civilian rifle clubs for the use of Dechmont rifle range in the last year for which figures are available;

(10) how many full-time soldiers or civilians are employed at Dechmont rifle range;

(11) what is the total acreage of Dechmont rifle range;

(12) how much money was expended by his Department for fencing and for walling at Dechmont rifle range in the last year for which figures are available; and how many people are permanently employed on this work;

(13) what insurance arrangements are made by his Department in respect of accidents to people and livestock on or near to Dechmont rifle range;

(14) how many rounds of live ammunition were used at Dechmont rifle range by regular or reserve forces in the last year for which figures are available; and what was the cost to public funds of the ammunition;

(15) what arrangements are made to warn members of the public when live ammunition is used at Dechmont rifle range.

Mr. Lee: My noble Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member.

Re-Chem Plants (Bonnybridge and Pontypool)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Defence what quantities of waste from Porton Down have been sent to Re-Chem plants at Bonnybridge and Pontypool for disposal since 1975.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 7 May at column 386.

Centaur Military Vehicle

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has sought any information or conducted any assessment, of the performance of the British-manufactured Centaur military vehicle in use in Chile.

Mr. Butler: My Department is familiar with the basic specification and performance of the Centaur multi-role military vehicle and has in the past conducted trials on one of its variants. No specific assessment has been made or information sought on the trials of the vehicle in Chile.

War Widows (Visits to Cemeteries)

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Defence what visits to war cemeteries are being arranged in the current financial year for war widows under the scheme announced by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley), on 22 October 1984, Official Report, column 471.

Mr. Stanley: For the first year of the new Government-funded scheme, The Royal British Legion's programme of visits to overseas war graves planned so far is as follows:

Country/Region	Area Covered
Italy (South)	Salerno, Cassino, Anzio, Caserta, Naples
Tunisia	All war cemeteries
Japan/Hong Kong	Yokohama/Hong Kong
S Germany	Munich, Durnbach
Somme	Arras, Amiens, Theipval, Vimy, Pozieres, Beaumont Hamil
Normandy	All war cemeteries
Luxembourg and Belgium	Honon, Brussels
Germany	Hamburg, Hanover, Soltau, Berlin
Holland	All mainland cemeteries including Rheinberg and Reischswald Forest
Italy (North)	Argenta Gap, Florence, Coriano Ridge, Ancona, Faenza, Forli, Sanierno
Egypt	El Alamein, Cairo, Alexandria
Belgium	Menin Gate, Ypres Salient Cemeteries
Thailand	Kanchanburi, Chungkai

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions on which military personnel from other countries have visited the Falklands since 1983, stating in each case their country of origin and the purpose of the visit.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 8 May 1985, c. 385]: There have been no official visits by foreign military personnel. However, such records as are readily available show that three Canadian officers have visited the Falklands as part of their duties with the British units to which they are attached. This is part of the normal and productive officer exchange programme between Canada and the United Kingdom. To provide details of all additional exchange personnel who may have visited the Falklands for the period in question would require a check of the records of all units posted to the Falklands during that time, which could not be undertaken except at disproportionate cost.

Defence Secretariat 17

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence which parts of his Department now handle the responsibilities formerly handled by Defence Secretariat 17.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 8 May 1985, c. 383]: The responsibilities of the former Defence Secretariat 17 for nuclear and conventional arms control and disarmament have passed to the defence arms control unit, while the division's other nuclear policy responsibilities have been allocated to the director of nuclear policy and security.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Homes (Insulation)

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many grants for homes insulation have been given in each year since 1978; and what estimate he has of the number of grants paid to households where one member of the household was in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Dr. Boyson: I am informed by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, which administers the home insulation grant scheme in the Province, that the number of grants paid in each year since 1 December 1978 is as follows:

Year	Grants
*1978-79	1,882
1979-80	11,119
1980-81	7,452
1981-82	7,267
1982-83	5,844
1983-84	4,984
1984-85	4,999
	43,547

* 1 December 1978 to 31 March 1979.

In 1984-85 (the only year for which a figure is available) 850 grants were paid to households of which one or more members were in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the number of public sector houses which do not benefit from adequate insulation.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive who has advised me that about 47,000 Housing Executive dwellings do not have adequate roof space insulation. There are about 30,000 dwellings which could benefit by having cavity wall insulation but do not at present have such insulation.

Armagh Prison (Female Prisoners)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, in the month of April; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being concluded; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance at Armagh courthouse on remand, attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons, itemising the other reasons.

Mr. Scott: During April 1985 a total of 52 searches were carried out on 21 prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Armagh: 12 prisoners were searched once, eight were searched twice, and a life sentence prisoner taking part in a pre-release programme was searched on 24 occasions. The latter prisoner was offered accommodation in a separate self-contained unit of the prison, which would have eliminated the need for her to undergo the full reception search procedure, but she preferred to remain located with other prisoners.

No prohibited articles were found during these searches, and no prisoner refused to be searched. Searches were carried out in the following circumstances:

	Number
First admission on remand and awaiting trial	5
First admission on sentence, and final discharge	9
Attending Armagh Remand Court	1
Bail Court appearances	3
Outside hospitals	3
Pre-release programme	21
Home leave scheme	10
Total	52

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Defence

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what encouragement the Government are planning to give to local authorities to develop civil defence to cope with peacetime emergencies as well as with war; and if he will seek to amend the Civil Defence Act 1948 accordingly.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The existing guidance to local authorities will be incorporated in the consolidated emergency planning guidance to local authorities, to be issued in the near future, makes clear that there is no objection to the use of civil defence resources in planning for peacetime emergencies provided that this is done without detriment to the performance for an authority's civil defence duties. It remains our intention to fulfil the manifesto commitment with regard to extending the Civil Defence Act 1948 at the earliest practicable opportunity.

Advisory Council on Race Relations

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings of the Advisory Council on Race Relations have taken place since 31 March; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Brittan: The council met on 29 April under my chairmanship. Discussion concentrated on two issues. First, there was a positive and constructive discussion on the Swann report on the education of children from ethnic minority groups. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education led the discussion, which ranged widely over the major recommendations of the report, but focused particularly on the possible causes of educational under-achievement and the question of ethnic monitoring of pupils and teachers.

The council also had a most useful discussion about the role of the Manpower Services Commission, focusing on the training opportunities it could offer to people from the minority communities. The chairman of the MSC was present and reported on a number of positive steps which had been taken since the council last considered this issue in October 1984.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Human Rights (Bulgaria and Greece)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last made representations to the Governments of Bulgaria and Greece about their policies on the human rights of the Turkish minorities in their respective countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend discussed this question with the Bulgarian authorities during his visit to Sofia on 10-11 February. He has had no such discussions with the Greek authorities as the situation in the two countries does not seem to be comparable.

Nicaragua

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what references are made to Nicaragua in the European Economic Community Commission's negotiating mandate for a European Economic Community-Central America co-operation agreement; if it is proposed to treat Nicaragua in a similar way to the other countries in the region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The Commission has not yet made proposals for the negotiating mandate for a European Community/Central America co-operation agreement. By analogy with the European Community/Andean Pact Co-operation Agreement and the European Community/ASEAN Co-operation Agreement, we would expect a European Community/Central America agreement to be negotiated on a collective regional basis.

Discrimination Against Women

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government have not yet ratified the United Nations convention for the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Renton: We are still considering this convention in the light of our existing legislation and hope to be in a position to make an announcement about ratification soon.

Poland

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had in the framework of the International Monetary Fund about raising the level of financial loans available to Poland to assist economic recovery.

Mr. Rifkind: None. Discussions about Poland's application to join the International Monetary Fund are continuing.

Nuclear Weapons Freeze (Europe)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of East Germany about proposals for a nuclear weapons freeze in Europe.

Mr. Luce: During my right hon. and learned Friend's visit to East Berlin and the German Democratic Republic he discussed arms control issues with Mr. Fischer and Mr. Honecker. On the question of a freeze on nuclear weapons, my right hon. and learned Friend stressed our view that the aim should be to achieve significant reductions in both sides of nuclear weapons rather than a moratorium that would merely freeze the existing imbalance in intermediate range forces in Europe in the Soviet favour.

"Europe—The Future"

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is meant by European integration in paragraph 13 of Her Majesty's Government's Paper, "Europe—The Future," submitted to the European Economic Community Heads of Government meeting in June 1984.

Mr. Rifkind: The phrase denotes the co-operation of European Community member states in pursuit of common objectives and greater unity.

Human Rights (Iran)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Her Majesty's Government last made representations to the Islamic Republic of Iran regarding reported violation of human rights of minority groups, including Baha'is; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: On 2 October last year, the Ten made a demarche in Tehran to the Iranian Government expressing the concern felt by the Governments of the Ten at the continued reports of persecution of the Baha'i community in Iran. We followed this up by co-sponsoring the resolution on human rights in Iran at the 41st session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. The resolution was adopted on 13 March.

Human Rights (Uganda)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent evidence he has received about developments in human rights in Uganda.

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) visited Uganda on 11-12 March. There appears to have been some improvement in human rights although much still remains to be done. We receive regular reports on human rights in Uganda from the British high commission at Kampala.

TRANSPORT

Bus Grant

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received on the definition of rural area for the purposes of transitional bus grant.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received several representations from hon. Members and others on the definition of small towns within which mileage will be eligible for grant and we shall take these into account in reaching a final decision.

Private Cars (Taxation)

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider simplifying the method of taxing private cars.

Mrs. Chalker: New cars are subject to VAT and also to a special car tax, levied at first registration. Thereafter they are subject to vehicle excise duty when they are used on the roads. VED for private cars is levied at a flat rate, currently £100 per annum, although six monthly licences may also be taken out. Almost all relicensing may be done in any of more than 3,000 post offices. The procedure for vehicle excise licensing also serves the purposes of maintaining an accurate vehicles register and of enforcing MOT test and insurance requirements.

Consistent with those other purposes, vehicle excise licensing is as simple and convenient as we can make it. If the hon. Member has any particular examples of complexity in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

M25

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport why several private cars and other vehicles were using the as yet unopened M25 interchange at Leatherhead at 10 am on Wednesday 1 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Advertising agencies, film companies and so on often ask to be allowed to use unopened stretches of motorway which are not yet ready for use by public traffic, for filming or demonstration purposes. The Department gave permission for London Weekend Television to use part of the Leatherhead interchange section of the M25 on 1 May 1985.

Legislation

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to consolidate all transport legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: No. Given the wide ranging nature of my responsibilities, I do not believe that this would serve any useful purpose. Individual areas are of course consolidated when necessary and when the opportunity arises.

North Circular Road

Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider an alteration in the road markings along the single carriageway three-lane section of the north circular road known as Telford road.

Mrs. Chalker: I have considered the markings on this section from the point of view of road safety but am not aware of any special problems. If my hon. Friend has a particular point in mind, perhaps he will write to me.

SCOTLAND

Salmon Industry

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the state of the salmon industry.

Mr. John MacKay: Following a modest increase in reported catches of salmon and grilse from 1,092 tonnes in 1982 to 1,221 tonnes in 1983, provisional figures for 1984 indicate a decline to about 988 tonnes. This is extremely disappointing but may be due in large part to last year's prolonged drought preventing significant numbers of fish from running up rivers until after the fishing season.

Elderly Persons (Dementia)

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what funding is being given to research projects in Scotland investigating the causes of dementia in elderly persons.

Mr. John MacKay: Information relating to all medical research being conducted in Scotland is not available centrally. However, the Scottish Home and Health Department is currently supporting two projects relevant to investigating the causation of dementia in elderly persons. Total funding provided for these projects is some £38,000.

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many projects for the elderly with dementia are funded under the support finance scheme in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: 50 projects for the provision of facilities for the elderly are currently being funded under this scheme. Many of these will be of benefit to the elderly with dementia, and two of them are specifically intended to assist such persons.

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many elderly people with dementia are in psychiatric hospitals in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The number of patients suffering from dementia, aged 65 years and over and resident in Scottish psychiatric hospitals of all types at 31 December 1983 was as follows:

	Number
Males	986
Females	3,206
Total	4,192

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many day centres are planned in each of the next five years for each health board in Scotland for the elderly with dementia;

(2) how many places in day hospitals are planned in each of the next five years for each health board in Scotland for the elderly with dementia;

(3) how many continuing care units for the elderly with dementia are planned to open in each of the next five years for each of the health boards in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally. Health boards are currently reviewing their plans for this type of accommodation.

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many day centres are provided in each health board in Scotland for the elderly with dementia;

(2) how many places are provided in day hospitals for each health board in Scotland for the elderly with dementia.

Mr. John MacKay: The statistics held centrally do not distinguish between the two types of provision. At 31 March 1984 the estimated number of hospitals/centres and the number of places available in the areas of the Health Boards making such provision was as follows:

	Number of hospitals/centres	*Number of places
Ayrshire and Arran	1	25
Argyll and Clyde	3	73
Fife	3	103
Greater Glasgow	2	48
Grampian	4	53
Lothian	7	156
Tayside	7	107
Dumfries and Galloway	1	30
Total	28	595

* Estimated.
Source: ISD(S)1.

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what evidence is available to him on the performance of health boards in Scotland in providing services for the elderly with dementia, in terms of the recommendations of the Scottish Home and Health Department's report "Scottish Health Authorities Priorities for the Eighties", HMSO 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: The evidence available centrally is contained partly in information provided in response to requests by the Scottish Home and Health Department and partly in published and other statistical information collected by the information services division of the Common Services Agency.

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many continuing care units for the elderly with dementia have been opened by each health board in Scotland since the publication of the Scottish Home and Health Department's report "Scottish Health Authorities Priorities for the Eighties", HMSO 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: Two such units have been opened, both in the Grampian health board area.

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many elderly people with dementia are placed in acute medical wards in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not kept centrally.

Leith Academy

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received regarding the proposed new building for Leith academy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Representations have been received from Lothian regional council and from a number of community organisations and individuals in Leith. I have agreed to meet Lothian regional council when they have completed an investment appraisal of secondary school accommodation in the northern part of Edinburgh.

Teachers' Superannuation Fund

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average payment and number of years of payment to recipients out of the Scottish teachers' superannuation fund from the date of retirement to the date of death, indicating any payments to dependants.

Mr. John MacKay: In the year to 31 March 1985 the average pension paid to former members of the teachers' superannuation scheme in Scotland was £4,004 inclusive of pensions increase. The average period during which pension had been paid to former members who died in that year, rounded to the nearest full year, was 16 years. Figures for the dependants of those who died in the year are not readily available. At 31 March 1985 there were 2,177 pensions in payment to dependants of deceased teachers.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average total annual payment (a) out of and (b) into the Scottish teachers superannuation fund; and if, in the latter case, he will give a breakdown of income from employees' contributions, employers' contributions, investment and any other source.

Mr. John MacKay: Since the teachers' superannuation scheme for Scotland has a notional but not an actual fund, all income is paid to the Exchequer, which in turn meets all expenditure. In 1983-84, the latest year for which figures are available, expenditure in respect of the scheme, including pensions increase but excluding the cost of administration, amounted to £106·6 million: teachers contributed £38·7 million, their employers contributed £49·9 million, and £1·1 million was received from miscellaneous sources including transfer values.

It is for actuarial purposes only that the assets and liabilities of the scheme are treated as a notional fund. The notional interest assessed as arising from notional investment was calculated as £107·7 million for the year. The cost of pensions increase, which accounts for 38 per cent. of total expenditure, is met separately by central Government and is not charged to the fund.

Freshwater and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many protection orders have been (a) applied for and (b) granted under the Freshwater and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976; and if he will list in each case the mileage of waters, the names and addresses of the applicants, the permit prices, the times of access and any other restrictions.

Mr. John MacKay: Formal proposals for protection orders have been submitted in respect of six areas. Protection orders have been granted in respect of four areas and were detailed in my reply to the hon. Member on 10 January. Proposals in respect of the River Tay and the Rivers Garnock, Irvine and Annick and other waters in west Strathclyde region have now progressed to the stage of formal consideration; proposals in respect of the former have been advertised and made available for public inspection in terms of paragraph 1 of schedule 1 of the Freshwater and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976. Proposals in respect of the latter are likely to be advertised etc. in the very near future.

The numbers of proprietors and occupiers who submitted proposals for access are 67 in the case of the Tweed, 23 in the Upper Spey and so on, 29 in the River Tummel, 2 in the River Lunan, 107 in the River Tay and 18 in the Rivers Garnock, Irvine and Annick etc. This amounts to some 246 separate names and addresses and it would not be practicable to list them in this reply.

The mileage of water and costs of permits available for fishing are:

River	Mileage	Day Permits	Weekly Permits	Season Permits
Tweed	426	Free-£3	Free-£6	Free-£10
Upper Spey	118	£2-£5	£5-£8	£12
Tummel	200	50p-£2	£2-£6	£5-£25
Lunan	18	£1-£2.50	n/a	£5-£20
Tay	180	£1-£5	£4-£25	n/a
Garnock
Irvine etc.	*	£1-£3.50	£5-£10	£5-£14

* Not calculated.

The permit prices in respect of the Upper Spey, Tay and Garnock, Irvine etc. are current; those in respect of the Tweed, Tummel and Lunan were the prices chargeable at the times of grafting or renewal of the protection orders. Any changes in prices are taken into account when renewals of orders are being considered. In each of the cases above, there are various reductions for old age pensioners and juveniles.

Restrictions on fishing vary in each case. For example there are some restrictions on methods used and night and Sunday fishing. The numbers of rods permitted at any one time on some fisheries is limited whilst in others unlimited access is offered. Bag limits on the numbers of trout caught in any one day are also applied on some fisheries.

Salmon

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about salmon poaching and other offences damaging the salmon industry.

Mr. John MacKay: A great deal of effort is devoted to the enforcement of salmon and sea fisheries legislation by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, district salmon fishery boards, water bailiffs and the police. Fishery protection vessels, fixed wing aircraft, helicopters and shore-based staff equipped with two-way radio telephones are all deployed, with considerable success, to curb the activities of those who fish illegally. In the period from 1 December 1983 to 1 December 1984 there were 321 and 38 prosecutions respectively for salmon poaching in the sea and in fresh water.

My right hon. Friend proposes to complement the ban on the use of drift nets, set from a boat, to fish for salmon by prohibiting in Scottish inshore waters (a) the use of gill nets, set otherwise than from a boat, to fish for salmon and (b) the carriage of monofilament gill nets in British fishing boats. Consultation about those prohibitions are under way in terms of the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984.

Consultations are continuing about the possibility of introducing legislation to deal with several other matters, including a scheme of salmon sales control as an anti-poaching measure.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheepmeat

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount paid out in grants and subsidies on the production and sale of sheepmeat, including hill farming etc. subsidies, as a ratio to the total receipts from the sale of British sheepmeat in the United Kingdom market for home consumption in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: Information is not available in the form requested.

National Aids

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he examines national aids given to agriculture by other member states of the European Economic Community to ensure that they comply with articles 92 and 93 of the treaty of Rome; and whether he will publish in the Official Report details of the national aids given to agriculture by the other member states, together with the amount spent for the latest period for which figures are available in each case.

Mr. MacGregor: The European Commission is responsible for monitoring all aids given by member states with a view to ensuring they are compatible with the Community's rules. It would not be appropriate for my Department to duplicate this work. We are however constantly on the alert for national aids to agriculture that appear to breach the Treaty and remain fully prepared to refer substantiated cases to the Commission. Full details of aids to agriculture in other member states are not available.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Dr. Cunningham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the broadleaved woodlands clearfelled under licence but not to be replanted in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in the Forestry Commission's (a) south-west England conservancy, (b) north-west England conservancy, (c) north-east England conservancy, (d) east England conservancy and (e) south-east England conservancy.

Mrs. Fenner: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Soil Survey

Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received with regard to the continuation of the soil survey of England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: In response to recent representations we have confirmed that the funding of the soil survey is unchanged for the current year and will be set at around half the present level in 1986-87. We believe that the wide range of interests which make use of the expertise of the survey offers scope for it to operate more commercially in the future.

EC Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the European Economic Community Commission's latest budget proposals for expenditure by common agricultural policy products for 1985.

Mr. Jopling: The Council has now established a draft Budget for 1985 which provides for expenditure by product as set out in the reply given to the hon. Member on 17 April 1985 at column 205.

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the anticipated increase in common agricultural policy expenditure in 1985 resulting from the most recent budget proposals as compared with 1984.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on Thursday 9 May 1985 at column 499.

Bees

Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to take steps to ban the importation of foreign queen honey bees; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Under the Importation of Bees Order 1980 the importation of bees is prohibited except under the authority of a licence. Licences are issues only in respect of queen bees (with attendant workers) from countries which have a high bee health status and, more particularly, are free from the parasitic mite, Varroa jacobsoni. In practice imports are restricted to those from New Zealand and the USA. At the present time there is no reason to prohibit imports from these countries although the situation is kept under review.

Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the current legislation on honey bee diseases.

Mrs. Fenner: We have received a number of letters, including some from hon. Members, on various aspects of bee disease. In reply we have made clear the importance which I attach to maintaining a healthy bee population and have described the arrangements which we have introduced to that end. I am satisfied that our current arrangements provide fully adequate protection for the health of our bee population. However, we keep the situation under review and would modify our arrangements should this become necessary.

Genetic Research Expenditure

Mr. Steel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement outlining how genetic research spending within his Department's research and development budget is determined.

Mrs. Fenner: Expenditure on animal and plant genetic research has been determined after taking account of the views of the industry, the Agricultural and Food Research Council and advice from within my own Department. In future the advice of the Priorities Board will also be available to Ministers and the Agricultural and Food Research Council in determining the allocation of research and development budgets.

Vitamins (Food Labelling)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations have been received by his Department regarding the implications for vitamin manufacturers of his Department's food labelling regulations; and if he will list the organisations concerned and state which representations concerned vitamin E.

Mrs. Fenner: Since proposals for new food labelling regulations were issued in September 1983 my Department has received representations concerning the labelling vitamin products and of foods containing vitamins from trade associations, manufacturers, retailers and individuals. Most of these representations have been general in nature and have not referred specifically to the implications for vitamin manufacturers.

Vitamin Deficiency

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has sought or received from outside his Department as to whether vitamin E deficiency constitutes a health problem in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department is advised on such health matters by the medical advisers in the Department of Health and Social Security. Their advice is that vitamin E is present in adequate amounts in any likely diet in this country.

Agricultural Land (Access)

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions his Department is having with interested bodies on the question of access to agricultural land.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department attends regular meetings of the Rights of Way Review Committee and the Common Land Forum, the membership of which includes a broad cross-section of bodies interested in the question of access to agricultural land.

My Department assisted the Countryside Commission in preparing its "Countryside Access Charter", in whose launch in March this year my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Lord Belstead, participated.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Statistics)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each local authority the latest estimates available of (a) rate support grant, (b) rate support grant per domestic ratepayer, (c) expenditure on education, (d) expenditure on police, (e) revenue from domestic rates and (f) revenue from commercial and business rates.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have today placed in the Library the information, based on local authorities' 1984-85 budgets.

Conservation Policy

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the adoption of conservation policies for already designated conservation areas.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local Planning authorities have a duty under the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 to formulate and to publish proposals for the preservation and enhancement of designated conservation areas. It is for local planning authorities to determine how to carry out this duty in practice. My right hon. Friend has no plans to add to the guidance set out in DOE Circulars 23/77 and 12/81.

Footpaths

Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects that sections 53 and 54 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, relating to the definitive map for footpaths, will be brought into force for Cornwall.

Mr. Waldegrave: The bringing into force of sections 53 and 54 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for Cornwall is dependent on the completion by my Department and the Cornwall county council of action on the current definitive map and review. I expect this to be completed by the end of 1986.

Designated Buildings

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many authorities have designated buildings under local schemes under section 12 of the Housing Defects Act 1984 since its coming into force.

Mr. Gow: No designations have been made.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been given to local authorities in contributions where local authorities have designated local schemes under section 12 of the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: No designations under section 12 of the Act have been made.

Smith Houses

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Smith houses he has (a) visited himself personally and (b) instructed his officials to visit in (i) Birmingham and (ii) any other areas; and whether he will publish the evidence available to him about the value and condition of Smith houses.

Mr. Gow: The condition of Smith houses is discussed in the Building Research Establishment report "The Structural condition of Smith system houses", published in December 1983. As part of its investigation, the BRE inspected in detail six Smith houses (three in Birmingham and three in other areas) and examined a further 25 in those areas. I have visited seven Smith houses in the Birmingham area. In addition to BRE inspectors my officials have made other such visits in Birmingham.

As indicated in my reply of 8 May, at column 417, we have no evidence of any substantial reduction in value generally. But there has been a substantial reduction in the value of those Smith houses in Birmingham which are defective through use of shale fill. It would not be appropriate to publish the detailed valuations.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with (a) local authority officials and (b) other interested parties about Smith houses in the last 12 months; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: Over the last year my Department has obtained information on Smith houses from local authorities and other interested parties. I have kept closely informed those hon. Members who have previously raised this subject and I met local Members of Parliament, City officials and other interested parties during my visit to Birmingham on 25 May last year. My officials have had separate discussions with City officials.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department first became aware of defects in Smith houses.

Mr. Gow: The condition of Smith houses was first raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan) and formed the subject of replies given to him on 8 November 1982 at column 80.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the areas in which Smith houses have been built; and (a) which of these areas have been visited and inspected by officials of his Department and (b) in which of these areas Smith houses were found to be defective.

Mr. Gow: Smith houses have been reported in the following local authority areas in England and Wales:

Amber Valley
Ashfield
Erewash
Leicester
North East Derbyshire
Birmingham
Dudley
Nuneaton
Sandwell
Walsall
Wolverhampton
Cardiff

The Building Research Establishment inspected houses in Birmingham, Cardiff, Erewash and Amber Valley during its investigation of Smith houses. I refer the hon. Lady to my reply to her of 8 May at column 417, on the condition of this type of house in Birmingham and generally.

Councillors (Subsistence)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the circumstances in which subsistence may be claimed by local councillors; and what is an approved duty allowable for a claim by a member of a local authority.

Mr. Waldegrave: The circumstances under which a councillor may claim a subsistence allowance are set out in section 174 of the Local Government Act 1972. The scope of the term "approved duty" is outlined in section 177(2) of that Act, but the Government take the view that the interpretation of the statute is for individual local authorities. The judgment as to the correctness of that interpretation in a particular case is in the first instance a matter for the independent auditor appointed by the Audit Commission and ultimately one for the courts.

Homes (Insulation)

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many grants for homes insulation have been given in each year since 1978; and what estimate he has of the number of grants paid to households where one member of the household was in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Sir George Young: Numbers of home insulation scheme grants paid in 1982, 1983 and 1984 (provisional) appear in table 2.17 of "Housing and Construction Statistics" part 2, No. 20: figures for the earlier years were last published in table 7.5 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1973-1983". Copies of these publications are available in the Library.

Figures are not collected of the numbers paid to recipients of supplementary benefit.

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of public sector houses which do not benefit from adequate insulation.

Sir George Young: The available information is from a sample survey conducted by Audits of Great Britain and it is estimated that at the end of 1983 about 1 million council houses in Great Britain had no loft insulation or less than 2 inches of loft insulation.

Thermal Insulation

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current standards defined by building regulations for thermal insulation in (a) new buildings and (b) other buildings; and whether he proposes to upgrade these.

Sir George Young: The current standards defined by the building regulations for the resistence to the passage of heat through the roof, external walls and external floor of new buildings and extensions to existing buildings are:

Type of building	Minimum U value required W/m^2 °C
	External walls and floors	Roofs
Dwellings	0·6	0·35
Residential other than dwellings, shops, offices assembly, recreational	0·6	0·6
Industrial; Storage	0·7	0·7

Hot water pipes and tanks are also required to be insulated.

My right Friend has no proposals at present to upgrade these Standards. All the technical requirements of the building regulations including those for the conservation of fuel and power will be reviewed once the new system of building control has been introduced later this year.

Home Improvement Grants

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been paid out in home improvement grants by local authorities in each of the last five years.

Sir George Young: The figures requested are as follows:

	£m cash
1980-81	129
1981-82	197
1982-83	425
1983-84	*911

* Provisional.

The amount spent by local authorities on home improvement grants in 1984-85 is expected to have been around £740 million.

EC Directive (Wild Birds)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the letter number S6(84) D/2695 dated 23 February 1984 from the Commission of the European Communities to Her Majesty's Government concerning directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the reply from Her Majesty's Government contained in letter number SER 226/2 of 17 May 1984.

Mr. Macfarlane: Copies of these two letters have been placed in the Library.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many requests he has received from the Nature Conservancy Council for section 29 orders since 1 January; how many of these requests have been granted and how many have yet to be decided; and what is the time each order has taken to be processed from the date it was secured by his Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member with this information.

National Home Improvement Council (Exhibition)

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the National Home Improvement Council to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Gow: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 13 May to 17 May.

Ronan Point (Report)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the report of the Building Research Establishment's investigation of Ronan Point and other Taylor Woodrow Anglian Buildings will be published.

Mr. Gow: The Building Research Establishment's report on the structure of Ronan Point and other Taylor Woodrow Anglian (TWA) buildings is being published today. The main findings of the BRE's investigation were announced in the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 19 February at columns 409-10. The report contains detailed analyses which support those findings and I commend it to those responsible for managing and maintaining Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings and to the consulting engineers and others who advise them.

Some of the conclusions in the BRE report apply not only to Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings but have implications for large panel system buildings generally.

In the statement which I made on 23 October 1984 at columns 553-57 I advised that authorities should take urgent steps to prevent the use and storage of liquefied petroleum gas cylinders and other explosive materials in large panel system buildings of all type over six storeys in height which were not designed or strengthened to resist a standard static pressure of 34 KN/m² (5 p.s.i.). I repeat this urgent advice to authorities which have not done so already to take steps to guard against the risk, even if it is remote, of these large panel buildings being seriously damaged by explosion, by preventing the use and storage in them of LPG.

The necessary steps include effective publicity about the danger of LPG and the readiness to take enforcement action when necessary. I appreciate that in some cases tenants face difficulties because existing heating systems are inefficient or expensive. In these cases one possibility local authorities should consider is to provide alternative, more economic forms of heating, combined where necessary with better insulation.

In my statement of 23 October 1984 I also referred to the risk of progressive collapse in certain large panel buildings of six or fewer storeys. Many such buildings do conform to the requirements of D17 of the building regulations, which require, inter alia, that the relevant parts of the structure should be capable of withstanding static pressure of 34KN/m² (5 p.s.i). But where they do not and particularly where piped gas is installed or LPG is being used, I urge authorities to appraise the robustness of the buildings and their resistance to progressive collapse, as indicated in the BRE report.

Having appraised their large panel buildings authorities will need to consider carefully all of the steps which they should take, including management measures mentioned above (for example, the use and enforcement of tenancy agreements, to ensure that LPG is not used) as well as possible works such as the modification or replacement of heating systems or the alternative of strengthening buildings to the 34KN/m standard. Authorities will need to consider carefully the relative costs and benefits of the options open to them, while also keeping in mind the need for other expenditure on the maintenance and renovation of these buildings in the longer term. Though it will be for each authority to decide on the best course of action my Department will give whatever further advice it can.

The Department is writing today to those authorities which own large panel system flats and houses to bring these recommendations to their attention. Copies of the BRE report are being sent to each of them: a copy has been placed in the Library.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

UNESCO

Mr Key asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards technical support for selected national institutions with a view to developing prototype curricula for health education at school and related teacher training in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute in 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards contracts with institutions for pilot activities aimed at introducing into literacy activities for young people and adults, and educational dimension relating to population problems and drug abuse prevention in 1984-85; and how much it intends to contribute in the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(3) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards (a) the organisation of training activities aiming to include in educational curricula and non-formal educational activities interdisciplinary content relating to drug abuse prevention, and (b) the publication of an appraisal of activities undertaken by certain member states in education and communication to combat the use of narcotics and prevent drug abuse in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(4) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards operational projects to further the inclusion in general educational curricula and in non-formal educational activities of subject matter relating to problems connected with the quality of life, the environment and nutrition education in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(5) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards the development of Palestine university institutions in the occupied Arab territories in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(6) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards consultancy services to assist in setting up a scholarship fund for students from the occupied Arab territories in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(7) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards further training fellowships for the teaching staff of universities in the occupied Arab territories, and to the supply of teaching materials and equipment for these universities in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(8) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards the supply of educational material and equipment for the education centres of African national liberation movements, and the organisation of seminars with a view to improving the training of the staff of the centres in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(9) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed to fellowships for students sponsored by African national liberation movements and students presented by the Palestine Liberation Organisation in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(10) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards the cost of printing school textbooks for the education centres of African national liberation movements in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(11) how much the United nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation subsidised the publication of African poems and other activities decided upon with those responsible for education in African national liberation movements with a view to helping to preserve their cultural identity in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(12) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards informing public opinion about the assistance it provided in the implementation of education projects of African national liberation movements in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

Mr. Raison: I am seeking this information from the organisation and will circulate it in the Official Report.

Ethiopia and Sudan (Food Aid)

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commowealth Affairs what action he proposes to take in the light of the Court of Auditors report on the European Economic Community for 1983, to ensure that cereals and foodstuffs allocated and committed for delivery to the drought-affected areas of Ethiopia and Sudan are received by those for whom they are intended.

Mr. Raison: Much has been done since 1983 to improve the procedures for agreeing the Community's annual food aid programme and individual commitments and thus to remove some of the causes of the delays criticised by the Court of Auditors. The Commission have also taken steps to speed up deliveries to the most seriously affected countries. However, I believe the Community could respond more rapidly in emergencies. The Development Council on 23 May will review progress in delivering recent Community food aid commitments to Africa.

Centre for World Development Education

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement with regard to the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the Centre for World Development Education, with particular reference to its funding in the period 1979 to 1985 and in the future.

Mr. Raison: The Government have provided financial support for the Centre for World Development Education since it was established in 1977. In the period 1979-80 to 1984-85 grants totalling £793,000 were provided. Subject to Parliamentary approval I propose to allocate £100,000 per annum for 1985-86 and 1986-87. Our hope is that the continuation of support in this way will enable the centre to identify secure sources of funds for their activities from non-Government sources.

Ethiopia

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what agricultural aid was given by Her Majesty's Government to Ethiopia in each of the last five years.

Mr. Raison: No agricultural aid was given to Ethiopia on a bilateral basis during the four years from 1980 to 1983 inclusive, but the Government provided £165,000 to buy seeds and tools in 1984. Ethiopia is a major recipient of multilateral aid especially from the European Community, to which we make a substantial contribution. Much of such aid goes to the agricultural sector.

India (Westland Helicopters)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there will be a reduction in total aid expenditure in 1985-86 in the event of failure to achieve a sale for Westland helicopters to India; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I have no plans to reduce total aid expenditure in 1985-86.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Overseas Development Administration intends to buy for sale elsewhere Westland helicopters which cannot be sold to India.

Mr. Raison: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the 1985-86 aid commitment to India is in respect of the Westland helicopter sales; if failure to achieve the contract for this sale will reduce total United Kingdom aid to India by the amount involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: An allocation of £45 million has been made for 1985-86. Discussions with the Government of India about the provision of Westland helicopters are still continuing. There might well be implications for the aid programme to India if the contract were not concluded.

United Nations (Children's Fund Appeal)

Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government intend to make a further contribution to the United Nations international children's emergency fund appeal for Africa.

Mr. Raison: I have made available a further £1 million for the UNICEF special appeal for Africa. This is in addition to the £1 million contribution announced in August 1984.

EMPLOYMENT

Trade Union Rules

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will introduce legislation to require major changes in the rules of trades unions to be subject to an affirmative vote of their members in a manner similar to that specified in part III of the Trade Union Act 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have no plans to introduce such legislation at present.

Redundant Miners

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on proposals to provide retraining places in skillcentres for redundant miners; how many places will be offered and in what areas; what will be the Government's financial contribution; and when discussions on this proposal were instigated.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I very much welcome the agreement signed on 2 May between the skillcentre training agency and the National Coal Board to provide training for people leaving the mining industry under the board's voluntary redundancy arrangements. This will create new opportunities for those who choose to leave the industry. The contract, worth up to £10 million, is the largest ever private contract obtained by the skillcentre training agency.

Training will be available under these arrangements for all who choose to take voluntary redundancy and decide to take advantage of the opportunity. It is not possible at this stage to predict the number of applications which will be made. The training can be provided by any skillcentre in any National Coal Board area and will be within the capacity of the re-organised skillcentre network.

This is a commercial contract between the National Coal Board and the Manpower Services Commission and will be financed accordingly by the Board.

The discussions, linked to the development of the Board's enterprise initiative, were initiated in May 1984.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Nicaragua

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy on trade with Nicaragua.

Mr. Channon: Our trade with Nicaragua is minimal and I do not think this will change in the foreseeable future.

Chile (Export Licences)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy regarding the granting of export licences for vehicles, weapons or equipment to Chile.

Mr. Channon: In the case of Chile or other countries arms sales are considered individually on their merit. The nature of the regime of the importing country and the use to which the equipment may be put are among the many factors which are taken into account before a decision is made whether or not to grant an export licence.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications for export licences have been made for the sale of vehicles, equipment or weapons to Chile in the past 12 months.

Mr. Channon: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to make public information of this kind.

Consumer Safety

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many consumer safety complaints in respect of imported goods have been made by trading standards officers in the last 12 months; how the figure compares with previous 12-month periods; and to what extent such complaints relate to specific types of goods and to specific countries of origin.

Mr. Fletcher: This information is not kept centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Consumer safety complaints are made in the first instance to trading standards officers who pass them on to my Department only if the goods concerned cannot be dealt with under the powers already available to TSOs, or if the case raises questions of policy. Of the total number of consumer safety complaints made to TSOs, a significant proportion relate to imported goods; a recent survey by TSOs in the Midlands suggested that this might be as much as 80 per cent.

Imported Goods (Trading Standards)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are taken to ensure that imported goods comply with trading standards; if he is satisfied that present measures are adequate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Imported goods are subject to trading standards legislation. Enforcement is primarily a matter for local authority trading standards departments.

We propose to amend the legislation on consumer safety to deal more effectively with imports as soon as the legislative programme permits. Our proposals are set out in the White Paper on the "Sale of Goods" (Cmnd. 9302) published last July.

Trans-national Corporations

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the outstanding issues in the negotiations for a United Nations code of conduct for trans-national corporations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Government continue to support negotiation of a balanced code, which could make a useful contribution to improving the climate for international investment, particularly in developing countries. On the main outstanding issues we consider that the code should be voluntary, should provide for non-discriminatory treatment by Governments of trans-national corporations and respect for international law, and should also be universally applicable.

Exports

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give comparative figures in money and percentage terms for the percentage change in exports of (a) cereals and (b) all agricultural products and the percentage change in the remainder of British exports, broken down also into its principal sections.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

*Change in United Kingdom Exports between 1979 and 1984

	Change
	£ million	Per cent.
Cereals and cereal preparations	+ 728	+276
All Agricultural products	+ 1,446	+ 80
Other Exports	+26,314	+ 64
of which
Beverages and Tobacco	+ 383	+ 32
Inedible Crude Materials (excl. Fuels)	716	+ 61
Mineral Fuels, Lubricants etc	+11,043	+255
Chemicals and Related products	+ 3,304	+ 67
Manufactured Goods	+ 567	+ 6
Machinery and Transport Equipment	+ 6,733	+ 46
Miscellaneous Manufactures	+ 2,996	+ 76
Miscellaneous Commodities and Transactions	+ 573	+ 47

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1973 the amount of the United Kingdom contribution to own resources under (a) value added tax and (b) other resources, together with the United Kingdom share in each case of the European Economic Community total; and to what extent the United Kingdom rebate has been reduced by confining the calculation to the value added tax element.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Details of the United Kingdom's contribution to own resources under value added tax and other resources, together with its share of the EEC total are given in the Official Journal of the European Communities —"Annual Report by the Court of Auditors". The copies covering the period 1973 to 1983 are in the Library of the House. The latest estimated outturn figures for 1984 are as follows:—

United Kingdom Contribution of Own Resources 1984 (MECU)

(a) Value-added tax—2,927 (20·05 per cent. of total)

(b) Other own resources—2,603 (25·05 per cent. of total)

(c) Total United Kingdom contribution—5,530 (22·1 per cent. of total EC own resources)

The calculation of the United Kingdom's rebate is not confined to the value-added tax element. As the Prime Minister pointed out in her statement to the House at column 1002, the calculation takes the majority of the United Kingdom's contribution to all forms of own resources into account. Furthermore, it is not possible to calculate to what extent the United Kingdom abatement has been affected by the agreement reached at Fontainebleau since it cannot be known what agreement, if any, could have been reached on other arrangements to reduce the United Kingdom's net contributions for future years.

Illegal Drugs

Mr. Irving asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the quantity and type of illegal drugs seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise by year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: The quantities and type of illegal drugs seized in each year since 1979 are set out in the following table. (The figures for 1984 are provisional.)

Personal Incomes

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide information on the net income after income tax, national insurance contributions and child benefit at (a) actual prices and (b) constant (April 1985) prices of typical household units (i) single, (ii) married couple, (iii) married couple with two children, (iv) married couple with four children whose gross income is at (x) the lowest decile, (y) the median and (z) the highest decile for each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide a table showing the cost of mortgage interest tax relief for each year since 1964 at 1985 prices.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Poaching

Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people have been (a) fined and (b) imprisoned for poaching over the past six years; and what was the average fine and average term of imprisonment.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Statistics on the sentencing of persons for poaching are not separately kept and could not be obtained for the past six years except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people have been prosecuted under the Freshwater and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976; and what was the average fine or other sentence imposed on those found guilty.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Statistics are not separately kept for contraventions of the Freshwater and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976. Information on the disposals of such cases could not therefore be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students (Income)

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department's review of student grants and the funding of higher education includes a review of the different treatment accorded to a student's income derived from local authority or central Government grants, and income derived from parental contribution, whether directly or by covenant.

Mr. Brooke: The Government will consider all points made to them about student support arrangements during the current wide-ranging review. However, the treatment of income for tax purposes remains the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what ratio of membership to representation he considers appropriate for the union side of the Burnham committee; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what criteria he will take into account when deciding the balance of representation in the union side of the Burnham committee;

(3) whether he will appoint an independent chairman to the review of membership composition of the union side of the Burnham committee; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

School Library Provision

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to respond to the report of the Library and Information Services Council on school library provision.

Mr. Dunn: The White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) makes clear the Government's view that the function and use of school libraries should form part of the curricular policy of every local education authority and school since schools are better placed to extend the range and depth of pupils' learning when library services are included in their curricular policies. The Government recognise the importance of school libraries and look to local education authorities and schools to explore ways in which the resources available can be most effectively deployed.

The Library and Information Services Council's report also addressed a number of recommendations to local authorities, training establishments, staffs of schools, professional bodies and others. Those recommendations are to be considered by the bodies concerned.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will order a report by Her Majesty's Inspectorate into the provision of books in schools and school library services.

Mr. Dunn: The report of a survey by Her Majesty's inspectors of school libraries in six local education authorities will be published later this month. Book provision is referred to, often in detail, in HMI's reports on individual schools and on educational provision in particular authorities, and in their annual report on the effects of local authorities' expenditure policies—all of which are published.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will seek to determine statutory minimum levels for the (a) financial provision, (b) book stock and (c) staffing of school library services in England and Wales.

Mr. Dunn: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many local education authorities in England and Wales have a school library service.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not collect information from local education authorities about their arrangements for school library services.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to seek to make the provision of a school library service a statutory provision in England and Wales.

Mr. Dunn: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many qualified librarians were employed in school libraries in England and Wales for each of the last five years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not collect information in this form from local education authorities.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total expenditure by the National Health Service on ancillary services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no precise definition of ancillary services. Current expenditure by health authorities classified as on general services was £2,704·2 million in 1983-84. The details were given in table 1 in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 21 December 1984 at columns 412-14.

Doctors

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of qualified doctors employed by the National Health Service in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of qualified doctors directly employed by the National Health Service in England at 30 September 1984 was 48,900. This figure includes all permanent paid and honorary doctors working in the hospital and community health services except locums. It excludes general medical practitioners (25,800 at 30 September 1984), except those also employed on a part-time basis in the HCHS (4,300).

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average salary of each nursing grade employed by the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested for the main nursing pay grades based on the minimum and maximum points of the 1984 pay scales is in the table. In addition to basic pay, nurses in grades up to and including senior nurse 6 and senior tutor are eligible for additional payments, mainly for working unsocial hours or overtime. The table therefore includes the estimated annual gross earnings of these staff where readily available. Pay rates for 1985 will be determined in the light of the recommendations of the review body for nursing staff, midwives, health visitors and professions allied to medicine.

Residential Homes

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he decided to compile a questionnaire for completion by disturbed elderly and handicapped people who seek social security assistance to pay for private home places; and if he will make provision for his Department's staff to help them to understand them and fill them in.

Mr. Whitney: The draft letter seeking information from people in residential care and nursing homes claiming supplementary benefit has been simplified. Copies of the revised version have been placed in the Library.

Supplementary Benefit

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has been expended in supplementary benefit heating additions in the latest available period; and if he will break down the claimants by category.

Mr. Whitney: Our most recent estimate is that some £400 million was spent in heating additions in the financial year 1984-85. A breakdown of the numbers of supplementary benefit claimants in different groups who receive a heating addition is only available at one point in a year. The latest figures are provisional estimates for December 1983.

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many supplementary benefit single payments in respect of draughtproofing or other named energy saving measures have been made in each of the last three years.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 28 November 1984 at column 525. I regret that comparable figures for 1983 and 1984 are still unavailable because they have been delayed by the recent strike at Newcastle central office.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff were responsible for dealing with supplementary benefit claims in each of the last five years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Whitney: Returns of local office staff which sub divide those actually working on supplementary benefit from those on contributory benefit work have been kept only since May 1983. Additionally, it is not possible to give a separate figure for staff employed exclusively on claims work, as opposed to other tasks arising from supplementary benefits.

However, the following figures for 1981 to 1983 relate to the number of staff allocated to do supplementary benefit work in local offices and the figures for 1984 and 1985 relate to the numbers of staff actually in post.

April of Year	Numbers
1981	34,782
1982	34,220
1983	35,290
1984	37,639
1985	39,536

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what way attendance allowance will be accounted for in the assessment of costs under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985.

Mr. Whitney: The Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 amend regulation 11 of the Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Regulations 1981 to enable attendance allowance to be taken fully into account as a resource in assessing a person's entitlement to supplementary benefit, where that person is living in a residential care or nursing home.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision will be made under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 for supplementary benefit payments to be paid in bulk to a home; and for what uses such supplementary benefit payments can be made.

Mr. Whitney: The Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 make no provisions for payments of supplementary benefit to be made in bulk to a home. Current legislation allows such payments to be made only in individual cases where the claimant has incurred serious debt.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in respect of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985, which authority has a duty to ensure that assessment for care is made and provided for.

Mr. Whitney: Supplementary benefit for people in all forms of board and lodging accommodation is paid on the basis of the accommodation in which the individual is resident and does not take account of any assessed need for that accommodation. The existing duties of both local authorities and health authorities in respect of those requiring residential or nursing home care remain unchanged. The local social service authorities and district health authorities also through the registration systems for residential care homes and nursing homes respectively ensure there are satisfactory standards in registered homes. A joint working party between this Department and the local authority associations has been considering the scope for improving collaboration between the Department and local authorities in relation to the support from public funds of those in residential care homes including the assessment of the resident's need for that type of care.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what duty is placed upon local authorities and health authorities to provide topping-up payments under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985.

Mr. Whitney: The Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 do not place any duty upon local authorities to provide "topping-up" payments but allow local authorities who wish to make such payments to do so in certain circumstances without affecting supplementary benefit entitlement. There are no provisions concerning "topping-up" payments by health authorities.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985, local authorities have a responsibility for (a) social work input, (b) transfers and (c) attending case reviews.

Mr. Whitney: The Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 did not alter local authorities' statutory powers and duties with regard to people in need of residential care.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many unemployed persons aged between 20 and 25 years are in receipt of supplementary benefit; what is the average payment; and what is the total cost.

Mr. Whitney: In December 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were approximately 379,000 unemployed persons between 20 and 25 years (eg between their 20th and day before their 25th birthdays) in receipt of supplementary benefit. The average weekly payment was £23·75. Information on total cost is not available, as separate records of every payment to this age group are not maintained.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of single payments made in 1983 to meet exceptional needs of those receiving supplementary benefit; what was the average amount paid; and if he will provide a breakdown of these totals into the major categories of payments.

Mr. Whitney: The information is contained in table 19.2 of the DHSS Annual Statistical Enquiry, a copy of which is in the Library. The information relates to the December 1982 enquiry, the latest date for which figures are available.

Figures from the "Annual Statistical Enquiry" relate to single payments made during the 12 months preceding the date of the inquiry to persons still in receipt of supplementary benefit at the time of the enquiry, and do not, therefore, record all the single payments made during the year.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures showing the total number of supplementary benefit claimants with additional requirements at the latest date for which figures are available, and the number in each of the following categories: (a) retirement pensioners and national insurance widows aged 60 years and over, (b) unemployed, (c) sick and disabled, (d) national insurance widows under 60 years and (e) one-parent families.

Mr. Whitney: Provisional information at December 1983 is as follows:

	Number of claimants 000's
Total number	2,716
Retirement pensioners and National Insurance widows aged 60 and over	1,446
Unemployed	646
Sick and disabled	150
National Insurance widows aged under 60	13
One-parent families	303

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry 1983.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures showing the average amount and number of additional requirements to supplementary benefit by category of additional requirement.

Mr. Whitney: Provisional information, December 1983, is as follows:

Category	Average amount	†Number of additional requirements 000's*

* A standard rate of additional requirement is laid down in regulations.

† Some claimants will receive more than one additional requirement.

‡ Less than 500.

Note: Some additional requirements given to supplementary pensioners and other claimants receiving the higher long term scale rate of supplementary benefit are subject to the available scale margin deduction (50p in 1983). The amounts shown do not take account of this deduction.

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry 1983.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much supplementary benefit went unclaimed in each of the last five financial years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Whitney: The only information available is an estimate of £760 million derived from family expenditure survey data for the calendar year 1981.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of those eligible claimed (a) supplementary benefit, (b) family income supplement and (c) rent rebate, rate rebate or housing benefit in each of the last five financial years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of those in receipt of unemployment benefit who have been unemployed for between six months and a year are also in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: At November 1983 (the latest date for which figures are available) there were 82,500 persons in receipt of both unemployment and supplementary benefit who had been unemployed for between six months and a year.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many unemployed persons aged (a) between 16 and 19 years and (b) 20 and 25 years are in receipt of unemployment benefit; and how many have been receiving unemployment benefit for (i) up to six months and (ii) more than six months.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is:

Unemployment Benefit Recipients	Aged 16-19	Aged 20-25
Unemployed up to 6 months	63,200	147,100
Unemployed more than 6 months	23,300	63,100

Note The information relates to people between their 16th and the day before their 20th birthdays and between their 20th and the day before their 25th birthdays respectively.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many recipients of standard housing benefit he estimates currently have incomes above their supplementary benefit entitlement.

Mr. Whitney: The majority of standard housing benefit cases will have incomes above their supplementary benefit entitlement. I regret that reliable information on which to base a more precise estimate will not be available until the end of this year, for the reasons I set out in my letter of 22 March to the hon. Member concerning take up estimates, a copy of which is in the Library.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the families receiving family income supplement in October 1984 were self-employed.

Mr. Whitney: Of 204,000 families receiving family income supplement at the end of October 1984, 27,000 were self-employed.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to whom a family income supplement order book is made payable in a two-parent family.

Mr. Whitney: Family income supplement is receivable by either the man or the woman in a two-parent family and the order book is generally made payable to the woman, with the man shown as alternative payee.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the number of one-parent and two-parent families with one, two, three, four and five or more children, respectively, in receipt of the maximum family income supplement, showing the average family income supplement payment for each group at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Whitney: The following is the position at the end of February 1985.

	Average payment £	Numbers on maximum
One-parent family
With 1 child	11·70	5,000
2 children	14·00	4,000
3 children	16·20	1,000

4 children	13·60	2,000
5 or more	16·80	1,000
Total	11·30	15,000

* Less than 500, rounded to nearest 1,000.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the number of one- and two-parent families receiving less than £5, £5 to £10, £10 to £15, £15 to £20, £20 to £25, £25 to £30, £30 or over in family income supplement at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Whitney: The following is the position at the end of February 1985. It is regretted that a breakdown over £25 is not available.

Amount of award	Number of one-parent families	Number of two-parent families
Less than £5	14,000	33,000

Chiropodists

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any requests from the Council for the Professions Supplementary to Medicine for amending legislation to preclude non-registered chiropodists from working and treating patients in private nursing homes.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

Committee on Safety of Medicines

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he is satisfied that, throughout their service, present and past members of the Committee on Safety of Medicines having a connection with a pharmaceutical company have maintained a level of objectivity consistent with their status as committee members; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will indicate the length of service on the Committee on Safety of Medicines of each of its members;

(3) if he will take steps to ensure that the Committee on Safety of Medicines is wholly independent in its membership from the pharmaceutical industry;

(4) how many members of the Committee on Safety of Medicines have any connection, financial or otherwise, with pharmaceutical companies; and if he will name them;

(5) if he will name the organisations employing each member of the Committee on Safety of Medicines;

(6) if he will list the current members of the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 78

SESSION 1984–85

29th April—10th May 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations
